The verse reads: "Whensoever I take my jo ney into Spain, I will come to you; for I tr to see you in my journey, and to be brought my way thitherward by you, if first I be so what filled with your company."

The Explosion of an Empty Whiskey B rel in New York, a few days ago, is a somew uncommon form in which the injurious prop ties of the liquor were manifested. We are miliar with its effects on the persons who dr it, but in this case the injury assumed a n shape. The occupant of a tenement house moved the bung from the empty barrel, a tried to see what was inside by the light o match. The barrel was impregnated with fumes of the whisky it had contained, and ploded doing considerable damage.

ev. Dawson Burns, the Distinguished Tempe nce advocate, now on a visit to this country, e ived a cordial welcome on August 7th, from th epresentatives of the Temperance Societies. T meeting was held in the parlors of the Y. M. A. in New York, and though only con e d by circular, was well attended.

r. Burns described the progress of tempe- e work in England and the objects of the ous organizations established in that coun- to promote the Temperance cause. "One ese," Mr. Burns said, "is really an insur- company; I speak of the Temperance and al Provident Society, organized in 1840. he first ten years only total abstainers were itted to become members; but then its were thrown open to all. Abstainers and bstainers are kept in different sections, and rofits of each section are also kept separ- Every five years a dividend is declared, though there are only about 10,000 mem- n the total abstinence section, while there er 15,000 in the other, the profits of the section as compared with the latter have s been much larger, showing the influence perance in prolonging life."

Remarkable Pair of Criminals are Under at Norwich, Conn. It was discovered he houses of several wealthy citizens of ity had been plundered while the owners away on summer excursions. For some o clue could be obtained to the identity depredators, but at length an empty pill- s picked up in one of the rifled houses, on it was the name of a young lady very r in the city. A watch was set upon her, was found that she and her lover, who is of a prominent Norwich merchant, had tted the burglaries. The crimes have been on since July 9th, and a considerable ty of property has been stolen. The prisoner, who is nineteen years of age, sed her guilt and revealed the spot where ost valuable part of the plunder was d.

aloon-Keeper on Sixth Avenue, New related at a religious meeting in the city ek the reasons which had caused him to on abandoning his business. Among stomers, he said, were judges, lawyers, s, and men from the best classes of socie- e saw many of those who visited his place ruin. One, worth some hundreds of nds of dollars, went so low that he was stand at the bars of the vilest saloons a glass of beer from any who would treat Another, a young man, the joy and hope other's heart, took his first "drink" in respectable" "first-class" saloon, and fter sunk so low that he took his own he saloon is near the Gospel Tent, and nns sung in the tent could be distinctly in the saloon. Curiosity prompted the keeper to visit the tent, and there, by ce of God, he was converted. The com- "Leave all and follow me," was impress- is mind, and he resolved to obey it. He ed the prayers of Christians that he might e instrumental in the salvation of many s he feels deeply that through his former on many were led astray.

ullis, of Boston, whose Work was De- in a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN D, held a meeting on July 31st, at the chard Camp-meeting ground. In the of his address on "Faith Cures," Dr. mentioned two cases which had come is own observation, one of a tumor and er of blindness for nine years, which had ealed by means of faith. Captain R. R. from the Military Academy, Chester, stified that in 1872 he was afflicted art disease, caused by improper exercise gymnasium. After consulting the most physicians, and finding no relief, he went ornia, where he remained three years, and rd to Europe, hoping thereby to regain lth, but without avail. One year ago t broke down and he was unable to take even a five minutes' walk. He read Dr. Cullis's book entitled "Faith Cures," and finding not the least hope of recovery from any other source, applied to the doctor for healing by prayer, and was restored to health by that means, so that he was enabled to walk a mile or more to attend to his duties at the academy. Albert A. Cheney, of the Baptist Church, Brattleboro, Vt., testified that he was one of three in his church who had been cured by faith. Many others related similar experiences, and when a call was made for those to rise who had been cured through faith, fifty responded.

A Strange Retreat is Resorted to by myriads of ants on the banks of the Amazon. A traveller in that region describes a gigantic reed which grows near the river, and attains a height of nearly thirty feet. He noticed on the summit of the reeds a ball of earth, and found that it was the home of swarms of ants, who were thus safe from inundations, and yet were able to descend through the hollow reed to procure their food. It is an illustration of the condition of him whose "life is hid with Christ in God" (Col. 3 : 3), but his refuge from the storms of the world is not built on a reed, but on foundations which can never be overthrown.

Ice Water for the Poor.—The Business Men's Moderation Society is about to extend still further the good work it commenced in New York by the erection of an ice-water fountain at the Post Office. It is now announced that a water-cooler mounted on wheels will be sent through the streets of the city where tenement houses abound, and the poor inhabitants will be supplied with cold water free of cost.

How a Lie Caused the Death of a Child at Oceanica, Md., recently, is related by the Youth's Companion. It recalls the punishment of Ananias and Sapphira. A man in Oceanica had a vicious, kicking horse, which he was anxious to sell. While trying to make a bargain with a probable purchaser, he remarked, "That horse is so gentle that my little girl could go up behind him and twist his tail, and he wouldn't raise a hoof." The girl overheard this lie, took it for the truth, tried the experiment on the horse, and was killed by a kick.

A Strange Inhabitant of the Depths of the sea is described by a New Hampshire journal. It is like a long black cord, apparently without any head. It is often mistaken for a piece of trailing seaweed when it comes to the surface, but on being placed in an aquarium it shows signs of life. A fish touching it is seized by a bell-shaped sucker the creature puts forth, and then twining itself serpent-fashion around its victim, the fish is brought near one of the ends of the innocent-looking black cord, a mouth opens, and the fish is swallowed.

How like this is to many of Satan's wiles! An amusement, which looks innocent, attracts a victim. Once caught, it becomes difficult to return, and repeated indulgences increase the danger till, too often, the captive is lost body and soul. (2 Cor 2 : 11.)

A Mother's Perservering Search for her Son.—A well-dressed woman, who gave her name as Mrs. Kohler, called at Police Headquarters in Jersey City, July 31st, and asked for assistance to get to Philadelphia. She said that four years ago, when she lived in St. Louis, her son, aged 4 years, was abducted by a strange man. Search was made for the lost child throughout the West, but without result. Six months after the loss of the child, her husband died, and Mrs. Kohler, having some money, determined to go to Europe to look for her son. She hunted through England, France, Germany, and Austria, but could find no trace of the boy. Chief Murphy sent her to a benevolent citizen, who, on hearing her story, provided her with money to go to Philadelphia, and she started for that city on a late train. Thus the love of a mother prompted her to travel thousands of miles to find her boy. But the world has seen one instance of greater love in Him who came from Heaven "to seek and to save that which was lost."

THE GIFT UNSPEAKABLE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift." 2 COR. 9 : 15.

Gospel Graces and Gospel Motives—I. Jesus the Gift Unspeakable—The Gift Cannot be Fully Described—1. In its Meaning—Teachers who have done great Mischief—Those who Regard Christ as a Divine Philanthropist Only—As an Expression of God's Love—The Cross a Hospital as well as a School—2. In its Manner—3. In the Boons that have come from it—4. Because Speech fails—A Candidate for Church-Membership—The Walls of Nero's Palace—II. The Gift to be much Spoken of—1. By Thanks to God—A Story of Two Cardinals—Tamerlane and Bajazet—2. By Deeds of Praise—3. By Deeds of Patience—A Blind Preacher Reproved—4. By Holding a Thankful Creed—5. By Trying to bring Others to Accept it.

PAUL had spoken of the liberality of the Corinthian believers, and he had endeavored to stir them up to a prudent preparation for displaying it. "Now, therefore," said he, "perform the doing of it, that as there was readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which you have." He closes his exhortation by this remarkable sentence: "Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable gift"; intending no doubt thereby to give expression to his own hearty thankfulness, and also to deliver a master stroke of argument for Christian liberality.

Nothing can so excite God's people to give to him as the remembrance of what God has given to them. "Freely ye have received, freely give," is our Lord's own argument. Gospel graces are best stimulated by Gospel motives. It is wrong to appeal to believers by reasons drawn from the law of works, for they are not under it; children are to be ruled as children, not as oxen. Appeal should be made to renewed hearts by arguments distilled from the law of love under which they live: seeing God has loved them with an infinite love, this love has become the most mighty of forces within them: "The love of Christ constraineth us."

The Gospel is founded upon giving, and the spirit is giving. Buying and selling are unknown in spiritual things, unless we buy without money and without price. Payment is for the law; under the Gospel everything is a gift. God gives us Jesus, gives us eternal life, gives us grace and glory, gives us everything, in fact; and then moved by love to Him we give ourselves back to Him and to His people.

Paul had been boasting of the liberality of the Corinthians, and he somewhat feared that by their delay he might be made ashamed; he seemed almost alarmed lest he had said too much about their gifts. He could speak upon that subject and say all that should be said, but he felt that he could not describe the liberality of God. The gifts of the Corinthians were such as he could speak of, but when he thought of what God had given he could only cry, "Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable gift!"

You can readily put down in black and white, and count up, the largest contributions of the most self-sacrificing believers, but you cannot estimate the gift of God. You cannot estimate the value of God's own dear Son: you could certainly give no expression to any estimate you had formed if it were in the least degree worthy of the subject. The love which is seen in Jesus is inconceivable, infinite, unspeakable.

During this meditation I desire to aid you as the Holy Spirit shall aid me, for in my case the power to speak of this unspeakable gift must itself be a gift. I trust it shall be given me in the selfsame hour what I shall speak. We will first consider that Christ Jesus is the gift unspeakable; but we are not going to be silent because of this, for our second head is, Christ Jesus is a gift to be very much spoken of. The gift unspeakable is to be for ever spoken of by way of gratitude—"Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable gift."

I. First, then, the eternal Son of God given of God unto men, Christ Jesus, is the gift unspeakable, and He is so in many ways.

1. To begin with : no man can doctrinally lay down

THE WHOLE MEANING OF THE GIFT

of Christ to men. The Church has produced thoughtful scholars whom it has called "divines," and described as "eminent theologians": from these teachers we have no doubt receive much help in the exposition of the Word ; and yet if we put them all together they have never been able to unfold to us the entire meaning of the gift of the Son of God to men. The devout and studious have themselves cried out, "O the depths," but they have not pretended to fathom this abyss of mystery.

Certain teachers have fallen far short of the mark, and have done great mischief by their low estimate of the unspeakable gift. What they have said may have been true, but their sin has been one of omission — omission where none should have been possible. They have said far too little about Christ, and have seemed to be afraid of extolling Him too highly. In the estimation of such persons the gift of the Saviour has been simply a display of God's good will to the race, and nothing more : Jesus was a divine philanthropist and nought beside, according to their Gospel. This is to use other balances than those of the sanctuary, and to give short weight to the great Householder.

It is true that God commended His love to man by the death of His Son, and none can say too much upon this point ; but there is far more in the gift of Christ than mere good will. We are glad that these men admit the divine benevolence, but we wish they could see more than that : for that view of our Lord which sees in Him only a display of benevolence to men does but dimly discern His character and value. Certainly He is "unspeakable" by those who only think of Him after this fashion.

Others have spoken of Christ as a wonderful declaration of God's opposition to moral evil. The death of Christ has been received by them as a vague expression of divine displeasure against sin, of course not dissociating it from His benevolence toward men. Herein is truth also, for how shall we ever see the purity of God more fully vindicated than in the exhibition of sin's result in the mortal agony and death throes of our divine Lord? Yet if this be all that any man has to say, he has failed to comprehend the gift of God, for the great Father has done far more for men by the gift of His Son than merely to intimate the kindness of His nature and the results of moral evil. We admit that in the death of His Son the Lord has declared His love to man, and His hatred of sin, but He has done infinitely more : the cross is not only a school but a hospital: the crucifixion not only reveals man's evil, but provides a remedy for it ; Christ is not merely a lesson, but a gift—a gift unspeakable.

Some of our brethren dwell very much, perhaps none too much, upon the general aspect of Christ's death toward all mankind. It is a grand fact that the human race is spared because Jesus died ; and that it is not only reprieved, but uplifted from degradation and put in a position to hear messages of mercy, which if believed will bring salvation.

They do well who freely proclaim the common salvation ; they cannot dwell too much upon its freeness, though I would have them not overlook its fulness and sovereignty. We like well to hear of the effect of the incarnation and the atonement upon the entire human family as placing it under a mediator, but we would also hear of the special application of redemption and its actual results. The sinner's Friend, the mighty Saviour, the gracious Pardoner cannot be too much spoken of, for under that aspect He is unspeakable.

We delight in addition to this to speak of Christ's special relationship to His own people, and we lay a great emphasis upon the fact of His substitution in their behalf. We rejoice to speak of His bearing the sin of many, His being numbered with the transgressors, His being made sin for us though He knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him. Our heart expands, our eyes o'erflow, whenever we dilate upon His suretyship and consequent substitution. Yet if this were our one theme we should still fail to express the unspeakable.

We are apt to think that when we have laid down this doctrine clearly and distinctly, and have admitted all that others have well said, that we have believed and taught all that can be known concerning the gift of Jesus Christ to men : but, beloved, I am persuaded that it is not so. Beside the purpose of declaring benevolence and censuring sin, of uplifting the race and of effectually saving the chosen, there is more yet to be subserved by the incarnation and atonement. I bid you peer over the brink upon which I would set you. Look down into this abyss of love. Be you sure of this, that this depth is unfathomable. It is idle to attempt a definition of infinity, and therefore vain to hope to declare how wide, how high, how deep, how broad, is the wondrous gift of God to the sons of men.

2. The gift is unspeakable for another reason : no man can ever set forth

THE MANNER OF THIS GIFT.

The way and method of the giving are unknown, perhaps unknowable, and hence unspeakable. Just think awhile. Do you understand, and could you possibly explain, the manner of the Father's giving the Only-Begotten to us? For Jesus Christ is not only the Father's Son, but he is God Himself, one with God : the gift of the Son is virtually God's giving Himself to men. There can be no separation between God the Son and God the Father, for, saith Christ, "I and my Father are one." "Believe me," saith He, "that I am in the Father, and the Father in me."

Do you understand this? Is it not unspeakable? Do not, therefore, be drawing hard and fast lines, and speaking of Christ as suffering, and of the Father as scarcely participating in the sacrifice, for this may grow into grievous error. It has been laid down by divines that God is impassable, and not capable of any form of suffering. It may be so, but I fail to see scriptural authority for the statement. That God can do what He pleases I do believe, and therefore He can suffer too if so He wills. To me a God who has no feelings is further off from me a great deal than my Father who is in heaven, who can be grieved by my sin, and can feel for my sorrow. It may be true that Scripture only speaks after the manner of men, but then it is as a man that I understand it ; and it does seem to me to reveal not only a living God, but a feeling God.

We swim in mysteries when we speak of the Father and the Son. How, then, God could give the Son to die, He being one with Himself —shall any man explain it? Or, if he could explain the mystery, can he tell us what it cost the Father to give His Son? Can a mother tell us how it pains her heart to part with her child? Can any father tell us the anguish of losing his only begotten? What must it be to give up your well-beloved son to be despised and spit upon, maltreated and murdered! No ; you do not know what it is, and therefore you cannot tell what it is! You that have been bereaved of your dearest, you know the pang which tears the heart, but you cannot express your loss to others : your grief is inexpressible. All the agony of Abraham when he unsheathed the knife to slay his son was but a faint type of what it cost the Father when he gave the Only-Begotten that He might die for us.

A further sense of the unspeakableness of this gift will come over you if you attempt to measure our Lord's sufferings when He was made sin for us. None can declare the greatness of His sacrifice. Think of the glory of Christ throughout all ages at the right hand of God, and remember that all this was laid aside. What a descent from heaven's majesty to Bethlehem's manger ; from the throne of Jehovah to the breast of Mary! Think of the perfect nature of Christ's humanity, and its consequent rest in God, ar yet He stooped out of His spirit's peace to e dure the contradiction of sinners against Hi self. Think of His infinite perfections a boundless deservings, and of the shameful co tempt that was poured upon Him.

Try, if you can, to conceive of incarnate G as having sin imputed to Him, transgression la upon Him. Why, the very idea must have be horror to His perfect spirit. Conceive of ju tice with its iron rod bruising and pounding t innocent Son of God with griefs vicarious, bor for us!

> "Much we talk of Jesu's love,
> But how little's understood!
> Of his sufferings, so intense,
> Angels have no perfect sense."

O Lord Jesus, the brightest spirit before t throne who has dwelt with thee ever since Th ascension cannot tell us what Thou didst endu Thy groans are a gift unspeakable. How it w that He died who is the resurrection and the li and how it was He bore sin, even He wh none other than eternal perfection? None of can speak here, for He is the gift unspeakabl

3. I ask you to follow me in another line thought, while I still talk upon the unspeakal None can describe of Christ. Think of what we have been delive from : think awhile of what you were by nat and what you would have continued to have b had not grace interposed, and what you w have become if Jesus had not been given save the lost.

THE BOONS WHICH HAVE COME TO US THROU THE GIFT

Ah, my brothers and sisters, we are fallen ready, but the full results of the fall are not on earth. The ripe result of sin is gathere the dark region where castaways dwell for e finally banished from hope ; where ring of bath bell is never heard, for they rest not nor night ; where voice of mercy can never ter, for this doleful knell tolls through dreary land with awful tone, "He that is just, let him be unjust still : and he whic filthy, let him be filthy still." And you a might have been there now, and shall be yet, if Jesus Christ be not ours.

The distance between the depth unfathon of deserved woe and the height unutterab infinite grace and glory an angel's wing ca measure ; hence it will always be impossib tell the height and depth of this unspeakable

But now think for a while what are the which we enjoy at this hour. There is, fir all, the forgiveness of sins according to the of His grace. We are washed, washed i blood, clothed in the righteousness of the S God, adopted into the family of the Et and "if children, then heirs ; heirs of God joint heirs with Jesus Christ." There c to us by way of adoption all the provision ture, education, and paternal love whic heavenly Father gives to all the children o family.

Brethren, I have not time to mention o one all the covenant blessings. All thing in the covenant, whether things presen things to come, or life, or death, all thing yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ's is G and all these things come to us through C If the streams be fathomless, who shall plummet wherewith to measure the founta

I preached last Sabbath night to a great gregation that had come for many miles being faint and thirsty, they emptied many ets of water which were set for them : their consumed a great quantity, yet an observer soon have known how much they drank who shall tell what the earth drinks in du single thunder-shower? Who shall measu floods which roll down the great rivers? shall compute the volume of the sea? these are finite, and may be reckoned order : our Lord Jesus Christ is in Boundless grace, unutterable mercy, divin —these are heavenly things, and tongues can never fully declare them.

4. Furthermore, the gift of God must always e unspeakable because when it is best realized he effect it produces upon the emotions is so great at SPEECH FAILS.

would not give much for the man who can at l times fluently talk about the love of God in hrist Jesus. When he feels most his obliga-ons his heart will check his lips! Utterance longs not to the deepest emotion. Some feel-gs are too big for expression. The griefs that attle are but small: great griefs are silent.
ercies which make us talk are common, and longer wondered at; but those which come th an unveiled divinity about them are like oses, too bright to look upon.

Yes, the gift must be unspeakable, because the ore it is appreciated the more are we silenced:
e deeper our sense of its value the less is our wer to impart it to others. Power to speak the love of Christ is not always to be taken as evidence of true religion, nor is its absence a tter for alarm. I remember one dear lover of rist who wished to join a certain church, but r testimony of experience was very slender; leed, she said too little to satisfy the brethren o came to speak with her, and they told her
; when, bursting through all bonds she cried
, "I cannot speak for Him, but I could die for m." Many are in a like plight, and in a meas-all true souls lie under the like difficulty.
could more easily die for Christ than hope tell out fully our sense of His dear love. He gift unspeakable. Heaven cannot match u; how can earth describe Him?

was one day in the ruins of Nero's palace,
he who guided us there had a series of rods
ed in telescopic manner into one another.
the top of these was a candle, and he held it h up to let us read the inscriptions on the n of the vault overhead. We can do that n mortal things, and so make men see them, when we have done our best to describe the e of Christ we have felt as though we had l aloft those silly rods with a farthing candle n them to show the sun at noon.

oor, poor work is our best preaching concern-the adorable Lord Jesus. But this is one g we can say with respect to Him from our hearts, that He has filled us to the full and sfied us. They said of Alexander that ad an ambition so vast that if his body had as large as his soul he would have stood one foot on the sea and the other on the e, and would have grasped the east with his t hand and the west with his left. If our s were thus boundless in desire Christ's love d fill them.

hus have we dealt with the unspeakable, and ow feel even more truly than when we be-that language fails us.

THE GIFT TO BE MUCH SPOKEN OF.

Let me have all your hearts for a few min-while I now dwell on the other truth, that st is a gift of God to be very much spoken of.

be spoken of, first, by thanks to God.
anks be unto God for his unspeakable gift."
Br hren, we do not thank God as we ought for an hing: we are not half as thankful as we ou t to be. Luther was wont to tell a story of cardinals who were riding to the Council of Co tance. One of them stopped because he saw a shepherd sitting down in the weadow we ing. Dismounting, he tried to comfort and asked him why he wept. The poor was slow to answer, but being pressed he "Looking upon this toad I wept because I never thanked God as I ought for making man possessed of reason, and of excellent and not a loathsome toad." The cardinal ed as he saw the piety of the peasant, and went away he exclaimed, "O St. Augushow truly didst thou say the unlearned nd take heaven by force, and we with all earning rise not above flesh and blood."
t not some of us faint under a like sense of titude?

ethren, if we have Jesus to be our salvation, when ought we to thank God for Him? Why, every morning when we wake. How long should we continue to praise God on this account? Till we go to sleep again. From the rising of the sun to the going down of the same His name is to be extolled. Let us praise God till sleep steeps our senses in a sweet forgetfulness.

When we become low in spirit, it will be a sad reflection if we have to own that in fairer weather we forgot our beloved. Let us give double praise while we can. While we are in good spirits and happy in the Lord let us pour forth our hymns. Tamerlane said to the mighty Bajazet, when he had overcome him in battle and taken him for a prisoner, "Didst thou ever give God thanks for making thee so great an emperor?" Bajazet confessed that he had never thought of that. "Then," said Tamerlane, "it is no wonder that so ungrateful a man should be made a spectacle of misery."

Conscience will taunt us when we are sorrowful by saying, "You did not praise God when you were in health; and now you are ill and hoarse, and cannot lift up your voice; you did not praise Him for his unspeakable gift when you knew you had it; and now you are full of doubts about it, and Satan has you upon the hip, you well deserve all the sorrow that your mind shall feel." Therefore, brothers and sisters, let us praise the Lord; let us vow unto ourselves to-day that, His grace helping us, we will praise Him, praise Him, praise Him, and praise Him again, and again, and again, and again, as long as we have any being, for His unspeakable gift.

2. Next, let us show our gratitude to God in deeds of praise. "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift." If we cannot speak it, let us that will show forth the praise of God. Actions speak more loudly than words. If our words have failed, let us try actions. And the first thing to do is to give yourself away to your Lord. Come, beloved, if God has given you Jesus Christ, give Him yourself. Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price, wherefore present your bodies as living sacrifices. Don't talk about it, but really do it: live for him who died for you.

TRY IF WE CANNOT DO SOMETHING

Nothing can be too good or great for our ever blessed Lord. Our loving Master will accept at our hands the alabaster box when we break it joyfully for His dear sake. Let deeds of holy consecration mark the whole of our lives, for with such sacrifices God is well pleased, when they are not brought as a price to purchase merit, but as a love-token and tribute to His grace. Think of this exhortation, and carry it out abundantly: it shall turn to your temporal and eternal enrichment.

3. I am sure, however, that

DEEDS OF PATIENCE

are among the thanks which best speak out our gratitude to God. Did it ever strike you that patience is a noble sort of psalmody? Perhaps you will see this truth if I tell you an anecdote. In the old church stories we read of one called Didymus, a famous preacher, who brought many souls to Christ; but he was blind, and Didymus grieved greatly over the loss of his sight. Those who heard him perceived that his blindness gave a mournful tinge to his discourses.

A certain godly man named Alexander went to him and spoke to him in private after this fashion: "Didymus," said he, "does not thy blindness cause thee great sorrow?" "Brother Alexander," said he, "it is my constant grief that I have lost the light. I can scarcely endure my existence, because I am always in the dark." Then Alexander said to him, "Thou art doing a work which an angel might envy thee, and thou hast the honor of an apostle in speaking for Jesus Christ, and wilt thou fret because thou hast lost that which rats and mice and brute beasts have in common with men?" This was not a very tender thing to say, but it strengthened Didymus patiently to endure his trial and to bless God for His unspeakable gift.

What is there, after all, that we have not, if we have Christ? If you have lost everything but Christ, yet if you have Christ left you what have you lost? Why fret for pins when God gives pearls? Why grieve over the loss of a few pence when God has heaped upon us talents of gold? Submit in gracious joy to the Divine Will, and let your patience say, "I will thank God, I will thank God still for His unspeakable gift.

4. Now, dear friends, there is one way in which I want you to thank God and show your gratitude for Christ. and that is by always holding a thankful creed. Believe nothing which would rob God of thanks, or Christ of glory. I set great store by a sound creed in these evil days when the Gospel is but little valued by many. Hold a creed of which the top and bottom is this, "Grace, grace, grace; salvation all of grace." Whenever you hear a preacher, no matter who he may be, making out that salvation is not completely of the grace of God, just say in your hearts, "Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable gift." Do not go an inch away from that standpoint. Salvation is altogether a gift: it is not of works, it is not of merit; it is of grace, and grace alone.

Hold a theology which magnifies Christ, a divinity which teaches that Christ is God's unspeakable gift. When a man gets cutting down sin, paring down depravity, and making little of future punishment, let him no longer preach to you.

SOME MODERN DIVINES

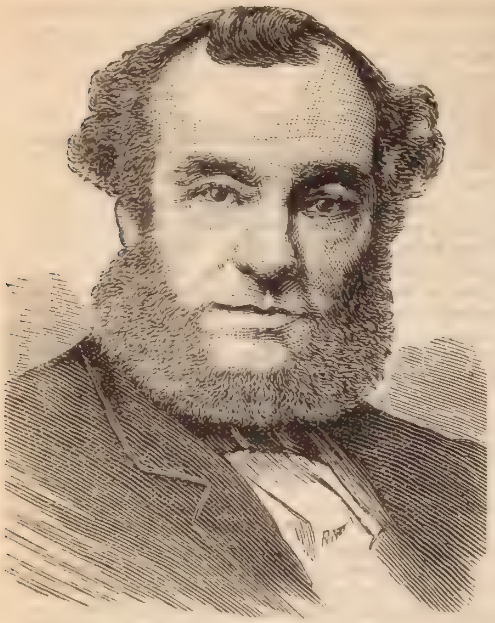
whittle away the Gospel to the small end of nothing. They make our divine Lord to be a sort of blessed nobody; they bring down salvation to mere salvability, make certainties into probabilities, and treat verities as mere opinions.

When you see a preacher making the Gospel small by degrees and miserably less, till there is not enough of it left to make soup for a sick grasshopper, get you gone. Such diminution and adulteration will not do for me: my heart cries, "Thanks be to God for His unspeakable gift." These gentlemen, you know, are highly cultivated and can tell us all about it: they have a theology which is suited to their educated reason: to them grace can be weighed in scales and atonement in balances; unless indeed both be as the drop of a bucket, not worthy of being mentioned at all. Every grand truth with them is dwarfed and dwindled down into utter insignificance.

The thought of the nineteenth century makes men the heirs of apes, while it declares their souls to be mortal, and their sins to be trifles. Our Bibles are made to be mere human records, and our hopes are treated as childish dreams. These pigmy thinkers shorten all things to their pigmy scale. As for me, I believe in the colossal: a need deep as hell and grace as high as heaven. I believe in a pit that is bottomless, and in mercy above the heavens. I believe in an infinite God and an infinite atonement, infinite love and infinite mercy, an everlasting covenant ordered in all things and sure, of which the substance and the seal is an infinite Christ. Christ is all; Christ is unspeakable, the unspeakable gift of God. Hold to that, or you will not thank God as you should.

5. Nor rest in a thoroughly sound creed, but try to bring others to accept God's unspeakable gift. Bless the Lord till you set the fashion, and others bless him with you. Seek out those who do not know the Lord Jesus Christ, and tell them "the old, old story of Jesus and His love." Thus, if you cannot sing more yourself, nor praise God more yourself, you will have increased His praise by bringing in others to sing with you. See you to this, and let this be henceforth the motto of your lives. Write it over your doors; emblazon it on the walls of your chambers; let it hang over your bed-head by night, "Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable gift." O Holy Spirit, write this line of gratitude upon the tablets of our hearts. Amen.

[Portions of Scriptures read before Sermon—
Romans 5 and 2 Corinthians 9.]



MR. GAWIN KIRKHAM,

The Respected Secretary of the English Open-air Mission.

THIS devoted gentleman, whose exertions in connection with the mission formed to spread the Gospel by open-air preaching has brought his name prominently before the religious public, was born at Eskraigg, a small hamlet nine miles from Lancaster, England, on August 9th, 1832. His father was a small farmer, and Gawin was the second of ten children. He went to school at Aughton, a neighboring village, his tutor being the clergyman of his own parish. When old enough to add to the family exchequer by his own industry, he entered the service of Rev. W. Stratton. In this excellent clergyman's family, he remained seven years, and owed much to his kind counsel and consistent example.

One Sunday afternoon, when he was about twenty years of age, he was kneeling with his father and mother at the Lord's table. All at once the grand, soul-subduing truth flashed upon his soul, "Jesus was punished for your sin. If you believe in Him you shall not be punished, seeing that he has suffered in your place." He now tremblingly cast himself upon the sinner's Friend, and entered into the blessedness of those who rejoice in forgiven sin through the merits of the Redeemer.

Now followed an intense desire to be made useful to others. Sustained by this hope, he began to study, and entered on a course of self-improvement, assisted by his brother. That he might have more time at his disposal, he removed to another situation at Milenthorpe, Westmoreland. Here he taught in the Sunday-school, visited the sick and the poor, and diligently pursued his studies, the Greek language being among them.

During his residence at Milenthorpe he first heard an out-of-door sermon, and it appears to have been a seed which was destined to bear good fruit. This was on September 6th, 1855. He had never heard anything of the kind before, and it seemed to him a means of usefulness capable of being turned to great advantage in winning souls for Christ. Though invited to devote himself to foreign missionary work, the desire for mission work at home had taken so strong a hold upon him, that he offered himself to the Scripture Readers' Society, in London. The consequence was that in 1856 he was set to work in the district of St. Paul's, Bermondsey, where he continued for four years.

His superintendent, Mr. Long, was in favor of open-air preaching, and encouraged the young man from Westmoreland in the same good work. In 1860 the Committee of the Open-air Mission invited him to become secretary, and he at once heartily responded to the call. Unconsciously, by his previous village labors, he had been preparing himself for the important post he was now asked to fill.

His first open-air sermon in London was preached on Easter Monday. Crowds were returning from Greenwich fair. He gained the attention of an increasing group of listeners. Upon becoming secretary, he seems to have given a very wide margin to the meaning of the words Open-air Mission. He went to races, fairs, and public executions, and wherever crowds would be certain to attend.

On one occasion, when the execution of criminals was a public spectacle, Mr. Kirkham, accompanied by about fifty friends, were assembled one midnight in front of the Old Bailey, in London, for the purpose of holding a religious service throughout the night, until the bell of neighboring St. Sepulchre's Church, mournfully tolling, would announce that a murderer's last morning and last hour had arrived. The little band of preachers having sung a verse or two of a hymn, became conscious that they were literally hemmed in by thieves and by persons of well-known desperate character. Their pockets were turned inside out, but the open-air preachers had very wisely taken no money with them.

On another occasion, while

A MURDERER

within the jail was awaiting the dawn, the subject which Mr Kirkham took referred to evil tempers, which sometimes ripen into the crime expiated on the gallows. It happened that among those listening to him in front of the Old Bailey was a man who in the morning had quarreled with his wife and had left home in a rage. All day long he had been harboring revengeful and murderous thoughts, and secretly resolved upon carrying out a fearful intention when he returned home. The preacher's words, however, laid hold of his heart and conscience, and the fiend-like spirit of cruel anger was expelled. The man went home, not to kill his wife, but to be reconciled to her, and the address he had listened to was blessed by the Holy Ghost to his conversion.

The race-course presented a field of work whose claims seemed imperative, and whose duties would require the best gifts of the preachers. The crowd, bent on merriment, and but little inclined to listen to the Gospel of Salvation, would sometimes greatly try the patience of the speakers. Pelted at with small bags of flour, they would frequently be compelled to abandon their position as white as millers. Mr. Kirkham always found, however, that by quietly enduring these practical jokes, by preserving an unruffled temper, and forbearing threatening, personal insults have been very rare.

On two occasions Mr. Kirkham has been taken into custody, and lodged "in durance vile," on a charge of obstructing the thoroughfare. At Bath, both Captain Meyer and Mr. W. Lear, of Cheltenham, were thus arrested, as well as Mr. Kirkham, and the charge being pronounced proved, they were convicted and fined—sixpence! The second occasion was at Kensington, London, where some enthusiastic Roman Catholics interrupted the preaching. An Irish policeman being present, said to Mr. Kirkham, "You can't stay here." Mr. Kirkham replied, "I am not going to;" but the irate son of Erin, not hearing the last little word, took the reply as a refusal to "move on," seized him roughly by the collar, and dragged him to the station to enter the charge. On nine witnesses being called who distinctly heard all that had been said, the case was first adjourned and subsequently abandoned.

Mr. Kirkham has been instrumental in introducing open-air preaching into Holland, and there are now no warmer friends of the movement than those who are found in the ancient commercial city of Amsterdam. During the exhibition of 1867 he attempted to commence similar operations in France, but found that nothing could be done in that direction. He has been a total abstainer for twenty-four year and a hearty supporter of the temperance mov
ment. During the awful days of the cotto famine in Lancashire, he went down to Presto Manchester, and Blackburn, carrying relief the starving operatives.

Mr. Kirkham has made this work of open-a preaching the work of his life, and never miss an opportunity of preaching himself whenever has opportunity, and also of directing the effor of others in this work. It has been the mea of great good in England, and we trust that t beginning now being made in this country m go on and prosper and an abundant harvest gathered in.

AN INTENDING SUICIDE SAVED IN M SPURGEON'S TABERNACLE.

THE following remarkable incident was lated recently by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

A very remarkable case came under my not at the noon prayer to-day (in January, 188
A Christian man who once served God for ma years, when he prospered in the things of t world forgot his Father. Like the prodigal, was so taken up with his portion he forgot Giver of it, and went away into the world.
gave up the Sunday-school; he ceased to m with the Lord's people, and lived a careless, g less life.

Recently, however, this man lost all he sessed, was thrown out of employment, as many are, alas! in these times of distress; wife was scolding him, his children were cry for bread, and he had none to give th
Thus for days he went on, searching for w and unable to find any, until one evening said, "I can't stand this any longer," and termined to drown himself. His house was the Surrey Canal, and the first thought wa throw himself in there. But on considering matter, he was afraid if he did so that he mi perhaps get frightened and call for help, w he could easily be rescued.

So to make the matter sure, he resolved come to Blackfriars Bridge and jump into Thames. Without mentioning his intentio any one, he left home to put his awful pur into execution. When going that way he invariably to go round by the Elephant Castle; but this evening, instead of taking usual route, some invisible influence seeme draw him in the direction of the little street mediately opposite this building. Cross St is its name, and a very significant name it is is it not at Cross Street that all of us get hope of eternity?

Coming through that street a worker put hand on his shoulder, and said, "Where are going?" I do not know who that worke but may God bless him. This question startled him, as you may suppose, so he the young man why he wanted to know.
cause, if you are doing nothing better, th a service in the Tabernacle to-night; a ge man will play the cornet, and an Irishman speak." You smile, but we must "by all m save some." At length he was induced to in. He became interested, and the Word of was applied with such power that then there, as he sat in the seat, he resolved to back to his God.

Now all thought of suicide was gone, and the result. Though previously his condi bodily and spiritually, was exactly like th the Prodigal Son in the narrative—"peri with hunger"—when he went home he that in his absence some one who had owed sum of money for three years, and from who never expected to hear again, had called, without knowing his condition, paid the so that the hunger of his children had been fied, and there was bread on the table and on the mantel-piece. Though, like this way, he had been perishing with hunger, he came back he found bread enough a spare. May many come to God to-night their experience will be the same.

PROPHETIC EXPOSITION.

Compiled by Rev. M. Baxter.*

(Continued from page 519.)

r. Keith on the Napoleon Empire—The Marks of Indentification—The Evidence not Weakened by the Collapse at Sedan—Rev. Edward Nangle's View — Rev. J. B. Clifford on the Course of Events.

THE REV. DR. ALEXANDER KEITH, the vener- le and world-famed author of "Evidence of rophecy," which has been translated into seve- l languages, fully expressed in the concluding ges of his work, "History and Destiny of the urch and the World," published in 1861, his lief that the Napoleon Empire is the predicted ILD-BEAST (i.e., EMPIRE) THAT WAS AND IS NOT D YET ASCENDS FROM THE ABYSS, and carries e scarlet-clothed woman of Rome at the closing sis of her history, as described in Revelation He said:

'The seven heads or governmental kingships the Wild-beast or Roman Empire were thus plained by the angel in Revelation 17:

'They are seven kings (i.e., kingships or head- ps): five are fallen, and one (the sixth) is: the er (the seventh) is not yet come: and when he eth, he must continue A SHORT SPACE. And Wild-beast THAT WAS AND IS NOT, even he is eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth into dition (Rev. 17:11).

Five governmental headships had fallen and sed away in the apostle John's time. The h head, of which it was said, 'and one is,' was ROMAN EMPERORSHIP, or Cæsarean head. e Wild-beast's seventh head—of which it was l, 'the other is not yet come, and when he eth he must continue a short space'—and un- which the Latin kingdoms were again to be ed, was the NAPOLEONIC HEADSHIP. For e only since the Cæsarean head of the Roman pire fell, the Latin kingdoms became united the extremity of Italy to the German Ocean, er Napolean I., who was the head of an empire h comprehended kingdoms of his own cre- n, Spain, Holland, Westphalia, Naples.

The Confederation of the Rhine was subject s sway. Switzerland, Savoy, Lombardy, any, the minor dukedoms of Italy, and the es of the Church so long divided were por- s of his empire. He was King of Italy, and on and presumptive heir was King of Rome, h itself was entitled the 'second city of his re.'

But, as they that dwell on the earth well , it presently came to pass that the first leonic Empire was and is not. Of it and of ead—Napoleon—(from 1804 to 1815) they know assuredly that when he came he con- d but a short space. But now (since 1851) see 'that empire reconstituted'—that seemed for ever dead alive again—the Wild-beast that was and is not, the same the Napoleonic: and the kingdom now , which was won by fierce conflicts before."

Keith also pointed out four existing en the Napoleon Empire and that symbolic beast.

MARKS OF IDENTIFICATION

t was manifestly carrying the scarlet woman, staining the Pope in his temporal power at .

t was an empire, "that was and is not and ": "When the wars of Napoleon I., which terror and disaster over Europe, were ter- ed in 1815, the four great powers (England, a, Austria, and Russia) which formed the Alliance, decreed that none of his dynasty ever sit upon the throne of France. Yet the Crimean War began in 1854 Napoleon as acknowledged as French emperor by all."

3. It gradually ascended from the abyss of political non-existence by increasingly large plébiscites. The author of the "Histoire du Prince Louis-Napoleon" wrote, "It is worthy of remark that the number of the suffrages always increased during four years. In 1848 he was elected President of the French Republic by five and a half million votes; in 1851 by seven and a half million votes; in 1852 he was elected Emperor by nearly eight millions. The popularity of the prince ascended, ASCENDED, ASCENDED always (montait, montait, montait toujours), and now seemed to attain a summit so elevated that it was believed to be inaccessible to the ambition of any one man."

4. Its ascent from the abyss had excited general wonder: "The prediction also in some measure has come to pass: 'Then the earth shall WONDER when they behold the Wild-beast that was and is not and yet is.' The same historical writer states that 'on learning the number of affirmative suffrages, France was, as it were, DAZZLED. Seven million eight hundred thousand suffrages! It seemed almost a miracle; like some of the victories of the hero of Austerlitz, it was a FABULOUS success. In reading the journals which announced this fact, ALL THE WORLD BELIEVED THAT IT READ A FAIRY TALE.'

"The end is not yet. But as soon as the beginning of the end, as regards the Wild-beast that ascendeth from the abyss, can be seen, there are facts relating to it which need no proof, for they are expressly and necessarily such that men, however blinded in other respects, must needs be cognisant of them—even facts so marvellous as to excite the wonder of the world."

The temporary suspension since Sedan of the Napoleonic ascent from the abyss, toward its predicted pinnacle of earthly greatness, does not at all weaken this fourfold identification; for when the Napoleon Empire again ascends from the abyss (into which the necessity of prophecy has required it to descend for a season), it will resume, with intensified distinctness, these four marks of identication, viz.: 1. It will again carry the Scarlet Woman. 2. It will be, more emphatically than ever, an empire that was and is not and yet is. 3. It will ascend with swifter and loftier flight to dazzling pre-eminence. 4. It will excite the wonder of the world to a greater extent than hitherto.

In a letter from Dr. Keith, written in 1878, expresses his expectation that a break-up of the Turkish Empire, and consequent restoration of the Jews to Palestine, will be an ultimate result of the Franco-Prussian War. He said:

"A confederacy of the Latin kingdoms (the ten horns) has, I think, still to be looked for. Whether the present Franco-Prussian War will prepare the way for that union has yet to be seen. I think there is reason to believe that this war at least is the precursor of movements in the East, which will lead to the restoration of the Jews as a nation to Palestine. A point of actual history of both Gentiles or Jews will then be reached, from which a sure retrospect and prospect also may be taken.

"The rapidity with which great events are progressing—such as the 'casting up of highways' and the 'running to and fro' of many—the increase of knowledge and science—the preaching of the Gospel to all nations—the union of spiritual and civil despotism—the progress of the democratic spirit toward anarchy, and its short triumph when that union shall be broken—all seem to betoken that the time, though NOT YET, draweth nigh, when 'the deaf shall hear the words of the Book, and the eyes of the blind shall see out of obscurity and darkness.'"

Dr. Keith continued, after the temporary overthrow of the Napoleon dynasty, to express the same firm conviction that it will yet be raised to be the predominating power in Europe, especially in connection with the final three and a half years of tribulation and persecution.

The Rev. Edward Nangle, M.A., the venerable editor of the Irish Church Advocate, of Dublin, and author of several prophetic works, has in that monthly periodical upheld for the last twelve years the view that the Napoleon dynasty is the seventh and last head of the Roman Empire. In his Irish Church Advocate, in September, 1870, he wrote:

"We freely admit that the check which has been given to the power of Napoleonism in the Franco Prussian War has led us to a careful re-examination of the scriptural grounds of our persuasion that it is the embryo head of the Roman Empire. The more we have considered the subject, the more deeply are we persuaded that not a single link is wanting in the chain of reasoning by which our conclusion was reached, and that the reverses which Napoleonism has experienced prove nothing but this, that 'the end is not yet.'

"We are convinced that the ultimate issue of events will be the aggrandizement of Napoleonism. The seventh head, after its full revival and 'healing of its deadly wound,' is to become the greatest military power of the age, so that all the world, astounded at its prowess, are to wonder and exclaim, 'Who is like unto him? Who is able to make war with him?' (Rev. 13:3, 4). The Napoleon Empire has indeed undergone a fearful reverse; but, if our interpretation be correct, it will ultimately rise to be the GREATEST MILITARY POWER in Europe."

THE REV. J. B. CLIFFORD, M.A., Rector of St. Matthew's, Kingsdown, Bristol, showed, in a discourse in 1844, from Revelations 23:3;.16:13, etc., that the Napoleon dynasty was the seventh head of the Roman Empire or wild beast, and would be revived before the end of this dispensation, which, in the opinion of himself and other prophetical investigators, was indicated by the chronological prophecies to be not much later than 1879, and that a spirit of revolutionary lawlessness must go forth among the nations in connection with its revival. He again showed, in a discourse in 1851, that the imperial Napoleonic power which has been wounded to death at Waterloo, must be healed of its deadly wound and revived, according to the prophecy of the wild beast ascending from the abyss.

He also delivered prophetic discourses in the winter of 1870–71, which were published, recapitulating those views about the Napoleon empire, and showing that the dissolution of the Turkish Empire—the drying-up of the mystical Euphrates—preliminary to the restoration to Palestine of the two tribes of Judah, and afterward of the ten tribes of Israel from the East—also the second advent of Christ and the final great war or battle of Armageddon, which would be far more fearful and terrible than the Franco-Prussian war, were not many years distant.

(To be continued.)

---

tracted from "Coming Wars," by Rev. M. in two pamphlets—five cents each by mail. amphlet contains "Ten Signs of the End, and ption of Approaching Events," with two maps r large diagrams. Second pamphlet contains e quotations from Forty Expositors on these Address, 63 Bible House, New York.

The Collegian's Beer-barrel.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson, in a recent speech at Exeter, England, said that as an illustration of local option, not long since a proposal was made that Manchester should be supplied with water from one of the Westmoreland lakes, but as it was an expensive scheme, a poll was taken under an Act of Parliament of all the ratepayers, who decided in favor of the scheme. Now, whenever it was proposed to lay on supplies of gin and whisky, why, he would ask, should not a poll be taken on the question of the drink traffic? Surely one plan was as rational as the other. People had said, "What! rob a poor man of his beer?" but they talked just as if the publican gave him the beer. He never heard of a publican who gave beer except at election time—and even then he had a shrewd suspicion that somebody or other paid the publican for it. A friend had told him an anecdote which he thought might bear repetition. It appeared that a student at one of the Universities had a barrel of beer in his room, which was against the college rules. In explanation of his misconduct he told the authorities that the beer had been ordered for the purpose that he might be strengthened; and it had had such a wonderful effect, that although three days before he could scarcely lift the barrel, he was then able to carry it about the room.

A WEIGHT OF WEALTH.

(Concluded from page 526.)

Chastened Peace.

RATHER more than two years after Rose's death, one bright, sunny day of February, when the winter winds were lulled for a little while and the sea lay resting after its storms, Mrs. Britton took the cliff path to Rockwood to pay a visit to Mrs. Clifford. A narrow road, yet wide enough for a light pony-carriage, had been made, with much trouble and considerable expense, between Rockwood and Clifford Grange, and daily communications were carried on between them.

Ernest never missed finding time to see his brother every day, and it was seldom that Ruth failed to do so when the weather was tolerably calm. But Mrs. Britton was not driving; she was walking humbly on her own feet, as became the wife of a poor vicar whose income was too small for his large family.

For some months after Jenny lost her situation as governess in Sir Robert Fortescue's household, her mother did not cease to lament the misfortune loudly and vehemently; and these lamentatons were scarcely hushed even when the Bishop's lady engaged Jenny to educate her daughter; for what was the Bishop compared with Sir Robert Fortescue, the senior member for the county, and the largest landowner in their part of it?

But this fine, calm, sweet February day Mrs. Britton for once was feeling that her strivings and mournings, her prudence and good management had at last been crowned with success. She was the proud bearer, if proud is the term to use for one so humble, of good news to her old friend, Mrs. Clifford.

At Rockwood she was ushered into a large, light, cheerful sitting-room adjoining Charles's bedroom. Charles had regained so much of physical strength as to bear being lifted from his bed to a sofa, which could then be rolled into the next apartment; but he had no power to help himself. He lay in the pleasant sunshine of the noonday, an old man in appearance, with gray hair and sunken face. Ruth was sitting beside him, and both of them were watching the frolics of Ernest's boy, who came often to play for an hour or two in his uncle's sight.

Charles's old social nature had not forsaken him, and he enjoyed seeing his quiet room peopled by friendly guests. He could not bear to be alone, and Julia took care that he should never be left in complete solitude. She was seldom away from him herself, and she was seated now where he could see her face, and appeal to her in a low voice whenever his memory failed him.

For his mind was going, and the first faculty that failed him was the power of remembering slight, unimportant things, lying a little outside of the narrow circle which hems in self. Very few had noticed this beginning of the direful end, but Julia was keenly awake to every change in him, and now she seldom left him herself, and always hastened back if she had been absent for a few hours.

Charles Clifford was no longer unhappy. Of late he had fallen into the habit of assuring Ernest each day that this was the happiest portion of his life. Now and then he talked of old times to Julia, and expatiated on the adventures and changes of his earlier years; but he looked back upon them as quite apart from himself, a wild career which had nothing to do with the present.

A deep gulf lay between him and that past life, and he would not have passed across it if he could. The friendship of Ruth and Ernest, his own passionate love for the boy who was to be the future Clifford of Clifford, and above all, his sense of reconciliation to God, filled up his heart, and gave to him a fulness of contentment such as he had never dreamed of in that far-off past which was growing more and more dim to his failing brain.

When Mrs. Britton entered the sunny parlor she was very warmly greeted by Mrs. Clifford, who was feeling neglected and overlooked by Charles and Ruth, engrossed as they were by the little child. She was to the full as jealous of her grandson as she had been of Rose, whose early death she was now always bewailing to Ernest as the greatest sorrow that had ever befallen her.

"I cannot get the thought of poor Rose out of my head," she said in a doleful voice, as soon as Mrs. Britton was seated; "she was such a sweet, quiet child; the very opposite of Ernest's boy. Those that knew them both as children must see an enormous difference You never heard her make such a noise and racket as little Charlie has been making all the morning. And I was twenty years younger then, and could have borne it better. Poor Rose! we shall never see her like again."

"She was a sweet creature," remarked Mrs. Britton, as Ruth carried her boy away; "but, my dear Mrs. Clifford, what a Providence it was for the son and heir! Miss Rose would have wanted a large dowry, you know, and it would have been so much taken out of the estate. Mr. Charles likes to know he will be heir of all."

"Who is that woman?" Charles asked of Julia in a puzzled whisper.

"Mrs. Britton," answered Julia; "you know the parson at Clifford? His wife."

"Mrs. Britton!" spoke up Charles, "Ernest and I would have Clifford drowned in the depths of the sea to have little Rose back again."

"Ah, Mr. Charles!" sighed Mrs. Britton, "you do not know what it is to have sons and daughters, and nothing to give them. Nobody knows that better than a poor vicar's wife. Somebody is always wanting something in a family like ours; but you rich folks have everything supplied you before you know you have need of it. Rose would have been but a poor creature to push her way through the world, as my Jenny has had to do. But I have good news to tell you about Jenny, Mrs. Clifford."

"Good news is scarce," said Mrs. Clifford in a tone suggesting much indifference to Jenny and her fortunes.

"You are quite right, dear Mrs. Clifford," answered Mrs. Britton, "especially in a little out-of-the-way vicarage like ours. I said so when Jenny's letter came. 'My dear William,' I said to my husband, 'now I can be thankful for once!' You'll agree with me when I tell you that Jenny is engaged to be married, with the Bishop's approbation, to one of his own nephews, a remarkably clever young man, with a living worth £600 per annum! That's something to be thankful for."

"Who is Jenny?" whispered Charles, with a shade of trouble on his face. "Do I know her?"

"Dear Miss Rose's old playfellow," answered Julia. "She was with her when she was ill. And she was the first after me to bid you welcome home. You remember her?"

"Ay! I recollect now," he said, smiling; "what could I do without you, Julia?"

Julia's eyes were turned away from him to her sewing, for she did not wish him to see the tears starting in them, or the inward trouble showing itself on her face. He was growing more and more dependent upon her, but she knew now she could keep true to him to the end, whatever the end might be.

"It's good luck for Jenny," observed Mrs. Clifford, peevishly. "I'm sure I never had such luck. My first husband was a poor man, and my second husband never thought much of me. Indeed, both of them neglected me, and so did my sons, especially Ernest. Whatever he expects his boy to grow up like, I don't know. He'll find out some day what a serpent's tooth is."

"I must be thinking of a wedding present for Miss Jenny," said Charles, who still delighted in being lavish at times. "Julia tells me she was the first, next to her, to welcome me home. What does a young lady about to be married wish for most? I have no knowledge in su matters."

"Oh! my dear, good Mr. Charles!" cri
Mrs. Britton, "any little token of regard wou do. Of course," she continued anxiously, " are poor people, and wedding gifts will be mo acceptable, as Jenny is only a vicar's daught
I dare say it would be a trouble to you to thi of a suitable gift, and if you did not mind trusting me with the money, however small was, I could buy her something she needed, a tell her it was your gift, you know! I don't yet where her wedding-dress is to come fro unless she wears simple white muslin, and body wears plain white muslin in these days."

"Let the wedding-dress be my present," s Charles with an inward laugh, noticed by no except Julia.

Mrs. Britton rose in her rapture of gratit and crossed the room to his side, an express of reverential transport beaming on her face.

"You're too good, Mr. Charles, too goo she exclaimed, "you do not know much it cost!"

"Never mind the cost," he replied; "sen all the bills to me, and don't be afraid of cost. All Jenny's wedding finery shall c from me, and Julia shall go and see the wedd and tell me all about it."

"Jenny shall come to thank you herself," Mrs. Britton with tears of real joy; "you not think how good people are! Your bro Ernest gave William a hundred pounds to the expenses; and old Dunnit and his wife, are the only persons beside that know abou have promised to rear a brood of their fa chickens for poor Jenny. It is so pleasant t ceive gratitude from the poor! Mrs. Dun chickens are as much, perhaps, from her Jenny's wedding-dress will be from you.

"Every one should give according t means. I shall not tell Mr. Britton, for so peculiar, you know. He is a very good but he has peculiar notions. Perhaps he w insist upon Jenny refusing your very hand present."

"Perhaps he might," answered Charles, another inward chuckle.

"Yes," continued Mrs. Britton, some alarmed. "Oh! my dear Mr. Charles, it w double the value of your kindness if you not mention it to my husband when he com see you."

"But he accepted Ernest's hundred pou said Charles.

"Mr. Ernest can do what he pleases wit as with everybody else," she replied. "Wi thinks no more of taking benefits from than if they came directly from heaven. I a happy day for Clifford when he came Oh! Mr. Charles," she continued, in a t vexation and dismay, "I'd forgotten wh was talking to. Of course we'd rather hav rightful heir among us; but after you t nobody like him."

"I thank God daily that Ernest is at Cliff said Charles, gravely. He closed his eyes weary with talking, and Mrs. Britton cre of the room, silent and cast down, with ma uneasy qualm lest he should retract his pr or mention it to her husband. But as n of these hindrances occurred, she provid Jenny a handsome and becoming dress, helped to make her wedding the pretties had ever been celebrated in Clifford church

The bishop was present, but it was Ernes pronounced the benediction. It was a da of mournful memories, and of suggesti what might have been. Rose's marble shone new and white among the gray old ments of the Cliffords and the Symons's, e in the chancel now surrounded by wedding
What was it to him that he was Cliff Clifford, while his first-born child had be price paid for his ambition?

He saw Ruth gazing at him, with deep, sympathy and tenderness in her dark eyes his heart blessed her for it, but it was n sad and troubled. When all was over, a ld separate himself from the other guests, he le his way alone to the bench under the light- se, and sat down there, his face buried in his ds, thinking.

e had entered in at the strait gate; and how it and narrow it was, none knew better than His feet were treading the highway through wilderness, whereon the ransomed of the walk. (Isa. 35 : 9, 10.) The kingdom of was within him. There might be sadness, there was no bitterness in the memory of He would not have exchanged this hour, all its sorrow, for any hour of his prosper- untroubled life, before he had given himself o God.

THE END.

ABRAHAM'S INTERCESSION.

Lesson for August 29th—Gen. 18 : 16–33.
len Text, Heb. 7 : 25. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

such an age as this, in which all the dations are out of course, we need to have key of prevailing intercession, of power in t with the living God "If the foundations estroyed, what can the righteous do?" 1 : 3) is one side; but still what can God not remains as the powerful inducement to icial work. Politically, ecclesiastically, lly, there is a disruption; the foundations erywhere giving way. Everything seems tending to destruction; but the voice of rophet sounds yet: "I have set watchmen thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never their peace day nor night: ye that make on of the Lord, keep not silence, and give no rest, till He establish, and till He make lem a praise in the earth" (Isai. 62 : 6, 7).

subject for to-day forms the first instance ercessory prayer on record in the Word of Abraham was living in close and uncon- ed communion with God. In the begin- of our chapter the Lord appears to him, le may tell him the time of the fulfilment promise is at hand. "And the Lord ap- l unto him in the plains of Mamre; and up his eyes and looked, and lo, three men by him," etc. (verses 1, 2). Some have ht that this was a revelation to Abraham mystery of the blessed Trinity, because am, after running to meet them, and bow- wn himself to the ground, yet addresses as "My Lord" (ver. 3), and says, "My if now I have found favor in Thy sight ot away, I pray Thee, from Thy servant: little water, I pray you, be fetched, and our feet, and rest yourselves," etc. Again), "They said unto him, Where is Sarah, fe? And he said, Behold, in the tent. said, I will certainly return unto thee ing to the time of life, and Sarah shall son."

ers, again, have thought that two of them ngels, and that these were the two who ent to Sodom (ver. 22) when Abraham before the Lord." But in chapter 19 we he same change of number, Lot saying nes "my Lord" and sometimes "my (verses 1–18). Especially in verses 18- uld seem to be the Lord Himself to whom eaks. Still, it is God the Son in whom eth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" : 9); and thus they may be right who say ly God the Son has ever appeared to man an form. "No man hath seen God at ne; the only begotten Son, which is in om of the Father, He hath declared him" : 18). In any case, it is not necessary elucidation of our subject that this point be settled.

ill bless thee . . . and thou shalt be a " (Gen. 12 : 2), is the key-note of Abra- life. The assurance of the accomplish- God's promise to himself seemed to be a tion for his intercession on behalf of Thus should it be with us also. The sus received gifts for men (Ps. 68 : 18). hich we receive, we receive in trust for the of Christ. And thus we cannot wonder that they who sun themselves in the delight of a grace given by God instead of seeking to make others benefit by it, so often lose it, and fancy that they were deceived.

"And the men rose up from thence, and looked toward Sodom: and Abraham went with them to bring them on the way. And the Lord said, Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do?" Before Abraham can be in a position to intercede with God, he must know the terms on which he stands with Him. God was dealing with him as a prophet, for "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but He revealeth His secret unto His servants the prophets" (Am. 3 : 7); and as with a friend, for Jesus said to His disciples (John 15 : 15): "Henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his Lord doeth: but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you." God says, "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do?"

The Lord thus gives his reason for His confidence in Abraham: "Seeing that Abraham shall surely become a mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blest in him. For I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment; that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which He hath spoken of him." That is, God could count upon Abraham; He knew the man He had to deal with, and that his children and household as well as himself would be under the influence of God.

It is not without cause that Paul ordains that he who desires the office of a bishop must be "one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity (for if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the Church of God?)" (1 Tim. 3 : 4, 5). Also that the deacons must be "the husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well" (ver. 12). David says also (Ps. 101 : 2), "I will behave myself wisely in a perfect way. O when wilt Thou come unto me? I will walk within my house with a perfect heart."

What was the burden which God would confide to Abraham? "And the Lord said, Because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and because their sin is very grievous; I will go down now, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto Me; and if not, I will know." We noticed the expression (Gen. 15 : 16), "The iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full." It would seem as though the iniquity of the men of Sodom was full. But the inhabitants of the wicked city were unconscious of their doom: "In the days of Lot they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded" (Luke 17 ; 28), and they knew not that fire and brimstone was preparing for their destruction.

"And the men" (i.e., two of them) "turned their faces from thence, and went toward Sodom; but Abraham stood yet before the Lord." Thus, whether, as some suppose, the two men who went toward Sodom were angels, or, as others think, Lot was not in communion with God in the same measure as Abraham, and therefore the manifestation of the Godhead to him was less full, in any case Abraham was in a position to urge the plea which lay upon his heart. "Abraham drew near," this was essential; one cannot speak heart to heart with any one who is at a distance. Perhaps the secret of the want of success of much of our intercession is that we are not near enough to God. God had drawn near to Abraham, and Abraham took the right advantage of his nearness, and drew near to God.

Abraham said, "Wilt Thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked? Peradventure, there be fifty righteous within the city: wilt Thou also destroy, and not spare the place for the fifty righteous that are therein? That be far from Thee to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked; and that the righteous should be as the wicked, that be far from Thee. Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Abraham knows that there is at least one righteous man in Sodom, but although blest through his uncle, Lot was not yet made a blessing. Abraham expects that he must have won fifty souls during the time of his sojourn in Sodom. He thinks of his nephew, with whom once he prayed and held spiritual intercourse, and he cannot endure that he and any souls he may have gathered should be involved in the destruction of the men of Sodom.

"And the Lord said, if I find in Sodom fifty righteous within the city, I will spare all the place for their sakes." Abraham seems to have had a misgiving: Lot had fallen into the hands of the enemies of the King of Sodom, and Abraham—knowing the heart of that God, who said afterward to His people, "If thou wilt obey . . . . and do all that I speak; then I will be an enemy unto thine enemies, and an adversary unto thine adversaries" (Ex. 23 : 22)—thought perhaps that he had fixed the scale of Lot's influence in Sodom too high. "And Abraham answered and said, Behold now I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord, which am but dust and ashes: peradventure there shall lack five of the fifty righteous: wilt Thou destroy all the city for lack of five? And He said, if I find there forty and five, I will not destroy it. And he spake unto Him yet again, and said, Peradventure there shall be forty found there. And He said, I will not do it for forty's sake."

Having gained ground, as it were, with God, Abraham continues pleading: he reduces the number again until he comes down to ten. Could it be that in Lot's own family there were not even ten righteous? Wife, daughters, sons, were all ungodly? Had Lot's faith shed no light upon the wicked city? What a revelation to Abraham! There was a great difference between Abraham and Elijah. Abraham looked for spiritual life where it did not exist; Elijah, on the contrary, imagined that the whole land of Israel was so corrupt that he alone stood on the Lord's side: "I, even I, only am left." (1 Kings 19 : 10, 14).

When the last answer of God reached Abraham, "the Lord went His way." Abraham had said, "I will speak yet but this once." Was he wrong to make this promise? God did not limit him; he limited himself. God had justified Himself, had proved that He would not destroy the righteous with the wicked. Abraham had insured the safety of Lot, as we find by the issue (chap. 19 : 29), but the city for which he had interceded was not saved. God can only turn from His purpose when He can do it righteously, as in the case of Nineveh (Jon. 3), when the city repented at the preaching of Jonah. Truly, Noah was a preacher of righteousness before the time of the Flood, but the people did not repent. Lot was a righteous man, but did not preach righteousness, and the people among whom he lived perished, in spite of Abraham's intercession.

What, then, is the secret of prevailing intercession? Is it not to pray "in the Holy Ghost" (Jude 20), and to ask according to His will? for thus asking "He heareth us: and if we know that He hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of him" (1 Jno. 5 : 14, 15). "But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering," says St. James. "For he that wavereth is as a wave of the sea, driven with the wind and tossed. For let not that man think that he shall receive anything of the Lord." Is it not often the case that our intercession is made in a wavering spirit, not in the absolute assurance that what we ask we receive of Him? Let us be sure of our ground. Have we a right to urge the plea which we are pleading? Have we Scripture for it? Then away with all wavering. God can not break His Word. Let us learn to plant our feet firmly on what God is and what God has said. Let us be united as Christ's Church should be, for "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it" (Matt. 16 : 18).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Serious Anxiety Exists in Great Britain as to the fate of the troops in Afghanistan.' It is hoped that at Candahar, and at Khelat-i-Ghilzai the garrisons may be able to hold out until General Roberts comes to their relief; but their position is regarded as hazardous. Ayoob Khan has sent orders to the villagers not to supply the British troops with provisions. A dispatch from Quettah to the London Standard says: "A letter has been received from Candahar, dated the 5th inst., which says a camel-driver, who has come in as a deserter from Ayoob Khan's army, states that the Heratee and Cabulese troops fought over the spoils after the battle at Kushki-Nakud and that Ayoob Khan was wounded in trying to separate them."

The I. R. B., as the Fenian Organization is called, appears, from a report sent last week by the Irish correspondent of a New York journal, to be growing in strength and numbers. It is estimated that over 47,000 men in the British Isles stand pledged to contribute funds and to obey the orders of the executive committee of the Irish Republican Brotherhood. The contributions are expended in the purchase of arms and ammunition, and at the present time a reserve fund of one hundred thousand dollars is amassed, ready for a propitious moment, when England, is engaged in a foreign war, to make an attack upon her.

The correspondent made inquiries as to the plans of the conspirators, and writes: "Regarding the operations of the organization in the immediate future it may be relied upon that the object of the brotherhood now is, and will be for some time to come, to organize, arm, and discipline from eighty thousand to one hundred thousand men in Ireland, and to pick from the English and Scotch organizations from three thousand to four thousand of the most determined men for action there, when the proper moment arrives. As soon as the organization is completed and has sufficient funds on hand, the Supreme Council will cease to exist, and the organization will become purely military. Each county will be placed under an officer, each province under a general, and the entire body under a military executive, the American organization being expected to supply officers. But even then no revolution need be anticipated, for the Irish revolutionists have now no hope of fighting England alone. The organization in its changed form will simply await events."

A Remarkable Robbery of Arms from a Norwegian ship in the harbor of Cork, Ireland, occurred on August 12th. The ship was ostensibly bound for New York, and had put into Cork for repairs. About a hundred men boarded her, and having secured the crew, carried off three cases of muskets.

The bold act has caused considerable excitement. The reports in circulation of Fenian plots, the drilling of men by night, and large arrivals of arms combine to produce a feeling of uneasiness which is increased by the desperate robbery of the ship. It is believed in many quarters that the vessel's position and cargo were the result of conspiracy, and that she was run into Cork harbor with the connivance of the owners and officers, for the purpose of providing arms, which can only be openly imported under difficulty and subject to restrictions.

The land agitation also continues, and a Government officer with his two sons have been attacked by a party of men armed with guns and bayonets, and wearing masks. One of the sons was shot dead and his brother and father seriously wounded. These facts combine to confirm the opinion held by many students of prophecy, which at one time seemed so improbable, that Ireland will ultimately be separated from England.

The Deplorable Condition of Society in Germany which has followed, if it has not been caused, by the scepticism which has taken deep root in German universities and schools, was graphically depicted in a sermon preached recently before the Emperor and the Princes by Mr. Bauer, the chaplain of the imperial family. He said: "Affection, faith, and obedience to the Word of God are unknown in this country, in this our great German Fatherland, which formerly was justly called the home of the faith. On the contrary, it really seems as if it were the father of all lies who is now worshipped in Prussia. What formerly was considered generous and noble is now looked upon with contempt; and theft and swindling are called by the euphonic name 'business.' Marriages are concluded without the blessing of the Church, concluded 'on trial,' to be broken if not found to answer. We still have a Sunday, but it is only a Sunday in name, as the people work during church hours, and spend the afternoon and evening in rioting in the public-houses and music-halls; while the upper classes rush to the races, preferring to hear the panting of the tortured horses to hearing the Word of God, which is ridiculed in the press and turned into blasphemy in the popular assemblies."

Garibaldi and the Jesuits.—Many of the Jesuits expelled from France have betaken themselves to Italy, principally in the locality which before the unification of the country was known as the Kingdom of Sardinia. Garibaldi regards the Jesuits as the worst enemies of Italy, and, in fact, of freedom throughout the world; on being informed of their arrival he expressed his sorrow that such an event should have happened, and wrote the following indignant letter to a friend, from Caprera, his island home: "My dear Baudi—Here, then, are the Jesuits in Sardinia. These wolves, chased from France, are in the midst of those innocent, brave, and hospitable people—a race so patriotic that the tyrant of the Seine was never able, in spite of all his corruptions, to encroach upon their steadfast attachment to Italy. Ah well! This generous peope has heard the bells, which are destined one day to be distributed among the poor as pence, ringing a full peal to greet the arrival of the sectaries of the Inquisition, protected by the most Jesuitical of governments."

Dr. Parsons, the American Missionary whose murder in Asiatic Turkey we mentioned last week, had been connected with the American Board of Commissioners for thirty years, and was a member of the Presbytery of New York. He graduated at Williams College in 1845, and afterward studied at the Union Theological Seminary. He had labored at Thessalonica and Smyrna since 1849. Mrs. Parsons, who had been absent from her American home for more than twenty years, returned alone on a visit last year. It is believed that notwithstanding the unsettled state of the Turkish Government, the murderers of the missionary, who have been arrested, will be put to death.

What is Good for the People, is a Subject on which the authorities in Great Britain appear to entertain strange ideas. A well-known evangelist, whose labors in the cause of the poor, the friendless, and the fallen, have been signally owned and blessed by God, applied to the Metropolitan Board of Works for permission to hold evangelistic services on Sundays in Finsbury Park, London. His request was not granted, but permission was readily given to the Sunday League to have a band of music in the park on Sundays. The Sunday League was organized to agitate for the opening of museums, libraries, and places of amusement on Sundays.

A Visit Paid by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon to the Wesleyan Conference during its recent sittings was the occasion of a cordial interchange of friendly greetings. When Mr. Spurgeon appeared on the platform the president, shaking hands with him, while all the ministers were on their feet, said: "Mr. Spurgeon, this is our way of expressing our acknowledgment of God's great mercy to you. Your great success as an evangelist of the Lord Jesus Christ has gladdened the heart of the conference as much as if you had been one of our own ministers. The way in which you have organized your church has filled us with amazement. We take this opportunity of welcoming you among us."

Mr. Spurgeon said he was altogether take surprise. The kind things which the presi had spoken had humbled him to the gro While opposition roused him, kindness over him. He belonged to the "know-nothings," f was determined to know nothing among save Jesus and Him crucified. Their bus was to believe the Word of God and to pr it. He was old-fashioned enough to believ only in the Bible but in its verbal inspira He believed God had chosen the best wor which the Bible might be written. But in days there was no sure ground for some pe they allowed one doctrine after another t away from them. He counselled his you brethren that most of their victories can faith. They should have faith to believe was unpopular, and the power of God woul able them to speak out the truth.

The Gospel in Gold and Silver Letter valuable and interesting manuscript has discovered by two German scholars. They searching through the libraries of Southern and Sicily, when they came upon an an manuscript in the Palace of the Archbish Rossano. On examination it was found to tain the Gospel of Matthew and the Gosp Mark as far as the fourteenth verse o sixteenth chapter. Scholars believe it was ten in the fifth century, and it is in exc preservation. The leaves of this manuscri made of purple parchment, and the material throughout in writing is silver, except i first three lines of each gospel, where the are golden. There is only one other manu of this kind in existence, containing any p of the New Testament, and it is in a mut condition, four of its leaves being in Londo in Rome, two in Vienna, and thirty-three been more recently discovered in the Isla Patmos.

The Waldensian Church has now One dred agents in evangelizing Italy—not fo ers, but Italians by birth, by civil right privileges, they constitute a native agency. Gospel is preached by them in forty-seven and villages. The number who attend worship under them is about 4000, and of 2414 are communicants, the majority of have come out of the Church of Rome.

The Smallest Married Couple that ever before an altar have lately been exhibi Odessa, in the persons of a miniature quis" and "marchioness." The forme native of Kiel, is thirty years old, and only nineteen pounds, while his fairy-lik sort, a young lady, born in Newmüns twenty-two years of age, and weighs onl teen pounds. They became aware of each existence a year ago, through reading the paper notices of their respective characte and entered into a correspondence whic mately led to a matrimonial engagement. are now travelling about and being exh and are saving up their earnings with the of retiring into private life in the Fatherl Persian Famine Fund.—Contribution ceived, from Adam Armstrong, Elmira, Ill., G. S. G., Baltimore, Md., $1.00; Alice Adam sellville, Ky., $1.00; U. Marble, Vassalboro $1.00.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Wat (London) for August may be obtained at the THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Price six cents.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Works are at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at low as to bring them within the reach of eve Twelve Sermons on various subjects, with ph of Mr. Spurgeon, price 35 cents. John Ploug Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, 6 The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, a volume sermons, $2.50. The Treasury of David, a h cal exposition of the book of Psalms, five vol as Psa. 118, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth-Da This popular gift-book contains a suitable selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for ev in the year, with a blank space opposite f graphs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. S appear at their respective birthdays. The elegantly bound, and the price is 75 cents. tances should accompany orders.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

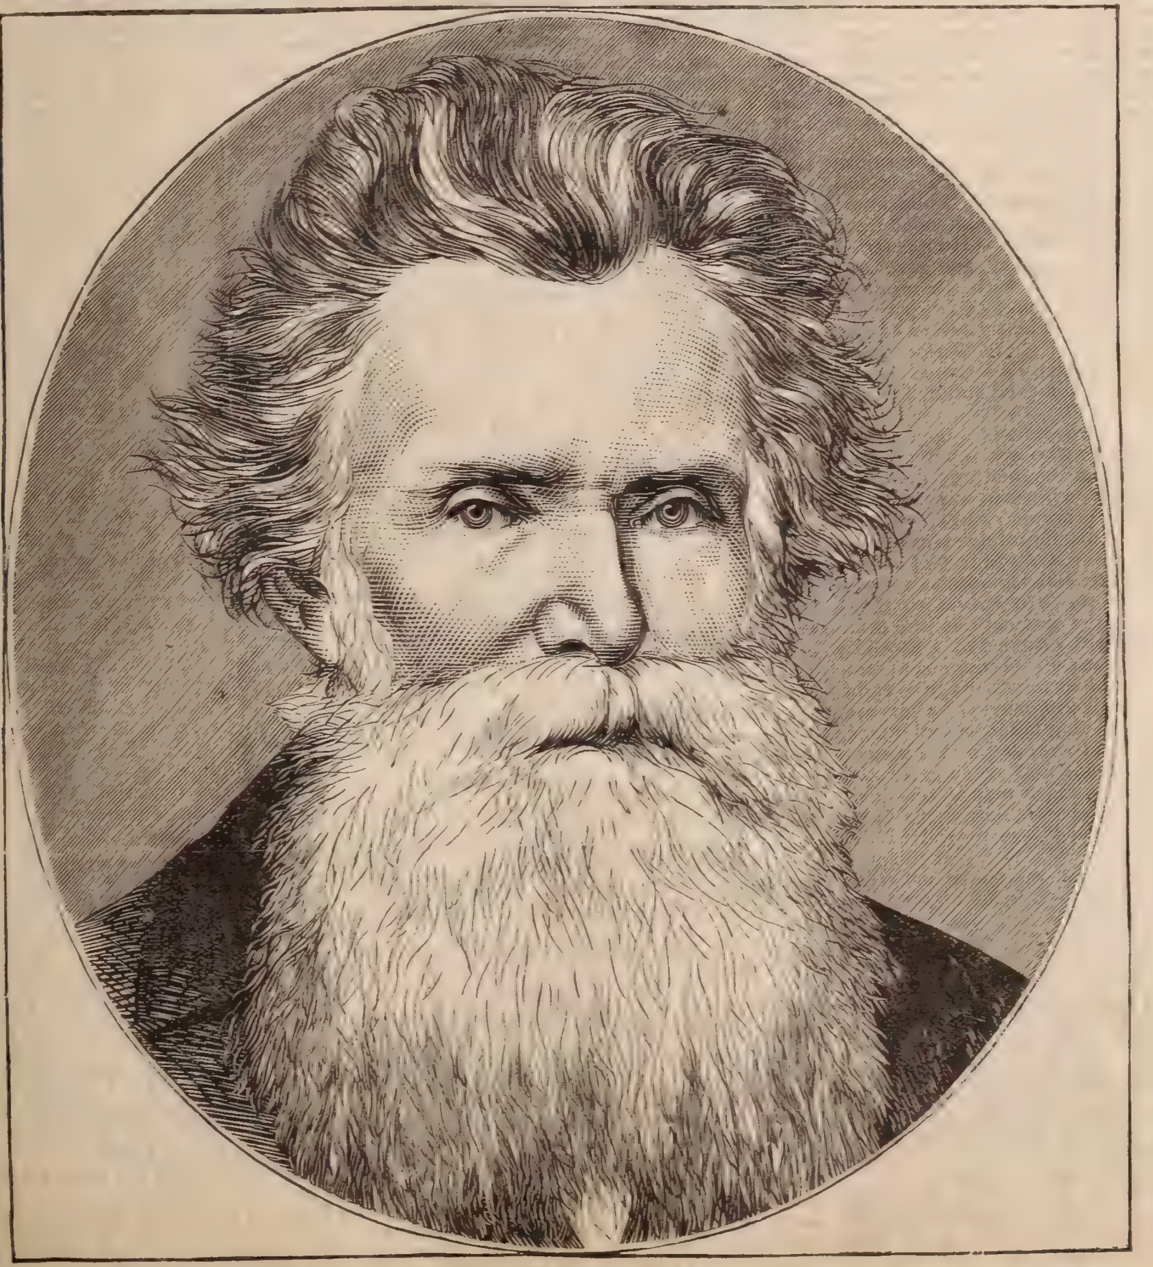
blished at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. LMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, Rev. W. M. Y AITKEN, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

ingle Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, AUGUST 26, 1880. 14th Year. No. 35—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PTRAIT OF THE LATE REV. ALEXANDER UFF, D.D., LL.D., the Famous Scottish Mis-onary, with Sketch of his Life.
A END TO VACILLATION. An Evening Sermon Dr. Talmage.
HESTER TOWER. A New Serial Story by ss M. A. Paull (Continued).
Salvation Army: Progress of the Work.
APPROACHING PERIHELIA AND CALAMITIES, by Rev. T. J. Malyon, LL.B. (Concluded).
CURRENT EVENTS: Campaign Notes—A Public Institution Needed—The Camp-Meetings—A Fatal Cigar—Fifty Years' Dissipation and Prayer—A Minister's Dog at Church—Prayer in a Liquor Saloon—A Maimed Census Enumerator, etc.
PROPHETIC EXPOSITION. Compiled by Rev. M. Baxter (Continued.)—John Barlow's Transformation.
TO-DAY! TO-DAY! TO-DAY! A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
A CHOICE VINDICATED. A Serial Story by the Author of "Saved at Sea."
Lot's Escape from Sodom. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter—Out on Bank Holiday in London.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The Attempt to Blow up Cork Barracks—The Persian Famine—The New Eastern Question—How a Moderation Pledge Failed, etc.



The Late Rev. ALEXANDER DUFF, D.D., LL.D., the Famous Scottish Missionary.

DR. ALEXANDER DUFF.

The Celebrated Missionary.

A Pious Father's Influence—Two Remarkable Dreams—Prayer in a Snow Storm Answered—Dr. Chalmer s Teaching—Attraction of the Mission Field—Ordination and Marriage—Twice Shipwrecked—His Method of Work—Organizing in Great Britain—Visit to America—Illness and Death.

IN our last issue we sketched the life of the eminent evangelist whose labors in various countries have been so abundantly blessed by God. In our present number we give the life of the pioneer missionary of the Scotch Church who gave his life to the spread of the Gospel in a field where Mr. Taylor also labored with success.

The name of Alexander Duff is one of the most highly honored among those of the braveand self-denying men who have devoted their lives to the work of preaching the Gospel in heathen lands. All his talents and all his energies he laid at the feet of Jesus in this cause, saying as he dedicated himself as a youth, "Silver and gold to give to this cause, Lord Thou knowest I have none; but what I have I give, I offer myself to Thee for the work. Wilt Thou accept the offer?" Tears ran down his cheeks as he thus gave himself up, and the Book of Life in Heaven and the records of the church on earth, testify that the offering was accepted by the Master. How many proud intellects and stubborn hearts have been brought under the power of the Cross through the instrumentality of Alexander Duff will be known only at the last day.

In the early days of this century the saintly Simeon was travelling in Perthshire, Scotland, and was delayed in his journey. While awaiting the means of proceeding, he attended a service conducted by Dr. Stewart. He was struck with its coldness and formality, and gave up a day to serious conversation with the minister. That conversation let a flood of Gospel light into Dr. Stewart's soul and he became an earnest evangelical preacher. The church was astonished at the change in the pastor's sermons and the whole neighborhood was moved and many souls converted.

Among the first converts was James Duff, a farmer at Auchnatoyle, who was a man of some culture and soon became eminent for his Christian life and character. This man was the father of Alexander Duff. Years afterwards, while his son was laboring in his far-off Eastern sphere, the old man laid himself down to die, and his son wrote of him a testimony honorable to both. He said: "If ever son had reason to thank God for the prayers, the instructions, the counsels, and the consistent example of a devoutly pious father, I am that son. Though sent from home for my education at the early age of eight, and though very little at home ever afterward, the sacred and awakening influences of infancy were never wholly forgotten, and in the absence of the moulding influences of regenerating grace, the fear of offending a man who inspired me in earliest boyhood with sentiments of the profoundest reverence and love toward himself as a man of God, was for many a year the overmastering principle which restrained my erring footsteps and saved me from many of the overt follies and sins of youth."

In the home of this godly man, Alexander Duff was born April 25th, 1806. He was sent to a small school in the neighborhood at the age of eight. It was a mere pretence of a school, for the man who kept it, spent his time in mending watches and violins while the elder children heard the younger ones say their lessons, and then went off to fish while his wife heard them all read a chapter from the Bible. After three years attendance the boy was removed to the parish school, and afterward to Perth Grammar School where he made rapid progress.

The boy's books at this period were only three, but over those three he pored with rapt attention, reading them over and over again. They were the Bible, "Paradise Lost," and the poetical works of Dugald Buchanan who was called the Highland Bunyan. The tone and character of Alexander Duff's thoughts and utterances throughout his life bore marks of that boyish reading, and those three books seemed to have given a form or mould to his mind which it never lost.

One of Buchanan's poems was on the "Judgment Day" and was the occasion of young Duff having

TWO REMARKABLE DREAMS.

One night he retired to rest after reading the poem and dreamed that he saw the great White Throne, and many men of different races advancing to receive sentence. He saw some condemned to everlasting punishment and others ordained to eternal life. He was seized with indescribable terror as his turn approached. His whole frame was convulsed and as he moved toward the judgment seat he awoke in an agony of dread. The dream left an indelible impression on his mind, he arose and prayed, and did not return to his couch until he felt in his soul an assurance of forgiveness through Christ.

On another occasion he had returned to his home for the summer vacation and after working on the farm one warm day he flung himself down to rest on the banks of a stream which flowed by his home. He fell asleep and dreamed that in the distance he saw a light brighter than the sun and that it approached him. Soon he saw that it was a chariot of gold and gems drawn by fiery horses. As it came near him he heard a voice, saying, "Come hither, I have work for thee to do." Three score years afterwards his memory of that dream was still vivid, and he related it to his little grandson as being the first suggestion he had of his call to Christian labor.

PRAYER IN A PERILOUS SITUATION.

Another boyish experience must close the reminiscences of his early days. He and a companion started one Saturday afternoon to walk home from school. It was ten miles away and, over the Grampians, where their road lay, a thick mist hung, and as they plodded through the heather snow began to fall, obliterating all landmarks. As they skirted a valley about three miles from their destination, darkness fell upon them and they knew not what to do. Deep morasses and a considerable tarn were to be avoided and the path was lost in the snow. But to go back was as dangerous as to go on. They toiled wearily along when suddenly they slid down what they supposed was a precipice; they alighted safely at the foot, but their way was hopelessly lost. In their extremity, Duff proposed that they should pray, and they knelt on the snow-covered ground and prayed for deliverance. Almost instantly a bright light flashed upon them. At first they supposed it to be lightning, but it was only the flash of a torch kindled by some salmon fishers. The gleam of light saved their lives, for it revealed to them a cottage near at hand where they obtained shelter until morning.

At the early age of fifteen years the boy was presented with twenty pounds by his father, to carry on his education at the nearest university of St. Andrews, and from that day was at his own charges. Here he made the acquaintance of the saintly Urquhart, to whose missionary enthusiasm he owed so much of his own burning zeal.

Mr. Duff was a student of divinity at St. Andrews when entered on his duties as Professor of Moral Philosophy in November, 1823. Encouraged by Dr. Chalmers, a few of the more earnest students, led on by John Urquhart, who by this time had entirely yielded himself to Christ, formed themselves into a missionary society, which at first held its meetings in a private room. The object was to diffuse information on the subject of missions Early in the session of 1824-5 it was incorporated with a general association, and thus originated the St. Andrews' University Missionary Society, which, in striking contrast to the apathy which formerly prevailed, came to number among its active frien and supporters a very large proportion of t students of the university.

DR. CHALMERS

Dr. Chalmers' heart was in the cause of m sions, and his house was always open to any o like-minded. At his table young Duff had t privilege of meeting that saintly man, Dr. Mo rison, and Dr. Marshman, the friend and co league of Carey. As an evidence of the pow Dr. Chalmers had over the young men und his care, it is a fact that no less than six of the volunteered for missionary work. They we Nesbitt, Adam, Urquhart, Duff, Mackay, a Ewart.

Mr. James Duff was naturally thankful for son's hopeful progress. It was his earnest sire that he should occupy a Scottish pulpit, a the reports that reached his ears of the you man's talents and attainments made him h that that pulpit would be a prominent one. I had gained a hold of Alexander's mind, and thoughts were directed to India. The Gene Assembly decided to establish in India a c tral seminary of education, with branch scho in the surrounding country for the benefit of tive children. It was resolved that the semin should be placed under the charge of an ordai minister of the national church with two ass ants. For this responsible post Alexander D then twenty-three years of age, was selected.

THE MISSIONARY SPIRIT

knew the disappointment his acceptance wo be to his father, but the passage was impres on his mind, "He that loveth father or mot more than Me is not worthy of me," and a tenderly breaking the news to his father, he cepted the appointment, and at a service on gust 12th, 1829, Dr. Chalmers having preac in St. George's, Edinburgh, Alexander Duff solemnly ordained for Bengal. He was thus first missionary sent to India by the Churc Scotland.

His ordination was followed by his marr to a daughter of Mr. W. Drysdale, of E burgh, a lady who, till her death some ten y before his own, proved a devoted wife and a loved mother. The young people set out after their marriage for the sphere of thei bor. They sailed from Portsmouth in the I Holland, October 14th, 1829.

The voyage proved one fraught with

SHIPWRECKS

and disaster. On the 13th February, 1830 vessel violently struck on the rocks of an u habited barren island, about thirty miles n of Cape Town, Africa. Passengers and barely escaped with their lives. The noble sel went to pieces, and almost everythin board perished. The personal losses of Mr. were great. Of a choice collection of book every department of knowledge, much p and dearly loved—amounting to 800 volum only a few, reduced to a state of pulp, picked up on the beach. All his journals, n memorandums, essays, and other papers, fruits of the reflection and research of years, were entirely lost.

"But they are gone," was the mission own written declaration at the time, "the gone; and blessed be God I can say 'g without a murmur. So perish all earthly thi the treasure that is laid up in heaven alo unassailable. God has been to me a God f mercy; and not the least of His mercies find in the cheerful resignation with whic now enables me to feel and to say, 'The gave, and the Lord hath taken away, bless the name of the Lord.'" The only artic covered in an undamaged state was a q copy of Bagster's "Comprehensive Bible Psalm Book," belonging to Dr. Duff, whic picked up safe in its leathern cover, by o
the sailors on the beach.

The disasters of the voyage were not yet
For having set sail in another ship fro Cape, on the 7th of March, 1830, a treme gale was encountered off the Mauritius, in the vessel was well-nigh foundered; and mouth of the Ganges she was overtaken rane, and violently tossed ashore, so that horrors of a second shipwreck were ex- ced. Thus, after eight months' voyage of tuous and varied perils, Mr. Duff reached lcta, well night overcome through exhaus- nd fatigue. Very cordial was the welcome and the sympathy shown him by his mis- y brethren, and by none more than by te Bishop Corrie, then Archdeacon of lcta, and by John Adam, of the London snary Society, his fellow-student and n t once adopted the plan he never after- bandoned. He firmly believed that India be converted through education, pene- with a Christian spirit and conveyed in glish language; and amid scorn and op- he founded, with only five pupils, the Assembly's Institution, which became mplar of a system of vast schools on the asis which have since educated tens of ds of Hindoos. Possessed of singular of tuition, unwearied in labor, and able ain men with an oratory under which lis- who hated missions would sit rapt for r. Duff had another faculty which served re than all these. He was a born diplo- the highest sense, and for years he me- etween the religious world and the gov- of India until he acquired the perfect ce of both, and was able to exercise a eficent influence over all moral, educa- nd philanthropic legislation. He never red a principle, but official objections o vanish before his arguments. No man ve himself up for others more unre- or exerted a nobler influence, or dis- ore splendid powers with a more com- pression of himself.

PLAN OF THE WORK.

THE MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

ow celebrated institution or academy, s been pronounced even by the Gov- neral of India to have produced un- l results, commenced amid discourage- all sides. But Duff knew what he was ailing to get assistant teachers he had f only one East Indian lad. Gradually l grew, the reputation of its master d a larger building was found.

titution, which was opened on the 12th , became signally successful. The Hin- s who flocked to the hall to procure an ducation, were so numerous that a se- d to be made. The missionary was con- ssailed by their importunities in broken Some would say, "Me good boy; oh, " others, "Me poor boy; oh, take ers, "Me know your commandments alt have no other god before me—oh, ' and many, by way of final appeal, me, and I pray for you." From the an ordinary school, the institution rose to that of a missionary college, y from 700 to 800 natives of different m the Brahmin downward, and of ges, from eight to nine, to twenty or . The improved systems of Euro- ture and science, as well as the evi- doctrines of the Christian faith, were brought into contact in the minds of advanced, with the systems of error, he prepossessions of ignorance and 1.

from the interior of the country re- their stations to imitate the model could. The heathen Hindoo College e excited, and challenged the impet- ian missionary to controversy. Duff, ave a series of lectures on natural d religion, which drew crowds and tes which alarmed the government, a heavy blow at infidelity, and led to of two of the atheistic leaders, who ymen.

s eastern career of thirty-four years history of Indian progress from 1830 t as Dr. Carey's was during the pre- of a century. But he was, above all things, the Christian missionary, whether "preparing the way" for Him whose right it is to reign, or stirring up the churches of Scotland, England, and America to do their part.

DRIVEN FROM INDIA

in 1836 by dysentery after his first five years of such work, he engaged in rousing the British churches to a sense of the importance of foreign missions, and he published the substance of his many addresses in the well-known work, "India and India Missions."

Returning in 1839 by Egypt, Mount Sinai, and Bombay, he found the institution at Calcutta flourishing under Dr. Mackay, Dr. Ewart, Mr. Macdonald, and Dr. Thomas Smith, and he at once prepared for carrying out his great design of building up an indigenous church by establishing a collegiate department in which to train converts for the native pastorate.

The disruption of the Scottish Church occurred in 1843, and all the missionaries left in a body, forming the Free Church in Calcutta. The whole work of erecting and furnishing a college had again to be undertaken, as well as the task of building a church. After years of labor and expense, this was accomplished, and the operations of the mission were so extended that, in 1849, having previously declined to leave India to become Dr. Chalmers's successor, Dr. Duff was asked to go home to raise more funds. He returned, and was eminently successful. His eloquent appeals throughout Great Britain being met with ready response.

VISIT TO AMERICA.

In 1851, Mr. George H. Stuart, of Philadelphia, paid a visit to Scotland and listened with delight to Dr. Duff's addresses. He urged him to visit America, and in 1854 the invitation was accepted. A vivid recollection still remains of the enthusiastic reception accorded him. At Philadelphia, New York, Washington, and Baltimore he addressed large assemblies which were powerfully moved by his eloquence.

He travelled to Canada intending to return to Scotland by way of Halifax; but he was induced to come back to New York that he might attend a general missionary conference convened at the Broadway Tabernacle, and which lasted two days. The conference was held May 4th and 5th, and Dr. Duff was one of the most prominent speakers. On the 13th, he set sail in the Pacific for Scotland amid the enthusiastic good wishes of his American friends. Shortly after his departure the University of New York conferred upon him the degree of LL.D.

On his arrival in Great Britain he acted as Moderator of the General Assembly, and was with difficulty allowed by his medical advisers to return to Calcutta, which he reached early in 1856 through Central Europe and Central India. No missionary has spoken so much and so eloquently, and perhaps none has published so much as Dr. Duff. One is amazed at the fertility of his pen at a time when his activity in public has been so great in a tropical climate. He was editor of the Calcutta Review. His letters on the Indian Mutiny roused Scotland. He took a prominent part in the Missionary Conference which he established, the Agricultural Society, founded by Carey, the School-Book Society, and the Doveton College. His Bengalee students are to be found as ministers, teachers, and clerks all over Upper India. Ramchundra Bose, who is now on a visit to this country and whose portrait and life appeared in a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was a student in Dr. Duff's college, and his ripe scholarship and attainments are an evidence of Dr. Duff's ability and skill as a tutor. So well did Dr. Duff carry out the self-propagating system of his institution, that to it many of the other missionary bodies look for agents. India in its widest interests has been Dr. Duff's field of action—that India may be Christ's was ever his prayer and his toil.

When sore sickness drove him finally from it, in 1864, all classes and all creeds combined to do honor to the most unselfish, most laborious, most devoted life that generation had witnessed. The native Christians, a much poorer and smaller body, also caused a marble bust of their great teacher and spiritual father to be made.

The Scottish merchants of Calcutta, especially men like the public-spirited William Mackinnon, Esq., of Ballinakill, who knew Dr. Duff's work best, raised a sum sufficient to present him with a house, which became his Edinburgh residence, and to endow in the new college a professorship of Evangelic Theology, to be filled by such retired missionary as may be found competent for the duties. That chair Dr. Duff was himself persuaded by the General Assembly to hold. Self-denying always and generous ever to the extent of his means, Dr. Duff refused to draw his salary as Professor, leaving it to accumulate for missionary purposes.

LAST ILLNESS AND DEATH.

At the close of 1876 Dr. Duff suffered from a heavy fall while taking a book down from an upper shelf in his library. A visit to his favorite retreat, at Patterdale in the English Lakes, would have benefited his health more had he not indulged in long walks. In November, 1877, he was removed south to Sidmouth, Devonshire. His second son was summoned by telegraph from Calcutta to be beside him, and in the last few weeks was enabled to cheer his father's dying hours.

Never had he been so mentally vigorous during his illness as in his last few days. He dictated much to his son, as the old Indian life came back to him, when he contended for the Christian education of the people.

His last conscious Sabbath was that of the 3d of February. "I can feel, I can think, but the weakness prevents my almost opening my mouth," he whispered. When one said to him, "You are like John at Patmos, you are in the Spirit on the Lord's day," the earnest response was, "Oh, yes! oh, yes!" But on that day the hand of death became more evidently visible. In the evening his daughter repeated to him the 23d Psalm as he lay apparently unconscious, he responded at the end of each verse. Even on Saturday the departing saint could recognize the voices he loved, but his only response then was a grasp of the hand. Without acute suffering, and in perfet peace, he lingered on till Tuesday morning, February 12th, 1878, when he was summoned away to receive his reward.

The results of Dr. Duff's labors become more apparent every year, and they are likely to go on growing in the public esteem as time rolls on. He believed that converts whose education was defective were in great danger of falling back into heathenism, and therefore he earnestly labored to diffuse secular knowledge saturated with Gospel truth. His favorite description of his work was that he was laying a mine which he hoped would ultimately explode under heathenism and infidelity, and shatter them to pieces. It was a laborious, toilsome mode of warfare, but the patient persevering man who planned and executed it, had faith in the work, and he lived to see that God had directed him, in it, and had blessed his labors.

A Man in Liverpool, England, Resolved on committing suicide and started toward the harbor, intending to throw himself into the Mersey. As he threaded his way through the crowded streets he passed "The Stranger's Rest," a mission room where services are daily held, and he was prompted to enter for a moment. A hymn was being sung at the meeting, when he entered—"What a Friend we have in Jesus"—and he was particularly affected by the words in the last verse, "Do thy friends despise, forsake thee?" for he had lost friends and character. A solo hymn, sung by a blind lady, was "What are you Going to Do, Brother?" It was the turning-point with him. He became a changed man, gave his heart to Christ, obtained a situation and has now been a worker in connection with the mission for five months.

AN END TO VACILLATION.

An Evening Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Preached on Sunday, May 16, 1880.

"How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him; if Baal, then follow him."
—I KINGS 18 : 21.

The Time for Baal to do his Best—Elijah's Precautions against Future Sceptics—The Vote—There are Two Gods Now as Then—Persons Addressed—I. Those who are Trying to Compromise—The Undecided—In the Desert Half-way between two Fountains—II. Christians who Make no Profession of Religion—Silent Partners in the Firm—Silent Friendships Worthless—Silent Patriotism is Treason—A Nonogenarian's Mystery—III. Those who Cannot Decide on a Suitable Time to Surrender—The Endless Journey—Two Crises—An Interview with a Sick Sinner Postponed—"Ah! that Fatal Word"—A Better Word.

ELIJAH noticed great indecision in the people of his day, as to whether they had better worship the Lord, or a Phœnician idol by the name of Baal. Without wasting any time in a round of argument he said, Now let us have this matter demonstrated. We will have two bullocks slain: if the bullock slain by the Baalites is destroyed and consumed by fire from heaven, then we will all go over and worship Baal. But if the bullock slain by the people of God is consumed by fire from heaven, then all the Baalites will come over to our side. Come now, let us have the matter demonstrated.

I hear the stroke of the bludgeon, and the bullock staggers back and drops down, dead. It is quartered; the bullock is put on the altar of wood and stone. Now is the time, Baal, to do your best. If you have any fire at all, throw it down now and let this bullock be consumed. From 7 o'clock in the morning till 12 o'clock at noon the Baalites cried: Hear us, Oh, Baal; hear us, O Baal.

Elijah cannot keep his face straight from irresistible laughter; and so he jokes them. He says to them, now perhaps your God is gone a-hunting, and he may be on the track of a deer, or a fox, and be determined to keep on until he has brought down the game. Or perhaps your God is talking very loud, is negotiating in very boisterous conversation, and cannot hear. Call louder; call louder.

No fire from heaven came. Then the Baalites took knives and lancets, and drew the knives across their hands, and across their feet, and across their faces, until the blood spurted, as much as to say, Now, O Baal, just see; if you do not hear our cry, we will kill ourselves; and then what will you do? No fire fell upon the sacrifice, no fire consumed the bullock of the Baalites.

Now Elijah comes in with great gravity of countenance, and of overwhelming demeanor. I know he is a prophet of the great God; I hear another stroke of the bludgeon, and the bullock staggers back and drops down; it is quartered; it is placed upon the altar of the Lord which had been broken down, but which Elijah had repaired with twelve stones he brought to represent the twelve tribes of Israel.

Now, says Elijah, that there may be no appearance of sleight of-hand, about this, and that no fool in the first century, or in the nineteenth century, may say "this is no miracle," dip up twelve barrels of water from the sea at the foot of the cliff, and pour the water all over the wood, all over the sacrifice, so if it is really consumed, it may be clear that it is destroyed by no ordinary fire. And the work was done; the water was dipped up; and I hear the plash, and I hear it dropping all around about the altar. Now all is ready; still as the grave. With deep majestic voice Elijah begins to pray: Oh, Lord God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, let it be known this day that Thou art God in Israel; hear me, O Lord, hear me. As a flash in the sky there is a bolt, and everything is ablaze, the wood, the meat, the stones of the altar, the solid earth; the long tongues of flame begin to lick up the water out of the trenches, as a pack of thirsty hounds lap up a stream.

ELIJAH IS READY;

And now I see Elijah looking off upon the audience and saying, All those who think that Baal is God, let him say aye. No answer. Then Elijah looked over upon the audience, and he now says, All here who think that the Lord is God, let him demonstrate it. And there goes up a shout through the trees, a shout rolling down through all the ages, as they cry, The Lord, He is the God; the Lord, He is the God.

As then, so now.

THERE ARE TWO GODS.

Some prefer the one, some prefer the other. Jehovah the one, the world the other. I do not at this point in my discourse express any preference; I do not in this point of my discourse try to persuade you whether it shall be best to choose this God, or choose that one, but I ask you to make some choice, do some one thing or another, either go this way, or go that way. "If the Lord be God, follow Him: but if Baal then follow him."

There are many in this audience who are decided for God; and I have no time to talk with them to-night, I have no more anxiety about you than a farmer who has loads of hay in the barn, while there are fifty loads out on the field when the wind changes to the north-east. All I have to say to those who have chosen God is, I congratulate you, while I pass on; for my text does not accost you, you have decided, and decided forever.

Then there are those who have decided for the world. I do not now address them; they have said, I look at worldly associations, I look at worldly principles. I would rather have $10,000 in money than all the promises of the Gospel you ever made. Give me the world, let me die in the world, I want no other portion; you will decide; my text does not accost you.

Neither this one party who are Christians, nor this other party who have given themselves up to the world; but there is a third party vacillating between the right and the wrong. There was a time when you went into your room, and locked your door, and you prayed. You started heavenward. Then you started back. I ought to be a Christian—that is your one opinion. I ought not to be a Christian—that is your other opinion; and between these two opinions you halt.

This morning one hundred and fifteen souls had their names read out from the church roll; they are all decided. That little band of men and women said, give me Christ while I live, give me Christ when I die. But there is a vast multitude in the house to-night who are entirely undecided. To them come the words of my text. "How long will ye halt between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him: if Baal, then follow him." And while I stand here I am overwhelmed with the fact that in 100 years at least this whole audience will be in heaven, or in--hell. Oh, Lord God, help us to-night; help us to speak, and help us to hear, since it is for eternity.

I. My text in the first place describes all those people who are trying to serve Christ and serve the world, and so compromise the matter. They want Christian society, and yet they want to keep their old connection; they want to go to the prayer-meeting, and want to keep with the dissipated club. They want first Christian sobriety, and then they want to keep themselves under the damnable power of the wine-cup. They want to serve the world, and they want to serve Christ at the same time; they are just far enough from the world to lose the advantage of its friendships and its joys, they are far enough off from Christ to lose the pardon and peace of the Gospel; they are neither one thing nor the other; they do not have the advantage of the world, and they do not have the advantage of religion.

They are off in the desert; three miles in that direction there is a fountain, and three miles in the other direction there is a fountain; I don't say which is the best fountain for them t out of, but they alight here in the deser way, halting between the world and Chris

OH, WHAT A FOOLISH POSITION

it is to occupy. Now friends you had be clear over to the world. Perhaps you ha take out a new ticket for some place o amusement; perhaps you had better fil your wine-cellar; perhaps you had better deeper into worldly association, and go ther amid Godless companionship; if best, then go in that direction. If Baal then follow him.

But if you are really coming to the co that Christ, notwithstanding all that h said against Him, is not after all so und if you would like to be on the same sid your Christian father and mother stood would like to be among the hundred a and four thousand radiant and peerle around the throne of God, if at last yo like to enter heaven, a place which shall besieged by sin and sorrow and death a then perhaps this night you had be render yourself to God. Why will yo thirst on the path across which there c ooo buckets dripping from the spring will you die on the door-step of heav
you hear the clang of the golden harps will you stop half-way between Christ world? Either stick to the Ville du H go down, or swim to the Loch Ern and "If the Lord be God, follow Him: if B follow him."

II. But my text also describes all th while they have the grace of God in th make no profession of it before the worl do you attend church? A man says, " the Methodist church sometimes, or th church, or the Presbyterian church, or copal church." To what church do yo You say, "I don't belong to any churc world claims you because you carry back; the church claims you for you port its religious institutions; but you long to neither.

"Oh," you say, "Can't a man seek prepare for heaven and finally reach i publishing his profession of religion."
perhaps when the Lord's army has c songs and everlasting joy upon their h will be some stragglers who will come tell you, the vast majority of those before the throne of God on High, b triumphant, had their names on the c ord on earth, as they have them on records in heaven.

Oh, do you not want to belong to of the church here, and to be forever with them before the throne. Do yo be

SILENT PARTNERS IN THE FI

and get all the rewards of spirituali tages, but not have the world know that side?

What would you give for mere sil ship? if you were in some great str life, and you should want a friend, an say to himself, I like that man as a fr will not profess in public any particu ship toward him; ten thousand s would be of no advantage; you want a will stand up for you, who will stand behavior, and on every important an occasion will say, I am that man's know he is right.

The Lord Jesus Christ has been y yet there are hundreds and thousan perhaps, in this house to-night who and yet are ashamed to say so. He c way from heaven to win your soul, ca darkness and gloom and death, and moments He asked you to come and love, saying, do this in remembra
You have not had courage to take th withstanding all that Christ has do salvation, that little thing, and you it.

Suppose there came a great war,

ere struggling in battle against a foreign , and when the drum for recruits sounded, a man who would stay at home, not come d make any enlistment, never express his r the United States Government, never nything for the defence of that Govern- Oh, you would say, let the country be from such patriotism as that. Yonder is who will come out, and fight for his Gov- t, he will do all that is required or ex- of him as a citizen, and you say, it is an ambition.

are the friends of the Lord Jesus Christ government of heaven, we should openly ve-board and on every occasion express erence. Oh, are there not those here to- ho will say to the people of God, "Where est I will go; thy people shall be my and thy God my God; where thou diest e, and there will I be buried; the Lord me, and more also, if aught but death e and me." I had a Christian uncle ninety years of age, and he said to me: t, it has always been the great mystery ife that though for forty years I loved l, I never said so."

Again my text describes all those who ecide as to what is

BEST TIME TO BECOME CHRISTIANS.

are two voices in your soul; one says the other says "to-morrow." I will is point in my discourse say which is time, but only ask you to decide what it a judge of a court sometimes adjourns a hree months and then not bother him- the case until it comes, and then takes if you will, adjourn your decision for a y, then put it off until that day or year e. Suppose, then, you postpone religion ars, if you can at the end of that time st, while in the meantime you have had , won't that be better? Or, if you are st in health, why not adjourn it twenty will bring it to the year 1900.

you say, "how if I should be taken off nt before that? How if my day of uld close before that? How if I eve away the Holy Ghost before that? avalanche of iniquity should come n my soul before that?" Ah, my ee the point you make. You mean to ut of a thousand souls lost forever, 999 are lost through adjournment. You y, that out of a million souls lost, 999,- eir souls through putting it off. You y that if in the world of darkness we hose who had lost their souls through ition, to rise, they would all rise, and t our souls by putting it off. Decide e now and to-morrow.

u go out of this church you will not ahead, there is no street direct to the n the front of the church you will to the east or west, up and down the so it is in matters of the soul, you raight, you will either go to the right ft. Toward God or toward Baal, to- or toward darkness, toward victory lefeat.

started on a journey that will never foot will stiffen, the lung will fail to r, the film will come down over the ut out the light of the sun and moon nd your body will stop, but your soul and on, up, up, down, down, through ert, under plume or bramble, across or hovel, along by halls filled with he marriage of the king's son, or e rows of skeleton armies beating ith the dead march of the soul. Oh, t you would decide.

ertainly expressed no preference. ss it. There came a lad, I sat by the winter fire, and e, the evangelist, had come to our while we sat there in the country g at the fire, and the storm was hallooing outside—Mr. Osborne knew all the members of my father's family were Christians except myself—not addressing himself to me, but looking at the fire, he told of a sheep and lambs that were out on the mountain, and that they all got into the fold but one lamb, and that perished on the mountain.

RISES IN MY SOUL'S HISTORY.

With that conversation the evening ended; but that was a crisis in my soul. I was the only one in all the household that did not love God, father, mother, brothers, and sisters all Christians. I knew then what it was to be alone, and outside of the ark, alone and away from God. And that, perhaps, is your condition to-night.

But there came another crisis: it was at the close of a Sabbath service in which I had heard my brother preach a farewell sermon to his people. That night, out of a sound sleep, I was startled, and voices seemed to say, Are you ready for eternity? Are you ready? I sprang from my couch and I struck a light, I went down stairs to the room where my brother was asleep, and he was startled when I came in, and I said, Oh, what shall I do? I am a lost sinner; what will become of me? Pray for me. He prayed for me, and we passed all that night in conversation. Oh, that was a crisis in my soul's history.

Yet there was another crisis, for I struggled against God's Spirit, until it was a wonder He did not give me up. One beautiful Sabbath afternoon, halting between two opinions, I opened Doddridge's book called "The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul." I read a while, and I prayed a while; then I read, and I prayed; and I believe that that afternoon was the time of my soul's deliverance. And then I went forth to preach the gospel, and I have had the joy of preaching it for eleven years to many who sit in this house to-night.

My heart aches to have all the people saved. First I desire to reach heaven myself; then I desire to take all this audience with me. Why halt any longer between two opinions? "If the Lord be God, follow Him; if Baal, then follow him."

A FATAL WORD.

Ah, that word to-morrow, comes in to crowd out the word now. To-morrow, to-morrow, to-morrow. I don't like the word. It makes me think of the time when a minister of the gospel heard that his neighbor, who was entirely unprepared for eternity, was dying, and he hastend to his house, and he knocked at the door; the servant came to the door, and he asked, "I hear Mr. A. is very sick; how is he now?" She says, "He is very low to-day. The physician says no one can see him," and the clergyman said, "When can I come?" and she said, "To-morrow."

The next day he went to that household, and he entered again, and he says, "How is Mr. A. to-day?" And she says, "Let him come in, but he is entirely delirious, he will not know what you are saying." The clergyman entered; the whole house was in distress, and he knelt down by the bedside of the sick man, so sick he knew not what was being done, and he now all unprepared for the future. At the close of the interview he said to the wife, "When shall I come again?" She said, "To-morrow." The next day he went to the house, and he knocked at the door, and the servant says, "You can't see Mr. A to-day.' "Well" says the clergyman, "when shall I come?" And she said, "To-morrow." The next day he went to the house, and hardly had he touched the door before it was opened by the servant, and he said, "How is Mr. A. to-day?" "Oh," she said, "he is dead." Before the clergyman thought, he cried; "God, have mercy." But it was too late. Oh, that fatal to-morrow—to-morrow! There is

A BETTER WORD

than that — to-night, to-night. Many of you have friends in heaven. I look into the faces of some here who have children in heaven. Are you going to meet them? Some of you have companions in heaven; will you meet them before the throne? Parents in heaven; will you meet them? Soon all this scene will have passed away, and the books will be opened. Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him shall wail because of Him. How then? Will you be in the glorious companionship of your dear ones who have preceded you into glory, or in everlasting banishment and exile?

[The prayers oi the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, of labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 185,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

OUT ON BANK HOLIDAY IN LONDON.

By G. W. M.

I TAKE no holidays, but like other people to enjoy theirs. So I went on August 2d to see how the people enjoyed their holiday. What a hive of life is the East-end of London! Miles of streets, acres of houses; tens of thousands of men, women, and children, and alas! many of the little folks are very pale and thin.

All the stations on the North London Railway were lined with old and young off to the Zoo, the Alexandra Palace, and the Crystal Palace, and, observe, they are all sober. This fact filled me with thankfulness. But former experiences of Bank holidays have taught me that after three p.m., especially if showers have driven people into public-houses, there is a sudden outburst of alcoholic excitement. So it was. Between three and four o'clock I was on a crowded pier near one of the bridges, and there came along the jetty, dancing, shrieking and swearing, four young men and two girls, who had furnished themselves with high shoes and scarlet stockings. Down they rushed on to the pier to catch the Woolwich boat, which had just gone. "How long," said a drunken youth, with his hat on the back of his head, "before the next boat?"

"Half an hour," replied the pierman. Who swore that fearful oath? Not any of the big, rough men around us. No, it exploded on the lips of this girl! Alas! her fair young face, and she is fair in feature, is wild with drink, and she swears like a trooper. Where is her father—her mother? "Half an hour to wait; let's go and have some drink." And off they went. I waited, but saw them no more. What became of them?

A quiet saunter along the Thames Embankment may be soothing after that scene. So I strolled on, and lo! a woman incapably drunk is being lifted by a strange man out of danger, and propped up against the parapet wall. She is quite alone, and so drunk that she cannot speak. Did Cleopatra's Needle, in that old land from whence British heroes, not without loss of life, brought it, ever in ancient times look down on so much intemperance as is to be seen to-day in London?

But for a purpose I went on board a Chelsea steamer and started up the river. Three hundred of us are here, and all are not quite sober, as you may see. This boat, and forty-five others plying up and down these broad reaches of water, are public-houses! Let us go down into the forecabin. Here, as you see, is a stout, silent woman selling biscuits, Banbury cakes, cigarettes, shag, lemonade, pale ale, stout, brandy, whiskey, and rum; and round the cabin are people imbibing those liquors. Now is this sale necessary? Can people not go from London Bridge to Chelsea without bottles of beer and glasses of brandy? They are none the better for them, as will be seen at seven or eight o'clock.

A cup of tea and a pleasant rest prepare one for another excursion. Let us visit a well-known West-end station. What a rush of people—some of them very queer people indeed. The refreshment bars are full and busy. They are very busy indeed. Going off by train those people drink, coming in by train they drink too. Beer, brandy, rum, whiskey, are sold with amazing celerity. Now, just ask for a cup of tea. See how that young lady starts, looks glumly at you, and then, turning to someone else, says, snappishly enough, "A cup of tea." Ah! a teetotaler is not wanted here, so let me out.

What is that noise? Surely the bulls of Bashan have broken loose. Let us go into a doorway and let them rush past. Some tipsy young men pass bellowing—they thought it was singing—in the most hideous manner. Let them go. We have known bears behave better. Here is a corner public-house with four doors crowded with drinkers. Young women, flushed with gin, are rushing in and out; old and young folks are dancing on the pavement, and "the fun"—as they call these mad leaps—is "jolly." Be it known to you that this is a "fixed point," where a constable is always on duty, but if you can find him just now it is more than I can. His present "fixed point" is elsewhere.

Do you wonder now that not far from here is a jail where 5000 women have been in a single year. Think of that grim fact, and remember that this holiday will send a good many women within its walls.

Business called me to the House of Commons, and as I passed through the lofty hall of William Rufus, and saw the marble statues of kings and statesmen, and then stood under the gorgeous roof of the House itself, I said, "When will the legislators strike an honest, mighty blow at this monster—Strong Drink?"

ROCHESTER TOWER.

By Miss M. A. Paull.

(Continued from page 535.)

Constance Writes to the Minister—Her Perplexities—Mr. Ferguson's Reply—The Plan of Creation and Providence—A Solution in Faith—Constance Coming Home.

A few days afterward Mr. Ferguson received the following letter from Constance Anerley:

"Dear Mr. Ferguson: I don't think I need remind you that you once told me I might apply to you if I was in any difficulty in which I thought you might be able to help me. I am in a difficulty now, a difficulty which it would trouble mamma or even Emmie to write freely to them about, and though I do not feel at all sure you can help me, I have made up my mind to try.

"You know I have not made any profession of religion, so I hope you will not manifest any pious horror at me, as I know most people would, if I write to you exactly that which, do as I will, I cannot help thinking. I quite expect you know all about the sad occurrence that has taken place here, and you know that, though I tried my best to keep dear Clara Altmeister from falling in her somnambulistic sleep, yet that I did not succeed, and that she fell and received very severe injuries. The doctors hoped at first she might ultimately recover; now they know that she has suffered concussion of the spine, and that her fate will probably be to lie on a bed or couch all the remainder of her life.

"They fear, as yet, to tell her the truth, and will wait until she regains some little strength before they make known to her this awful alternative. Now, Mr. Ferguson, you say, and you preach, and so I hope you believe, that God is good, and God is love. Will you be kind enough, then, to explain to me why a God who is goodness and love should make a person like Clara Altmeister—should produce in her, or even allow to be produced in her—tendencies and failings of physical strength which make her unable to prevent herself from walking in her sleep: should suffer her to break away from all the restraint that might have prevented so dread a catastrophe, and to fall and become a helpless, hopeless invalid, not for years merely, but for life?

"I can quite understand when men and women and children wilfuly and deliberately break God's laws, that even a God who is both just and good, and full of love, may very properly punish them. For instance, if Clara had become intoxicated with Rhein wein or lager bier, and in that state had fallen from the window to be maimed or injured for life, there would have been a beautiful order and fitness of retribution in it. But when an innocent girl is so frightfully punished for a mere accident she could not possibly avoid, I feel it difficult to understand the reason for such an event.

"Why should Clara Altmeister, a sensible, industrious, clever girl, be thus cut off from playing her part in the work of the world, while a tiresome, pedantic, purse-proud, self-willed child like Anna Glück is favored with the use of a healthy body? Why should a man whose wickedness spoils all he touches be suffered to live, and my dearest father, who did, as you will acknowledge (for I believe you loved him), almost nothing but good, be cut off prematurely, and thus the very light of my eyes, as it were, taken from me?

"I cannot tell you how much these matters puzzle me, how anxious I am to be able to explain them, and still respect the faith of my father. Does he know all things now? Can he understand and pity the perplexity of his youngest born? Will my belief in God and Christ, and my trying to be a Christian, really reunite us? Have you any certain dependable knowledge of that other life which you say comes after death? Is death, indeed, only a bridge, uniting this life with that which is to come? Are heaven and earth only two lands divided by the ocean of time?

"Please do not fear that I am doing any harm to my pupils because of these fierce inward questionings. I am content to be silent concerning what I very much fear I shall never understand. If I cannot comprehend life myself, why should I perplex younger and more innocent beings, many of whom I dearly love, with mysteries I have no power to solve?

"Nor must you think that my puzzling and speculations make me always dull and gloomy. Though I often wonder at myself for it, I am sometimes absurdly merry, for a girl who has lost her father, and is in doubt whether she can ever find the road to him. Believe me to remain yours respectfully,

"Constance Anerley."

Tears were in Mr. Ferguson's eyes as he read the last sentence of this strange impulsive letter.

"Poor dear child!" he murmured.

The evening of the same day that he received the letter, he answered it.

"My dear Constance: I thank you heartily for the confidence you repose in me, and which made you write to me the letter you have done.

"But some of that letter was not worthy of you, because you asked me in it several questions which you could, if you had only thought longer, have answered for yourself. So I will first suggest some other questions, which will help you to answer your own.

"Why, when you copied that beautiful head of Minerva did you not make all your lines of equal length; why did you cut some short abruptly, and fashion others long and boldly curving; why did you have curved, and arched, and horizontal, and perpendicular lines in your picture? You will answer, 'Because I had to follow my pattern.' And do you not suppose that the Great Artist of the Universe, like all His true artists on earth, follows an idea, has a plan for all His creations, for all His purposes, and with man, as with everything else? May not what we ignorantly call a too short or a spoiled life be really the very thing that completes a picture?

"I, like you, am still a child, still a learner, still puzzled over my alphabet. But because I cannot understand the mystery of the worlds of light in the heavens above us, shall I commend my good sense to any one by declaring that the stars do not shine? You may not be able to trust God's love and goodness, and I am glad you are honest enough to acknowledge this to me.

"But it is His love that supplies you wit power even to reason about Him so false you are now doing. He can withhold that re ing faculty, and allow you to become an By your own showing, you deserve that should happen, for you are making an un ful, i.e., a sinful, use of those powers, an admit you can understand God's justice punishment of wilful sinners.

"I am answering you, Constance, as I b you honestly wished to be answered, b fearlessly, almost as I should try to answe self—as I did try, in fact, when I, like yo now, was troubled with miserable questio We have to face a great many most pu things, and they are far easier to face if we faith in God to answer them instead o very small, poor, mean substitute—faith i selves.

"Any small soul can have some sort o in his own poor puny self. It takes a no greater, a braver soul to have faith in Those who try to reason away God and t a life from which He is shut out, narrow thing. Examine for yourself whether this so, and whether the finest lives, viewed ally and dispassionately, of all of who read or whom you know, are not those wh fullest, most unwavering, most entire f the Divine Being. Look first of all at yo loved father, and try to comprehend mor what made you all love him so, and w nobled his life. Constance Anerley, disb God makes cowards, not heroes.

"It may be that your poor friend, Cla meister, will live a grander life on her so she would ever have done with the body she formerly possessed. We take o earth microscope, peer curiously at ou and see all the ugly spots on them more than their beauties. But God looks at us men, where He can see everything in its ite and just proportion, and He knows t 'light affliction which is but for a mo working for us the exceeding weight of g

"I can truly assert that my own life peace till Christ was my pattern, my brot guide; that since He has become all thi rather since I have been willing to receive such, I have been happier, and at rest. I mean that I have no troubles, perplexi sorrows; all these, as I believe, are nee cipline for us, but I cannot feel friendl saken, or alone. Who shall separate us f love of Christ? Believe me, my dear Co your own friend and your father's friend

"Hermann Fergu

The sitting-room of the Anerleys loo lightfully inviting. A profusion of flow fumed the room, and gave a festive ap to the table laid out with viands en tempt any honest appetite that had b increasing during a considerable journey stance had written that she was comi and hoped to arrive that evening; T had caused a flutter of excitement in the home and all was eager expectation.

Mrs. Anerley looked bright and well gay and joyous far beyond her usual Salome Stanley stood beside them arran one more bouquet, destined for Co room upstairs, and feeling herself just a at ease than she had hitherto done in th pleasant home.

"I wish you would let me shut mys my own parlor to-night," she said; most sure you will feel me in the way. remember that Constance does not ev me; that all your acquaintance with since she left; and that I shall seem an nent stranger to her."

"Oh, Salome!" cried Emmie, "pra speak so! You are not a stranger to h most always mention you in my letters is longing to know you. Mamma, Salome reasonable."

Mrs. Anerley smiled. "I admire M ley's delicacy, my dear, while I am sorr agine for a moment that we should feel her in way. I can only obviate the difficulty by iting her in the most formal manner"—and e the lady bowed playfully—" to join us at r evening meal."

"It would spoil everything if you were not e," said Emmie, simply ; " mamma would be eved, Mr. Ferguson astonished, Cecil in the ks, Constance disappointed, and myself cha-gned."

alome Stanley could not help laughing—she d not often laugh, not as often as it is well do so—but her low sweet laughter was pleas- to hear, it was so very musical.

What a doleful picture, Emmie, of a discon-ate group ! Certainly I cannot consent to n the comfort of so many people by my nun- proclivities, and I will not desert you, ugh I still think, as every woman does when gives in, that I am very likely right."

alome Stanley was curious to see this young , whose return to her home after her long ence in Germany seemed to have so much er to arouse the whole family, and even the . Hermann Ferguson, so cool and self-essed about everything and everybody else.

(To be continued.)

APROACHING PERIHELIA AND CALAMITIES.

By Rev. T. J. Malyon, LL.B.

(Concluded from page 535.)

S r Domination — Consequences of Impeded ght and Heat—Dr. Pearce's Testimony— ilosophical Basis of Physical Changes re-lting from Atmospheric Disturbance—De-ription of a former Plague by Hippocrates d Thucydides—Moral Reflections.

is owing to the existence of the sun that globe is a habitable world and productive of yment. Almost all the benign agencies h are going forward in the atmosphere, the rs, and the earth derive their origin from its erful and perpetual influence. Its light ses itself over every region, and produces hat diversity of coloring which enlivens and ns the landscape of the world, without which hould be unable to distinguish one object another. By its vivifying action vegetables laborated from inorganic matter. By its the waters of the rivers and the ocean are uated and carried to the higher regions of tmosphere, where they circulate in the form por, till they again descend in showers, to y the sources of the rivers and to fertilize soil. By the same agency winds are pro-d, which purify the atmosphere, noxious rs are dispelled, and pestilential effluvia nted. Its influence descends even to the al kingdom, and is felt in the chemical ositions and decompositions of the ele-s of nature. The disturbances in the ic equilibrium of the atmosphere and the rties of terrestrial magnetism may be traced e agency of the sun.

is is all true of the sun in its normal condi- but if the electric equilibrium be disturbed, diately every planet in the whole solar n is more or less affected. If either light at be abstracted or diminished from the by a conjunction of planets, or perihelion, ows as a matter of course that physical es and diseases must eventuate. It is only portion as light and heat to the electric tary zones are supplied unimpeded by the hat they are maintained in perfect action. instance, the globe which we inhabit were eive about one thousand times less heat ght for a space of time shorter than one e only, immediately the utter destruction animal life would follow. So that if two re of the superior planets are in conjunc- r perihelion, they appropriate to them- the life-giving solar energy without a cor-nding return, the atmospheres of the whole ary system become vitiated, with disas- and appalling consequences.

A. J. Pearce says :—" It was not alone to incident perihelion periods of the great planets that the pestilences of the sixth and sixteenth centuries were due. In the year 407 a comet was visible for months, and there was a conjunction of Jupiter and Uranus. In 590, another comet appeared, and Saturn was in conjunction with Jupiter. In 1544 Saturn again joined Jupiter. In 1548 Uranus was in opposition to Jupiter. In 1544, 1546-7, comets and Uranus were in opposition to Saturn. In July, 1544, Saturn opposed Jupiter, when sweating sickness, which killed in twenty-four hours, prevailed in London to a frightful extent. In 1563-4, when plague prevailed in London, there appeared a comet, and Saturn was joined with Jupiter. These, and several others we might indicate, were all periods of plague or pestilence.

A writer in the Penny Cyclopædia says : " When one phenomenon is constantly observed to happen at or near the same time as another, there must be some connexion between the two. Both must depend upon, or in some way be derived from, the same cause. However unaccountable it may be that two phenomena should happen together, the fact of their so happening is an argument in proof of their connexion which it is impossible to overturn by any reasoning."

Mr. Christopher Cooke, of the Astro-Meteorological Society, in a letter to Alderman Humphrey, quoting the above, goes on to explain the philosophical basis of the physical changes which result from the penetration of our atmosphere by the approach of that of other great bodies to it. " It is demonstrated that a ray of light from the sun striking on the planet Neptune takes three hours and fifty minutes to be reflected back to the earth. Light and electricity are united ; therefore this body must affect the electricity of our atmosphere and the temperature of the earth's inhabitants. The nearer to the sun the planet may be, the greater, of course, is the displacement or interference, and this principle applies equally to all the planets."

DESCRIPTION OF A FORMER PLAGUE.

Hippocrates, of Cos, the great father of medical science, who lived in Greece from 460 to 357 B.C., was a firm believer in the influence of the planets upon the public health, and put his theory, rude as it was, into practice. He anticipated the great plague of Athens in 427 B.C., which was the precursor of that in Rome in 407 B.C. Although astronomical writers have not given us such data connected with that science in the former as in the latter, yet we have it upon the testimony of Thucydides, the Grecian historian, who was contemporary with Hippocrates, that, he, believing in the on-coming of evil atmospheric influences, betook himself to Athens nearly a year before the plague broke out, that he might befriend the sick by his healing art. This he did in an heroic manner, as the following detailed narrative of war and rapine in conjunction with plague will show :

" At the beginning of the summer (427 B.C.) the Peloponnesians and their allies invaded Attica, and laid waste the country. When they had not yet been many days in Attica the plague began to show itself among the Athenians, though it was said to have previously lighted on many places about Lemnos and elsewhere. Such a pestilence as this was nowhere remembered to have happened. The physicians were at first of no avail, treating it, as they did, in ignorance of its nature. Nay, they themselves died most of all, inasmuch as they visited the sick when all others had fled. Nor was there any relief in human art. As to the supplications offered in the temples, or the divinations, or other similar means, they were all equally unavailing, and were at length relinquished by the people, who were overcome by the calamity.

" It is said to have first begun in Æthiopia, then to have extended to Egypt and Lybia and adjacent districts. On the city of Athens it fell suddenly, first attacking the men on the Piræus, so that it was even supposed by them that the Peloponnesian invaders had thrown poison into the cisterns " (then as now water was first suspected because so liable to conceal and propagate the germs of disease), " for as yet there were no fountains there. It afterwards reached the upper city, where it was more general. Now, let every one, whether physician or otherwise, maintain his own opinion as to the source and causes of the epidemic ; I, however, shall only describe its character, and explain the symptoms by which it may be recognized, should it ever return ; for I was both attacked by it myself and had personal observation of others who were suffering from it.

" That year, then, as was generally allowed, happened to be unusually free from other diseases, and if any such appeared they all terminated in this. Without any notice, while apparently in good health, those about to suffer from it were seized with violent heats in the blood, redness and inflammation in the eyes, and immediately the internal parts, both the throat and tongue, assumed a bloody tinge, and emitted an unhealthy and fœtid odor.

" Next came sneezing and hoarseness, and in a short time the pain descended to the chest, with a violent cough. When it settled on the stomach, it caused vomiting. An ineffectual retching also followed, in most cases producing violent spasms, which in some instances ceased soon after, in others much later. Externally the body was not very hot to the touch, nor was it pale, but reddish, livid, and broken out in small pimples and sores. But the internal parts were burnt to such a degree that the sick could not bear clothing or linen of the very lightest kind to be laid upon them, nor to be anything else but stark naked, and would gladly have thrown themselves into cold water if they could. Indeed, many of those who were not taken care of did so, plunging into cisterns in agony of unquenchable thirst, and it was all the same whether they drank much or little.

" Moreover, the misery of restlessness and wakefulness continually oppressed them. The body did not waste away so long as the disease was at its height, but resisted it beyond all expectation, so that they either died in most cases on the seventh or ninth day through the internal burning while they had some degree of strength ; or, if they survived this period, the disease descended into the bowels, producing violent ulceration there, and intense diarrhœa, by which the greater part were carried off through weakness. Four thousand heavily armed men died in less than two months.

" It was at this time also that numerous earthquakes happened in several parts of the same country."

Let it here be noted that these symptoms agree with the descriptions given by old English chroniclers of the sweating-sickness which prevailed in the year 1544, and which happened at as nearly as possible two cycles of 1000 years after this plague at Athens.

The foregoing description may help to convey some idea of the fearful ravages of plague and pestilence which may be expected to prevail throughout the world some time within the next few years, according to the calculations of Professor Grimmer and others.

Whatever the Divine Wisdom may determine respecting our world, whether He permit its decimation by disease or encompass it in the lurid flame of universal conflagration, the benevolence and exuberant bounty of God will be made manifest to those who love and trust Him. All the enjoyments of this deranged terrestrial sphere are, after all, only " as the drop of a bucket and the small dust of the balance " in comparison to the overflowing fountains of bliss which enrich the regions and gladden the society of celestial worlds. To His children the eternal Jehovah ever appears a glorious and amiable Being. " God is Love." This is His name and His memorial in all generations and throughout all worlds. And how extensive His goodness is, not only throughout the planetary system, but over all the regions of universal nature, it is impossible for the tongues of men or angels to declare, or the highest powers of intelligence to conceive."

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter.

The aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to The Manager, Christian Herald, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

SINGLE COPIES

can most conveniently be obtained through newsdealers. Any complaint that the Christian Herald cannot be obtained from a particular newsdealer is promptly attended to if we are given the name and street address of the dealer who does not keep it for sale.

Scores of our readers take the trouble to send us the kindest expressions of their good will. Hundreds more agree cordially in what they say. Now will each of these good friends get us a new subscriber? We may say to persons to whom the commission is an inducement, that we believe our terms are more liberal than those of any other paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Political Issue in Maine will probably be complicated by a third ticket. At the recent Republican conference in New York, Mr. Blaine and other speakers placed considerable importance on the Maine election as being likely to indicate the course events would take on the Presidential question, and also as having an influence on elections in other States, especially in the South. At a mass convention of the Maine Temperance Society held at Portland on August 19th, Joshua N. Osgood was nominated for Governor as a Prohibition candidate. This nomination will probably withdraw over five thousand votes from the Democratic and Republican candidates, and thus weaken the influence the victory, whoever may win it, will have through the country. The object of the Prohibitionists is not quite clear, from the telegraphic report of the convention. Maine has already a stringent prohibitory law, so that probably there is some doubt as to its being enforced by either of the candidates nominated. It would be difficult to understand on what other ground a third candidate was placed in the field.

The Tammany section of the New York Democracy has called a State Convention which it is hoped will tend to produce harmonious action between the rival parties in the forthcoming State elections, and prevent the State falling into Republican hands, as it did last year. The proposal is not cordially received at Irving Hall; Mr. Kelly has excited too much animosity to be welcomed there, even though he presents himself with the olive-branch in his hand.

In New Jersey, harmony was secured in the Republican camp by the voluntary withdrawal of General Kilpatrick; and the Hon. Frederick A. Potts was nominated by acclamation.

In Connecticut, Mr. James E. English was nominated for Governor on August 18th, by the Democratic Convention, in spite of his reiterated and positive refusal to accept the nomination. Mr. Charles M. Pond was nominated for Lieutenant-Governor.

The Corner in Wheat which last Fall caused so serious a disturbance to the commercial interests of the country, it now appears, was a loss even to the speculators themselves. The effort to raise the price of wheat by filling all the elevators and places of storage and holding it while the rest of the world waited anxiously for its arrival, and ships ready to carry it lay idle in port, failed, as it deserved to fail, and the speculators are reported to have lost several million dollars by their operations.

Mr. Herbert Spencer, the English Philosopher, is, it is announced, contemplating making an extensive tour through this country. He is the writer who in his latest work said that the old forms of religious belief were losing their hold on the people, and undertook to provide a substitute. Those Christian people who have studied his system must see how miserable a substitute he provides for the divine scheme as revealed in the Gospel. A striking evidence of the divine origin of the Bible is furnished by the plan Mr. Spencer in his worldly wisdom has devised to save society. In its weakness and incapacity we see the utmost uninspired man can do, and those elements are revealed in every line.

A Public Institution Appears to be Sorely needed in the interest of society in the State of New York. Recorder Smyth and Judge Rufus B. Cowing have recently called attention to a difficulty they and other judges have experienced in the exercise of their judicial functions. A large proportion of the criminals brought up for sentence are females, and this proportion is steadily increasing. It seems probable that the increase is owing to the lack of an institution for females similar to the one for males at Elmira. At present a judge, if he inflicts any punishment on a female criminal, must sentence her to the penitentiary, where she must herd with the most shameless and depraved of her sex. If an institution of a reformatory character existed, where discipline accompanied by kindness and Christian influences reigned, girls convicted of their first offence, who are penitent, might be sent there with the hope of their being improved by the punishment. That such an institution might be hopefully established may be inferred from the fact that while those criminals who are sent to the Elmira Reformatory seldom appear before the judges again, those sent to the prison at Blackwell's Island may be looked for in the dock with confidence soon after their release. There are 20,000 committals to the prison in a year, but as a rule there are only 5,000 persons committed, each one serving an average of four terms a year.

Commercial Integrity.—A Fact Deserving of wide publicity is mentioned in the daily journals. Mr. Horace Waters, the head of the eminent firm who deal in Sunday-school music and musical instruments, was compelled some time ago by trade losses to suspend payment, and finally passed the bankruptcy court. It is announced that having recommenced business he has been successful, and has applied his profits to the payment of the debts from which his bankruptcy legally released him. All the creditors have now received the amount of their claims in full.

The Camp-Meetings Held During the Week have been very successful, both as to the numbers attending, and the influence of the services. Services have been held at eight camping grounds in Maryland: Deal's Island, Jackson Grove, Summit Grove, Asbury Grove, Wesley Grove, Woodlawn, Freedom Camp, and Emory Grove. Both at Summit Grove and Wesley Grove the number of persons who came forward to confess Jesus as the result of the meetings was so large as to fill all hearts with thankfulness. At the closing service at Summit Grove the company formed in procession and marched around the camp, about thirty children, who have been converted during this meeting, leading in singing "In the Sweet By and By" and "We are marching to Zion."

Successful union meetings of Methodists and Baptists have been held at Wayland Grove, at Martha's Vineyard. At Ocean Grove also t meetings have been attended by an unprecedent number of persons and a deeply solemn feeli prevailed. August 17th was the greatest d Ocean Grove has ever known. The hotels a cottages were full, and the hundred or mc tents erected during the night were all occupie It was the continuous day service of the cam meeting. Consecration services from 6 to 7 the morning began the day's worship, and n withstanding the early hour and the chilly over 500 persons were present. At 8.30 o'clo Dr. and Mrs. Palmer conducted their holin meeting. The children's meeting in the tab nacle at 2 o'clock was largely attended. A P.M. the Rev. George Hughes delivered a serm in the auditorium. At 6.30 P.M. the Rev. B. Adams conducted the twilight meeting in t tabernacle. A congregation of great size lister to a sermon delivered by the Rev. J. M. King the auditorium at 7 P.M. The other meeti held were those of Mrs. Lizzie Smith, and meeting of Christian workers, conducted by L L. and Cassie Smith. As many as 15,000 p sons attended the different meetings.

Important Spiritualistic Revelations may looked for. A gentleman named Waite, who l been for many years prominent among Spi ualists and was an assistant of the Davenpor has abjured their doctrines and pretensions, a has commenced a series of lectures on Spiritu ism, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A Boston. Some of the astonishing feats wh have been attributed to the spirits Mr. Wa shows to have been mere conjurer's tricks, d playing wonderful dexterity, but having no c nection with the unseen world. Among th are included some of the wonders Rev. Jos Cook saw and described in his famous lectu Mr. Waite denounces Spiritualism as a fr throughout.

Mr. Moody has been Conducting Services Saratoga, which have been attended by an mense concourse of people. On Saturday, gust 14th, he preached in the Town Hall; Sunday morning at the First Presbyte Church, in the afternoon at the Gospel T and in the evening at the Town Hall and at Methodist Church. Three services were held Monday and subsequent days.

In the course of his evening sermon Moody, in alluding to the bereavements pare are sometimes called upon to sustain, said, "J is more than a Teacher. He is a Shepherd, keeps His sheep. He pities, cares for them, keeps them from falling. Sometimes He se poor mother making an idol of her child, like the shepherds of Palestine who carry lambs across the streams in their bosoms in der to make the sheep follow, He reaches d and puts the child in His bosom and carries to the hilltops of glory, that the mother again be led in the way."

The Beer-Saloon Nuisance will Probabl abated by a recent decision of the Excise C missioners of Brooklyn. There are now saloons in the city, and they are the caus much drunkenness. The commissioners resolved that the licenses shall not be rene nor any new ones granted, and that for the fu only hotels and taverns will be allowed to pense intoxicating liquors. An organized o sition is threatened on the part of the sal keepers.

A Fatal Accident resulted from Cigar S ing at Mount Joy, Pa., on August 15th. A and gentleman were enjoying a stroll toge the gentleman smoking a cigar. A gust of carried a spark from the cigar to the la dress, which being of a light, thin mat instantly took fire. In her alarm the lady s ed to run, thereby increasing her danger. A tleman driving past, observing her peril, le from his carriage and wrapped her in his tr ling-rug. The flames were easily smothered the lady's injuries were so severe that she the same day.

The Debt on Dr. Talmage's Church.—One lar received from Mary P. Sheppard, Mount Vern

Half a Century of Dissipation and Prayer s the subject of a short address at a meeting New York last week. The speaker said that fifty years he had lived in sin, the victim of emperance and other deadly vices. All that y years, day by day, his pious mother prayed him and never despaired that her prayers uld be answered. She lived to the age of ety-four, and still there were no signs of her 's reformation; but in the last year of her she had the happiness of seeing him saved m his sins and forgiven through the blood of us. The appetite for strong drink was mer- lly taken away from him, and he presented self as a living instance of the efficacy of er and of the power and mercy of God.

Sunday-School Teacher's Efforts to Save s from becoming criminals have been crowned success in New York. Some time ago he ced in his class two poorly-clad, hungry- ing boys, who appeared remarkably intelli- g. He interested himself in their welfare and ured them situations where they earned er pay than they had hitherto done. He engaged for them a clean, comfortable lodg- and they repaid his kindness in the way he d, by leading reputable lives. Soon, more of the same kind came to his hand, with ar results. He has now organized the boys s befriended, into a club, which they man- themselves. They meet once a week, and t any little friendless boys they have met who ar to be worthy of help. The boys take them e hand, contribute from their own earnings sums to set them up as newsboys or aid in getting employment, and so carry on the work to which they are themselves in- d. It is a remarkable and a hopeful fact, ne that says much for the shrewdness of the that not one case has occurred of a boy so ht into the club ever doing anything after- to discredit it.

Salvation Army Commenced a Campaign icago on August 14th. General Railton hed twice in the open air during the day, the evening held a service in the Pacific n Mission Hall. There appears to be en- ging prospects of success in the city. Some nts connected with the work of the army er places will be found on another page.

Only Drinking Saloon in Neptune Town- N. J., was the scene of an earnest prayer- ng on August 19th. The town a month d not a single place within its limits where was sold, but a man named Grover w succeeded in opening a saloon there. efforts have been made to induce him to uish his attempt, but without avail. Last day, however, ten evangelists who were g at Ocean Grove went to the saloon in a and prayed there for the keeper and his ers. Grover did not raise any opposition proceeding, and the next day went of his cord to Ocean Grove and had a conver- with his visitors of the day before. He eply impressed, and the evangelists believe ere will be no more liquor-selling in his loc

A laimed Man in Ohio has Shown How atly hopeless difficulties may be overcome. s run over by a street car some years d his arms were injured so seriously that geons found it necessary to amputate t the shoulder. Some men so situated ave sunk in despair into the position of , but the injured man possessed indom- nergy. He succeeded by persevering ef- earning to write by holding a pencil with h, and after a time wrote in this way a lly legible hand. He was employed this a census enumerator, and recorded an of two hundred names a day.

am Young's Daughter, whose Conver- m Mormonism was mentioned in a recent of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is now at . In an interview with a Christian friend ed that in the home where she lived ere seventeen wives and forty-two chil- As to the probability of reform she said: "The law as at present framed is a practical nullity. According to its provisions, unless a polygamous marriage ceremony can be proven within two years, nothing can be done with the offenders. Now the elders and rulers can always fix it so that no marriage ceremony can be proved. The first thing that began to shake my faith in the Mormon Church—for I was a firm believer in their faith—was that I heard several Mormon elders take oath that they knew nothing of any polygamous marriage ceremonies being performed, when they had that very day performed fourteen polygamous marriages in the endowment-house. Until the law is changed so as to make mere proof of living together in polygamous relations a sufficient cause of conviction, the law will be a dead letter. Among a great many Mormon women there is intense anxiety for this, and they are organizing and working against the admission of Utah as a State until polygamy is abolished."

A Minister's Dog Attended Church a Few Sundays ago at Phœnixville, Pa., much to his owner's discomfiture. He succeeded in escaping from confinement while the minister was conducting service, and making his way to the church, took up his station on the platform by his master's side while the sermon was being delivered. He distracted the attention of the congregation by gaping repeatedly, and when the usher after the sermon took the plate to make the collection, he barked furiously and seized the man with his teeth. The minister was obliged to come to the rescue, and eventually conducted the animal out of the church.

A Man met his Death Through Stealing a bunch of grapes on August 16th near Pittsburgh, Pa. He was passing a garden in which grew a vine laden with grapes, and he appropriated one of the bunches. The report states that the wife of the owner saw the theft, and having previously suffered from many similar depredations she followed the stranger and charged him with stealing the grapes. Thereupon an altercation ensued, and the neighbors coming up joined in the quarrel. Soon the man was seen running away, followed by the woman and her friends, who threw stones at him. The man in his alarm plunged into the river and then returned to shore, pleading for mercy. He then again entered the water and swam about two thirds of the way out, when he sank and drowned, the men continuing to stone him until he went under. Probably the excitement of the moment rendered the pursuers oblivious of the man's danger, and they doubtless regret that their anger should have led to his death. It is well that sinful man has to do with a God so long suffering that an appeal for mercy offered in the all-prevailing name of Jesus is never repulsed. (John 6 : 37).

A Dog's Obsequies were Conducted in an ostentatious manner in New York recently. He was a Fifth Avenue dog and had been the pet of the family for nearly twenty years. At his death orders were given to a firm of undertakers to furnish a handsome casket, and the canine remains were laid therein covered with a mantle of white satin ornamented with ribbons. The casket was placed in a hearse and removed, six carriages following, to the cemetery and deposited in the family vault. This ceremony took place in a Christian country, in the nineteenth century, and in a city where hundreds of human beings are dying for lack of the means of life.

In the Military School at West Point Regular weekly prayer-meetings are held. Dr. Irenæus Prime visited the academy recently, and says: "In one of the society halls a meeting for prayer is held on one evening during the week, and the average attendance is forty. It is not probable that so large a number would be found at a week-night prayer meeting in a scientific college. Another meeting of the same kind is held every Sabbath evening, when nearly twice that number is present. There is probably less gambling, profane swearing, and other vices, among the cadets than in most educational institutions with an equal number of pupils."

TO-DAY! TO-DAY! TO-DAY!

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"To day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your heart."—PSALM 95 : 7, 8.

A Warning Voice to the Unbelieving and Disobedient—I. The Time Specified—1. A Time of Obligation — 2. Of Opportunity — 3. A Time Limited—A Sick Man in Berlin Startled by a Whispered Warning—His Remarkable Conversion and that of his Physician—4. A Time of Promise—II. The Voice to be Regarded—The Voice of God, a Voice of Authority—Of Love—Of Power—A Pitiful Story—A Pledging Voice—The Herbs of Sicily—III. The Evil to be Dreaded—A Serious Evil—A Challenge to Write—A Greater Sin in Some than in Others—Many Ways of Committing it—"Sweet Sin Hold"—Queen Elizabeth's Dying Cry.

THIS Psalm is a burst of praise. It resounds with the joyful noise of hearty thanksgiving unto Jehovah, and yet ere it closes you hear the solemn tones of exhortation to men to hearken to the voice of their God. Alas, that it should be true, but true it is, that the Canaanite still dwells in the midst of Israel. In every gathering of the faithful there is an admixture of those who know not the ways of God. When Israel came out of Egypt, a mixed multitude came forth with the people of God; that mixed multitude did them great damage, and often brought them under great sin, and consequent sorrow, but they were always there; and they are always here too, in the church and around it, dishonoring us by their evil behavior.

Such characters are here this morning, and it is well for us to know the fact; it is well for us to examine ourselves, whether we belong to this class, and whether the words before us may not be addressed to ourselves—"If ye will hear His voice, harden not your hearts." But supposing us to have hearkened to the Lord ourselves, and to have found peace like a river in consequence, it is well for us to think of those who are sitting side by side with us who are living in unbelief, that we may bless God the more for distinguishing grace manifested to ourselves, and that we may offer our earnest prayers for them all through the service, that God may bring them to His feet, and save them by His grace.

Let us come at once to the text. The simple plan of our speaking this morning shall at once be laid before you. We have here, first, a time specified—the Holy Ghost saith "to-day"; secondly, a voice to be regarded—"If ye will hear His voice;" and then, thirdly, an evil to be dreaded, against which we are warned—"harden not your heart." There is a sad tendency in man to harden his heart even when God speaks, therefore saith the Holy Ghost to us, "Harden not your heart, as in the provocation."

I. First, then,

THE TIME SPECIFIED.

"To-day if ye will hear His voice" This is the uniform time and tense of the Holy Ghost's exhortations. He saith nothing about to-morrow, except to forbid our boasting of it, since we know not what a day shall bring forth.

1. "To-day" is a time of obligation. Every man is under a present necessity, as a subject of God, to obey his Lord to-day, and having rebelled against his God, every sinner is under law to repent of sin to-day. "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out," is the cry of Scripture to every one who has sinned against the Most High. (Acts 3 : 19.)

What if I should repent to-morrow, yet it will be a sin to remain impenitent to-day. What if I should believe in Christ next year, yet will it be a heinous offence to have been an unbeliever this year. I have no more right to continue to disobey than I ever had to disobey at all. When the law has been broken, it is still binding, and every fresh offence against it is reckoned to our charge. We are bound to confess and forsake sin now, and delay increases our sin.

I met with a striking sentence in the works of William Mason which is well worthy to be written among your memoranda: "Every day of delay leaves a day more to repent of, and a day less to repent in." What if this day shall be the last I live; shall it be spent in refusing to hear the word of my Maker? Shall my last breath be spent in rejecting my Saviour? God forbid! I see that I am bound as His creature to obey Him, and as His sinful creature to seek pardon of Him; help me, therefore, blessed Spirit, to attend to these things this day without delay.

2. Remember, also, that to-day is a time of opportunity. There is this day set before us an open door of approach to God. This is a very favored day, for it is the Lord's day, the day of rest, consecrated to works of grace. To-day our Lord Jesus rose and left the dead that He might declare the justification of His people.

With some of you it is a time of choice opportunity, for you are in good health, and possess the powers of clear connected thought. How much better is such a day than the gloomy period when you will lie sick and near to death! That poor brain will be distracted with a thousand cares and fears, how will you then be able to grasp the solemn truths of revelation for the first time? It is ill to be setting your house in order at the moment you are leaving it. You may have enough to do even to draw your breath, while those who watch you will need to wipe the clammy sweat from your brow: it will be a poor time for these weighty matters then. It may be you will be low, or faint, or delirious, and it will be hard to be without God then.

Many have said to me when I have seen them dying, "If I had a Christ to find now what should I do?" Do avail yourselves, dear hearers, of the time when your reason is yet upon its hinges, and the windows of your minds can yet admit the light. Seek ye the Lord while yet your health is continued to you. The day of strength should not be wasted, nor should our youth be thrown away, but while vigor lasts we should press into the kingdom. To-day, then, listen, for to-day is an opportune time.

Remember, also, that you are sitting in the place where God has saved thousands of souls; and you are listening to one who, though in himself utterly unworthy, God has used for bringing many to Himself. Perhaps you have come from some distant part of the country where the preaching has not been a power to your soul; the very change and novelty of the minister's voice may be helpful to you, and you may this day be more inclined to attend to the Gospel than you have been on other occasions; it is therefore a time of opportunity. Hoist sail while the wind blows.

3. Remember how Paul tells us plainly that it is

A TIME LIMITED.

He says "Again he limiteth a certain day, saying in David, to-day if ye will hear His voice." To-day will not last forever; a day is but a day. When days are longest, shadows fall at last and night comes on. How many lives are extinguished as a candle is suddenly blown out. This thought ought to make us listen to the divine voice which cries—"to-day," "to-day." The thought of death has often brought men to decision.

They tell us in the old histories that Peter Waldo, a certain eminent merchant, had lived a thoughtless, careless life, but as he walked the streets of Lyons his friend, who was apparently in good health, fell dead at his side, and Waldo at once sought the Lord, believed the Gospel, and preached it to others. According to certain writers he became the founder of that wonderful people the Waldensians, who maintained the truth of God through many a century when the whole earth was covered with Papal darkness.

Oh, that some of you would become so conscious of your own frailty as to perceive that you are standing on the brink of everlasting woe: thus may you be moved to seek your God at once, and find your Saviour to-day. Reflections upon death have often driven men to Christ, and so have wrought life in them by the blessing of the Holy Spirit.

In a book entitled "Wonders of Grace," by a Primitive Methodist minister, I met with a story which pleased me much. A young man in Berlin who was sick with fever was attended lovingly by a young doctor who was his bosom friend. He lived in apartments. His careful friend ordered him to be moved into the darkest part of the room, because the sunlight was too much for his eyes. It was a singular providence that the bed should be pushed close against the wall, which was only a thin partition separating the apartment from the room in which lived the landlord of the house.

While the sick man lay there, possibly with his mind somewhat wandering in the fever, he was astonished to hear a voice whisper in his own tongue a verse which may be translated thus:—

"To-day thou livest yet,
To-day turn thee to God;
For ere to-morrow comes
Thou mayst be with the dead."

Some other words followed which he did not hear so well, but presently in a louder voice he heard the words repeated.

Over and over again those same words were whispered or spoken close to the spot where his ear was lying. It so impressed him that, when his young friend the physician asked him how he was, he looked at him earnestly, and replied—

"To-day thou livest yet,
To-day turn thee to God;
For ere to-morrow comes
Thou mayst be with the dead."

The physician took his hand and said, "Your pulse is better, but if it were not for that I should think you worse, for you are evidently raving." To this he received no answer but a repetition of the lines. He could get nothing out of his patient but that verse, spoken with an awe-struck look and thrilling voice.

The young physician went home thoughtful, and when he came next time he found his friend much better, sitting up in bed, reading the Scriptures. The two sought and found the Saviour, for those warning words had drawn them across the boundary line, and made them decide for God and for His Christ. How came the lines to have thus sounded in the sick man's ears? Was it a dream? Did an angel pronounce the warning? No; it was a little boy who had failed to repeat his lesson to his father, and had been made to stand in the corner, with his face to the wall, till he knew the lines. He was saying his task over and over to himself in order to fix it on his memory, and God was using his voice through the partition to bring a heart to Himself.

How various are the methods of mercy! Dear hearer, there may be something quite as odd, and yet as ordinary, about your being here this morning: some simple circumstance may have stranded you on these shores, where love waits to bless you. May the Lord impress you with the fact that the day of grace is limited.

4. A word, however, of encouragement before we leave this point: it is a time of promise, for when God saith to a man, Come to me at such a time, He by that very word makes an engagement to meet him. One asked me this morning, "When can I call upon you?" I said, "At ten o'clock next Tuesday." Of course, I shall then be ready to receive him if nothing unforeseen prevents. I should not have made the appointment for him to come if I had meant to refuse him when he comes; and when God saith, "Hear my voice to-day," He means that He will meet you and speak with you to-day.

David said to Solomon, "If thou seek Him, He will be found of thee." This is true of thee, dear hearer, if thou wilt see Him to-day. He has made no appointment with thee to meet with thee to-morrow, but He has engaged to speak with thee to-day, if thou wilt hear His voice. Never shall one wait and say, like young Samuel, "Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth," without God's speaking in words of love ere long. There is so much to encourage in the text that I would fain hope and pray that many of my dear hearers who have never sought the Lord will at this moment cry, "The time pa shall suffice me to have wrought the will of t flesh, and now to-day, let others do as they w as for me and my house, we will serve the Lo and seek His face."

II. Secondly, let us think of

THE VOICE TO BE REGARDED.

"To-day if ye will hear His voice." Pl the emphasis upon the word HIS. I thank G there often is a force in the love of believers their friends; but if in our case there is none you think our appeals too insignificant, yet I seech you listen to the voice of God, for sur
His voice may not be slighted: to-day hear
His voice, for indeed the Gospel is His voice.

Remember that the voice of God is the voic authority. God has a right to speak to y shall the creature refuse to hear the Creat Shall those who are nourished and fed by H turn a deaf ear to the Preserver of men? W He saith "to-day," who among us shall dar say that he will not hearken to-day, but by by? It is disobedience on the part of a c when he says to his father "I will not obey to-day." He might as well say "I will disc you," for that is what he means.

If you had a summons from the court to tend at such an hour, would you send a mes to say that it was not convenient, but you w attend at your own pleasure? If the Queen to command you into her presence at such hour, I warrant that you would be there be the time rather than after it. It is an insu superiors when we take no notice of their pointed times, but keep them waiting our and pleasure.

The Lord has a right to fix his own tim doing deeds of grace and favor. He is gi away His free mercy to undeserving objects if He says, "I will open the gates to-day, a will answer prayer to-day," it will be the h of impertinence if we reply, "Thou must my time. Go Thy way: when I have a convenient season I will send for Thee." I to wait as a lackey upon you? You deserve wrath, will you slight His love? He spea amazing tenderness, will you exhibit astou hardness? Be not so daring, so profane, so as to talk of delay when the divine messag such stress on your immediate attention, sa
"To-day if ye will hear His voice."

If this strain should not affect the consc let me try another. The voice here spoken the voice of love. How wooing are its t
The Lord in Holy Scripture speaks of merc of pardon bought with blood, the blood dear Son. O man, He calls you to Him that He may slay you, but that He may you. He does not summon you to a p but He invites you to a banquet. God s not as judge, but as father; not as from but from Calvary: "Come now, and let son together, saith the Lord; though you be as scarlet, they shall be as white as s
"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are laden, and I will give you rest."

Remember, too, that this is the voice of
This is a sweet thought for those of you w without strength. You will perhaps s cannot turn unto God;" but He can tur
You lament that you cannot feel as you wish: He can give you every gracious f God's voice alone created the world, He the universe out of nothing, and when da enwrapped it He said, "Light be," and was; He who spake thus in nature ca speak in grace, and work salvation in you text warns you against hardening your and if you will listen to the voice of God soften your heart.

It is a pitiful story I once heard told of man sitting alone with his little gran Taking the little child on his knee he sai boy, seek the Lord betimes; seek Him
"Grandpa," said he, "have you sought
"No, child," he said, "no." "But, g should you not seek Him?" The o shook his head and sadly answered, "I child, but my heart is hard: my heart

There was a time ;" and then the old man wept. Oh, but if such an old man be here, I say to him, there was a time and there is a time, for even now, though your heart be hard, is there not the promise, "I will take away the heart of stone out of their flesh, and I will give them a heart of flesh ?" Old man, the Holy Ghost saith still, "To-day, to-day ;" and he that saith "to-day" can make to-day for thee a day of tenderness and melting, till you will be no longer like a stone. How often have I felt the power of that verse—

"Thy mercy is more than a match for my heart,
Which wonders to feel its own hardness depart ;
Dissolved by thy goodness, I fall to the ground,
And weep to the praise of the mercy I've found."

The Lord put that new song into all your mouths.

The voice of God, let me add now, to close this point, ought to be heard because it is

A PLEDGING VOICE.

God, by calling you, pledges Himself that He will hear you if you come. When He saith to you, "Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die ?" He pledges Himself that you shall not die if you urn to Him. When He saith, "Seek ye the Lord while He may be found," He doth, as it were, covenant that He will be found of you. Listen, then, to His promising voice, His cheer-ng voice : it will cast all unbelieving fear out of ou, and drive away Satan better than David's arp drove the evil spirit out of Saul. God help ou so to do.

Diodorus Siculus says that in Sicily the herbs re sometimes so odoriferous, and in certain aces there are such thick beds of them, that hen hounds pass through them they lose the ent, and I fear that in some men's lives there re so many vanities, so much love of the world, many poisonous flowers, in fact, that they se scent of things eternal, if they ever had any. et what will it profit you if you gain the world d lose your souls ?

III. Now comes our third point, and as time esses we must speak in condensed words of

THE EVIL TO BE DREADED.

Harden not your hearts :" there is no need, ey are hard enough already. "Harden not ur hearts :" there is no excuse, for why should u resist love ? "Harden not your hearts :" ere can be no good in it ; a man is the less a an in proportion to his loss of tenderness of art. To do good, man needs the help of grace, t to do ill, he needs no aid, and if he did, the vil is there to lend it to him right speedily. "Harden not your hearts," for this will be your n ; it is suicide of soul.

For, first, it will be a serious evil if you do. harden the heart in this case is to harden it ainst God. The voice is that of the Lord of sts. Be astonished, O heavens, God is speak- in boundless grace, and the man is harden- his heart in the presence of God ! Under sound of love's entreaties, within ear-shot of rcy's imploring tones, the sinner is hardening heart. Sad work to harden one's heart inst one's own welfare ! Shall any man do and go unpunished ? What think you ?

re you resolved to be lost ? If so, then there ne thing I would like you to do, and that is, ut it in writing. I would, daring as it seems ne, challenge you to write out your covenant hell. I would have you look yourself in face and say, "I have surrendered myself to e of sin, and I am resolved to take the con-ences, and to die an enemy to God." If you put that in black and white I feel persuaded will start back from it and say, "It must be." But you answer, "No, I could not e it." Then wherefore do it ? Perhaps this ning one more obstinate fit will end all our of you ; one more holding of conscience e throat until it turns black in the face with grip may be the final action that shall de- your future, and you will never be troubled n by compunction or conviction. Ah me, if ould come to this that you will henceforth glide down without a jerk into the bottomless pit ! God forbid it. Oh, Almighty Spirit, suffer it not to be so with any here ! To harden the heart is a great evil.

And it is a greater sin, let me say next, in some than in others, for the Scripture quotes the instance of Israel. The Holy Ghost says, "As in the provocation, when your fathers tempted me and saw my works forty years." Some of you are the highly privileged as compared with others. Look at the multitudes that live in our back streets and courts and alleys, who never heard the Gospel, were never trained to go to the house of prayer, and who live and die ignorant of it !

How much better your lot ! Many of you cannot recollect when you first came to a place of worship ; you were brought here when you were children ; you know the Gospel thoroughly, though you know it not in your hearts : what guilt must be yours to sin against such light and such special advantages ! Some of you have often been warned ; you have frequently twisted about on those seats most uneasily ; you have gone home and you could not eat ; you have felt you must turn, but you have not done so ! You are as careless as ever. "He that, being often reproved hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy."

Certain of you have also been chastened; you have had a great deal of trouble ; you have lost your dearest friend, or you have been sick yourself, and been forced to look into eternity, and see how dark it is. On your weary bed you moaned in spirit—

"Dark is all the world before me, Darker yet eternity."

Yet affliction has had no good effect upon you. "Why should ye be stricken any more ? ye will revolt more and more." Already you are as ill as you can be ; the whole head is sick with sorrow, and the whole heart faint with grief ; you have bruises and sores to-day as the result of God's chastening. Will you revolt more and more ? Will you still offend ?

Ay, and on the other hand, some of you have been greatly indulged by God : you have all that heart could wish. He has prospered you in business beyond your expectation ; He has made you happy in your wife and in your children ; He has set a hedge about you and all that you have, and yet you are not His. Oh, why can you stand out against love when she multiplies her favors ? I pray and beseech you, by the love of our dear God, treat Him not so ill, but confess your fault, and seek His face.

I know some, too, who have had hard struggles of conscience, and are having them now. Which way they will turn I know not. May God cast the weight of the cross into the scale and decide them for heaven !

I must beg your further attention a minute while I say that this great sin, this dreadful sin, can be committed in a great many ways. Only one thing can soften the heart, and that is the blood of Christ applied by the Holy Spirit ; but

FIFTY THINGS CAN HARDEN THE HEART.

I shall tell you what others do, but I beseech you not to emulate them—"Harden not your hearts."

Some harden their hearts by a resolution not to feel : they set their faces like flints and resolve to shake off the word. I recollect preaching once when my host disappeared on a sudden about the middle of the sermon, and I noticed that a friend who had travelled there with me disappeared too. Afterward I found out the reason. I said, "What made So-and-so go out ?" He said, "I guessed what it was, and I went after him, and he said to me, 'Mr. Spurgeon handles me like a piece of India-rubber, and shapes me as he likes. If I stop in there I shall be converted, and that will never do, and therefore I slipped out.'"

Ah me, many fly from their best friend. While they are plastic they are afraid of being cast into the right mould. Some of you are very much like plaster of Paris, or other cement, which will take any shape while it is soft ; but oh, how quick it sets, and there is no altering it. If you are somewhat affected this morning, do not resist the feeling, but give the full assent and consent of your heart to it. Who knows ? You may now be saved.

Many harden their hearts by delay, by not yielding to-day, by wishing still to wait. Hundreds harden their hearts by pretended doubts, by making foolish criticisms and cavilling remarks. They talk about the speaker's mode of utterance, and they get their conscience quiet by remembering a false pronunciation or an ungrammatical sentence ; or else they say, "We cannot be sure of it ; Professor Wiseman says differently." Ah, yes ; but if infidel professors are cast into hell, their learned observations will not comfort you when you perish in their company. Look to your own souls, and let the professors see to theirs.

Some of these literary and scientific men will have a great deal to answer for ; they gain their eminence by daring to say presumptuous words which better men tremble to hear, and unbelieving souls welcome their wickedness. I have small respect for these advocates of Satan, these decoy-birds of the destroyer. I charge you, do not pretend to be unbelievers if you are not, nor invent doubts for the mere sake of pacifying your consciences.

Too many silence their consciences by getting into evil company, and by running into silly amusements, all intended to kill time and prevent thought upon divine things. A number of people harden their hearts by indulging a favorite sin. There is a man here who knows the Gospel well, and I thought that he was saved ; but he loves the intoxicating cup, he drinks every now and then till he is drunken, and that one sin is destroying him, though in other respects he is a fine fellow. As sure as he lives he will commit that folly once too often, and perish miserably. Oh, that God would create sincerity in him, and make his heart weep instead of his eyes !

Darling sins are sure destroyers. We must give up sin, or give up hope of heaven. John Bunyan, in his Holy War, describes as a favorite fortress of Satan, which long held out against the Prince Immanuel. Oh that we could raze it to the ground ! I cannot go into further detail ; but, oh, how many things may be used to harden the heart.

"SWEET-SIN HOLD"

This sin will bring with it the most fearful consequences. Harden not your heart, for by such conduct the last opportunity of entering into the divine rest may pass away. "He sware in his wrath, They shall not enter into my rest !" You wish to rest at last, you long to rest even now. But it cannot be till you yield to God. You are not at peace now, and you never will be if you harden your hearts. God is gently drawing some of you this morning ; I can feel that He is doing so. May God the Holy Spirit lead you to yield your heart to Jesus Christ at this very time, for, if not, there will surely come one of these days a last time in which you will feel, and you will after that be given up to a conscience seared as with a hot iron, never to feel again.

Bethink you in what plight you will be when you come to die without Christ. How would you like to die like Queen Elizabeth, of whom history tells us that she would not go to bed, she would have cushions on the floor ; for if she went to bed she would die, and she could not bear the thought ? This was her frequent cry, "Call time again ! Call time again ! Call time again ! A world of wealth for an inch of time ! Call time again !" Her Majesty, whom you have seen tricked out with all her ruffs and farthingales, and the like, all haggard and in deshabille upon the ground, shrieked out, "Call time again ! A world of wealth for an inch of time !" May God grant that such may never be your lot ; for if you so die—there is a something after death more awful still. Escape for thy life ! To-day, if thou wilt hear His voice, harden not thine heart. Amen.

JOHN BARLOW'S TRANSFORMATION.

A Temperance Story.

John Barlow's Habits Induce Poverty and Sickness—To obtain Drink he Steals a Boy's Money—His Daughter Kittie Sells some Work of her Mother's to Procure Food—The Child's Story is Followed by a Happy Sequel.

THE door-latch was slowly raised, and a tall, dark man entered. His clothes were worn, even ragged. His shoes were old, and a hat which could hardly be called a covering was upon his head. Let us take a peep in the room which he calls his home. One room, in an old tenement, on the top floor. A table, which is propped up by a broom-handle, as one leg is missing. The stove is so worn as hardly to be able to retain the fire (when there is one), of which it is guiltless to-day. One chair and a stool, also a large block of wood which can be used as a seat, and when Mrs. Barlow sits up it is used as a foot-rest. A bed of straw in one corner on a low bedstead, the only decent piece of furniture in the room. And well it is that this one relic of a once happy home has been retained, as poor Mrs. Barlow has been an invalid for months, and has had to lie in bed most of the time.

Hers, like many another woman's, was once comfortable, even luxurious, and now—but this is a picture of a drunkard's home. The man walked slowly toward the bed, seated himself, and said:

"Mary, how do you feel now?"

The invalid raised her eyes to his face, and was about to answer, when something in the man's countenance arrested her attention, and the color rushed into her poor wan cheeks and the tears came into her eyes, as she said, "John, where did you get it?"

"Oh, Mary, I had to have it—curses on the men who sell it. If some one would put me where I never could see or smell it, perhaps I could give up this dreadful habit of drink." And the man groaned in his agony.

"But where did you get the money to obtain this, John?" said his wife.

He evaded the question by saying, "Mary, I know you are sick and hungry, I know I ought to have bought food for you and our child with it, but I could not pass that vile place. Oh, God, forgive me!"

"John, I pray for you every day," she said.

"Mary, I am not worth a thought. See what I have brought you to. Who could have foreseen this in our youth? Oh! if I had never taken the first glass!" And the man laid his head down and wept.

The poor, sick wife placed her hand gently on his arm, and said, "John, my husband, pray for yourself, as I have prayed for you; God will hear you, and help you to overcome this dreadful habit."

The man sprang to his feet and said, "Mary, don't touch me, I am too vile." He was going toward the door when his wife said, "Stay with me, John; I do not like to be alone." He seated himself in moody silence.

Presently a light step was heard, and a little girl, of about nine years, entered the room. She had a sweet face, pinched by want and care, but the calm blue eyes looked right into yours in such a manner as to win the hearts of all who saw her.

She bounded forward, kissed her mother, put her arms around her father, and said, "Mother, I have sold it," and she lighted up with joy. "So I bought some bread and a little tea; just for you, mamma—was that right?" and she took a package from under the thin shawl which she had about her shoulders. She then set about making some tea in a tin cup—the only thing of the kind there was in the house.

Soon a fire was started with a few chips she had gathered at a shop near by. She put a few grains of tea with a little water in the cup, set it on the stove, and in a few moments the savory fumes of the tea filled the room. Then she propped up the darling mother in the bed, and gave her the first meal she had had that day. The wife offered part of the warm tea to her husband, which he took and drank eagerly, and said, "Thank you, Mary, I will stay at home all day to repay you for your kindness to me." The wife's face lighted up with joy, and she offered a silent prayer to God for His blessing.

During the meal the child told her story in these words: "Mother, I offered the piece of lace you knitted to a great many people, and no one seemed to want it; when three ladies passed me. I asked God to please tell those ladies to buy it, as we wanted food; and then I said this part of the prayer, 'Please God to give us our daily bread,' and I walked right up to the ladies and asked them to buy it.

"One of them took the lace, looked at it closely and said, 'This recalls my school-days. I remember well when we girls learned to knit lace like this. One of us, sweet Mary Thomas, used to knit it beautifully, and this looks as if it had come out from under her fingers.' So she took the lace, paid me sixpence for it, and then asked me where we lived; and when I told her we were poor, and my mother was sick, she said she would call this afternoon and see you. Mother, you will love that lady, as I did."

When she turned her head to look at her mother, she saw the tears coursing down her cheeks, and said, "Why are you unhappy, mamma?" But the mother said they were tears of joy, as she felt that her prayers were about to be answered.

Early in the afternoon a gentle rap was heard at the door. Kittie hastily opened it, and on the threshold stood the lady who had bought the lace that morning. She patted her cheek, and said, "Ah, here is my little friend." She stepped lightly into the room and crossed to the bed. Holding out her hand to the invalid, she looked closely at her and said, "Can it be you, Mary Thomas? Can it be you? Why, how has it come about? Are you a widow, and so poor?"

"No," said the man who was seated upon the block of wood, in one corner of the room, "but worse, far worse; she has a drunkard for a husband, and I am that man." He said this with a burning cheek and a downcast eye.

The lady talked kindly with Mr. Barlow, and tried to persuade him to think there was a hope for him yet, and said if he reformed, his wife would recover, and they might yet have a happy home.

Mrs. Barlow's old friend and school-fellow, Emily Cary, remained with her several days, and as she was wealthy, some of her wealth was generously employed for her friend's sake and Christ's, and soon the room looked more cheerful and homelike than it had done for many years.

By such good care and nursing Mrs. Barlow soon began to show signs of returning health, and as her husband resolved, by the help of God he would reform, his friend got him a situation as book-keeper in a warehouse where he had years before been a confidential clerk.

* * * * * *

Several years have passed, and we will look at the home now. Kittie is a lovely young woman, she is educated and refined, but her heart always goes out toward the inebriate, and she does what she can for all such unfortunates. She says the man who sells liquor is worse than the one who drinks it.

One evening they were all sitting in their cosey library, both the ladies engaged in some fancy work for a fancy fair, when Kittie said,

"Mother, did I ever tell you of the boy I gave part of my loaf to, that day—years ago—when I sold the piece of lace you had knitted to your friend Mrs. Cary?"

"No, dear," said her mother.

"Well, I met a boy crying bitterly; I stopped and asked him why he cried so. He said he had a penny to get bread, and was running to the shop, when the piece of money dropped out of his fingers, and although he and a tall dark man, who happened to pass by, looked everywhere for it, he could not find it. I felt so sorry for him that I gave him part of my loaf."

While she was speaking, Mr. Barlow raised his head, made a desperate struggle with himself, and said, "I am the man, and the money was spent by me for rum. But it was the last glass. I have been years wishing to say this, but had not the courage to debase myself so before those I loved. But I have tried to show my repentance to God by doing what I could for the boy I so much injured. See how drink will debase a man!"

"Who was the boy, father?" asked Kittie, with a suppressed expression in her face.

"Some one whom you know and love," said he; "I hope I have repaired the wrong, for I have taken him as a partner in my business, and am about to give my beloved daughter to his keeping for life."

Kittie threw her arms about her dear father's neck, and said, "My noble father, I thank God that He has led you to forsake the downward path."

"As I do each day, my child. I can never feel humble enough before Him, and I always pray for all such as I was."

PROPHETIC EXPOSITION.

Compiled by Rev. M. Baxter.

(Continued from page 541.)

Mr. Gregory on Daniel and Revelation—Predictions Fulfilled by Napoleon I.—Rev. R. Chester on the Last Franco-Prussian War.

THE REV. J. G. GREGORY, M.A., Incumbent of Park Chapel, Chelsea, London, maintained, in his excellent prophetic lectures, "Earth's Eventide," published in 1862, that the Napoleon Empire is the seventh-eighth or last head of the Apocalyptic Wild Beast. Notwithstanding its overthrow at Sedan, he still expresses his assured belief that it must be re-established, and become the predominating power in Europe at the final crisis of three and a half years; and that thus A NAPOLEON will eventually be the Personal Antichrist. He expressed the following view in his third chapter upon Israel and Antichrist:

"Daniel describes

THE FUTURE ANTICHRIST

in his eighth chapter 'as a king of fierce countenance and understanding dark sentences, who by peace shall destroy many;' and in the eleventh chapter as 'a vile person, coming in peaceably, making a league with Israel (or covenant for seven years, according to Daniel 9 : 27), working deceitfully, afterward taking away the daily sacrifice and setting up the abomination of desolation, and at last coming to his end between the two seas upon the glorious holy mountain;' and 'at that time there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation; and at that time the people written in God's book shall be delivered,' and the first resurrection take place. (See Daniel 8 : 23; 11 : 21 to 45 12 : 1; 9 : 27.)

"Again, in the seventeenth chapter of Revelation, a scarlet woman, who is described as sittin upon the seven hills of Rome—unquestionabl representing the Papacy—is further depicted a seated upon a Wild Beast with seven heads an ten horns. Here we have the Papacy supporte by the Roman Empire; owing to its havin become too weak to support istelf. An explanatio is then given which makes it very plain that onl the last headship of the Wild Beast or empir is the supporter; for it says 'The Wild Beas that thou sawest (supporting the scarlet woman was and is not and shall ascend out of the abys and they that dwell on the earth shall wonde when they behold the Wild Beast that was and i not and yet is.' But what have we here? Dynasty, rising into power, then passing away and then rising again.

"We know the Dynasty which ROSE TO POWER and at the beginning of this century laid hand on the Roman Imperial throne. In 1809 the temporal sovereignty of Rome, and of the States of the Church, was seized by Napoleon I., who divided the States into departments, to be governed by French officers, and he conferred on his infant son (afterward called Napoleon II.) the title of King of Rome. This dynasty STILL (in 1862) holds the sceptre, and has control at Rome. In this connection it is noteworthy that NAPOLEONTI, the Greek dative dedicatory form of writing Napoleon, spells out the number 666, according to the value of its letters as figures.

---

* Extracted from "Coming Wars," by Rev. M Baxter, in two pamphlets—five cents each by mai First pamphlet contains "Ten Signs of the End, an Description of Approaching Events," with two map and four large diagrams. Second pamphlet contai valuable quotations from Forty Expositors on the events. Address, 63 Bible House, New York.

"This dynasty is to be joined by ten kings, and they are to unite together to consume the Papacy after supporting it, and to make war with the Lamb. They are to conspire to cast out of the world ALL RELIGION except the idol-worship—the worship of the Last Head of the Roman Empire—which he will set up in the temple of God at Jerusalem, where he will show himself that 'he is God.'

"He will have made a covenant for seven years and broken it in the midst of that period; for after the covenant has been made and the Jews brought to their land under his protection, and their temple and sacrificial rites restored, he is in the midst of the seven years to cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease: after which there will remain three and a half years (a time, times, and half a time) for the full display of all the terrors of his Antichristian dominion and unparalleled idolatry: but at last he shall come to his end, and none shall help him.

"Independently then of the help we might derive from the prophetic dates, we can perceive without much room for doubt, if any, from what quarter we must look for he Personal Antichrist. It is evident that he ertains to the EIGHTH DYNASTY OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE. Therefore we may safely hink we are not very far from that Great Day vhen every believer shall behold his Lord."

THE LAST WILFUL KING,

The Rev. R. Chester, M.A., Rector of Midlleton, Cork, Ireland, author of some prophetial essays, published an article in April, 1871, of which the following forms a part:

"It has been imagined by some few persons hat the course and results of

THE LATE FRANCO-PRUSSIAN WAR

ave falsified the expectations formed by many tudents of prophecy as to the prominent posi- on to be occupied by the Napoleon Empire as ie presumptive seventh head of the Roman mpire. Upon this point, however, it is my be- ef that recent events have strengthened rather ian diminished the probability of some one of ie Napoleonic dynasty being ultimately de- eloped into the position of the future Personal ntichrist or last head of the Roman Empire.

"Every aspect of our times is calculated to eepen the conviction that the world is rapidly istening onward to the great crisis of the day the Lord, which shall come upon mankind at rge like the thief in the night; and when they e mutually exclaiming peace and safety, then all they be overwhelmed by sudden destruc- n, as were the Antediluvians by the Deluge.

"But before the storm bursts in all its fierce- ss during the final great tribulation of three d a half years, there will previously be the inslation and ascension of all watchful and iting Christian believers to meet the Lord in e heavens at the first stage of His advent; then ll be fought the tremendous war in heaven ainst Satan and all his angels, casting them wn to the surface of the earth; and the fear- announcement will be made—'Woe to the habiters of the earth, and of the sea, for the il is come down unto you, having great ath, because he knoweth that he hath but a ort time.'

Forthwith Satan will energize and endow h supernatural power the Cæsar of the Last ys—the head of a revived Roman Empire— d will raise him up as the Imperial Antichrist, make war with the saints for forty-two nths, and to exercise authority over all kinds and tongues and nations. (See Rev. 12 and 13.) This will be 'The time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation, even unto that same time—no, nor ever shall be—and except those days were shortened no flesh should be saved.' (Dan. 12 : 1 ; Matt. 24 : 21.) At the end of this period Christ will destroy His enemies at the Battle of Armageddon, and commence. His millennial reign of 1000 years. (Rev. 19, 20)."

(To be continued.)

THE SALVATION ARMY.

Progress of the Work.

THE following incidents, illustrating the difficulties the Salvation Army has to contend with in prosecuting its mission, are extracted from The Salvation News, a weekly sheet, price two cents, which gives an account of the proceedings of the army here and in Europe. It may be had from Mr. G. S. Railton, 45 South Third Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A DISTURBER CONVERTED.

One of the converts says: "I thought I would write to you and tell you how I was reclaimed by means of the Salvation Army. I used to come into the meetings to disturb them. All this time I was feeling bad on account of my sins. One night, the night of my conversion, I was cutting up worse than usual and having a good deal of fun, when the Spirit of the Lord touched my heart. I was melted to tears. These were tears of joy to me. I have been four weeks nearly in this good way, and I praise the Lord it was the four happiest weeks of my life, and I mean to keep on this way until death, and then glory, shall finish what grace has begun."

A PHILADELPHIA DRUNKARD.

A lady said the other night in Philadelphia, "Although I do not belong to your army, I have seen something of it in New York, and I am with you with all my heart. I've been to the Grand Union Hall, one evening, and saw a poor man there who seemed as if he had been steeped in rum, and as though his face were dyed with it. I watched him during the meeting, and when they sang,

"'Can a poor drunkard come to Jesus,' and

"'This old time religion,
'Tis good for the drunkard.'

he shook upon his seat so that he could hardly sit still.

"A few nights later I was there again, and saw the same man looking so altered, sitting upon the platform, happy in Jesus, and heard him speak."

ALL BUT THE QUID.

At one of the meetings a man said: "I have been singing, 'My all is on the altar,' and all is not on—it's all on, all but the quid!" The captain brought him forward, and he threw his quid on the floor, and then threw himself afresh into the fountain, and was made whole.

Others gave up quids and idols of various sorts, and stepped into full liberty.

One man said, "I give up all, I lay myself on the altar, and I feel God accepts me, and I must be holy."

Another said, "Thank God, I am saved from that last bit of the devil, and Jesus comes and fills my soul. Bless Him! He does come in. I am His, and I will serve Him."

While we were singing,

"To get this blest washing I all things forego, Now wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow," we heard a noise, and when we looked we saw a pipe, tobacco, twist, and tobacco-box lying on the floor, which had been thrown away by two young men who were kneeling at the form, seeking a full salvation. Soon they were joined by another, who, throwing away his pipe, said, "O Lord, you have helped me to give up the drink, now I believe you will help me to give up tobacco." We all rejoiced and shouted together, because the blood was applied, and we were made "whiter than snow."

AFTER TEN YEARS.

"It's ten years since I put my foot inside a church," said one who came to the lecture hall of the church that afternoon: but ere he left the place he bowed to God, confessing his sins with a flood of tears, and promising to come again. He had listened in the open air many a time, and had done all he could to protect the sisters when others would have abused them. But he now felt in all its bitterness the hardness of the transgressor's road himself.

AN ATTACK IN A HORSE CAR.

As Mrs. Shirley [an officer in the Salvation Army] was riding in a horse-car, she noticed sitting opposite her a woman who appeared to be in some fatal disease, and nearing the grave. Just as distinctly as evangelist Philip heard it some years ago, Mrs. S. heard the voice of the Lord saying: "Go speak to that woman about her soul.' "Have you given your heart to God?" she asked her.

"No," was the sad reply; "I should like to; but I don't know the way."

She was told of Him who is the way, and promised to seek Him without delay.

Two weeks later she sent for Mrs. Shirley, who, on going to her address, found her ill in bed. Once more Mrs. S. told her of the way of salvation, and she listened with the greatest eagerness, and then, although she had been confined to bed entirely for two days, she rose up in bed, clasped her hands and said:

"Please, Lord, save me before I go to sleep."

She then joined Mrs. Shirley and Mrs. Reynolds in singing,

"He takes me as I am,"

and while she sang realized God's salvation so fully, that she shouted aloud for joy.

A change of air was tried for the poor woman, but she continued rapidly to sink into the grave. But at the last she said: "My pathway is brightly lit up. All is well. Oh, tell Mrs. Reynolds I'm on my way to glory."

Mr. Railton writes:

YOU WILL FIND US AT Stations.

"PHILADELPHIA, PA.	6
NEW YORK	2
NEWARK, N. J.	1
CAMDEN, N. J.	1
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.	1

"The above are the whole of the present stations of The Salvation Army in America, and we shall be obliged for early information of any case in which the name of the army is used by persons not connected with it. We hail with delight the entry of any number of laborers into the field. But, at the same time, it is not right that by the use of our name we should be made to appear responsible for the sayings and doings of persons over whom we have no control."

The following is the programme of Sunday services at most of the stations:

Prayer-meeting, 7-8.30; open air, 10; indoors, 11-12.30; open-air, 1.45; indoors, 3-5—often later then five o'clock; open-air, 6.30; indoors, 7.30-11, quite as often later as earlier than eleven o'clock.

A report of the work of the army

IN GREAT BRITAIN

says: "We are holding 120,000 mentings per year, and God is still opening the way for us in all directions. In Ireland, from the first Saturday to the first Tuesday there, 170 were brought to the feet of Jesus. Londonderry is opened, and this week three more towns. God is also using Mrs. Booth to speak and tell the glad tidings to rich folks, and 'tis no strange thing to see twenty or thirty people, clad in silks and satins, kneeling at the penitent form; also, to see the same people marching in the open-air down Oxford Street, London."

The Second Volume of The Christian Herald, comprising Nos. 37 to 62 (July to Dec., 1879), may be procured, elegantly bound in cloth, at this office. Price $1.75.

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

By the Author of "Saved at Sea."

Two Letters.

It has often seemed very strange to me, that in moments of great anxiety or trouble, when our minds and our hearts are stretched to the uttermost, we notice with the keenest perception every little object around us. Each moving leaf, each nodding flower, catches our attention, and, years afterward, we can remember, as distinctly as if it were yesterday, how everything looked in those sorrowful moments, when our minds were filled with thoughts of things and people far away.

There is one day in my life, which stands out from among the past as a day above all others to be remembered by me. And, as I look back to it, I see myself a girl of nineteen, sitting at my bedroom window, lost in thought and perplexity!

I can see the garden just as it looked as I gazed out into it that afternoon—our quaint, old-fashioned garden, with its hedge of laurel bushes, and the large elm trees at the end of it, with the flickering light and shade underneath. I can see the rabbits from the plantations round, nibbling the grass on the lawn; and I can hear the trickling of the stream, which ran by the side of the house, in which Claude, and Maggie, and I used to float our boats, in the happy days when we were children. And now the old home must be left for ever, for Maggie and I had not a penny in the world!

Our father had been the doctor in the village. It was a very poor place, and the people had never any money to spare. My father was too kind-hearted to press for payment, when he saw how hard it was for them to live; and so the years went by, and although his practice was large, he saved very little money. But even this small amount never came to us, for just before his death the bank in which it was placed suddenly failed, and so, when he was gone, Maggie and I were penniless!

Maggie was much younger than I was; she was my half sister, and her mother died three weeks after she was born. She committed her little baby to me, when she knew that she must leave it; and from that day I became, as far as I was able, a mother to Maggie.

I was a very little mother, for I was only seven years old; but a feeling of great responsibility and trust came over me, as I left the room where my step-mother was dying. I crept up to the nursery, and stroked the baby's face very gently, and felt as if she belonged to me from that moment.

And now, Maggie and I were left without a penny in the world. For Maggie it was not of so much consequence. A letter had come from her old maiden aunts, her mother's sisters, to insist upon her going at once to live with them in the old manor house at Branston. Maggie would be happy, and cared for there; that was a great relief to my mind. Poverty and hardship would not cross the path of my little sister, and I was more than content that it should be so.

But there was no such home in prospect for me. Maggie's aunts were, of course, not related to me, and my mother had been a friendless orphan, so I had no one to take compassion on me. Separated from the old home, separated from Maggie, life looked very cheerless to me in prospect.

My mind was full of trouble and of perplexity, for on the table before me lay two letters, which must be answered before evening, and upon the answer to these letters would hang all my future life.

I sat at my bedroom window, not knowing what to do. The clock ticked on, the hands were moving round, and my letters were still unanswered.

It was then, that, as I gazed into the garden, every tiny object was imprinted on my mind. And I can remember that, as I was sitting there the sun went behind a bank of heavy clouds, and all was gloomy and dismal in a moment. The rabbits ran back to their holes, the sunbeams fled from the lawn, the wind whistled drearily in the chimneys of the old house, and flapped the branches of the climbing rose-tree against my bedroom window. It seemed to me then very like the cloud which had come across my hitherto happy life. And now, what was before me? Joy or sorrow?

It appeared to be left with me to decide. The two letters must be answered. The first of these was from an old governess of ours, a kind, good woman. I had written to tell her of my difficulties, and she wrote to advise me to apply for a situation as companion to a young lady of fortune, in answer to an advertisement which had just appeared in the Times newspaper. A fair salary was promised, and all expenses of travelling would be defrayed.

That was one of the letters which I had to answer. That was one path of life which lay before me. It did not seem very bright in prospect. The position of a poor companion in a large household was certainly not one which I should have chosen for myself.

I had said "Oh no!" instinctively, when I had first read the advertisement which Miss Morley enclosed. And yet, the more I thought of it, the more I felt that perhaps I ought to apply for the situation. It was clear that I must work for my living, in some way; I disliked teaching, so I felt that I was not fit to be a governess: perhaps, after all, this would be the very place for me.

And yet, and yet, my heart shrank back from what might be the path of duty.

For there was another letter on the table: another, and a very different letter. And this letter must be answered before I could at all decide about Miss Morley's proposal. I had read it so often during the day, that I knew every word of it. And now I must take up my pen and answer it. It opened out to me another path of life, a very different path from the former—a path which seemed as bright as the other was shady.

The letter was from Claude Ellis, my old playfellow and friend. He was the son of the clergyman of the village, his only child. Claude had no companions at home, and therefore when we were children we went, day by day, to the parsonage, or Claude came to us, and we played together between the hours for lessons.

Maggie was too small to join in our games, but she would sit on the grass near us, gathering daisies, and watching us as we floated our boats, in the little stream, or ran races on the lawn. And then we grew older, and Claude was sent to school; but always in the holidays our old friendship was renewed, and we walked together, read together, and played together as before.

But soon school days passed by, and Claude went to Oxford. I remember so well the day on which he came to say "Good by" to us before leaving home. He looked very handsome, and was full of spirits, and was so much looking forward to his college life.

Maggie and I walked to the garden gate with him when he went away. And we talked of the time when he would come home again, and we should spend our days together as we had always done in the holidays. Then he went out, and the gate closed after him, and Maggie and I watched him down the road, and she waved her handkerchief to him till he was out of sight. And then we went back to the house and I counted how many weeks must pass before the term would be ended and Claude would be with us again.

But a very short time after, Mr. Ellis, Claude's father, was taken ill and the doctor ordered him to go abroad for the winter. So Claude spent his Christmas vacations at Mentone instead of at home. And then we looked forward to midsummer.

But Claude did not return home until the greater part of the long vacation was over. He was in Cornwall with a reading party, and did not come to the parsonage until about three weeks before his return to Oxford. And so it came to pass, that Claude Ellis and I had not met for nearly a year.

"Claude is at home," said my father, one morning at breakfast.

"Oh, is he?' said little Maggie, "how nice!" And I was very pleased also. I expected to see exactly the same Claude as I had parted from at the garden gate, a year ago; and I thought that all would go on just as it had done when he was a boy at school, and come home for the holidays.

So when I saw him coming up the road, I ran into the garden to meet him.

"Oh, Claude, I am glad to see you!" I cried, as soon as he opened the gate. And then, in a moment, I stopped short, and went up to him quite quietly, and giving him my hand, said in a very different voice: "How do you do, Claude; when did you come home?"

For in a moment it flashed across me that Claude Ellis and I were not the same as we were when we had parted at that very gate a year ago. We were both older than we were then; our childhood was a thing of the past.

Claude and I had grown out of the boy and girl into the young man and woman since we had last met. All this flashed across me in a moment, as I noticed the difference in Claude's dress, manners, and appearance, as he came in at the gate. And a chill came over me as I noticed it, and I wished that I had not run to meet him quite so eagerly.

And yet, when he began to talk, I felt that h was in many ways the same Claude still, th same, but changed.

Was he changed for the better? In many way he was. He was more manly, and more gentle manlike, and had much to tell us of his colleg friends, and college life, which made him a mor amusing and pleasant companion than before.

And yet, there was another change in Claude which I could not help noticing, in spite of m efforts not to do so. Claude Ellis was more o a man, more of a gentleman; but he was, yes he certainly was, though I tried to persuade myself to the contrary, less of a Christian.

Before Claude went to college we had ofte talked together of the Bible, and he had e plained to me many things which I did not u derstand. We used sometimes to sit on the ga den seat on Sunday afternoons, and read a cha ter together; and Claude used to talk so nicel about it, and I thought he loved the Lord Jesu and wished to serve Him. He often spoke of th time when he would be old enough to be o dained, and when I should come to his churc and hear him preach; and he told me what h first text would be, and how he had already wri ten some pages of his first sermon.

But after Claude's return I noticed a chan in him. At first he always avoided any mentio of religious subjects, and when, either in his ow home or ours, any allusion was made to the he quickly turned the conversation to so other topic.

I tried, for some days, to fancy that it was n because Claude had ceased to care for what h had loved before, but rather, that his feelin had grown so much deeper and truer, that h felt things divine too sacred to be talked abo But before the vacation was over, I was oblig to admit to myself, however unwilling I was believe it, that Claude's views and opinions we quite changed about religious matters; that had begun to doubt what he had before receiv with child-like faith; that he had begun to spise and hold in contempt that which from mother's knee he had learned to love and reve ence.

"Oh, you have never been to Oxford, May he said, rather contemptuously one day, whe was trying to prove something to him from Bible. "You should read some books, whi were lent to me by a man on my staircase. are behind the times in this little out-of-the-w place; the world is growing very clever a learned, and there are many things which have always taken for granted about which th is really great doubt and uncertainty."

"What things, Claude?" I said; "you do not surely mean—"

"I mean parts of the Bible, May, and doctrines, which are supposed to be proved from the Bible. But what is the use of talking about it to you? I don't want to unsettle your mind. If you like to believe it, and if it makes you happy, go on believing it, and be glad that you haven't read the books I have read."

"But you, Claude?" I said, sorrowfully.

"Oh, never mind about me, May, I am all right; I am a little wiser than you, that is all!"

"Are you happier, Claude?" I ventured to ask.

"Oh, I don't know, May; I don't think happiness, which is based on a delusion, is much worth having."

"Oh, Claude!" I said, "it makes me wretched to hear you talk like that."

"Then talk about something else, May," he said, gaily; "you began the subject, not I."

"But, Claude—"

"Now, that will do, May!" he said impatiently; "we don't think alike about these subjects, simply because I know a great deal more about them than I did before I went away, or than you do now; so let the matter drop."

(To be continued.)

LOT'S ESCAPE FROM SODOM.

S.S. Lesson for Sept. 5th. Gen. xix. 12—26. Golden Text, verse 17. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

It is with sadness that we contemplate that which is told us of the life of Lot. A man who had come out of heathenism with his uncle Abraham, who shared with him the path of faith when he left his country and his father's house, a man whom God calls "just Lot" (2 Pet. 2 : 7), that such a man should stop short in his career of faith, and while believing in God, should yet live for himself—this is deplorable.

By his own choice and from a selfish motive, he left the society of Abraham, and pitched his tent toward Sodom, and it was not long before he took up his abode in the wicked city. We learn from 2 Pet. 2 : 7, 8, that Lot was "vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked: (for that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds)." He had too much of God's grace to be at ease in the company of these ungodly men, but not enough to win one of them to his God. He could be vexed with the sins of others, but had no power to lead them away from their sins, because he himself was in a false position. It could not have been in any sense for God's sake that he lived in Sodom—it was for the sake of his possessions, his property, his well doing in this world.

God could count upon Abraham, but He could not count upon Lot, for Lot not only dwelt in Sodom, but he seems to have accepted at the hands of its inhabitants, a position of trust, confidence, and honor, for in the first verse of our chapter we mark that "Lot sat in the gate of Sodom." This was the place where causes were heard in old times, (Ruth, 4 : 1–12; 2 Sam. 15 : 3, and thus Lot was probably a magistrate, or as a judge. Thus, in accepting honor at their hands, in making use of the advantages which their country afforded to enrich and aggrandize himself, he put it out of his power to be faithful to them. Abraham, who "sojourned in the land of promise as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob" (Heb. 11 : 8–10) might speak with power about the city which hath foundations, whose Builder and Maker is God," but Lot had no pilgrim spirit, and by his manifest care for earthly things, his mouth was closed from speaking of heavenly things.

While anything on earth is in itself an object to us, health honor, comfort, riches, pleasure, the clearest expositions we can make in our Sunday-school classes, Bible-classes, etc., fail to have any power. We carry our atmosphere about with us, and the air of heaven is so different to that of earth, that those who are around us soon perceive the difference, if the source of our life and joy is from a spring which they know not. Lot was vexed with the men of Sodom, and perhaps none are so vexed with sinners as they who have no power to turn them from their sins.

Thus it came to pass, that when trouble came upon the King of Sodom, Lot, instead of having power with God to be a blessing, as was Joseph in Egypt, and Daniel in Babylon, was involved in the loss of the King of Sodom, and had it not been for Abraham, he might have been destroyed and all that he had. Oh, it is a piteous thing when children of the Living God are affected by those very circumstances which affect the unconverted.

When God made communications to Abraham, He did not find him preoccupied with himself, and thus he could speak to him about his seed, about the future, could trust him with the blessed knowledge that he should be made a blessing to others, could speak of the iniquity of the Amorites, and unveil His heart in its burden about the sin of Sodom. With Lot it was far otherwise. Personal matters must first be set right, and the only communication from God to Lot which is on record regards his own safety: "Escape for thy life," etc. How is it with us? Are God's communications to us mostly those which regard our own souls, or have we, by His wondrous grace, hearts so at rest in Him as to be free enough from their own burdens to share His, those of His church, His people, and the lost world?

We read in our last subject that two of the men who appeared unto Abraham "turned their faces from thence and went toward Sodom" (chap. 18 : 22). In chap. 19 : 1, "There came two angels to Sodom at even." Lot, who sat in the gate, saw them, rose up to meet them, and bowed himself with his face toward the ground. He had some difficulty in persuading them to enter into his house. They came with a message from God, if they were not a manifestation of God, and Lot was not on terms of near communion. Thus they said, "Nay, but we will abide in the street all night." Is there constraint, difficulty, effort in our communion with God? If so, it is a sure sign that all is not well with us, that there are things about which we are not on a good understanding with God · such a state of things is dangerous and wrong.

No sooner had Lot received messengers of God as his guests, than the men of Sodom commenced persecution. So it is always. Let men of God live near the world and in its spirit, no persecution assails them, but let their communion with God grow more intense, and deep, and real, the world will soon find it out. Doctrine does not awake persecution, but the life of God, the living witness of one who is "not of this world, even as Christ was not of this world," this is insupportable. Poor Lot made a sad compromise: to satisfy the wicked demands of the men of Sodom, he was ready to sacrifice his own daughters. Oh, why did he not commit his way unto the Lord?

But Lot is not the only converted father who has sacrificed his own children, sons and daughters, to the world's demands. A so-called "good match," with no consideration as to whether it is pleasing to God, has been entered into by a daughter, a situation which leads to fortune has been placed before the son as the right thing, who can wonder that the one thing needful is, in the eyes of such children, "father's antiquated notion," and no deep reality. If we speak of eternity, and yet all our calculations are made for time, how can we expect our words to have any power? Children unconsciously gauge the depth of their parents' piety, and from their earliest years form their own conclusions therefrom.

When the citizens used violence, the angels smote the men which were at the door of the house with blindness, and then opened their mission to Lot. What a blow! All his hopes of family and personal prosperity were staked on the doomed city, and now came the call from God to bring out all that he had. For "we will destroy this place, because the cry of them is waxen great before the face of the Lord; and he Lord hath sent us to destroy it." Lot believed the message, and at once he set about proclaiming it to the men who had married his daughters. Lot had dwelt many years in Sodom, had served his own ends in the city, but had never sought to proclaim the truth of God among the people. Now he made an attempt, but his words fell powerless, "he seemed as one that mocked unto his sons-in-law." An inconsistent life takes away all force from the exhortations of those who live it.

"And when the morning arose, then the angels hastened Lot, saying, Arise, take thy wife and thy two daughters, which are here; lest thou be consumed in the iniquity of the city." Where were his sons (ver. 12), and his two sons-in-law (ver. 14)? Lot lingered, perhaps to make one more effort to undo the evil which his undecided life had done in his family, and "while he lingered, the men laid hold upon his hand, and upon the hand of his wife, and upon the hand of his two daughters; the Lord being merciful unto him: and they brought him forth and set him without the city. And it came to pass, when they had brought them forth abroad, that he said" (the same change of person we noticed in the former chapter), "Escape for thy life; look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain; escape to the mountain, lest thou be consumed."

Must he then, leave everything behind and become a fugitive? Yes, they who are the Lord's, and who do not leave all for Him, must be deprived of all for their own sakes. Poor Lot sought to make a compromise, he "said unto them, Oh, not so, my Lord: behold now, Thy servant hath found grace in Thy sight, and Thou hast magnified Thy mercy, which Thou hast shewed unto me in saving my life; and I cannot escape to the mountain, lest some evil take me, and I die: behold now, this city is near to flee unto, and it is a little one: Oh, let me escape thither (is it not a little one?) and my soul shall live." At this same moment probably, Abraham, in full understanding with God about himself, his household, and his goods, stood before the Lord pleading for the salvation of Sodom, while Lot, with ruined prospects and divided family, was flying a fugitive, and pleading not for other souls, but for an amelioration of his own sentence.

Lot obtained his petition, and the little city of Zoar was saved, but he feared to dwell there (ver. 30): he escaped thither, and not until he was entered into this city did the Lord execute His sentence. "Then the Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of Heaven; and He overthrew those cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground." Lot's houses, furniture, gardens, herds, flocks, herdsmen, where were they? He was a beggar. His wife, perhaps a daughter of Sodom, who had never learned from her husband to set her affections on things above, disobeyed the command of the angels, looked back, and she became a pillar of salt.

Oh, when will Christians learn to live henceforth not "unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them, and rose again?" (2 Cor. 4 : 15). When will they that have wives, be as though they had none; "and they that weep, as though they weet not; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not; and they that use this world, as not abusing it; for the fashion of this world passeth away?" (1 Cor. 7 : 30, 31). When we learn to regard ourselves, and all we are and have, as not our own, but bought with a price, then we calculate not what is agreeable to us, not what we shall gain or lose, but what is to God's glory, what will be His gain or His loss. Making common cause with God we cannot lose, for the Lord Himself is the Portion of our inheritance, and all things are ours "whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's." (1 Cor. 3 : 21-23.)

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Barrels of Gunpowder with a Fuse Attached have been placed in a tunnel under the barracks at Cork, Ireland, presumably by Fenian conspirators. The English authorities were warned that an attempt would probably be made to blow up the barracks, and on making an examination the gunpowder was discovered, the fuse cut, and the barrels removed. Much alarm was caused by this deliberate attempt to destroy the building and the troops quartered there. Mr. Forster, the Secretary of State for Ireland, was dining with the Duke of Argyll when the news was received. He held a hasty consultation with his colleagues, and immediately set out for Dublin. The Press Association has received a telegram stating that the police deny that there is any truth in the report, and say that no gunpowder was found in the tunnel; but well informed correspondents of American journals, who are on the spot, reiterate the statement, and allege that the police endeavor to suppress all news indicating discontent on the part of the people.

There is a probability of an abundant harvest in all parts of Ireland; but it is feared that even that blessing may be turned into an occasion of disturbances. The landlords, it is expected, will take advantage of the farmers being in more prosperous circumstances to press for the payment of arrears of rent, which will not be paid without strenuous opposition. Disquieting rumors are in circulation respecting an anti-rent league which is said to be secretly organized, the members of which are required to pledge themselves never to pay rent, and to forcibly resist eviction if it is attempted.

Conservative organs censure the Government for not renewing the coercion acts in Ireland, but Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Bright, and Mr. Forster are reported to be still opposed to the acts, and to believe that their re-enforcement would be unadvisable. Mr. Gladstone is not sufficiently recovered from his illness to attend to public business, and it is expected that when Parliament adjourns he will try the effect of foreign travel.

The Distinguished English Minister who won the gratitude of American Christians of all denominations by his noble defence of our missionaries in Turkey at a very critical period, died on August 15th at the advanced age of ninety-two. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe represented Great Britain at Constantinople at the time of the Crimean War, and acquired paramount influence in the court of the Sultan. His whole life was spent in the diplomatic service of his country, and he probably understood, better than any one, the intricacies of the troublesome Eastern Question. He was appointed British Minister to Washington in the last year of the Monroe administration, but his work here was not a success. His hauteur and dignified manners were better fitted for a mission like that of Constantinople, and it was there that his laurels were won. As the friend of missions and as an upright, conscientious statesman, the memory of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe will be long cherished by the world.

The Persian Famine is now in its Final stages, but they are its worst stages. Mr. Shedd, an American missionary at Oroomiah, writes that the fields are covered with an abundant harvest, but before it is gathered in thousands must die of want. The money received from this country amounts to over thirty thousand dollars, and it has been distributed to those in most urgent need, regardless of class or creed. But notwithstanding this relief, and the money sent from Great Britain, it is estimated that one thousand persons died of hunger in the town and villages in sight of the mission station in one day, and thousands more are very near to death.

Mr. Shedd says: "The famine has assumed alarming proportions, and the worst fears have become realities. The streets and bazaars of the city reveal sights horrible enough to haunt a life-time, and too ghastly for language to portray—dead and dying women and children, corpses lying unburied and partly eaten by dogs, and, more pitiful, the haggard and emaciated forms of so many in the last stages of starvation. With multitudes it is only a question of a few days more or less of miserable existence; for after they reach a certain stage of emaciation the digestive organs are so nearly destroyed that food is useless."

Turkish Troubles.—The New Identic Note has been submitted to the Porte, which for once seems to be willing to comply with the wishes of the Powers. So many troubles lie before Turkey in her relations to Greece and Bulgaria that she might possibly feel it a relief to be rid of the Montenegrin difficulty. It does not, however, appear that the Albanians intend to submit to her will. They are desirous of being made an independent nation, and are resolved not to comply with the wish of the Powers. If war breaks out, it is probable that there will be a rising on behalf of the union of Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia; and the Greeks may determine to take their "cause" in their own hands, trusting to the help of England in the event of their being defeated. Turkey sees all these contingencies, and makes ready for a conflict in which it may be necessary to fight for her very existence. The crash, which is sure to come, may be postponed; but the tendency of events indicates a speedy downfall. Above all, the renewed activity of Russia is ominous. She does not conceal that her ultimate aim is the break-up of the Turkish Empire, and there are many indications that she thinks the conditions of the present time unusually favorable to her designs.

A Mohammedan Holy War, or Crusade against Christian England, is stated to be likely to be proclaimed by the Sultan of Turkey as head of the Mohammedan faith, if England actively helps Greece to oppose Turkey. Acting under threats and pressure from the fanatical old Mussulman party and the Softas, the Sultan may unfurl the banner of the Prophet, which is tantamount to declaring "a holy war" of extermination against all "dogs of Christians." The Great Sherif of Mecca and the whole of the Mohammedan clerical class are said to be inciting the Sultan to declare a religious war. Such a step might lead the Mohammedan population of India to rise against the Anglo-Indian Government.

A Wealthy Englishman has Donated Five thousand dollars to the Church Missionary Society, with a request that it be spent in Afghanistan. He believes that the policy of England toward the Afghans, is likely to lead to the Christian religion being despised in the country, and he is anxious that missionaries should be sent to preach the Gospel of the Prince of Peace.

A Curious Instance of People Purchasing their own property has come to light in London. The trustees of the British Museum recently purchased from Lord Ribblesdale a large picture, for which they gave $7500. It now turns out that the picture belonged to the trustees, having been presented to them by an ancestor of Lord Ribblesdale's fifty years ago, but through some inadvertence no record had been made of the gift, and it had been forgotten. The transaction is an illustration of the experience of many sinners who do not see their mistake until they are enlightened by the Holy Spirit. They think that repentance, or good works, or penances may purchase salvation, when the Bible over and over again reiterates that it is a free gift without money and without price.

The Son of a Murdered Maori Lately Acted in a manner which showed how the most powerful passions of human nature are conquered and tamed by God's grace. A missionary was returning to England, and held a service before he left, at which the Lord's Supper was administered. Suddenly, a Maori who had come and knelt before the table, rose and walked back to his seat without taking the bread and wine. While the missionary was wondering why he had done this, the man came back and knelt and received the tokens of the love of Christ. Why had he acted in this way? When he knelt down he found himself side by side with a man who had murdered his father and dr his blood. "I had never seen him since," said, "till I found myself kneeling by his si When that murderous deed was done they w both heathens: now they were Christians. A sudden impulse of disgust and revenge c upon the man. That was why he rose and w away. But a voice seemed to say to him, " this shall all men know that ye are my disci if ye have love one to another." He thoug moment. He thought of the Crucified C of His blood; of His cry, "Father, for them." And he arose and went back, kneeled beside the man who had slain father. The savage New Zealander was a lower of Jesus.

How a Moderation Pledge Failed to In sobriety was illustrated by the following dent related by Rev. Dawson Burns at a r meeting. He said some societies ple their members not to drink more than a pi beer in a day, and he remembered a case w a member of one of those societies was four a place where people do not generally expe find temperance men, that is, in the g "How came you here?" he was asked; " have surely broken your pledge." "No, answered, "I have not." "But one pi beer would not make you so drunk?" " perhaps not; but then there is no use in d ing a pint every day, so I saved up mine week, and drank it all to-day." After many instances it was found that the only safe wa to abstain from all intoxicants.

A Chinaman, who had been a Sorcere opium-smoker, and a very wicked man, wa to enter a mission house at Foochow wher vice was going on, and was there awakene sense of his great sinfulness, and eagerly acc Christ as his Saviour. He immediately res to preach Christ in his native town in the rior, which he persevered in doing notwiths ing many persecutions and some judicial pu ment from the native authorities. At l the magistrate determined to crush his sp not his life, and ordered him to receive two sand lashes. After this punishment, and his life was still uncertain, he was carried t chow, where Dr. Baldwin, who is now on to this country, visited him and saw his like a mass of jelly. The poor man's first of recognition, when he saw Dr. Baldwin "How blessed the presence of Jesus is!" recovered from the terrible flogging, and a as he was able, went back to his town preached with such power that the place i a mission station.

A Letter Lost for Fifty Years was fo Paris recently. Alterations are now bein ried out at the General Post Office, and moving a panel near one of the boxes a was found which had been posted exactl years ago, and which by some accident ha ped behind the panel instead of finding i into the box. The letter was duly forwar the party to whom it was addressed, wh alive, and received it safely. The writer ever, had been dead many years. It mus seemed like a voice from the grave, and been read with emotions very different those with which it would have been read livered in due course.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Works are at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at p low as to bring them within the reach of eve Twelve Sermons on various subjects, with pho of Mr. Spurgeon, price 35 cents. John Plou Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, 6 The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, a volume sermons, $2.50. The Treasury of David, a b cal exposition of the book of Psalms, five vols as Psa. 118, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth-D This popular gift-book contains a suitable selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for e in the year, with a blank space opposite f graphs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. S appear at their respective birthdays. The elegantly bound, and the price is 75 cents. tances should accompany orders.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1880. 14th Year. No. 36—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

RTRAIT AND LIFE OF THE KING OF GREECE.—His Recent Visit to London—The Procession Passing St. Paul's athedral.

AR SHORE. A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

CHESTER TOWER. A New Serial Story by Miss M. A. aull (Continued).

FECTUAL PRAYER. A Prayer-Meeting Address by Rev. Morley Punshon, LL.D.

RRENT EVENTS: Gen. Hancock's Letters to Gen. Sheran—The State Committees—The New Maine Law—The eida Community—A Christian Teacher's Devotion—A ene of Misery in Philadelphia—A Desperate Fight with a onkey—An Old Man's Future—A Precious Carpet, etc.

THE FRIENDS OF JESUS. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.—The Farmer and the Zulu Lad.

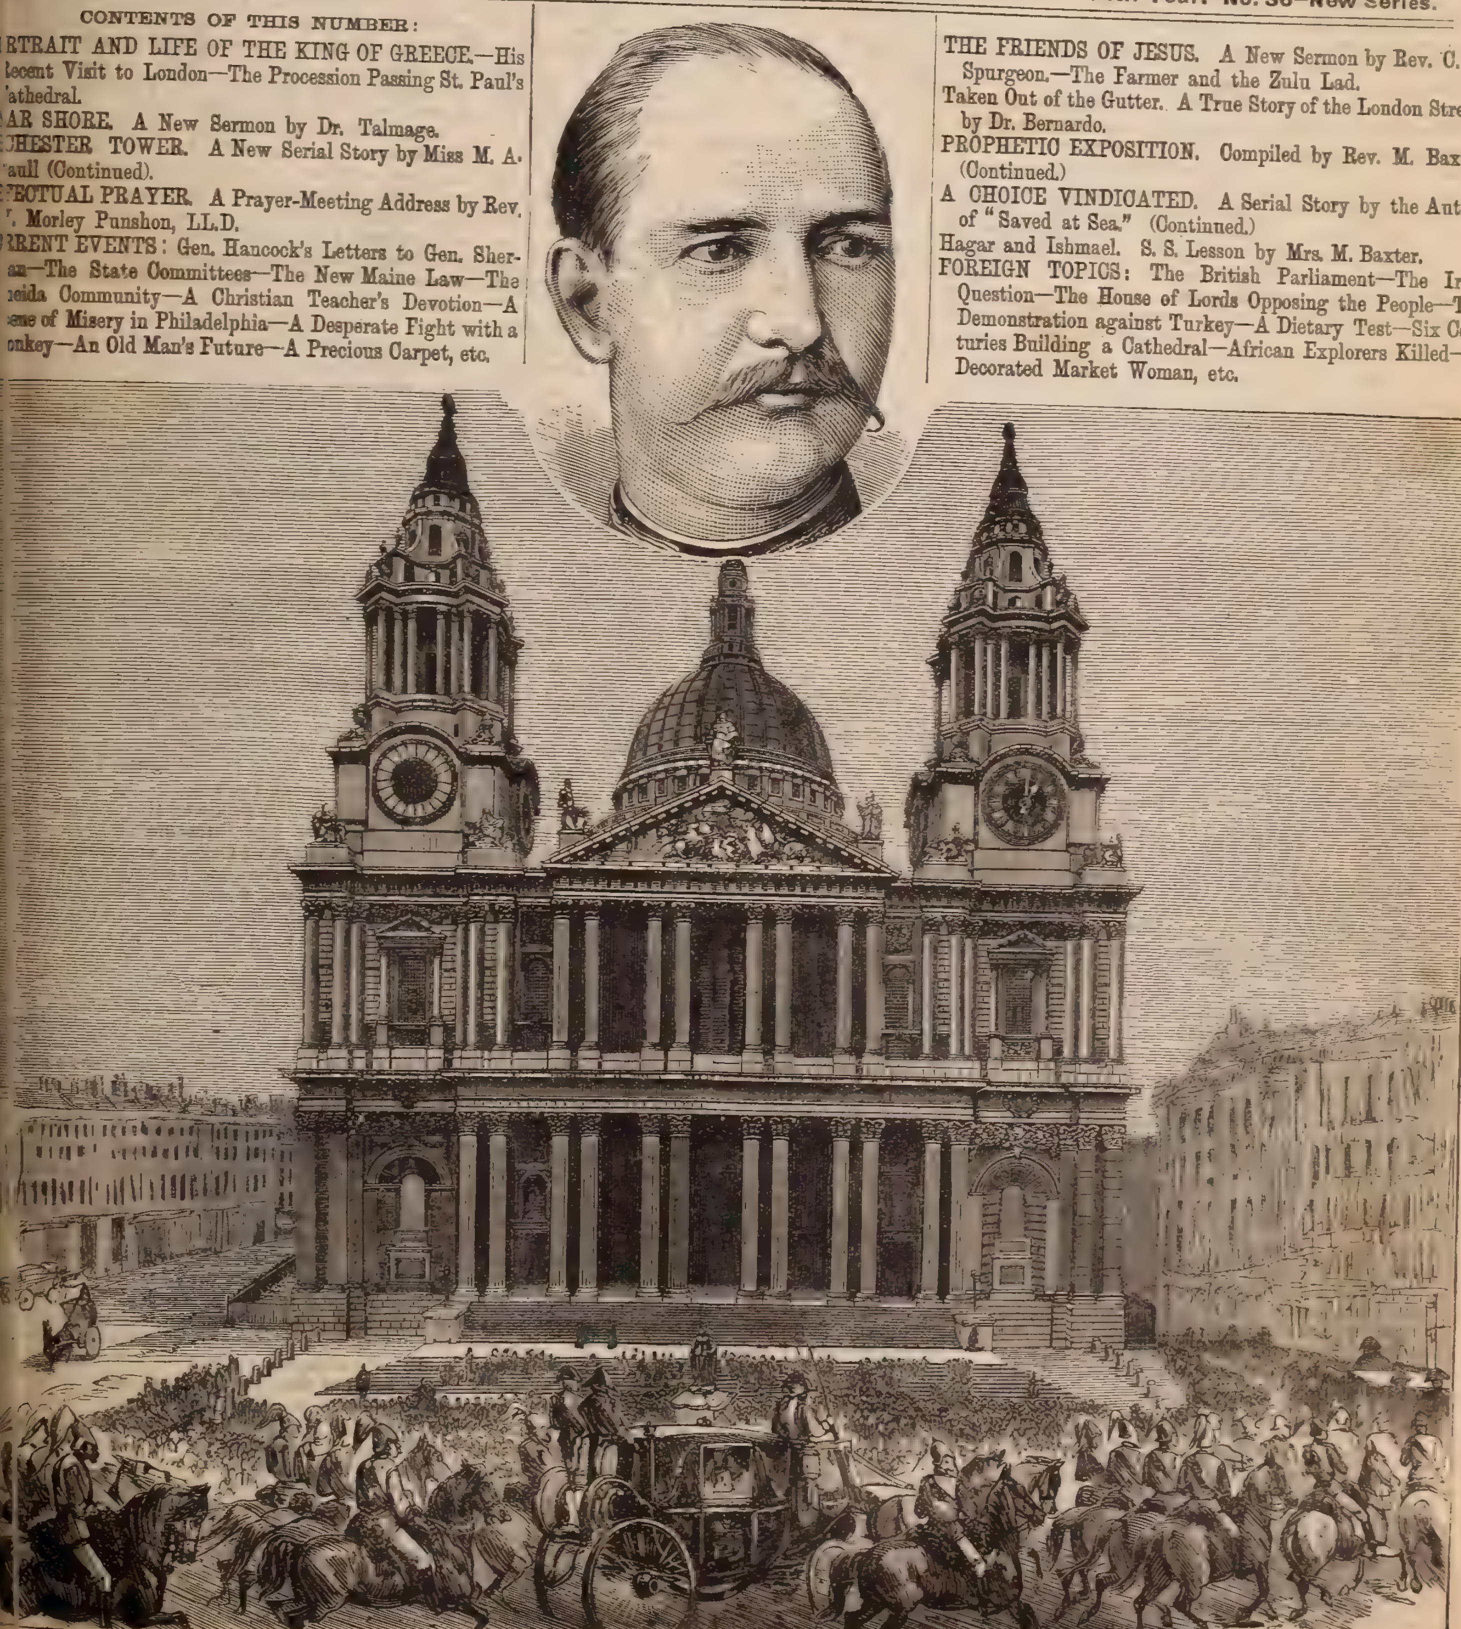
Taken Out of the Gutter. A True Story of the London Streets by Dr. Bernardo.

PROPHETIC EXPOSITION. Compiled by Rev. M. Baxter. (Continued.)

A CHOICE VINDICATED. A Serial Story by the Auther of "Saved at Sea." (Continued.)

Hagar and Ishmael. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.

FOREIGN TOPICS: The British Parliament—The Irish Question—The House of Lords Opposing the People—The Demonstration against Turkey—A Dietary Test—Six Centuries Building a Cathedral—African Explorers Killed—A Decorated Market Woman, etc.



THE KING OF GREECE, and View of his Entry into London while Passing St. Paul's Cathedral.

THE KING OF GREECE.

Sketch of His Life—Ancient Greece—Her Preeminence in Arms, Literature, and the Arts—Alexander and His Conquests—Decadence and Subjugation of the Country—Rise of Modern Greece—Struggles with the Moslems—Otho's Reign and Expulsion—Characteristics of the Nation—The Place of Greece in Prophecy.

A few weeks ago George I., King of Greece, paid a visit to London, and was the honored guest of the royal family, and was welcomed and fêted by the civic authorities. There were many reasons for the cordial reception accorded to him. One was that he was the brother of the lady who is beyond comparison the most popular lady in the British Isles. Wherever the Princess of Wales appears, she is received with enthusiasm, for apart from her elevated position, she has won the love of the people by her gentleness and her womanly character as a wife and a mother. For her sake, therefore, her brother, the King of Greece, was sure to receive a friendly reception in England. But besides that, the King of Greece had claims of his own on the sympathy of England. The country he rules had made a desperate struggle for freedom, had cast off the yoke of the oppressor, and was emerging from the gross darkness which centuries of thraldom had spread over her, and in a free, enlightened land the representative of the newly-enfranchised people might confidently expect to be well received.

But little is known of the young king personally, and the interest attaching to him is aroused by his position rather than by his character. The incidents of his career are briefly as follows: George I., (Christian Adolphus), King of Greece, is the second son of the King of Denmark. He was born on the 24th of December, 1845, and is now in the thirty-fifth year of his age. The maritime traditions of his country exercising their natural influence on his susceptible temperament, he elected, for a time, to enter the Danish navy.

After the abdication of Otho I., the late King of Greece, in 1862, the vacant throne was first tendered by a majority of the Greek people, through their representatives, to the Duke of Edinburgh, second son of Queen Victoria, but whose nomination, for constitutional and diplomatic reasons, the English Government refused to accept. It was then offered to Duke Ernest, of Saxe-Coburg Gotha, who also declined it; and eventually to Prince Christian, who, with the concurrence of his own family and the consent of the great European powers, accepted it, and began to reign on March 30th, 1863, as King George I. He was married, at St. Petersburg, to the Princess Olga, daughter of the Grand Duke Constantine, younger brother of the Emperor of Russia, on October 27th, 1867.

At the banquet given in his honor during his visit to London, the king gracefully referred to England's share in the efforts which resulted in the establishment of the Greek kingdom—efforts which were warmly endorsed in the eloquent speeches of Clay and Webster, on this side of the Atlantic—and the heroism of those Englishmen who took part in the regeneration of Greece since 1827. He said, "I feel gratified that you have remarked and appreciated the truly remarkable progress achieved by my people since their liberation. This development of their prosperity justifies past sacrifices, and confirms the conviction that Greece will not fail to contribute to and accelerate the civilization of that part of Europe."

ANCIENT GREECE.

The prominence of the Kingdom of Greece in the present crisis of affairs in south-eastern Europe has attracted general attention to that classic land, once the proud mistress of the known world. Her ancient glories, and the position she once occupied as the home of poetry, philosophy, and art, are familiar to all students of history, and Bible readers remember how the Apostle Paul went to the ancient capital of Greece, and, standing on Mars Hill, delivered that wonderful oration before the men who "spent their time in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing" (Acts 17 : 21).

Without enlarging upon the dawn of Greek history as vividly delineated in the poems of Homer, the father of Greek poetry, we pass over this classic ground of singular fascination, to that period when under Alexander the Great Græcia formed one of the great empires of the world. It was under this victorious monarch, whose conquests so extended his empire, that the Greek tongue became the common language of the whole civilized world. In that language the Scriptures of the New Testament were written, and thus the Gospel of the grace of God was brought at once within the reach of mankind. The whole antecedent history of Greece was, in its way, a preparation for the time when He, the desire of all nations, should appear for the redemption of the world.

The ancient Greek mythology and religion were of a baleful character. The gods who were worshipped were represented as partaking of all the passions and frailties of men. Not deities alone did the Greek of Homer's day invoke, but the air, the swift-winged breezes, the fountains of the earth, the all-seeing, all-hearing sun. The teeming earth, the restless sea, the rushing stream, the irresistible storm, every display of superhuman might, roused a distinct sentiment of religious awe. It was thought necessary to propitiate these imaginary deities by worship and sacrifices. There were as many priestesses as priests, and boys and girls, and sometimes very old people, were employed in their service. The business of the soothsayer was a flourishing one, and also that of the interpreter of dreams.

It was Philip of Macedon who, about 335 years before Christ, made himself master of all the Greek states. This man, though a renowned conqueror, could secure no happiness in his own family or home. Philip, according to the practice of the East, had several wives, and his chief wife, Olympias, the mother of Alexander, was a woman of imperious and passionate nature, who prided herself on being a descendant of Achilles, a hero of antiquity. When Philip married another wife there was a fearful scene at the marriage banquet between Philip and his son Alexander. Philip seized a sword, and rushed to slay his son, but his foot slipped, and he fell. Then said Alexander, "Behold the man who is about to pass from Europe to Asia, but who has been overthrown in going from one couch to another." Alexander and his mother fled the country.

In the autumn of the same year Philip was celebrating at Ægea, the ancient capital of Macedonia, the giving his daughter in marriage to the King of Epirus. Princes and deputies came with golden crowns and costly presents. Philip entertained them with music and banquets and theatrical performances. It was remembered afterward that the player who recited an ode during the banquet had chosen one which spoke of pride, luxury, and ambition, and the stealthy approach of death, that cuts short all these things. It is also remarkable that when Philip had asked the oracle of Delphi about the issue of his Eastern expedition, the oracle had answered, "The bull is crowned, everything is ready, and the sacrificer is at hand." The day after the marriage Philip walked in a procession, clad in a white robe, and with a chaplet on his brow. In the words of the oracle, the bull was crowned and the sacrificer was at hand. He was found in a young man, named Pausanias, who suddenly rushed out of the crowd and buried a long sword in the side of Philip, who fell dead. The proud, passionate queen was rejoiced at her husband's death, and the dark shadow of suspicion fell on their son Alexander.

Philip was succeeded by his son Alexander. The young king was at the time of his accession to the crown only twenty years of age. He had enjoyed the inestimable advantage of the tutorship of Aristotle, for Aristotle was in the world of philosophy as great a potentate as Alexander became in the material world At the time when Alexander ascended th throne another young prince also assumed crown. This was the brave Darius, the last c the Persian kings. The history of the conflic between the youthful monarchs is a history ric with all the splendors of Oriental romance.

Alexander went to Corinth in the year B.C 335, preparatory to his departure for Persia t subdue his rival, Darius. Here he met the fa mous cynic Diogenes, who with stoical disregar of the comforts of life, passed his days and night in a tub. Alexander visited him in state, an asked him if he wished for anything. Diogen replied, "Nothing, except that you stand out my sunshine." Alexander was so struck wit the answer that he said, "If I were not Ale ander I would be Diogenes."

Some months were spent in making milita preparations, and presently Alexander started the campaign with less than 35,000 men, a very little money. The invasion of Persia w the culmination of Greek history, the last a most splendid of its achievements, and Alexa der proved himself on that war one of the grea est masters of the military art the world has ev known.

And all the while the great designs of Pro dence were steadily being fulfilled; the valle were exalted, and the mountains and hills la low, that the way of the Prince of Pea throughout all the world might be prepare For two years the contests grew hotter and ho ter still, until, on the field of Arbela, the P sian army was completely routed and disperse and Persian sovereignty was abolished. T treasures that came into the conqueror's gra almost surpass the dreams of the wildest ima nation.

For a brief period Alexander's hope of obtaini universal empire was all but realized. And th that wonderful life, in the prime of its amaz powers, passed away into darkness, and the ki dom was divided between his four generals, Daniel had predicted (Daniel 8 : 5-8). But in these things the inspired prophecy was fulfil which spoke of the doom of Persia, and of events which should come to pass upon earth, as recorded by Daniel in the vision of he-goat overcoming the ram.

The period which followed the death of A ander was a period of intestine struggle, du which the strength of Greece was wasted in and enervated by the ease and luxury in w her people revelled. Finally, she was subdue the all-conquering Romans and in the year B.C. she sank to the position of a province of Roman Empire.

MODERN GREECE.

As the Romans in their turn succumbed be their enemies, Greece fell under the domina of the hordes of barbarians who devastated I and in 1305 A.D. when the Osman Turks ove Europe with fire and sword, Greece fell u the Mohammedan yoke, which she bore what patience she could until recent years, w her sufferings aroused the indignation of Eur

In 1770 and 1790 two unsuccessful insu tions occurred in which European sympat were with the struggling people, but in whic material aid was given them. But in 1829 present Kingdom of Greece was establis leaving still under the sway of the Turks T saly, Epirus, Macedonia, Thrace, Samos, C and various other districts and islands whic really Greek, and most of which have been state of chronic insurrection ever since. tions against this unwise curtailment of the kingdom were made in both houses of the Br Parliament, and supported by eminent Br statesmen. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe resi when the Powers refused to give the kingdo natural boundaries; and Leopold, after King of the Belgians, refused, for the sam son, the proffered crown.

The crown of the young kingdom was conf on Otho, the second son of the King o varia, he being the ruler selected by Great Br France, and Russia, who had assisted Gree final and successful effort to rid herself of Moslem oppressors.

he rule of Otho was not a successful one. He difficulties to encounter, consequent on the of degradation under which the people had ned for many centuries. The nation was ted with brigands, her seas swarmed with es, and her people were so unused to free tutions that they failed to make a proper of them.

r twenty-seven years Otho struggled on, opularity gradually decreasing, and his gov- ent becoming increasingly lax and corrupt. ly, in 1862, he was driven from his throne revolution, and sentence of banishment was d upon him. Then the people looked oad for a king, and after inviting the Duke of burgh, and other scions of regal houses, d the throne to Christian, the second son King of Denmark, who began to reign in under the title of George I.

population of Greece in 1871 was 1,457,- The form of government is that of a lim- onarchy, under a constitution framed on George's accession. The king wields the ive power and the House of Representa- elected by manhood suffrage every four ar possesses the legislative power.

productions of the country are flax, wine, d fruits of various kinds, and the com- is chiefly in those articles. The Greeks n merchants, and their commercial abili- famous throughout the world. They are active, and versatile, and wherever they h themselves they usually acquire an ex- business and accumulate large fortunes mission agents collecting and disposing products of their own and other coun-

Religion of Greece is in many points simi- he Roman Catholic but differs in some l doctrines, and it distinctly denies the acy of the Pope of Rome.

GREECE IN PROPHECY.

ery existence of a king of Greece at the time is a remarkable fulfilment of pro- ecause the revival and distinct reappear- Greece as a separate kingdom at the the end of this dispensation, when the ichrist shall arise, was distinctly predict- niel 8, where Greece was prefigured as the four horns on the he-goat which p in the place of the notable horn, Al- the Great. The Grecian empire of Alex- s parted after his death among his four ders and thus dismembered into four s, Greece, Egypt, Syria, and Thrace four hundred years ago the Turks con- d absorbed these four kingdoms into Ottoman Empire.

ey must be separated and reappear as kingdoms within their ancient boundaries e of the end, because Daniel foretells e then re-existent. "In the latter time kingdom, when the transgressors are the full, a king of fierce countenance st] shall stand up," and shall perish at second advent. This Antichrist is rep- s a little Horn springing out of one Four Horns, and consequently those s will re-exist in clearly-defined sepa- ctness at the time of the end.

therefore, a fulfilment of prophecy ce revolted from Turkey in 1822, and ecured its complete political indepen l convened a national Parliament, and I. appointed its king in 1833.

ust before long have Epirus, Thessaly, onia added to its territories, because d those countries when it was one of orn kingdoms after Alexander the th. And this enlargement of Greece will probably be accomplished by end of this dispensation is to be ear 1890.

Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman) August may be obtained at the office of IAN HERALD. Price six cents.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL IN LONDON.

OUR frontispiece represents the procession of the King of Greece escorted by the British Life Guards filing past the western front of St. Paul's Cathedral, the most conspicuous edifice in London, and the largest Protestant church in the world.

According to tradition, it was originally erected in the second century, and it is certain that in 1083, and in 1137 large churches called by the name of St. Paul's were successively destroyed by fire on the same site. The building of the cathedral now standing was commenced by Sir Christopher Wren in 1673. It is built in the form of a cross, and an immense dome resting on eight arches rises over the centre. The ball on the top of the dome is 404 feet above the pavement beneath.

The interior of the building is of rather a sombre character, but it contains many objects of interest. Torn and dilapidated flags which have been followed by British troops under Indian suns and on the famous battle-fields of Europe are deposited there. The funeral car on which were conveyed to their last resting-place the mortal remains of the great Duke of Wellington stands in the crypt. It is made of the cannon taken from the French by the Duke, and its construction cost $65,000. Under the nave lies the body of the great duke, enclosed in a porphyry sarcophagus, and not far away is the coffin containing the remains of Lord Nelson, the famous naval commander, who fell at the battle of Trafalgar. Here also is the tomb of West, the great American painter, and other distinguished men. A daily religious service is held in the cathedral, to which the public are admitted.

THE MAN WHO COULDN'T SAY NO.

A Temperance Story.

John's Confession—The Doctor Empties his Glass under the Grate—John goes Mad.

TWO young men were sitting at a dinner-table who were being watched with eyes of kindly interest, not unmingled with anxiety, by an aged doctor present. The young men were the children of the old man's brother, and they had been invited to spend a day or two with Squire Grove, a genial country gentleman, whose hospitality was of the old-fashioned hearty and demonstrative character. The young men never refused the wine, although it was evident they would have much preferred to do so. As soon as the Squire bore down upon them and their empty glasses, they immediately struck their flags and surrendered. "You young fellows little know what the Squire is doing for you," thought the doctor to himself.

"Now, Sharp," shouted Squire Grove, "wake us all up. You've been as silent as a mouse. Let us hear your voice."

"Well, Squire," replied the doctor, "I'll tell you about 'The Man who couldn't say No.'"

"Fire away, then—only don't hit too hard."

After the doctor had repeated the title, he thus began:

"I don't like talking about myself, but I must say this one thing—you'd never think, Squire, that I was once a regular harum-scarum fellow. I was, though. For a few months I drank like a fish, and thought no harm of it. It was at the end of these few months that what I am now going to relate happened. I had a young friend, who was as bright, and clever, and handsome a fellow as ever breathed. I was really proud of him. He could do everything he put his hand to. I set him down in my mind as one who would leave his mark upon the world. John Sothern was his name. We used to go to one another's rooms to drink, smoke, and exchange opinions.

"One evening, I remember, we were together, he on one side of the fire, I on the other—each in a comfortable arm-chair. He was just about to put a glass of sherry to his lips, when he paused, and looked over to me with the saddest expression on his face it has ever been my fate to see a man wear.

"'Why John, old fellow, what's the matter?' said I.

"'I want to let you into a secret,' he answered. 'I have discovered something, Sharp; I have discovered that I can't say "No."'

"I didn't think there was anything very terrible in that, so I laughed, and said 'Is that all?' He did not laugh back, however. He did not even smile. Still holding his glass in his hand he went on to say, 'It's only a day or two since I found it out. I used to have a will strong and firm enough, and could say "No" with ease. But now my will seems all dissolved.'

"'Do you remember,' he continued, 'when you and I launched out together on that swollen stream by your father's house—how easy it was to turn back at first, but how hard the farther out we went? You know we found it impossible when we reached the middle of the current. We had to be dragged in by others. I feel that I've got into the middle of the current, and must go on, and on, and on. Sharp!' he said loudly, and jumping from his seat, horror sitting on every feature, 'Sharp, I see nothing but darkness and shame before me.'

"Poor fellow, I can see him now with his head buried in his hands, and trembling in every limb. I began to realize it all. I saw that there was need for immediate action, so jumping to my feet, I said, 'Sothern, we'll drink no more to-night,' and I emptied my unfinished glass under the grate. He drank his, however.

"Well, Squire, it really turned out as he anticipated. He lost all self-control. He never said 'No.' He would drink with everybody who asked him. From morning to night he was being tempted, and from morning to night he yielded. I tried hard to turn his course. He wept and resolved—but still he went on. At last the end came.

* * * * * * *

"One morning a tall, muscular man, with a heavy beard, called upon me. He introduced himself as one of the keepers of a lunatic asylum. He told me that Sothern had gone raving mad, and that he was about to carry him off to the asylum. 'Would I like to see him before he was removed?' I thanked him and went.

"Oh, Squire, the ramblings of my dear gifted friend almost maddened me. The eyes, once so clear and bright, were pitiable in their vacancy. His whole bearing was that of a madman. I heard him say, in tones which rose at times to a scream:

"'Another glass? Yes, yes! But only one, mind—only one. I'm drifting, I'm drifting—one more? Yes, one more, then I'll stop. Who says I won't stop? No, I can't say "No." I've tried—oh so hard!' He then said in a startled whisper, 'It's dark! It's dark! Poor John, poor John—he can't say "No."'

"I could stand no more; and went away, my whole heart aching almost beyond endurance.

"Shall I tell you what my thoughts were, Squire? I thought—God help me, I'll always say 'No' to strong drink, and I'll begin now, while I have the power. And, besides this, I said to myself, 'I'll think of others who can't say "No" to strong drink, and will never tempt them.' There's many a man, Squire, young and old, who can't say 'No.'"

It was noticed by many that night that Squire Grove was unusually thoughtful, and it was also observed that from that night there was a decided falling off in his former boisterous hospitality in pressing strong drink upon his guests. He also took much less himself: while as for the two young men, they were known to have both come to the same conclusion, without consulting one another, that it was better to take nothing at all than too much, and to have acted upon it.

And more than this, they sought out Dr. Sharp, and thanked him most warmly for his story of "The Man who couldn't say 'No.'"

NEAR SHORE.

An Evening Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Preached on Sunday, May 9th, 1880.

"Thou art not far from the kingdom of God."—Mark 12 : 34.

The Last Two Hours of a Voyage—Those Who are not far from the Kingdom of God—I. Those Who Appreciate the Value of the Soul—A Jewel found by a Child—"Give me that Soul"—II. Those Who have Learned the Insufficiency of the World—A Grand and Beautiful World—A Cheating and a Dying World—It Destroys every one in its Power—A Perishable World—Astronomers Watching a Burning World—III. Those Who are Affronted with their Sins—IV. Those Who have Begun to Pray—The Greatest thing a Man can Do—The Danger of Stopping—A Man Falling from a Ladder—A Life-boat Capsized near Shore.

THESE words were spoken to an ancient scribe, and are just as appropriate to five hundred people in the Tabernacle to-night. Oh, that the pentecostal spirit which descended in tongues of fire upon the people in olden times might descend while I speak, making this house as silent as the grave, as solemn as the judgment, and as glad as heaven.

Once, after I had been twelve days on shipboard, I awaked in the morning and found myself in sight of New York Harbor. So anxious was I to get ashore that even Sandy Hook looked beautiful ; and it seemed as if we would never get past the Narrows and past the Quarantine and get up to the wharf. I think the last two hours of a voyage are more tedious than any hours of any voyage ; we are anxious to get among our friends on shore.

In that position many of you are to-night. You have been voyaging a long while toward the Christian life. Some of you have had a rough voyage ; hurricanes from the top of Mount Sinai have swept across the sea, but you are coming up the harbor, and you are coming through the narrows ; you are almost ashore, you are approaching the wharf, "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God."

I. These words might be uttered in regard to all those who have come to an appreciation of the value of their soul. Once you cared nothing specially about it. If a surgeon had told you that you must have a hand amputated, or a foot taken off, you would have said, "Oh, doctor, can't you save that? I can't get along without that hand, or that foot." But as to what would become of your immortal soul, you had at that time no special anxiety. As a little child once picked up what seemed to be a pebble, and took it to a jeweller's, and sold it for twenty-five cents, and that which seemed a pebble turned out to be a precious stone worth its hundreds and hundreds of dollars, so you had but little appreciation of that time of the treasure within you—an immortal soul.

Angels said,

"GIVE ME THAT SOUL ;"

Devils said, "Give me that soul ;" the world said, "Give me that soul ;" you said, "I don't care who gets it." But all that time of indifference has passed. You say now, "I have a deathless spirit, a soul—a soul so vast that no one but God can fill it, a soul so enduring that eternity cannot destroy it, a soul so imperishable that fires cannot consume it, and avalanches cannot crush it ; a wheel within a wheel, wound up for endless revolution ; a round so vast that God only can describe it, a realm in which love shall forever lift its smile, or pain shall strike its poignard, despair clank its chain, or faith kindle its aurora—a soul.

Oh, I wonder not that sometimes men in their dying hour, feeling all unprepared for the future, have risen from the couch where they had long been helpless, as with the strength of a giant, and shaken off that which kept them down, while looking in the future they cried out, Oh, my soul, my soul, what will become of it? My brother, my sister, if you have come to some appreciation of the value of that great treasure, I congratulate you. You are very near the Christian life ; I believe that to-night you are going to be saved ; "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God."

II. The words of the text are also appropriate to all those that have found this world is

AN INSUFFICIENT PORTION.

Now I have nothing to say against this world : it is a beautiful world ; it is more than that, it is getting brighter and brighter every year. There never was such a spring-time as this spring-time. The marshes are being turned into gardens, the rough places are being smoothed into gracefulness ; the grand old mountains, scarred with the tempest, are strewn with white flowers, slippery with green grass, diamonded with dew. The grand old ocean, through which God rides in the chariot of His omnipotence, the phosphorescence of light shooting from the waves, and the shoutings of the wind the halloo of the charioteers.

But, after all, though this is so grand a world for the immortal soul, it is a poor portion, and some of you have found it so. You said, "If I could get twenty thousand dollars, I would be satisfied." You have the twenty thousand dollars ; are you contented? You said, "If I could get in such and such a social position, I would be contented." You reached that position ; are you happy? Oh, no ; you found out that this world cannot satisfy an immortal nature.

You know it is a cheating world, it is a lying world, it is a dying world ; you know if the world could get its hand on your fortune it would perish ; you know very well if the world could get its hand on your reputation it would be blasted. You pay money, and you take a receipt ; you get a deed for property, you have it recorded ; why? You have no confidence in the world. It is a fallen world, and it is a dying world.

When the world gets a man in its possession, when the world gets a man under its complete influence, in its full possession, it destroys him. If he is not destroyed it is because it never yet had him in full possession. You know very well how the world treats a man when it gets him in its power, with what flails it pounds him, with what lancets it cuts him, with what slanderous tongues it vilifies him, through what sewers it drags him! A poor mouse under a cat's paw, mauled and turned over and bleeding and mashed, is hardly worse off than a man when the world has him in its clutches.

You know also that this world is that the mountains will fall into their graves, and the pulses of the mountain torrent will cease, and the thunders of the last day will heave the dying groans of a world. You know that this world was not built to continue. Astronomers tell us that within the last two hundred years thirteen worlds have been seen to burn down. Not a great while ago the astronomers were watching the heavens, and they saw a world beginning to blaze ; first a pale light, just kindled ; then it got to be a flame, deep red, it was in full conflagration ; then it became ashes, it was burned down. It took sixteen months to burn down.

A PERISHABLE WORLD ;

Well, the time will come when our world shall perish. The elements shall melt with fervid heat. We will find out it is a poor fortune for an immortal nature. There are thousands in this house who have found it out ; it is a discovery you have made for yourselves ; and I congratulate you, my brother, I congratulate you, my sister ; "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God."

III. Again, the words of my text may be true in regard to those who have been affronted at their own sins. The time was when you said, "I am all right ; I pay my debts, I live a clean and upright life, I am all right." You do not say that now. You say, "Here I am at twenty, or at forty, or at sixty, or at seventy years of age, and I have not yet begun the great work for which God made me. Who will unstrap this burden from my soul? Who shall deliver me from the body of this death? Once I thought sin was beautiful ; there was azure vision in her eye, th was perfume in her breath, in her step grace ness, morning coming down at the gates of east ; but I have been deceived ; her breatl the breath of the charnel-house, there are ad in her hair, her hands are the talons of beasts, her heart is hell. Away with it. V shall deliver me from the body of this death

Oh, I congratulate you that you have com that experience, if you realize you are lost undone, and want Christ ; I tell you plai whether you stay on the main floor or in gallery, thou art not far from the kingdor God.

IV. I remark also that these words of the are appropriate to those who have begu pray. What is

THE GREATEST THING A MAN CAN DO

To marshal an army? No. To write a cons tion, or a Magna Charta? No. Establish a ernment? No ; the greatest thing a man ca is to pray. What is prayer? Is it mere w Is it the breath coming from between the so feebly that it would hardly make a c flicker? Oh, no ; it is a mighty powe brought sight to the blind, it brought heali the sick, it took hold of the golden and s bits of the sun and moon and halted the the highway of heaven.

I believe this world would have been dest before this had it not been for prayer. So you have begun to pray ; it may be in b utterances that a grammarian could not it may be simply a look toward Christ.
to-night are hovering, and they cry o another, "Behold, he prays." I congr you ; thou art not far from the kingdom o

But if you stop where you are, what You may as well never have started. S to the kingdom of God and yet you ne tered. Ten thousand people were just as you are, and never entered. Suppose climbs a ladder, and he falls, had he not fall from the lower rung than from th
The higher he goes up, if he slips, the the fall. And a man climbing up towar heaven and peace, if at last he does no great must be the fall. In other word almost in the kingdom, almost a Christia be no Christian at all.

Years ago a vessel got into the brea
Long Island ; the wreckers on shore sho ets, and sent a rope, and finally the po got into the lifeboat and pulled for th
They came within hailing distance of th when a strong wave capsized the boat and perished. So a man comes on near the k of God, and nearer and nearer, but at la wave of temptation or sin sweeps over and he is destroyed without remedy.

ALMOST SAVED, BUT LOST.

Oh, why will you tantalize your soul will you come and look over the or God's love, when you might come in a the fruits? Why sit down at the well mercy, when you might take the wind bring up buckets of everlasting life?
unsaved? Unsaved, notwithstanding has been done for your redemption?
Why, many a lost spirit would clutch fo vantage which to-night perhaps you ar ling under foot. Unsaved, though God down on a sick bed to have you thin saved, though God opened the grave loved ones to make you feel. Unsaved through all these years God has been inviting, imploring you to come, rin bells of invitation by day, and ringing night, ringing them through all these saved!

How if you miss heaven? What wil the wound gotten in such a failure?
Jesus, banishment from Thee? Tha night, moonless, starless, forever, etern ing away, the whelps of hunger hallooin
the night,

A LOST SOUL!

A lost soul! Beat all the drums of the dead-march of a lost soul. Stand he procession go by, carrying the disem-ed spirit. A lost soul. Oh, my friends, night start for the kingdom of God. I de-here, without any discrimination, whoso-will may come, and that the door of mercy de open, and that there is not in all this a soul but may be saved, and saved to-

.

u may have heard of that king whose son itted some crime, and was condemned to both his eyes put out, and the father, the stepped up and said, take one of my eyes, ake one of the lad's eyes. And so it was they each lost an eye, but they each saved
. But a more wonderful fact is it that came, and He said, Take both eyes, take hands, take both feet, take my throne;
s heaven to Me when a world is perishing?
go out and rescue it. Lo, I come to do ill, oh God!

idas and his three hundred men threw lves into the pass of Thermopylæ to save ountry and save their friends, but Christ, eternity, threw Himself into the Ther-of our transgression to save his ene-Oh, will you not to-night open the door heart? As Christ stands there beating door, saying, Behold, I stand at the door
ock. "Whosoever will open to Me I will n and sup with him, and he with Me."
udge away in everlasting slavery when y be free?

will you die, when heaven is so grand, judgment so tremendous, and the soul ious, and Christ so loving, and God so Something impresses me with the fact re may be in this house a soul who to-having the last opportunity for salva-know not where he sits, or where he but I bring the Gospel offer to such a ight.

inner, perhaps this very day
  Thy last accepted time may be;
Oh, should'st thou grieve him now away
  Then hope may never beam on thee."

HE CONCLUSION OF THE SERMON REV.
HARRISON DELIVERED AN ADDRESS.]

rayers of the readers of this Journal are l for the blessing of God upon its Editors a and England, and those whose sermons, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and eekly circulation of more than 185,000 be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conf many sinners and the quickening of ople. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage request prayer every Sunday morning of their labors.]

ROCHESTER TOWER.

By Miss M. A. Paull.

(Continued from page 551.)

e Anerley's Arrival—The First Evening ssing the Future Plans—Mrs. Mitchell riole Aunt.

RGUSON had come to the Anerleys morning—once to bring a quantity of flowers, fresh and lovely, with the dew their bright bloom; the second time to aintly devised porcupine cake to orna-supper table, and to ask permission to for the evening.

e by, who will meet her at London he asked.

' replied Emmie; "Cecil will go there om the office."

he'll be in time. It would be distress-r to return and find no one waiting

s thoroughly dependable," said Mrs.
he always performs what he under-might be detained," said the minisyoung ladies did not think of go-

," said Mrs. Anerley, answering for ither Emmie nor Miss Stanley would enjoy the crush at London Bridge."

"Ah!" ejaculated Mr. Ferguson: "I think if I am anywhere near I will join Cecil and wait her arrival."

"Thank you!" responded the mother.

Later on, he and Cecil scanned the train from Harwich, containing the continental passengers who had crossed in the steamer from Antwerp; then, when he, searching diligently for a certain clever, earnest face, saw it first, and caught its expression of glad home-coming, the cheeks crimson, the dark eyes soft and dewy, the lips smiling, he felt his heart give a great leap that could hardly be accounted for by either of the above reasons.

"My child, how well you look!"

Constance might have resented the possible signification of those words "my child" at any other moment, but she was too happy to do so now. It was good to see home faces and hear home voices, and she cordially grasped Mr. Ferguson's hand as the train stopped, and he called aloud to Cecil, quite eagerly, "Here she is; I have found her."

Cecil held her in his arms as he kissed her and looked down upon her tenderly and admiringly. "My darling Constance, why you have come home quite handsome! How proud I shall be to show you to Miss Stanley!"

"Thank you, Cecil, very much; I want to know her exceedingly."

The luggage having been found in safety, the trio on their way home chatted and laughed gaily. There was sunshine to-day in Constance's heart, the sunshine of good health and youth. But at sight of Eglinton Terrace the memory of one dear form she never more might see, to whose memory she clung as passionately to-day, as in the first awful hours of her bereavement, swept over her; the hot tears gathered fast; the low sigh, "Oh, papa! papa!" escaped her lips, and Mr. Ferguson, with quick thoughtfulness, bade the cabman drive around another street and enter the terrace at the opposite end, that she might regain her composure.

With her usual energy, Constance commanded herself in those few minutes, dried her tears, stifled her sobs, and was ready with smiles for her mother and sister. But the beauty (a beauty of expression more than of feature) of the young face was softer and sweeter for its recent emotion. Salome Stanley was pleasantly surprised this first evening to find that Constance Anerley looked gentle. She had thought, "I can get on with good-natured Cecil, and kind-hearted, unassuming Emmie and dear Mrs. Anerley, but shall I be comfortable here when this clever, talented, determined young daughter of the house returns to it?"

The hours of that first evening of reunion and acquaintance passed quickly and happily away. Constance had gone forth a child, matured and thoughtful beyond her age truly, for her father's death had steadied and sobered her, and added an experience to her life that made her feel old; she returned almost a woman, her knowledge widened, her powers expanded, her mind increasingly well stored. A new era would shortly open before her.

"Three months' holiday, mamma, and then I must begin to earn some money for you," she said, the day after that of her return, as she sat at her mother's feet and looked up lovingly into the pretty familiar face.

"You might as well stay with us six, Constance," said Mrs. Anerley; "we can very well afford to keep you at home six months without the least inconvenience."

"Ah, but mamma dearest, my teaching powers would get rusty, and I could not honestly demand so good a salary."

"With your certificates Mr. Ferguson says you can ask quite a large amount."

"But I would rather go for a smaller sum to really nice people, mamma, than to aristocratic folk, who expect this, that, and the other ceremony from their poor wights of governesses. I shan't be displeased with fifty or sixty pounds a year."

"No," said her mother, smiling, "nor shall I."

"I am so glad we agree. I was afraid you meant seventy or eighty. I will advertise at once, and wait with patience an answer to my advertisement. Let me see, Emmie, what shall I write? 'A young lady, just returned from Germany, seeks—'"

"Do be quiet, dear, said Mrs. Anerley; "I will not let anything more be said or done about seeking situations. Do you begrudge your mother even a week of your attention, Constance?"

"Oh, no, mamma!"

"To-morrow, my child, there is the one dear spot I wish to visit with you—your father's grave."

"Yes, mamma," said Constance in a rather hard voice, as if she was keeping back some thing she dared not utter.

"Yes; mamma has been looking forward to our all going together," said Emmie quietly.

"Yes dear; we will."

What was a great comfort to Mrs. Anerley and Emmie was an extreme trouble to Constance; but she did not disappoint them.

As the weeks passed on the friendship between Salome Stanley and Constance became so warm, that if Emmie had been of a more jealous disposition she might have been somewhat envious of her sister and her friend; but her sweetness smoothed all, and tranquillity settled down on Eglinton Terrace for Constance's holiday.

It soon came to a termination, and she seriously set about obtaining a situation as governess in a quiet, respectable family. As a result of negotiations which had been proceeding for some days, the following conversation took place:

"I wonder what she is like; in person I mean. Of course her certificates give one some idea of her mind. But I do hope she is sound. There is so much teaching just now of a questionable character by these clever young women."

"Rowland has taken every pains to find out, aunt. I do hope you will be satisfied with her," said Mrs. Rowland Mitchell, the gentle, submissive lady of one of the Congregational ministers in the fashionable town of Brighton.

"But she has been to Germany," Aunt Julia Lack went on, apparently not heeding her niece's remark. "Germany is such a dangerous country, the very home of free thought and latitudinarianism. I should not wonder if she were tainted with German philosophy."

"Oh, Aunt Julia!" mildly expostulated Mrs. Mitchell, "she has been at Aix-la-Chapelle, in the establishment of Fruälein Hermann, Mr. Ferguson's aunt, and she comes highly recommended by Mr. Ferguson himself; and you liked him, you know, when he preached for Rowland that Sunday, and said he had a very vigorous, sensible style for a young man."

Miss Lack looked a trifle mollified; then she asked abruptly, "Is Mr. Ferguson married, my dear?"

"No, aunt."

"Then his recommendation is not worth much. It is very likely he admires the girl."

"I never heard anything of the kind," said Mrs. Mitchell.

"You were not likely to, my dear. When does Miss Anerley arrive?"

"This afternoon, aunt, at four o'clock."

"I will meet her," said Aunt Julia decidedly.

"I thought to send Percy," said Mrs. Mitchell, in a tone she meant to be decisive, but which was very far indeed from being so.

"I am a much fitter person than Percy to receive your governess, my dear. Boys never know how to behave. You may leave it all to me."

"Have a cup of tea ready for her at five. It is a mere matter of extremely new-fashioned courtesy to meet a governess at all. In my young days a governess was supposed to be able to find her way to the house where her work was to be performed."

"Oh, surely, aunt, that would be very inhospitable," said kind-hearted Mrs. Mitchell; "besides, Rowland particularly desired she should be met." She felt extremely glad she had her husband's authority to fall back upon in this matter.

"Oh, I have no objection," said Aunt Julia, with a short, rather cynical laugh, and the conversation presently turned to other matters.

When Miss Lack awaited the four-o'clock London train on the Brighton platform, she turned round more surprised than pleased to find her grand-nephew, Percy, beside her.

"If you please, aunt," he said, "mamma thought I might be useful to call a cab, or do anything you might want, when Miss Anerley arrives."

Sometimes timid Mrs. Mitchell managed in this quiet, unobtrusive manner to have her own way, in part at least, in spite of the stronger, more assertive will of Aunt Julia.

Percy, her eldest child, a boy of about fifteen summers, was exceedingly like his mother in disposition. Gentle and gentlemanly, there was nothing obtrusive to resent in the boy's presence, and though Miss Lack did not perhaps like him any the better for this, she could not find any reason or excuse to dismiss him. But as she had determined on a short preliminary conversation with the new governess, she quickly decided that Percy could and should sit on the outside of the cab, beside the driver, which no boy would ever be unwilling to do.

They had not long to wait for the train. But Miss Anerley's one large box prevented there being room for Percy on the driving-seat, and he jumped inside with them before Miss Lack had thought of any other plan to get rid of him. Nevertheless she did not altogether lose the time occupied by the drive to the comfortable house in Steyne Place occupied by the Mitchells.

"My nieces," she began, "are just of the age when it is exceedingly important that sound doctrine should be inculcated. I hope you feel yourself well-grounded in the faith, Miss Anerley, as delivered to the saints."

"Will you forgive me, madam," said Constance Anerley, with her winning smile, "if I say I do not feel quite prepared for a theological discussion just now? I conclude my pupils are very young, and that their parents probably impart to them their religious teaching."

"It is very unwise, my dear Miss Anerley, to conclude anything without just premises. If a governess is not prepared to give religious teaching, she is certainly wholly incapacitated for her calling." Constance was silent.

"You are prepared to admit that, Miss Anerley?"

"Not quite. I was engaged to come here to teach certain things which I have learned how to teach; religious instruction was not named. I supposed I should discover when I began my work what time my employers wished me to devote to such teaching."

There was an ominous silence for the remainder of the drive. Miss Lack and Constance were by no means mutually pleased. Constance was inwardly saying, "If I have to please her and satisfy her, I shan't be long in Brighton." Miss Lack was meditating, "How lamentable a display of religious ignorance! She was evidently nonplussed at my question."

Mrs. Mitchell accorded her governess a kind and cordial reception, though somewhat restrained in its nature and in her words of welcome by the presence of her formidable aunt.

But let no one imagine that Miss Lack was not a good woman. She would have been quite shocked had any one suggested to her that her behavior to the young stranger was unchristian. She wanted waking up, as a great many Christian people do, to the realization and manifestation of the sweetness and charity which made the presence of their great and Divine Master, Christ, so universally attractive; that ineffable power of sympathy which rendered His company so precious to all classes and conditions of men and women and children; that exquisite power of adaptation to humanity in all its multiform phases which made Him as welcome at Cana as at Bethany.

(To be continued.)

EFFECTUAL PRAYER.

An Address at Langham Hall Prayer Meeting, London, by Rev. W. Morley Punshon, LL.D.

"Pray without ceasing."—1 Thes. 5 : 17.

Prayer appointed by God—Condition of Health—A Privilege—Varied Objects—The Religion of the Household—The Noblest Precepts and Promises—Prayer for Professors and Teachers—Children—Elements of Successful Prayer—"Another Angel"—Perfumed Prayer—What a Lump of Clay said—Hindrances—Faith a Conqueror—"Jehovah Jireh."

YOU do not need that it should be explained to you what prayer is, or that any argument should be adduced to prove to you that it is either a duty or a privilege. It is an employment arising directly from the condition and relationships of human existence, and has been appointed by Divine authority and command. It may be well, however, to remind ourselves sometimes of the very frequent enjoinments to this duty of prayer which we have in the Word of God. For example, we are to "pray always with all supplication in the Spirit;" we are to "pray without ceasing;" and the Apostle further desires "that men everywhere lift up holy hands without wrath or doubting." There can be no doubt, therefore, of the direct and paramount obligation resting upon every renewed man to pray, for it is the condition of his spiritual health until he is transferred from earth to heaven.

I should like to regard prayer not so much as a duty as a privilege. Do we ever think of the transcendent beneficence, on God's part, in permitting us to pray? He seeks us that we may seek Him; He draws near to us first that we may draw near to Him; He stretches out His fatherly arms to us in order that we may stretch forth the arms of our faith toward Him. The most infinite condescension is embodied in the fact that God stoops to ask us to come to Him that He may come to us and fill our hearts with the peace and joy and consolation of the Gospel.

The objects for which prayer can be employed are of the most varied character. There is no one subject of human thought or care, of need or sorrow, that prayer may not comprehend. Under certain restrictions, prayer may be presented for temporal things—that life may be continued; that the physical frame may retain its vigor; that the family circle may smile on unbroken; that pestilence may not stalk through the land; that war may sheathe its sword: all these are legitimate subjects of supplication. Only, there must be in the mind of the suppliant the reversion of all to the will of God. But no such restrictions exist in reference to spiritual matters—to those, for instance, which have gathered us together to-day, because we know that our sanctification is the will of God concerning us in Christ Jesus.

And we are privileged not only to pray for the reversal of the curse and the bestowment of blessing, for the removal of guilt from the conscience and sorrow from the heart as regards ourselves; we are privileged also to become intercessors with God on behalf of others. A pious man, philanthropically looking not only on his own things but on the things of others, will present to the throne of God those interests which need special supplication. Here, also, there is no restriction, for God condescendingly listens to us when we pray for others. His survey takes in this world as well as the world to come. He who has taught us that not a sparrow falls to the ground apart from His will, has condescended to say "Ye are of more value than many sparrows." He who has said, "The very hairs of your head are all numbered," will not surely complain of us for supplication, but rather complain if we restrain prayer on what are deemed ordinary matters. We are not to be wise above that which is written, and to suppose that ordinary matters are too trivial to be spread before the Lord.

But with reference to the great matters which form the subject of prayer, it is impossible to exaggerate their importance. We pray for t sanctification of because it is the most telling illustration of t truth of Christianity, when it is exhibited i godly home. Congregations may gather fr custom, and from adherence to outside motiv but no one can resist—even the sinner must f —the quiet influence of a well-ordered, go home.

HOME LIFE,

The promise to Abraham was, "In thee sh all the families of the earth be blessed." E phatically, Christianity is the religion of household, and it is wonderful how many pro ises there are, "great and precious," all st ing from and tending to this. Abraham, read, "commanded his children, and his hou hold after him;" Joshua's noble resolve braced his household as well as himself—' for me and my house, we will serve the Lor David returned to bless his household, not tent with his individual privilege; the pron to Zaccheus, when the pitiful Lord calle him, saying, "Come down, to-day I must a at thy house"—the promise was, "This da salvation come to this house." Cornelius, first Gentile convert, had "his house" give him in answer to the supplication of his h When Paul baptized "the household" of phanas, he did not know the far-reaching sults, or read then that they woud addict t selves to the ministry of the saints, and be first fruits of Achaia. But so it was.

The Apostle prayed that the Lord would mercy unto the "house of" Onesiphorus brave one who "oft refreshed me, and wa ashamed of my chain." To the jailer, in a terror by which he was surrounded, the v were spoken. "Believe on the Lord Christ and thou shalt be saved—and thy h And he took Paul and Silas the same ho the night, and washed their stripes, and baptized—he and all his, straightway." Lydia's heart was opened, as a flower to the her household was included—"She was ba and her household." And how wonderf a Christian home depicted in the Epist Philemon, to whom Paul wrote on beh "Onesimus, whom I have begotten in bonds."

It is for us to remember that all the precepts and promises belong to sanctified holds, to godly homes. We must pray for for we cannot be better patriots, as w Christians, than by purifying the home li nation, and by guarding it with a ramp more powerful than the cannon upon the even the rampart of our Christian homes.

Then we are further to pray for our

PROFESSORS AND TEACHERS.

I am glad attention has been called t that we are asked to think of the higher s and to pray that they may become sou spiritual knowledge, and cease to be sou what is merely negative in religious th not of absolute and positive denial. We want so much distinctive teaching in matters as we want all secular matters pervaded by a Christian tone. If we teac tal philosophy, we cannot keep clear o subjects as the freedom of the will and mortality of the soul. A man may s anatomy as to make his pupils material like the teacher who can find in joints an cles a hymn of praise.

In the teaching of history, if a man h his salt, it will be impossible to avoid a b so there is need to pray for the Elis of ou who watch the Ark of God; to pray tha fountains of learning there may be the i of the Holy Ghost, and that upon the h professors and teachers (and perhaps es upon these) there may ever be resting the influence of Christ, and that every t however brilliant, that every excursi the realms of mind, however varied, ma companied by the same Spirit.

We would pray especially

FOR CHILDREN,

and for those who have such mighty influence in the Church that they may be able to direct these children wisely.

I should like to ask whether our prayers are all in this spirit? We do not, ought not, to forget that we are sinners, sinners saved by grace, but still sinners. There must be reality in our thoughts of this. If there was reality in Eden, where there were cherubim and a flaming sword which turned every way—if there is reality in heaven, where the veiled face and folded wing accompany the worship, there surely must be with us prostration of spirit, humbleness of soul when we come to God.

Someone has said, "depravity has infused a ew property into our wants." We must come, herefore, in the consciousness that we have been inners, and in the earnest sense of dependence nd reliance which the fact of such sinnership ecessitates.

Then there must be Faith; there must be he recognition of God's character and mercifulness. And there must be special respect to a rust in the Sacrifice of the Lord Jesus Christ, s the only sure hope of the sinner, and the only re warrant of our approach to God.

It is the thought of our need and the thought the Redemption which has been wrought out r us that will make our prayers inwrought. here must be no blemish of insincerity; the eech may lisp, the tongue may falter, but ere can be nevertheless the earnest eloquence the soul. Our prayers must be the conviction as well as the desire of the heart to be ectual. I want to deeply feel that if I pray I nnot pray in vain.

My mind has been running upon that passage, And me and stood at the altar, having a golden nser; and there was given unto him much inse, that he should offer it with the prayers of saints upon the golden altar which was be e the throne. And the smoke of the incense ich came with the prayers of the saints ascend- up before God out of the angel's hand." re we can rest our hope of acceptance.

ANOTHER ANGEL

'Another angel!" Who can it be but "the r t and offspring of David, and the bright and rning star, the author and the finisher of f h, the foundation and the topstone of the b lding, the Alpha and the Omega?"

t is our Saviour; He is that "other angel." thout Him, to whom could we address our p yers? In a time of extreme anguish it was w ten, "Neither is there any daysman." We d not want many mediators, but we do want One, and there is One, the man Christ Jesus. H stands at the "golden altar"—the figure being taken from the temple service of old. He ould never have stood at the golden altar until He had offered His Sacrifice. Here we have the nement brought before us, and if you rob us this you may as well rob us of the Bible.

ur High Priest has offered His Sacrifice, and read "there was given unto Him much ince, that he should offer it with the prayers of saints." May we not be deeply thankful that ou prayers can be perfumed and rendered prevailing through the efficacy of the Saviour's intercession?

here is an apologue that a man once said to lump of clay, "What art thou?" "A lump of ay," was the answer; "but I was placed by the side of a rose, and caught its fragrance." so our prayers are without fragrance; but, placed by the side of the intercession of the Saviour, they go up accepted in the presence of the Father, "with the smoke of the incense which comes with the prayers of the saints." Here is the age. In the old dispensation, when the cloud was blown down, it was a token that the sacrifice was rejected; but when it went up, then the sinner might rejoice. And the smoke of the incense with our prayers, always ascends up before God out of the Angel's hand.

PROMISE OF SUCCESS

Here, then, is our strong assurance; in fact, the matter may be said to be taken out of our hands. It is not our prayer any longer: He makes it His own—God's prayer going up to God's throne for His glory to come down to the Church. Surely we cannot doubt that He will then pour out upon us the blessings that we seek. Let us realize this just now, and assuredly the blessing shall come down.

Brethren, the great hindrance to our zeal and to our happinesss is just the weakness of our faith. We are languid because we do not trust, we are murmuring because we do not trust, we are paralyzed because we do not trust. Faith is cheerfulness, a happy disguiser as well as a continual feast; there is a gladsome ingenuity about it to find comfort in unexpected places and to draw a prevailing argument out of the very heart of a stone. There is a prostration and desponding in the heart of a sinner when he finds himself conscious of his sinfulness before God, and if ever man had fallen from a height of privilege to a depth of rebellion, that man was David sinning against light and against knowledge, and yet from the depth where his passionate outcry goes up to God, in the very guilt of his transgression, he finds an additional reason for its forgiveness, and he cries, "Oh, Lord, I beseech Thee pardon Thou mine iniquity, for it is great!" as if he had felt that in the very greatness of the sin there was a higher glory for the Saviour who could forgive the sin.

There is the poor individual, the Syro-Phœnician woman, who comes to Christ. She comes to Christ in the midst of difficulty and sorrow; her heart is mute from music because there is danger and there is sickness at home. She is hardly able to prefer her petition, her eyes seek the ground, she is overwhelmed with the consciousness of the peril in which she stands, and of the awfulness of the presence into which she is coming. But there comes a word from the Saviour's lips, which from any other lips would be a repression, only He was so kind and so loving and so gentle that there must have been an inner purpose in that—"It is not meet to take the children's bread and to cast it to dogs." Ah! but out of the heart of the deep and terrible rebuke, as it seemed to be, did she gather courage, and the downcast eye was uplifted and the stammering tongue loosened, and she said, "Truth Lord; yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table."

See the tumultuous crowd there. There is the poor woman that has had an issue of blood twelve years, and that has spent all her living upon physicians "and grew nothing better," as the simple narrative says, "but rather worse"—and she comes to Jesus, and the crowd is round Him, and she is unable to get at Him, but her faith is strong, and she says to herself, "I shall never see the glance of His eye that speaketh love, I shall never hear the tender voice, saying, 'Be thou healed,' but there is the hem of his garment; if I may touch His garment I shall be whole."

Oh, faith brings arguments out of repulsings, and encourages itself even in the midst of circumstances that would appal hearts in which the principle of faith is not. It is like fire, the great alchemist, that transmutes everything into its own substance, sends up ardent heat, and transforms the coal into bright and brilliant flame.

I should like you to take home from the meeting a

RENEWAL OF YOUR FAITH

in Christ. Your circumstances are various; I know that, but faith is a heritage for everybody. Your conditions are various; I know that, but faith is a heritage forever. Oh, I should like to gain entrance into each heart this morning with the same message of consolation and rejoicing—into the heart of the contrite man, into the heart of the perplexed yonder, into the heart of the humble, into the heart of the bereaved, into the heart of the dying, with the same message of consolation from on high.

We are on the Mount of Moriah, we have not come down from the summit of the mountain yet, and Abraham, before he left it on that memorable day in his history, baptized it afresh and called it "Jehovah Jireh"—"The Lord will provide, the Lord will provide." Oh take that comfort to yourself. What trouble is there, what anguish felt or feared that can get out of the way of the comprehensive comfort of these blessed words, "The Lord will provide."

Is the barb in thy heart? Doth mortal sickness assail thee? Has death gotten hold on thee with a lover's eagerness to his bride? "The Lord will provide" songs in the night of thy trouble; calm waters—a safe passage among the swellings of Jordan; music and welcome in the everlasting home of the departed.

Hath death wounded thee more keenly because he darted at thee from a mother's grave, because he hath stilled the heart that used to beat, hushed the loving voice that thrilled thee over when it spake?—"The Lord will provide" sweet relief of tears and the calm satisfaction of assured faith and everlasting recognition in the region where love cannot die.

Art thou perplexed about some question of duty or about some question of destiny, whether thou shalt do this or that, whether thou shalt go there or thither? Dost thou listen for some authoritative voice or to have some constraining word? Does the future trouble thee about thy family? Does thy business increase and harrass thee?—"The Lord will provide!" If your faith can but rely,

YOU ENLIST THE POWER YOU TRUST.

Are you anxious about God's cause, and with Elijah are you saying, "I, only I, am left as the prophet of the Lord, and Baal's prophets are four hundred and fifty men"—"The Lord will provide." Do not you think he can take care of His own, and if He choose any day he could show thee in the secret places of the heritage seven thousand that have never yet bowed the knee to Baal?

Are you praying for a revival? The Holy Ghost is no monopoly of any privileged class, does not wait upon any peculiar lips, is no exclusive heritage of this or that or the other creed or system or class of individuals. Oh, if the people were but willing it would soon be the day of God's power; if our hearts were only believing what should hinder a Pentecost here?

And now are you all personally contrite, feeling the burden of your own sin, mourning in Zion which is not the place for mourning, where there ought to be no sorrow, where the Jubilate should never dwindle down into Misereres, where there should be a continual rejoicing in God—but you are mourning in Zion because there is bitterness in your conscience and a burden in your heart, and because there is no beauty in the landscape, for there is no beauty in the soul, nad creation is dark because of an absent God—my brethren "the Lord will provide," nay, He has provided, Christ has died and lives to die no more. Aye, on His father's throne from His elevation He speaks to you, yes, to you, as if there were not another contrite heart in the universe, and as if all His wealth and love, waited to be poured upon you.

This is the latest message by my lips to-day. "Be not afraid, only believe," only believe. May the Lord help you for the Redeemer's sake, Amen.

A Significant Fact in Connection with the recent discussions as to the propriety of Christians being members of masonic lodges is the action of a lodge of Freemasons at Evansville, Ind. Mr. Chainey, the pastor of a Unitarian church in that city, adopted rationalistic views and promulgated them in a sermon he recently preached. His hearers came away convinced that the preacher was little removed from infidelity. Mr. Chainey was a Freemason, and had been the chaplain of his lodge. A meeting of the lodge was promptly called after the delivery of his sermon, and he was expelled from the order on account of "his thoughts, doubts, and opinions."

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

SINGLE COPIES

can most conveniently be obtained through newsdealers. Any complaint that the CHRISTIAN HERALD cannot be obtained from a particular newsdealer is promptly attended to if we are given the name and street address of the dealer who does not keep it for sale.

Scores of our readers take the trouble to send us the kindest expressions of their good will. Hundreds more agree cordially in what they say. Now will each of these good friends get us a new subscriber? We may say to persons to whom the commission is an inducement, that we believe our terms are more liberal than those of any other paper.

CURRENT EVENTS.

We have to thank those of our readers who have written us on the subject of our Political Paragraphs for their valuable suggestions, offered in kindly and courteous manner, for their good wishes, and for the commendatory terms in which they speak of the general character of the journal. In reference to our politics, we may state that it is not within the scope of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to assume a partisan attitude in secular affairs. We seek under Current Events to mention important passing occurrences, which we endeavor to do impartially and without party bias. While the suggestions made to us will have our careful attention, our readers may rest assured THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will abstain from taking any part in the present contest.

The Life of Gen. Hancock, Published Last week by Messrs. D. Appleton & Co., contains the famous correspondence which passed nearly four years ago between Generals Hancock and Sherman. The letters now published completely vindicate the Democratic candidate from the serious charge made against him. It was said that General Hancock's soldierly instincts led him to consider the military branch of the public service superior to the civil power, and that it was in consequence a dangerous experiment to place him in the White House. As proof of this allegation it was stated that during the critical period which preceded the inauguration of President Hayes, General Hancock had declared his readiness to oppose the inauguration, if called upon to do so by Mr. Tilden. The General's letters prove the charge to have been utterly groundless, and show that he protested against the army being dragged into a controversy of a purely political and party character. As these letters were written at a period when the question of his nomination was not before the public, they may be regarded as in no sense campaign documents, but as expressing the genuine opinions and principles of the writer. This vindication will reassure those people who had been alarmed by the thought that General Hancock, if elected, might prove a military dictator instead of a constitutional President.

The New York State Committees of both Political parties held important meetings last week. The Democratic Committee met August 27th, and after considerable discussion resolved on summoning a State convention, which will assemble at Saratoga September 28th. This decision is regarded as a concession to the Tammany wing of the party, and it is believed will lead to an arrangement being made which will secure harmony in the State. A deputation from the committee waited on Mr. Kelly, and, having had an interview with him, reported to the meeting. In consequence of the calling of a State convention, the call already issued by Tammany has been withdrawn.

The Republican Committee decided that the calling of a convention was unnecessary, and nominated Charles J. Folger as Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals to succeed the late Chief Judge Church. Mr. Folger has held the office temporarily since Mr. Church's death.

The New Liquor Law in Maine is of a Thoroughly stringent character. The act against saloons was evaded by private clubs, and the law against purchasing liquor was thwarted by giving the liquor away, the receiver purchasing some other commodity at a proportionately higher price than usual. The new law makes the gift of liquor punishable, and enacts that any person found intoxicated even in his own house shall be imprisoned for thirty days for the first offence, and three months for the second.

A New Colonization Scheme has been Inaugurated, and Mr. Thomas Hughes, the well-known English author, is now on a visit to this country to aid in its realization. Last spring an English company purchased 400,000 acres of land on the Cumberland plateau in Tennessee, and has expended half a million dollars in laying out a town, etc. Mr. Hughes anticipates the speedy filling up of the colony from England, of men who will be an acquisition to America, the younger sons and their families, many of them idly waiting for positions in the army and the learned professions. He says that the colony will be ruled with a high moral hand against intemperance and kindred vices.

The Stewart Memorial Buildings at Garden City will be of a useful as well as of an imposing character. It is stated on reliable authority that the widow of Mr. A. T. Stewart, the dry goods millionaire, and Judge Hilton have caused endowments to the amount of probably three million dollars to be made, to establish a collegiate institution at Garden City for youth of both sexes. One building is now nearly completed, which is said to be the finest structure of its kind in America, and to accommodate 500 students. Two other buildings of equal capacity will be erected near it, in a park of sixty acres. A building for young women, to accommodate 300, will also be erected in grounds of 20 acres. An Episcopal divinity school is also planned. The whole to be transferred to the charge of the Bishop of Long Island when completed.

A Christian Teacher's Devotion to His Friend is described in some reminiscences of the war recently published. One Sunday a small party of soldiers entered a church near Washington, and one of their number asked that his comrades might be received into the church by baptism. He had been instrumental while in the camp in their conversion, and they desired to make public profession of their faith. Shortly afterward the young man's term of service expired, and he returned home, hoping, he said, to serve his country in some other way. But not long afterward he was in Washington again in his old uniform. On inquiry it was found that after he left the army he had been conducting a Bible class, among other efforts to be useful, and one of the members had been drafted. Knowing that the young man chosen was unconverted, and was besides, the sole support of his mother and sister, the noble fellow had gone to the selectmen and had effected the substitution of his own name for that of his unconverted friend. He fell in the seven days' battle before Richmond, having thus given his life for his friend. A striking illustration of John 15 : 13.

A Personal Friend of the Rev. William Taylor, has kindly pointed out an error in the biographical sketch of that minister which was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 19th, and added some interesting particulars The writer says: "Mr. Taylor was born an reared at the base of the North Mountain a range of the Alleghany, in Rockbridg County, Virginia, and learned the tanner' trade in a tannery belonging to his father Stuart Taylor, who for a number of years was member of the Presbyterian Church, but wa converted at a camp-meeting held at the Col Sulphur Springs, in Rockbridge County, an united with the Methodist Episcopal Church i 1833, under the ministry of Rev. W. B. Edwards D.D., then as now a member of the Baltimor Conference, and subsequently was licensed as local preacher, and died a few years ago in hol triumph.

"His son William was converted in ear youth and joined the Methodist Episcop Church, held an exhorter's license for some tim and subsequently was licensed as a preacher, an joined the Baltimore Conference as an itine ant, and by that body was assigned, at its a nual session held in Staunton, Va., March, 18 as a missionary to San Francisco, California.

"He married his noble and estimable wife Botetourt County, Virginia. The writer of th knew the family intimately and well, and fe gratified that he was a member of the Quarter Conference of old Lexington Circuit, Baltim Conference, which started him out in the min terial field. Noble man, go on, and may G bless and protect you to the end of the world

The Death of Gen. Albert J. Myer is nounced. He died at Buffalo on August 24 He was born at Newburgh, N. Y., in 1828. studied in the medical class at Geneva Colle and received his M.D. degree from the Univ sity of Buffalo. He served with distinct through the war, having been first attached the army as surgeon in 1854. He attained rank of general in 1866. He devoted much att tion to the department of the Signal Serv and introduced a full course of signals at W Point and Annapolis. By the act of Febru 9th, 1870, he was charged with the special du of the observation and giving notice by telegr and signals of the approach and force of sto on the Northern lakes and seacoast, at the itary posts in the interior, and at other point the States and Territories. From this act he rived his name of "Old Probabilities;" by w he was universally known.

Major Whittle and Mr. and Mrs. McGrhan have been spending a short time among Scottish lakes and hills. When in Edinb they took part in some of the noon prayer-m ings, and in the Sunday evening service at Free Assembly Hall. They intend to pa brief visit to Paris and Ireland, and to re to America this month.

The Oneida Community Announced a ago that in deference to public opinion the moral practices and mode of life it had ado would be discontinued. Since then Mr. N the founder of the community, has remove Canada with a few of the members, and ha tled near Niagara, where it is believed he int starting a new community on the same p ples as the one at Oneida. The sudden an expected submission of the community was it has been discovered, altogether voluntar spontaneous. A number of young people i Oneida establishment had been led to se sinfulness of their lives, and were resolv make an exposure if Noyes had not agre dissolve the community. It may be hoped the Canadian authorities will interfere to vent so disgraceful a scandal being plant the soil of the Dominion.

Scene of Misery of a Peculiarly Distress- character was revealed in a Philadelphian use on August 24th. A Christian visitor who going from house to house in the lowest part he city entered a house in St. John Street, and e found a family sunk into a state of wretch- ess which only drink can produce. On a e in one room lay the partially decomposed y of a little girl who had died some days pre- sly; on a bench in another room lay a little six years old in all the agony of the last es of diphtheria, and on the floor was the er of the two children in a filthy state of cication. The father was in another part f the house, and was also intoxicated. The le had been drunk for several days, and their children sickened and died, they had singing, dancing, and fighting. So deplor- a state of things is only an extreme case in that might be furnished any day by Chris- workers in our great cities.

Desperate Combat Between a Man and a ey occurred at Chicago, on August 26th, in all zoological garden in State Street. ng the animals exhibited was a large and s creature, being a cross between the n and ordinary monkey, who managed to his chain and attacked a keeper named n, who attempted to secure him in his The monkey sprang upon him and fast- is teeth and claws in his lower limbs, tear- em in a fearful manner before assistance be rendered. The monkey eventually d into the streets, where he was pursued ot. Martin was removed to a doctor's and his numerous wounds were sewed up. fered greatly from loss of blood, and it is his injuries will terminate fatally. This te battle for life is a type of the spiritual that sometimes occurs in the soul of a o has been the slave of vice. His enemy im in its clutches and will not let him out a struggle so severe that only Christ's an deliver him.

Telephone as a Life-Saving Apparatus. entific journal announces the discovery telephone may be used to give alarm in the collection of combustible gases in allow the men to escape. By a well- principle of sound it is possible to fix a r a telephone in such a way that the n of the sound due to a greater or less re of gases with the air of the mine arn the manager of the state of the at- e in the workings.

Man's Future.—Bishop Warren Com- a sermon recently by relating the follow- lent: "I was walking up a mountain other day, and overtook an old man p the same road. He apologized for ertaken by a tenderfoot like myself, and he was getting old and infirm, and his days would soon be over. 'What said to him. 'After you have got mountains here, will you mount celes- ts?' 'No,' he replied. 'When I die shovelled into a hole in the ground, and be the end of me.'" That prospect e been a very gloomy one to the aged but even that is bright compared with le condition God has warned us is re- the unbelieving and impenitent after Nesting Adventure which Occurred s ago has been described recently by a , when a boy, took part in the expedi- was fond of climbing the rocks near to look for sea-gulls' eggs, and on one e provided himself with a stout rope het to enable him to explore a precip- which his father had strictly forbid- approach. The rope was made fast, y lowered by two companions until he vel with the coveted nests. He was steady himself, and for the purpose hatchet to cut a footing in the rock. ick, he accidentally caught the rope atchet, and nearly severed it. He seconds by the injured rope, but to his horror he saw that the strands of which it was made were rapidly untwisting, and in a little while he would be dashed to pieces on the rocks below.

The terror of that moment made a life-long impression on him, and the guilt of his disobedience seemed more prominent than the imminence of his danger. Happily his companions heard his signal for help and rescued him before the rope broke, but it was a question of seconds between him and death. The boy's perilous position is an illustration of the state in which impenitent sinners live. A worse fate than death menaces them, their hold on life is equally precarious, but the Savior who offers them rescue is able to save to the uttermost all who ask Him for salvation.

The Salvation Army in Cleveland, O., has met with a cordial reception. The Cleveland Leader prints a long account of Mr. Railton's arrival there and full reports of his addresses. The commissioner preached in the square and in the Tabernacle, and large congregations were gathered at both services. The Leader says: "The remarks made by Mr. Railton attacked no one, and undoubtedly were a surprise to his hearers, as was also his delivery. He simply laid before the people in a plain manner the fact that sin was broadcast throughout the land, and in order to prevent its spread a grand united effort must be made that will reach to the hearts of that class of people to whom words of a Christian nature are rarely spoken. Evidently his desire was to impress the people not so much with the fact that they needed salvation themselves, as that sin is the reigning power throughout the world, and that there is plenty for earnest Christians to do.

"In speaking, Mr. Railton makes no attempt at high-flown oratory. He speaks in a natural manner, uses plain but correct language, and assumes no oddity or peculiarity of speech. He simply does the best he can to advance the cause he is interested in, and in doing so evidently wishes to draw attention to his cause rather than to himself. His remarks were listened to throughout with the greatest attention, and undoubtedly he has sown seed which in the future will aid him greatly in his work."

A Precious Carpet was Destroyed last Spring in San Francisco. It had covered the floor of one of the rooms in the Mint, and had been used for five years. The dust of the precious metals used in the coinage had during that period daily fallen upon it, and when it was taken up the authorities had it cut in small pieces and burned in pans. The ashes were subjected to the process employed with mining dust, and they realized two thousand five hundred dollars. Thus the carpet after years of wear was more precious than when it was new. It is an illustration of the lives of some Christians. The discipline they endure in the world chastens and purifies them, and when God tries them they "come forth as gold" (Job 23 : 10).

A Murderess Driven to Surrender by Her dreams.—A poorly clad woman, whose countenance was peculiar, went to a police officer in New York, on August 25th, and said she wished to give herself up as a vagrant. The officer at once recognized her as the once notorious Fanny Wright, who, eight or ten years ago, was a disreputable character well known to the police, and possessed of great physical strength and ferocity. One night some years ago a new police officer, named McChesney, attempted to arrest her for disorderly conduct, and, becoming infuriated, she drew a knife from her dress, slashed it with all her strength across the policeman's throat, so that the blow nearly severed the officer's head from the body, and he died a few moments later. She was captured after the murder, and, after trial, was sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment, but after one year in prison she was released on a technicality. She has since been constantly subject to horrible dreams, in which the scene of the murder was presented to her, and finally broke down under mental depression.

THE FRIENDS OF JESUS.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you."—John 15 : 14.

The Best of Friends—Our Lord's Friendship a Model—Friendship like a Pair of Scales—The Highest Honor in the World—Obedience the Test of Friendship—I. The Kind of Obedience Christ Requests—1. It must be Active—2. Continuous—3. Universal—4. Rendered to Christ Himself—5. In a Friendly Spirit—II. No Friendship without Obedience—He who does not Obey Christ does not give Him His Proper Place—Is not of one Mind with Him—Is an Enemy though a Loud Professor—III. Closest Obedience brings most Intimate Friendship—Those who bow in the House of Rimmon—IV. Obedience the most Friendly Act a Man can do—The Test, not Munificence—Nor Self-mortification—Nor Monasticism—Nor Public Service—The Practical Outcome.

OUR Lord Jesus Christ is beyond all comparison the best of friends: a friend in need, a friend indeed. "Friend!" said Socrates, "there is no friend!" but Socrates did not know our Lord Jesus, or he would have added, "except the Saviour." In the heart of our Lord Jesus there burns such friendship toward us that all other forms of it are as dim candles to the sun.

"Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friend." An ordinary man has gone as far as ever he can when he has died for his friend; and yet he would have died anyhow, so that in dying for his friend he does but pay, somewhat beforehand, a debt which must inevitably have been discharged a little further on. With Christ there was no necessity to die at all, and this, therefore, places His love and His friendship alone by itself. He died who needed not to die, and died in agony when He might have lived in glory: never did man give such proof of friendship as this.

Let the friendship of our Lord to us stand as the model of our friendship to Him. It cannot be so in all respects, because our situations and conditions are different; His must always be the love of the greater to the less, the love of the benefactor to one in need, the love of the Redeemer to those who are bought with a price; but, setting those points aside, the whole tone and spirit of our Lord's friendship are such that the more closely we can imitate it the better. Such friendship as His should be reflected in a friendship most hearty and self-sacrificing on our part.

Our Lord does not, I think, in this text, speak to us about His being our friend, but about our being His friends. He is "the friend of sinners;" but sinners are not His friends till their hearts are changed. "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you," we are not His friends till then. His love to us is entirely of Himself, but friendship needs something from us. Friendship is like a pair of scales: there must be something to balance on the other side; there must be a return of kindly feeling from the person loved. Jesus tells us here that if we are to be his friends we must do whatsoever He commands us, and that out of love to Him.

Beloved, it is

THE HIGHEST HONOR IN THE WORLD

to be called the friend of Christ. There is no title surely that excels in dignity that which was worn by Abraham, who was called "the friend of God." Lord Brooke was so delighted with the friendship of Sir Philip Sydney that he ordered to be engraved upon his tomb nothing but this, "Here lies the friend of Sir Philip Sydney." There is beauty in such a feeling, but yet it is a small matter compared with being able to say, "Here lives a friend of Christ."

Beloved, in what a light this sets obedience to Christ's commandments. I cannot help at this early moment in the sermon noticing how the doctrine of our text transfigures obedience, and makes it the joy and glory of life. How precious it is, for it is a better seal to friendship than the possession of the largest gifts and influence. Christ does not say, "Ye are my friends, if ye rise to a position of respectability among men, or honor in the Church." No, however poor you may be, and those to whom He spake these words were very poor, He says, "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you."

I. Let us notice first, that our Lord Himself tells us from those who call themselves His friends. True friends are eager to know what they can do to please the objects of their love; let us gladly hearken to what our adorable Lord now speaks to the select circle of His chosen. He asks of one and all obedience. None of us are exempted from doing His commandments. However lofty or however lowly our condition, we must obey; if our talent be but one, we must obey, and if we have ten, still we must obey. There can be no friendship with Christ unless we are willing, each one, to yield Him hearty, loyal service.

WHAT OBEDIENCE HE REQUESTS

1. It must be active obedience, notice that. "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." Some think it is quite sufficient if they avoid what He forbids. Abstinence from evil is a great part of righteousness, but it is not enough for friendship. If a man can say, "I am not a drunkard, I am not dishonest, I am not unchaste, I am not a violator of the Sabbath, I am not a liar;" so far so good, but such righteousness does not exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees, and they cannot enter the kingdom.

It is well if you do not wilfully transgress, but if you are to be Christ's friends there must be far more than this. It would be a poor friendship which only said, "I am your friend, and to prove it, I don't insult you, I don't rob you, I don't speak evil of you." Surely there must be more positive evidence to certify friendship.

The Lord Jesus Christ lays great stress upon positive duties: it is, "if ye do whatsoever I command you." At the last day he will say, "I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink." In that memorable twenty-fifth of Matthew nothing is said about negative virtues, but positive actions are cited and dwelt upon in detail. You know it is an old English saying, "He is my friend who grinds at my mill." That is to say, friendship shows itself in doing helpful acts, which prove sincerity.

2. We are clear, from the wording of the text, that the obedience Christ expects from us is continuous. He does not say, "If you sometimes do what I command you—if you do it on Sundays, for instance—if you do what I command you in your place of worship, that will suffice; but no, we are to abide in him and keep his statutes even unto the end. I am not now preaching works as the way of salvation, but as the evidences of fellowship, which is quite another thing. We must seek in every place, at all times, and under all circumstances, to do as Jesus bids us, out of a cheerful spirit of reverence to him.

3. This obedience must also be universal. "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." No sooner is anything discovered to be the subject of a command than the man who is a true friend of Christ says, "I will do it," and he does it. He does not pick and choose which precept he will keep and which he will neglect, for this is self-will and not obedience. I have known some professors err greatly in this matter. They have been very strict over one point, and they have blamed everybody who did not come up to their strictness, talking as if that one duty fulfilled the whole law.

Straining at gnats has been a very leading business with many; they have bought a choice assortment of strainers of the very finest net to get out all the gnats from their cup, but at the same time, on another day they have opened their mouths and swallowed a camel without a qualm. This will not do: the test is, "If ye do whatsoever I command you."

I do not mean that little things are unimportant: far from it. If there be a gnat that Christ bids you strain at, strain it out with great diligence; do not let a midge escape you if He bids you remove it. The smallest command of Christ may often be the most important; and I will tell you why. Some things are great, evidently great, and for many reasons even a hypocritical professor will attend to them, but the test may lie in the minor points, which hypocrites do not take the trouble to notice, since no human tongue would praise them for so doing.

A domestic servant might place the breakfast on the table, and feel that she had done her duty, but if her mistress told her to place the salt at the corner, and she did not, she would be asked the cause of her neglect. Suppose she replied to her mistress, "I did not think it needful; I placed the breakfast before you, but a little salt was too trifling a matter for me to trouble about." Her mistress might answer, "But I told you to be sure and put out the salt-cellar. Mind you do so to-morrow." Next morning there is no salt, and the maid says she did not see the use of setting it on the table. Her mistress is displeased, and tells her that her wish must be carried out. Will she not be a very foolish and vexatious girl if she refuses to do so, because she does not see the use of it? I think it is likely that the young woman would have to find another situation before long, for such conduct is very annoying.

So it is with those professors who say, "I have attended to the main things, and what I neglect is quite a minor matter." Such are not even good servants; friends they never can be. I beseech you, dear brethren, labor after universal obedience. "Whatsoever he saith to you, do it." Only by an earnest endeavor to carry out the whole of His will can you live in happy fellowship with Him, and be indeed His friends.

4. Note well, that this obedience is to be rendered as to Christ Himself. Put the emphasis on the little word I: "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." We are to do these things because Jesus commands them. Does not the royal person of our Lord cast a very strong light upon the necessity of obedience? When we refuse to obey we refuse to do what the Lord Himself commands. When the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God and our Redeemer, is denied obedience

IT IS TREASON.

How can rebels against the King be his Majesty's friends?

5. To close this first point, it appears that our Lord would have us obey Him out of a friendly spirit. Obedience to Christ as if we were forced to do it under pains and penalties would be of no worth as a proof of friendship; every one can see that. He speaks not of slaves, but of friends; he would not have us perform duties from fear of punishment or love of reward; that which He can accept of His friends must be the fruit of love. His will must be our law because His person is our delight.

Some professors need to be whipped to their duties; they must hear stirring sermons, and attend exciting meetings, and live under pressure; but those who are Christ's friends need no spur but love. "The love of Christ constraineth us." True hearts do what Jesus bids them without flogging and dogging, urging and forcing. Constrained virtue is spoiled in the making, as many a piece of earthenware is cracked in the baking. The wine of our obedience must flow freely from the ripe cluster of the soul's love, or it will not be fit for the royal cup. When duty becomes delight and precepts are as sweet as promises, then are we Christ's friends, and not till then.

II. Having thus set forth what kind of obedience Christ requests, I now notice, in the second place, that our Lord leads us to gather from this sentence that

THOSE WHO DO NOT OBEY

Him are no friends of His. He may yet look upon them and be their friend by changing their hearts and forgiving their sins; but as yet they are no friends of His, for a man who does not obey Christ does not give the Saviour His proper place, and this is an unfriendly deed. If I l a friend I am very careful that, if he has h anywhere, he shall certainly have due res from me. He will be higher in my esteem in the regard of any one else. He who is t Christ's friend delights to honor Him as a g king, but he who will not yield Him His s eign rights is a traitor and not a friend.

He who does not do His commandments not be Christ's friend, because he is not o mind with Christ: that is evident. Can walk together except they be agreed? friendship exists not between those who upon first principles, and there can be no p of agreement between Jesus Christ and the who will not obey Him; for he in fact "Lord Jesus, thy pure and holy will is o ious to me; thy sweet and gracious comm are a weariness to me." What friendship here? It is not possible.

He who obeys not Christ cannot be Ch friend, though he may profess to be. He a very high and loud professor, and for that he may be all the more an enemy of the cros when men see this man walking according own lusts they cry out, "Thou also was Jesus of Nazareth," and they attribute faults to his religion, and straightway he blaspheme the name of Christ. Through consistent conduct of our Lord's pro friends his cause is more hindered than b thing else. Suppose you and I had som intimate associate who was found drunk street, or committing burglary or theft, we not feel disgraced by his conduct? W was brought before the magistrate wou like to have it said, "This person is the friend of So-and-so?" Oh, you would your face, and beg your neighbors never t tion it. For such a fellow to be known friend would compromise your name an acter.

We say this even weeping, that Jesus name is compromised, and His honor nished among men by many who wear th of Christian without having the spirit of such cannot be His dear companions. the wounds which Jesus has received house of His friends. When Cæsar was slain by the daggers of his friend trust he found treason. Those who he had spared, spared not his life. those who under the garb of Christianit the Lord afresh, and put him to an open Nothing burns Christ's cheek like a Ju and He has had many such.

Those that obey Him not cannot b by Jesus as his friends, for that would Him indeed. Time was—I know not now—when if any man wanted to be count, or to get an honorable title, he to pay so much at Rome into the E chequer, and he could be made a noble The titles thus purchased were neither ble to those who gave nor to those who them. Whatever His pretended vicar our Lord Himself sells no dignities.

Would you have our Lord stand up "The drunkard is my friend?" W hear him say, "That fraudulent bankr intimate companion?" Would you h claim friendly companionship with th and profane? A man is known by pany; what would be thought of Je intimate associates were men of loo and unrighteous principles? To g them for their good is one thing, to m His friends is another. We may, then the text negatively, "Ye are not my ye do not the things which I comman

III. Our third observation is:

THOSE WHO BEST OBEY CHRI

are on the best of terms with Him. my friends," he seems to say, "and I me, enjoying practical personal frien daily intercourse with me, when you obey." Some of you know by perso ence, brothers and sisters, that you c in holy converse with Christ unless

His commandments. There is no feeling of communion between our souls and Christ when we are conscious of having done wrong and yet are not sorry for it.

If we know that we have erred, as we often do, and our hearts break because we have grieved our Beloved, and we go and tell Him our grief and confess our sin, we are still His friends, and He kisses away our tears, saying, "I know your weakness; I willingly blot out your offences. There is no breach of friendship between us; I will manifest myself to you still."

When we know that we are wrong, and feel no softening of heart about it, then we cannot pray, we cannot speak with the Beloved, and we cannot walk with Him as His friends. Familiarity with Jesus ceases when we become familiar with known sin.

If, again, knowing any act to be wrong we persevere in it, there cannot be any happy friendship between us and our Saviour. If conscience has told you, dear brother, that such and such a thing ought to be given up, and you continue in it, the next time you are on your knees you will feel yourself greatly hampered, and when you sit down before your open Bible and hope to have communion with Christ, as you have formerly enjoyed it, you will find that he has withdrawn himself, and will not be found by you.

Some Christians will never get into full fellowship with Christ because they neglect to study His Word and search out what His will is. It ought to be a serious work with every Christian, especially in commencing his career, to find what is the will of his Lord on all subjects. Half the Christian people in the world are content to ask, "What is the rule of our Church?" That is not the question: the point is, "What is the will of Christ?" Some plead, "My father and mother before me did so." I sympathize in a measure with that feeling: filial reverence commands admiration; but yet in spiritual things we are to call no man "father," but make the Lord Jesus our master and exemplar. God has not placed your conscience in your mother's keeping, nor has He committed to your father the right or the power to stand responsible for you; every man must bear his own burden and render his own account; search ye the Scriptures for yourselves, each one of you, and follow no man but that which is inspired.

"Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." Oh, beloved,

SEE TO THIS.

Under all the crosses, and losses and trials of life there is no comfort more desirable than the confidence that you have aimed at doing your Lord's will. If a man suffers for Christ's sake while steadily pursuing the course of holiness, he may rejoice in such suffering. Losses borne in the defence of the right and the true are gains. Jesus is never nearer his friends than when they gladly bear shame for His sake.

The consequences which follow from our doing right belong to God. Abhor the theory that for the sake of a great good you may do a little wrong. I have heard men say, ay, and Christian men, too, "If I were strictly to follow my convictions I should have to leave a post of great usefulness, and therefore I remain where I am and quiet my conscience as well as I can. I should lose opportunities of doing good which I now possess, if I were to put in practice all I advise, and therefore I remain in a position which I could not justify on any other ground." Is this according to the mind of Jesus? Is this kindness to thy friend? How many bow in the house of Rimmon, and hope that the Lord will have mercy upon His servants in this thing. We shall see if it will be so.

Thousands of people sin because it seems so advantageous, so wise, so necessary, so sure to turn out well. Hear what Christ says: "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." If you do evil that good may come, you cannot walk with Him, but if your heart is set toward His statutes you shall find Him loving and kind and taking up His abode with you.

IV. Fourthly, by our text we are taught that for Jesus is to obey Him: "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." Rich men have thought to do the most friendly act possible toward Christ by giving an immense sum to build a church, or to found almshouses or schools. If they are believers, and have done this thing as an act of obedience to Christ's law of stewardship, they have well done, and the more of such munificence the better, but where splendid benefactions are given out of ostentation, or from the idea that some merit will be gained by the consecration of a large amount of wealth, the whole business is unacceptable. If a man should give all the substance of his house for love it would utterly be contemned. Jesus asks not lavish expenditure, but ourselves. He has made this the token of true love: "If ye do whatsoever I command you."

THE MOST FRIENDLY ACT A MAN CAN DO

Others have imagined that they could show their friendliness to Christ by some remarkable action of self-mortification. Among Romanists, especially in the old time, it was believed that misery and merit went together, and so men tortured themselves that they might please God. They went for many a day without washing themselves or their clothes, and fancied that they thus acquired the odor of sanctity. I do not believe that Jesus thinks a man any more his friend because he is dirty.

Some have put on a hair shirt, or have worn a chain girdle, which made raw wounds. I do not think that the kind Lord Jesus counts these things to be friendly acts. Ask any humane person whether he would be gratified by knowing that a friend wore a hair shirt for his sake, and he would answer, "Pray, let the poor creature wear whatever is most comfortable to him, and that will please me best." The loving Jesus takes no delight in pain and discomfort: the maceration of the body is no doctrine of His. John the Baptist might be an ascetic, but certainly Jesus was not: He came eating and drinking, a man among men. He did not come to demand the rigors of a hermitage or a monastery, else He had never been seen at feasts.

When we hear of the nuns of St. Ann sleeping bolt upright in their coffins, we take no particular satisfaction in their doing so; a kind heart would beg them to go to bed. I went over a monastery some time ago, and over each bed was a little cat o'-nine-tails, which I sincerely hope was used to the satisfaction of the possessor, but I did not copy the idea, and buy a couple for my sons, neither have I sent one to each of my special friends, for I should never ask them to flog themselves as

A PROOF OF FRIENDSHIP.

Our Lord cannot be gratified by self-inflicted, self-invented tortures. These things are will-worship, which is no worship. You may fast forty days if you like, but you will gain no merit by it. Jesus Christ has not demanded this as the gauge of friendship, neither will he regard us as His friends for this. He says, "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you," but He does not command you to starve, or to wear sackcloth, or to shut yourselves up in a cell; pride invents these things, but grace teaches obedience.

Certain persons have thought it would be the noblest form of holy service to enter into brotherhoods and sisterhoods. They fancied that they would be Christ's friends indeed if they joined "The Society of Jesus." I have sometimes asked myself whether it might not be well to form a league of Christian men all banded together, to live alone for Jesus and to give themselves up entirely and wholly to His work; but assuredly the formation of guilds, sisterhoods, or brotherhoods other than the great brotherhood of the Church of God, is a thing never contemplated in the New Testament; you shall find no foreshadowing of Franciscans and Dominicans there. All godly women were sisters of mercy, and all Christlike men were of the Society of Jesus, but of monastic and conventional vows we read nothing.

Why is it that people try to do something which the Lord Jesus never commanded? A schoolmaster will suffer me to appeal to him on this point. If he said to a boy in the school, "Now is the time for you to take your slate and attend to arithmetic," and the boy instead fetched his copy-book, would he not ask if he had understood him? If after a few minutes he finds the boy writing, does he say, "You have written that line very well?" Not at all. It is small matter whether the writing be well or ill done, for to be writing at all when he was told to be ciphering is a gross act of insubordination. So is it with you and me. We may do something else, and do it splendidly well, and other people may say, "What a pious man he is;" but if we do not the Lord's will we shall not be His friends. We may wear a piece of leather for a sandal, and brown serge for a garment, and forswear boots and coats, but there is no grace in apparel; excellence lies in doing what Christ has commanded.

Some think it a very friendly act toward Christ to attend many religious services in a consecrated building. They are at matins, and vespers, and feasts, and fasts without number. Some of us prefer to have our religious services each day in our own homes, and it will be a dreadful thing when family prayer is given up for public services: but a number of people think little of family devotion, they must needs repair to the parish church or to some other temple made with hands; but let no man dream that Jesus is thus made our friend.

We are not to forsake the assembling of ourselves together as the manner of some is, it is well to be found meeting with God's people as often as we can; but still you may multiply your sacraments and increase your ceremonies, and you may attend to this service, and to the other service, until your heart is worn away with grinding at the mill of outward religion. Ye are Christ's friends, if ye do whatsoever He commands ye: that is a better test than early communion or daily mass.

THE PRACTICAL OUTCOME

of it all is this: examine every question as to duty by the light of this one inquiry: Will this be a friendly action to Christ? If I do this shall I act as Christ's friend? Will my conduct honor Him? Then I am glad. If it will dishonor Him I will have nothing to do with it. Set each distinct action, as far as you are able, in the scales, and let this be the weight: Is it a friendly action toward my Redeemer?

Suppose that to-morrow you are brought into temptation by being asked to do something questionable, decide it this way: if Jesus could come in at that moment and show you His hands and His feet, how would you act in His sight? Behave as you would act under the realized presence of the Well-beloved. You would not do anything unkind to Him, would you? Certainly you would not do anything to grieve Him if you saw Him before your eyes. Well, keep Him always before you.

You will want much of the Holy Spirit's anointing to do this. May God give it to you. Live, dear friends, as if Christ would come at once and detect you in the very act. Do that which you would not be ashamed of if the next instant you should see the Lord sitting on the throne of His glory, and calling you before His bar. Thus living, you shall delight yourself in the abundance of peace.

"So shall your walk be close with God,
Calm and serene your frame;
So purer light shall mark the road
That leads you to the Lamb."

Obedience will gladden you with the blissful presence of your Lord, and in that presence you shall find fulness of joy. You shall be the envied of all wise men, for you shall be the beloved of the Lord; and your pathway, if it be not always smooth, shall be always safe; for Jesus never leaves His friend, and He will never leave you, but He will keep you even to the end. May this be my happy case and yours. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURES READ BEFORE SERMON—John 19.]

TAKEN OUT OF THE GUTTER.

A true Incident of Life on the London Streets.

By Dr. T. J. Barnardo, F.R.C.S.

While no one who knows the facts of our Babylon will doubt the truth of the assertion that the juvenile "wastrels" of London streets are alas! still to be reckoned by their thousands, he who would seek to know them as they are, must search for them chiefly in those haunts where in bad weather they find shelter from the storm, or seek a precarious rest at night, or where, if in "luck," they obtain the coveted "doss," as the bed in the threepenny lodging-house is called.

The former of these coverts are artfully selected as likely to escape observation by the dreaded guardians of the peace, and are not generally discoverable unless by patient search directed by experience. Nor is discovery all that is necessary, for the man who would thoroughly investigate the case of these poor waifs must have some object other than mere curiosity when in search of the habitat of the genus "street-boy." None is so suspicious as the young street arab, and none so unwilling as he to accept as genuine those professions, so easily made, of disinterested philanthropy. In any case, the pioneer in this terra incognita should be prepared for strange revelations, some of which will grow more perplexing as he advances in experience and knowledge of the class; and make him often ask himself in wonder, "Am I really in London—the heart of Christian England?"

One cold, dark November night, I sallied forth, accompanied by a boy acquainted by sad experience with all the hiding-places of the district, and who acted as my guide, to examine with care certain parts of the parish of St. Luke's.

Lodging-house after lodging-house in Golden Lane was visited in the course of the night, the deputies were spoken to, and some few children interrogated and given cards of admission to our Home. If they availed themselves of these, their weary wanderings might cease from that time forth for evermore.

At two o'clock in the morning we reached

HOTWATER COURT,

and there began a more careful house-to-house investigation. At that hour, of course, all lights were extinguished, and but for the occasional echo aroused by the heavy tread of a policeman, the stillness of the night would have been quite unbroken.

The miserable houses in this wretched court were let out in tenements of the most squalid character imaginable. The hall-doors were consequently never fastened at night, being the common property of all the tenants. On the staircases and in the passages it was no unusual thing to find persons who had had no money to pay for a lodging, lying down fast asleep. In these places they might hope for a time to escape the searching glare of the policeman's "bull's-eye," and obtain at least a partial shelter from the cold and rain.

My method was to open each of the hall-doors in succession, and then remain in the street on the watch, while my young guide entered with my lantern partly turned on, and carefully explored the stairs and passage. Few of the groups he saw in the various houses possessed more than a passing interest for him, although, boy as he was, he could not refrain from a shudder of pity as, pointing with his finger, he described in a subdued tone of commiseration the most horrible of those forlorn groups—"There are four, all women, in there, sir!"

Into one house, about mid-way down the court, my little conductor entered stealthily. As before, I at first remained outside. Shortly he returned, and requested me to follow him. I entered a long passage, which terminated in a steep narrow staircase leading to the upper rooms. But we did not ascend the stairs, for it was in an angle on the ground floor, formed by the staircase, the wall of the house and the floor, that the object of my young guide's discovery lay concealed.

I advanced quietly, turning on the full blaze of the lantern, but could at first discern nothing, except what looked like a dark bundle of old rags in the farthest corner under the stairs. The odor of the passage was uninviting, and one might have imagined that what I saw was really what it seemed—a pile of cast-off rags, unworthy even of a beggar's notice; but well I knew that this was not the case, and reaching forward, I felt beneath the rags, and soon grasped the thin, spare arm of a boy.

Gently arousing him, for he was locked fast in slumber, I drew him out of the corner, while at the same time the light from the "bull's-eye" lantern gleamed full upon his face. Rubbing with both hands the sleep from his eyes, the lad, scarcely yet awake, blurted out,

"I'm tirteen; I'm tirteen," and then turned involuntarily from me and sought the darkness to lie down again. He was not yet fully roused, so once more, drawing him toward me, I shook him, and succeeded in thoroughly dissipating his slumbers.

Again he repeated glibly,

"I'm tirteen, sir; I ain't been doin' nothin' wrong."

The meaning of this curious statement of the boy's is easily given. The Compulsory Clauses of the New Education Act were beginning at that time to be put in force. Children of the destitute class all over London were at last learning that the "school-master was abroad," and this poor boy had heard, as he afterward told me, that at thirteen years of age children could claim exemption from the rule which compelled all others to go to school.

Each night the poor waif had gone to sleep with the fear and dread of the police and the School Board Inspector haunting him. Even in his sleep their shadow fell across his troubled dreams. On being suddenly disturbed, imagining I was a policeman, or at least a School Board Inspector, he repeated mechanically the formula which, he supposed, would preserve him from summary arrest.

But I was not so easily turned aside. The poor child was but eleven, or at the very utmost twelve years of age. His appearance as he stood before me was deplorable in the extreme: without shoes or stockings, his nakedness scarcely covered by a few wretched rags, filthy to loathsomeness, tied around him, a wild shock head of unkempt hair and a wolfish hungry look gleaming from his eyes, now widely distended, partly with fear, partly, as it seemed to me, with the fierce determination to resist at all hazards any attempt I might make upon his liberty.

With his fists clenched, there he stood still in the corner, shielding as I thought something else from view, and unwilling to budge even one inch. I could hold no parley with him there; the atmosphere was so close and disagreeable. I was feeling quite dizzy. So I begged him to come outside and talk to me. "No, he wouldn't; he preferred his liberty; he wished I'd let him be. Couldn't I leave him alone? He hadn't done nothin' to me. What was I a'goin' about a disturbin' of him for at that time of night?" And so forth.

But my guide whispered, "Look behind him, sir, quick," and firmly but gently pushing the lad on one side, I observed that hidden in the corner there was still another little bundle of rags under the stair, and in due time, after the necessary gentle firmness had been exercised, the said little bundle proved upon examination to be another boy some two and a half or three years younger than the one who had first spoken.

The early history of these two children may be told in very few words. The older lad, Arthur, was really the guide and protector of his younger brother, whom he called, with a simple pathos that was very touching,

"LITTLE BOBBIE."

As soon as he saw I had the younger boy in my possession, Arthur's fierceness of demeanor disappeared. Now he expressed his whining willingness to do anything I wished, mingling his protestations with supplicating entreaties not to give them in charge, as "they wern't doin' nothin' wrong, only sleepin'." Indeed, this was the sum and substance of their joint avowal.

It transpired that the two boys were alone and without a relative in the world, except one older brother, who was a thief and had frequently been sentenced to imprisonment. This man had for a long time kept his two little brothers in servile bondage, making them do his work and in a variety of ways accomplish his wicked desires, until at length from a tramp's kitchen in Brighton, where they had all sought shelter, the two boys had crept forth early one morning and trudged alone to London.

(To be continued.)

PROPHETIC EXPOSITION.

Compiled by Rev. M. Baxter.*

(Continued from page 556.)

Beckersteth on the Final Crisis—A Time of Preparation—The Restoration of the Jews—Its two Stages—God's Children in the Last Trials—The Lukewarm—The Seventy Weeks—The Situation of the Wicked in those Days—The Mark of Antichrist—Arm and Gather Scriptural Truth for Oil.

The late Rev. Edward Bickersteth, Rector of Watton, England, whose theological works amounted to some twenty volumes, and who was one of the most widely known and esteemed of the Evangelical clergy, firmly maintained, in common with other expositors, that according to the prophetic dates, the fina crisis of this Gentile economy and the secon advent of Christ would most probably tak place somewhere about the general period con nected with the epoch of 1877. This was the gen eral period when, without being positive as to few years, more or less, he expected (to use hi own words) that "the Turkish Empire sha perish, the Jews shall be restored, the time c great tribulation will take place, our Lord Jesu will return to our earth, the saints shall be raise Popery shall fall, and the time of full blesse ness and the kingdoms of this world becomin Christ's kingdoms shall have arrived."

The following description of the coming tria of the Christian Church was given in his boo Practical Guide to the Prophecies and Restorati of the Jews, published in 1835-40:

"There is one part of the duty of the Chur which has hitherto been little regarded. Fro the extraordinary peace which God has given the world, a period of quiet clearly predict before the last troubles (1 Thess. 5 : 2, 3; Re 7 : 1), Christians have not had their attenti directed, as the earlier Church had, to the du and privilege of suffering for Christ.

"But as the predicted trials are manifest drawing nearer Christians should be led to p pare and be ready for them, that they may enabled to withstand every temptation, and come the largest blessings in those trials to th country, their fellow-Christians, and their fello men.

"THE PEOPLE OF ISRAEL

shall in these troubles be restored to their o land. On this the Prophet Daniel, 12 : 1, is plicit. "And at that time shall Michael st up, the great prince which standeth for the ch dren of Thy people: and there shall be a time trouble such as never was since there was a na even to that same time." In the midst of trials, when the enemy is coming in like a flo the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a stand against him (Isaiah 59 : 19). The Jews shall remarkably restored, and this itself will be as ensign lifted up on the mountains, and as the bl ing of a trumpet to all the inhabitants of the world and dwellers upon the earth (Isaiah 18).

---

* Extracted from "Coming Wars," by Rev. Baxter, in two pamphlets—five cents each by m First pamphlet contains "Ten Signs of the End, Description of Approaching Events," with two m and four large diagrams. Second pamphlet cont valuable quotations from Forty Expositors on t events. Address, 63 Bible House, New York.

There are two stages in their restoration ; the first, a gradual and preparatory restoration in a self-righteous and persecuting state (Isaiah 27 : 12 ; 66 : 1, 10), liberalizing and infidel (Ezekiel 20 : 32, 33), and anticipating their peace and health as come (Jeremiah 7 : 15 ; Isaiah 66 . 3). This is the signal to the nations that the mystery of God is about to finish. On this restoration, the last dregs of their bitter Jewish tribulation are drunk up by the nation through the unprovoked jealousy, hatred, and confederacy of the Gentile nations waging war against them (Ezekiel 38 and 29 ; Zechariah 13 : 8, 9 ; 14 : 1, 2). And at length their Messiah and Deliverer appears for them. (Rev. 19). The full and glorious restoration of Israel is on the return of our Lord, after this preparatory restoration.

" The situation of God's children in these LAST TRIALS.
We have an account in Revelation of the 144,000 sealed and preserved from the last judgments, as appears from Ezekiel 9, compared with Revelation. In several of the parables we have a similar distinction. In that of the Ten virgins, the Wise Virgins having oil in their vessels and ready for their Lord, enter in with Him to he Marriage. In that of the servants waiting, he faithful and wise servant, giving meat to he household in due season, is pronounced lessed and rewarded ; and it is to those who love His appearing, that it is to them that look for Him and love His appearing, that our Lord ' will ppear the second time without sin unto salvaon.' (Heb. 9 : 28 ; 2 Tim. 4 : 8 ; Matt. 24 : 5 ; 25). These form the first fruits unto God nd the Lamb. They will be completely delived from all the evil of the days of the Great ribulation (Isaiah 26 : 20 ; Matt. 25 : 10), and reserved in that Season of Temptation which hall come upon all the world to try them that well upon the earth. (Rev. 3 : 10.)

Among professors of religion there are, hower, vast numbers in an intermediate and very angerous state : the lukewarm of Laodicea ; e foolish virgins of the parable ; the many hose love waxes cold because iniquity abounds. hey are little to be distinguished outwardly om decided Christians ; they associate with em, they profess, perhaps, the same doctrines ; hey think they are right, that they are ' rich, creased with goods, and have need of nothing,' d yet continuing in this state, they will asredly be left in the terrors of the great tribuion. May all such ' be zealous and repent.' ev. 3 : 14–22.)

'Just before Daniel's time of blessedness, ere is a period of half a week of years (i.e., ee and a half years), which is mentioned in niel 9 : 27, for the infidel persecution from ich the Philadelphian Church is saved (Rev. 10), but the Laodicean part left in it to be ified, and to be the last gathering of the urch to the marriage supper.

In Dan. 9 : 27 we have the seventieth week ears at the close of the times of the Gentiles, en the people of Israel are again taken into enant. This week is divided into two parts. e character of the first half week seems to be out (Isaiah 66 : 1, 3), where the Jews are repnted as, in a self-righteous spirit, rebuildthe temple and offering sacrifices , and the acter of the second half, or dividing of the (the latter three and a half years), answers saiah 66 : 4–6, where they are represented as er the terror of the infidel Antichrist, who es the sacrifice to cease ; and at the close is consummation in the destruction of that christ as set before us. (Isaiah 10 : 23, 2 Thess. 2 : 8.*)

" The images, figures, and descriptions of this Gentile tribulation are some of the most awful passages in the prophetical writings. The restraints now upon the wicked will be removed by the overthrow of governments, as in the Reign of Terror, in 1793. The kingdoms of this world shall make open war against our Lord Christ. (Rev. 16 : 14 ; 17 : 14 ; 19 : 19.)

" The day of tribulation will be the day of large conversion TO CHRIST. We have many explicit statements that the time of these judgments will be the time of extended conversion of souls. A great multitude comes out of this Great Tribulation. (Rev. 7 ; 9, 14.) And just after it is mentioned in Daniel the most glowing promise is given to those successful in labors for the spiritual good of others. (Dan. 12 : 1, 3 ; Isaiah 26 : 9 ; Luke 14 : 23.)

" The character and
SITUATION OF THE WICKED
under these trials is also brought before us. There are those who will remain unconverted under these unequalled exhibitions of grace on the one hand and judgment on the other. As Luther once said, ' I believe it will come to pass, that the greater and clearer the light of the Gospel is, the more wicked the world will be.' Their character will become more and more desperately wicked (I Tim. 3 : 13), and this wickedness more manifest to all. (Rev. 19 : 19.) Even now, after their hardness and impenitent heart, they treasure up to themselves wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God.'

" It appears clear that the tribulation of the seventh vial serves to separate men into their respective classes, and not finally to destroy the wicked. When the great hail out of heaven falls upon the wicked, they do but blaspheme God because of the plague of the hail. (Rev. 16 : 21.)

" It is the very mark of Antichrist, with his many followers, to deny that Jesus is coming in the flesh. (2 John 7.) Thus Pharaoh in Eygpt grew more hardened with each successive judgment till his last overthrow. They will go on to make war with the Lamb and His followers ; and probably will reduce the people of Christ to such extremities as to make their faith ready to fail, and their hope to faint.

" Their continued impunity, and the prolonged absence of the Lord, produces entire unbelief of His return at all in the world (2 Peter 3 : 4) ; and the excess of suffering, and the delay of Divine vengeance on the wicked, cause despondency in God's people. Hence our Lord says, ' Shall not God avenge His own elect, which cry day and night unto Him, though He bear long with them? I tell you that He will avenge them speedily. Nevertheless when the Son of Man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?' (Luke 18 : 7, 8.)

" ARM YOURSELVES
with the mind of Christ about suffering. To be like Him is the glory of a Christian. He foresaw, with perfect distinctness and foreknowledge, all the bitter cup which He had to taste. He knew His sorrows beforehand far more distinctly than we can possibly know any sufferings throughout which we have to go, and yet He withheld not Himself from His overwhelming baptism, and was only straitened till it was accomplished. Amid all temptations, from friends and from foes, from the world and the devil, and from those infirmities of our nature, with the feeling of which He was touched—look at the invincible firmness, patience, meekness, gentleness, love, and faithfulness of our Divine Lord. Truly, we must look much to Jesus if we would be armed with His mind. He will give us His Holy Spirit ; He will strengthen us with His grace. He will impart to us His mind.

" Now gather Scriptural truth which may be as oil in our lamps for the day of necessity. A man unacquainted with all that God has foretold in His Word of events yet to come, and expecting things only to go on as they have done, must be taken unawares by them (Luke 21 : 34,) and so wholly unprepared. While he who has attended to God's warnings, and treasured up all His gracious statements of what has to take place, will not be taken by surprise, but will be found ready and provided against the evil day. The prepared Christian, who remembers what Christ has beforehand told him, will be able, amid all the unusual shakings and convulsions of that day, and the terrors of his fellow-men, to lift up his head. He knows the end of the Lord, he sees his redemption and that of the whole earth approaching, and with this hope he can be full of confidence, peace, and joy.

" Ask for grace to be bold in the confession of truth. This did the Apostles, and they were heard (Acts 4 : 29). True it is this boldness will expose us to ridicule and bitter hatred of evil men ; true it is even Christians may blame us, and they of our own household think we carry matters much too far ; true it is we may have thereby to suffer and be shamefully entreated, even though we had the wisdom, love, and humility of Paul, yet still let us be bold in our God to speak the Gospel of God with much contention.

" Oh ! how great a grace is given to a Christian, when he is enabled to look on the praise of man as a small thing, and one to be despised when put in competition with the praise of God ; and with large love to all, with humility, and patience, and simplicity of mind to seek only God's approval. This will give us real boldness, as it did to Peter and John before all the rulers of the Jews (Acts 4 : 13, 19), and so make us large blessings to His Church. The hope of the Redeemer's return is peculiarly calculated to embolden and strengthen even the timid believer to confess present and needful truth.

" BE DILIGENT
in seeking to save souls. The words of our Saviour should especially now be our purpose and guide day by day. ' I must work the works of Him that sent me while it is day ; the night cometh when no man can work. As long as I am in the world I am the light of the world.' Soon the present opportunities of spreading Divine truth, freedom, and liberty of action, and means of reaching all quarters of the earth, as far as regards the exertions of the children of God, may be greatly impeded or wholly taken from us. Soon we may be despoiled of the many advantages we now have for doing good to the bodies and souls of men ; but if we now scatter the seed it may be harrowed in even those days, and ultimately bring a glorious harvest, in which we shall forever rejoice.

---

*his paragraph on the futurity of Daniel's seven- week, and also the preceding paragraph, are d from Bickersteth's chapter on the chronologi- ates. He showed, in his " Guide to the Prophe- that in year-day fulfilment " there shall be a r year no longer," in Rev. 10 : 6, means, " there be 360 years longer, from Luther's Reformation until the Consummation. The main epoch of Luther's Reformation was apparently about 1517 to 1530.

He said, " These events, the appearance of our Lord and the first resurrection of the saints, would in this view take place within 360 years from the Reformation."

The Farmer and Zulu Lad.—A Natal colonist left his farm some time ago on a journey toward Verulam. He had with him a Zulu boy as his leader ; they had not journeyed far when they were overtaken by the heavy mists that are very common on those hills. The mists very shortly became a pouring rain, and darkness came upon them. The Zulu lad, overcome by the cold, dropping the thong with which he led the oxen, stood still. Speedily the eyes closed, and he could not move, and became silent. The farmer, stripping himself of his great coat, and taking everything that he had available for covering, laid him down in the wagon and covered him up, hoping by that means to revive him ; but it was all in vain, life seemed slowly ebbing out. Then laying himself down beside the little lad, and opening his coat and stretching out his broad arms, he drew the boy to his breast and kept him there. Very soon the eyes opened and the heart began to beat, and the boy spoke and life returned. The Zulu lad afterwards said to the farmer, " Sir, tell me what it was that made your heart so warm toward me and brought me back from death ?" And then, with his heart as warm as ever, the colonist told the " old, old story of Jesus and His love," and it warmed another heart, and was the means of the boy's conversion.

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

By the Author of "Ssved at Sea."

(Continued from page 559.)

The Voice of the Stars.

I was very unhappy after this conversation with Claude. He gave me no opportunity of renewing it; but though he had not explained to me any of his doubts, he had left an uneasy, troubled feeling on my mind, a feeling which I could not shake off.

When I went upstairs to bed that night, I sat down to think over what Claude had said. What if, after all, I was resting upon a delusion, building my happiness upon an unreality? What if, after all, my faith was in vain, my hope unfounded?

Horrible doubts, such as I had never known before, came crowding into my mind. "Are these things so?" was the oft-repeated question of my heart. It was a sad awakening from the trust and implicit confidence of childhood; an awakening which, perhaps, comes to every thoughtful mind, when its faith is brought into contact, for the first time, with the intellect of this world; an awakening which leads us either into the terrible region of doubt and uncertainty, or into faith, far firmer than ever before, because based, not on mere childish impressions, but on the words and the being of the eternal God.

In this state of perplexity I went to my bed room window and looked out. It was a bright, starlight night, so I put out my candle, and sat by the window, gazing into the sky at the countless multitude of stars.

Who had made all these mighty worlds? Who was keeping them all in their places, and making them fulfil the object for which they were created?

I knew who it was; my faith in the existence of an Almighty God remained unshaken. I could never look around me on God's universe and doubt that God was.

And then, as I looked at the stars, other thoughts came—thoughts of the majesty and wisdom and power of the God who had made all these; thoughts, too, of the smallness and insignificance of our own little world—in comparison with the rest of God's great universe a mere speck in space

And I—what was I?

Only one of the beings which inhabited this tiny world; one of the smallest and least wise of all in God's universe! Who was I, that I should say to God, "Why doest Thou this?" Who was I, that I should presume to sit in judgment on anything in God's revelation?

"His wisdom is unsearchable, His ways past finding out," was the language of my heart. I am but a little child—how can I understand God's plans? I know so little, I understand so little, I see such a little way, either before me or behind me. How can I, then, expect to understand that which is understood fully only by God Himself?

A feeling of my utter nothingness and insignificance in God's sight came over me so powerfully that I was almost crushed by it. Who was I—what was I, that I should dare to doubt what God had in wonderful condescension revealed to me, because of the vast amount of knowledge which was too wonderful for me; so high that I could not attain unto it?

"O Lord," I said, as I looked up into the sky, "I will be content to be a little child, receiving Thy Word with childlike faith, and what my mind is too weak and small to understand fully, I will yet believe, because Thou hast told me, and because Thy Word must be true."

And even as I said the words, this verse came into my mind: "Now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known."

Then the day was coming when, in another world, my mind would be strengthened to understand these difficult matters which were now perplexing me—these things which I only knew in part, and which, for this very reason, just because I only knew a part of them, seemed to me so perplexing and mysterious.

And then there was another thought which comforted me perhaps more than anything else, and it was this: I had proved the Bible to be true myself. I knew it was the Word of the God of truth by my own experience. I had prayed, and had received many an answer to my prayers. I had pleaded the promises, and had found them more than fulfilled to me in every hour of need. I had fallen back upon the grand old truths of the Bible in many a time of trouble, and had never found them fail me.

A hundred books written by the cleverest men on earth, could not convince me that the Bible was a mere human production; for I had found in it what I had found in no other book—peace for a troubled conscience, comfort in sorrow, victory over sin.

I lay down to sleep that night reassured and comforted, and with my doubts entirely removed, and I do not remember that they ever returned to me.

But Claude, what could I do for him? I could do nothing but pray for him, for he never gave me an opportunity of speaking to him again about what had so troubled me.

His college days passed by, and every vacation that he was at home he came frequently to see us, and each time he came I felt more persuaded that his new views had not improved his character. He had occasionally an imperious and dictatorial manner, such as he had never had before, and he looked restless and dissatisfied, as if something was preying on his mind.

And yet Claude was very kind to us, to Maggie and to me. He never came home without bringing us some little present, and he never seemed tired of our company.

One day, about six weeks before the time at which my little story commences, I had been spending the day at the parsonage. I did not often go there now, but Claude was away, and his aunt, Miss Richards, who had lived there since Claude's mother died, invited me to spend the afternoon with her. Claude had just left Oxford, and was staying for a few weeks with some friends in Scotland, before settling down at home.

After dinner Miss Richards and I took our work into the little summer house, and sat there until the evening. We talked on various subjects, the village, the people round, Mr. Ellis's health, and of many other things. And then we talked of Claude.

"It will be very pleasant to have Claude at home," said Miss Richards; "the house is so dull when he is away."

"Yes," I said, "you must miss him very much, Miss Richards, but I suppose he will not be at home very long; when is he to be ordained?"

She did not answer me at once, and when I looked up I saw that her face was very troubled and sorrowful, as she bent over her work.

"Claude will not be ordained, May," she said at length; "I think that is quite decided now."

"Why not, Miss Richards?" I asked in astonishment; "I thought that had been settled years ago, when Claude was a little boy."

"It was only settled conditionally, May," she said. "Claude was to go into the ministry if it was his own wish to do so; his father would never press him into such work, if he did not feel drawn to it himself."

"And Claude does not feel drawn to it?" I asked.

"Oh, no, he has written to his father most decidedly, giving up all idea of becoming a clergyman, and expressing his wish to study for the bar."

"Is Mr. Ellis very disappointed, Miss Richards?" I said.

"Of course, he is disappointed in one way, May, for he has made a great effort to give Claude a university education in order to make him more fit for his work as a minister; but at the same time he quite sees that with Claude's peculiar ideas (you know what I mean, May—those new views he has taken up at Oxford) his ordination is, at least for the present, out of the question."

I made no answer, but went on diligently with my work.

"Claude has been a great expense to his father," Miss Richards went on; "he has cost him many hundreds at Oxford, and bills are still coming in. He is young yet, you see, and I suppose all young men are extravagant. But it is a great pity that he let the bills run on for so long; some go as far back as his first term."

"What does Claude say about it?" I asked.

"Oh, he is always very much troubled when the bills come, for he sees that his father has not any money to spare, and he talks about the time when he will have money of his own at his uncle Charles's death, and when he will be able to repay all his father has advanced for him. And then he is quite certain that the tradesmen must have added a great deal which he never bought. But it is so long ago, May, nearly four years, so of course he cannot be sure of it."

"I am very, very sorry," I said.

"Yes, and so are we," said Miss Richards "but that anxiety is nothing to the other. Mr Ellis would not mind how much money he ha to pay if only Claude had not taken up such rationalistic, infidel ideas."

"Does he still hold those views?" I asked

"He spoke to me once about them, a long tim ago, but I have heard nothing of it since. hoped Claude had studied the other side of th question, and had grown wiser."

"Oh, my dear," said Miss Richards, "h seems to me to get worse and worse. At first was only some small parts of the Bible which h cavilled at, and which he maintained were nc inspired; but when he once began to doub there was no knowing where he would sto doubting—he carried the same spirit of critic suspicion into everything."

"But surely there are books written whic would in a great measure answer Claude doubts?" I suggested.

"Yes, undoubtedly," said Miss Richard "but it seems to me Claude prefers doubtin for he does not seem at all anxious to have h doubts cleared away. He does not want to ha his mind satisfied, and so he either does not re books on the other side at all, or, if he rea them, he does so fully determined that his sce ticism cannot be, and indeed must not be sh ken. If Claude would only prayerfully desi and prayerfully strive to have his doubts moved, I should have no fear about him."

"I am so very sorry, Miss Richards," I sa again.

"Yes, May, and so am I," said she. "I sure you that when I went up-stairs into Claud bedroom, when he was last at home, and fou at the bottom of his box a number of his favor books (the very names of some of which made shudder), I sat down on a chair in his room a had a good cry. I could not help it, May, de For I thought of the little, trustful face whi used to be lifted to mine years ago, when I t him, for the first time, the beautiful stories of the Book he now despises and scoffs at.

"I thought of the voice which used to say evening prayer at my knee, and which used, Sundays, to repeat hymns and texts to me this very summer-house. And then I thou of the small black Bible, which, when he g older, used always to be laid beside his pill that he might be able to read it as soon as it light in the morning. I could see plenty other books in Claude's room, May, but no ble! I could not help going down-stairs bringing a Bible up to lay on the dressing-ta in case he might see and read it. Though course, it would do him no good, unless he c to it in a teachable spirit," she added, with a si

"But I have not lost hope for Claude ye said Miss Richards, after a pause. "I beli that when he is older he will be wiser in m ways. And, May," she said, "my great hope Claude lies in you; you have more influe with him than any one has."

'I? Oh, no, Miss Richards; "you are quite ng there," I said. "He will never even ak to me on the subject."

No, perhaps not," said Miss Richards; it your quiet, gentle, loving influence must e its effect in time.'

felt my face growing very crimson as Miss ards said this. She had put into words a which had been hidden away in my heart ome months—a fear that I had never dared, in my own heart, to put into words—a fear I was becoming more to Claude than re sister, and that he had plans and views ur future, his future and mine, which I d not, which I ought not, to entertain for a ent.

(To be continued.)

HAGAR AND ISHMAEL.

Lesson for Sept. 12th, Gen. 21: 9–21. n Text, Psa. 139: 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THOUGH made of God an example to all ations of men since his time, yet Abra- faith needed education as ours does now, od has mercifully placed on record all the s of His faith that they may act like buoys seamen and help us to steer our course t falling upon the rocks and making ship- God had promised Abraham (Gen. 1:4), that shall come forth out of thine own , shall be thine heir." Abraham had be- in the Lord, and God had accounted it to r righteousness, and so long as his eyes n God's almightiness and His fidelity, all ll. But Sarah, in talking over matters r husband, appears to have looked at the ilities of fulfilment, instead of leaving work out His own promise.

s never forget that God is responsible to His own word; it is His, and not ours to ne the difficulties which stand in the Sarah did what thousands of believers ng to this day, what perhaps every be- as done some time or other—she thought ne means of helping God. No doubt the who is fertile in resources, suggested to at she in her turn suggested to Abra- at he should take Hagar, Sarah's hand- wife, and that Sarah should obtain chil- er (Gen. 16:2). This could not answer. irst place, it was a direct dishonor done who did not need the aid of His creat- carry out His designs, in the second was done without His command, and hout asking His counsel.

polygamy never had its origin with he first instance we have of it is in the Lamech, Cain's descendant of five gen- who was also a murderer (Gen. 4: d had Commanded. (Gen. 2: 24), ore shall a man leave his father and and shall cleave unto his wife (not his), and they (Mark 10:8, 'they twain') one flesh." In Abraham's history, in ry of Jacob and many others, we can lthough polygamy was tolerated in the ament, yet it was not in God's order; New Testament (Mark 10:8; 1 Cor. ph. 5:28–33, 1 Tim. 3:2–12) it is question of more than one wife under l rule.

came into Abraham's family through of expediency, this departure from that nd faith which had led him out of his nd from his father's house. "When that she had conceived, her mistress ed in her eyes." It was very natural; lave girl was put into the position she y no fault of hers, and when it seemed God's promises were about to be ful- r and not in her mistress, it was nat- he should think herself more favored an Sarah. To Sarah this was unen- d she carried her complaint to Abra- said, "My wrong be upon thee: I my maid into thy bosom; and when at she had conceived, I was despised s: the Lord judge between me and thee." Yes. Abraham was after all the most to blame, for he hearkened to Sarah when he ought to have taken counsel with God. He "said unto Sarai, Behold thy maid is in thy hand, do to her as it pleaseth thee. And when Sara dealt hardly with her, she fled from her face" (Gen. 16: 3–6).

It was deeply unjust, and Abraham must have bitterly repented the step he had taken, but without doubt he committed the poor oppressed maid to Him who judgeth righteously and delivereth them that are oppressed out of the hand of their oppressors. The angel of the Lord found Hagar by a fountain of water, and He said, "Hagar, Sarai's maid, whence camest thou? and whither wilt thou go?" She told the story of her wrongs. And the angel of the Lord said unto her, "return to thy mistress and submit thyself under her hands."

Oh, how wondrous are the ways of God! He leads us through death to life, through suffering to glory, through submission to overcoming. Hagar's seed was not the promised seed; but God was so tender to her that He even gave the name to her son, that she might be reminded, whenever she called him, that God had heard her affliction (Gen. 16:11). That Hagar had been grievously sinned against was no reason why she should also sin; and she could never forget the encouragement which God gave to her as her compensation for all which she had suffered. Hagar "called the name of the Lord that spake unto her, Thou God seest me," her sin and her suffering were alike known unto God; He had marked her, taught her, put her in the right way, and comforted her. This was a new experience to the slave girl. Abraham had done wrong in failing to leave his affairs in God's hands, and God rebuked him by making the affairs of his slave His own.

Ishmael was born, and when he was thirteen years old the Lord appeared again unto Abraham, and gave him the covenant of circumcision, and changed his name from Abram to Abraham. He also changed Sarai's name to Sarah, and said regarding her, "I will bless her, and give thee a son also of her," etc. Abraham's faith was sorely tried; he was bordering on a hundred years old, and Sarah was ninety; he gave way to his unbelief and said unto God, "O that Ishmael might live before thee." Then the Lord repeated His promise, also specifying the time of its fulfilment, "at the set time in the next year" (see chap. 17). This chapter, from which our subject to-day is taken, records the accomplishment of God's promise. Abraham's education in the pathway of faith had been carried on, he had learned the depth of unbelief which was in him, and now he could be trusted to receive the son for whom he had so long, "against hope believed in hope" (Rom. 4:18).

In the midst of her joy when Isaac was weaned, and when Abraham made a great feast in token of his own gladness, when no doubt all his servants and herdsmen were gathered together to see the master's son, "Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had borne unto Abraham, mocking. Wherefore she said unto Abraham, Cast out this bondwoman and her son: for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac." It was a bitter moment for Abraham, but his mouth was shut about Sarah's injustice to Hagar, for he knew that originally the fault was his, and so he laid the matter before the Lord.

Everything which is wrong must be put right in the life of a child of God who lives the life of Christ, but God alone can show us how, when, and by what means. When Abraham, in answer to Sarah's first complaint against Hagar, said to her, "Behold thy maid is in thy hand; do to her as it pleaseth thee," instead of making matters better it only made them worse; there was no humbling of himself and no justification of God. Now, a second time, Sarah complained, but instead of acting either by his own judgment or his own feelings, he placed himself and the whole matter in the hands of God. And God said, "Let it not be grievous in thy sight because of the lad, and because of thy bondwoman; in all that Sarah hath said unto thee, hearken unto her voice."

Thus Abraham had distinct direction what course to pursue. It might be urged that he was not acting with the consideration which was due to Hagar, that he was justifying Sarah in an imperious spirit which she was wrong to indulge in. And had it been only an arrangement between Abraham and Sarah, this would have been true. But God's hand was at work. The cost was greater to Abraham than even to Hagar and Ishmael, but in casting them out he would place God in a position to bless them directly, and Abraham would be delivered from consequences of his sin of unbelief.

As soon as Abraham was sure about the will of God, he acted upon it. "And Abraham rose up early in the morning." Perhaps most of the difficulty which we have in discovering with certainty the mind of God arises from the fact that often after obtaining His direction about a certain thing we begin to consider the consequences, and then doubt whether that direction after all came from God or whether it was some delusion of the enemy. Let us never be timid in following out at once what God shows us to be His will. It may be that every member of Abraham's household, Sarah excepted, thought that he was in the wrong; it was counter to all the love of a very loving heart, but on God's responsibility he did it.

Hagar had received promises from God, and He could not forsake her now; but her faith was put to the test. Probably in the first hours of her dismission she yielded to her grief, for she "wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba." She had no aim, and sought no direction from God. The water was spent in the bottle, no more was to be had, all was despair, "she cast the child under one of the shrubs. And she went, and sat her down over against him a good way off as it were a bow-shot: for she said, Let me not see the death of the child. And she sat over against him, and lifted up her voice and wept." Did she think then that God had forgotten the promises He had made to her about her son? Ishmael could not die in childhood and God's Word be fulfilled. Hagar was looking at outward circumstances and not straight above circumstances to God. Thus she saw only her outward surroundings, her wrongs, her bitter sorrow and loneliness, her fainting child, and the presence of her God was veiled.

But Ishmael had not been brought up in Abraham's house without inheriting some of his father's faith. He looked up to his father's God; and he who was then present, waiting for the first look or word which might claim His aid, "heard the voice of the lad." It was the first necessity in their new position that they should know that the living God was at hand and that He had not forgotten them. "The angel of God called to Hagar out of heaven, and said unto her, What aileth thee, Hagar? fear not; for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he is. Arise, lift up the lad, and hold him in thine hand; for I will make him a great nation."

"And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water." While her eyes were not up unto God she could not see His provision. So with us all: we need opened eyes to perceive how in every circumstance and at every moment God is sufficient for us. "She went and filled the bottle with water and gave the lad drink. And God was with the lad." His cry was no passing emotion, aroused by his need—it was but the beginning of a life in which God was a known and tried Friend. And "he grew and dwelt in the wilderness and became an archer." Thus was fulfilled God's word to his mother. "And he shall be a wild man,' etc. (Gen 16:12). "And he dwelt in the wilderness of Paran: and his mother took him a wife out of the land of Egypt." Thus we learn that however much we may suffer or cause others to suffer in following God's guidance, He makes all things to work together for good.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

An All-night Sitting of the British House of Commons resulted from the opposition of Irish members of Parliament to the vote of money to pay the Irish police. Mr. Parnell and his party demanded a pledge from the Government that the police should not be employed to enforce evictions of tenants, but the Government is responsible for the execution of the law, and therefore declined to give such a pledge. Mr. Forster, the Secretary of State for Ireland, said that he considered the rejection of the Compensation Bill by the House of Lords "a national calamity," and promised that if the tenants suffered injustice in consequence, to introduce a bill for their protection. But this promise failed to satisfy the Home Rule party, and they renewed the policy of obstruction which caused so much trouble in previous sessions. After continuing the debate obstinately for seventeen hours the Government consented to an adjournment, when the subject will again be discussed.

Mr. Forster, speaking of the condition of Ireland, said he had no fears of a general rising in that country, though he thought that there was great danger to individual life and property. One of the Home Rule members openly declared in the House that the party would not be satisfied by any policy that did not give complete legislative independence to Ireland.

The Abolition of the British House of Lords has long been an article of the creed of the advanced section of the Liberal or Radical party. The conflict of opinion between the two Houses on the Irish Question gave new vigor to the agitation, and another impetus has now been added by the reception the Lords gave to the Government bill affecting artisans. The bill made employers liable to action for damage to life and limb in cases where their own employees were injured, but the Lords have so altered the act as to render it practically inoperative, and have thus once more thwarted the will of the people as expressed through their representatives in the other House. Another bill, by which tenants are allowed to shoot hares and rabbits they find destroying their growing crops, is now before them, and it is known they are reluctant to grant the concession, but Lord Beaconsfield at a meeting of his party advised them to pass the bill. Should they reject it great dissatisfaction will be produced through the country, and the artisans will find themselves in the novel position of being allied with farmers in their political action.

A Naval Demonstration to Enforce the Recommendations of the Berlin Conference is the subject of discussion among the great Powers of Europe. The character of the negotiations has not yet been made public, but it is understood that England desires that the demonstration should be made at Constantinople, and is prepared to force the passage of the Dardanelles in defiance of the Sultan. Germany and Austria are anxious to limit the action of the Powers to the cession of territory the Sultan was urged to make to Montenegro, but England insists that the claims of Greece should be included in the ultimatum to be presented to Turkey. It is evident that the policy of evasion and delay which has served the Sultan in the past must be abandoned, as the patience of Europe so long tried has reached its limit.

African Explorers Killed.—The London Standard says: "The sad news which has reached Zanzibar of the murder of Captain Carter and Mr. Cadenhead adds two more victims to the long list of those who have sacrificed their lives in the interests of African exploration. Hitherto, disease, and not violence, has been the cause of the fatality which has overtaken so many of the explorers of the dark continent." From the facts which have reached us it would, however, appear that the gallant pioneers met their death at the hands of a chief named Mercambo, not far from Lake Tanganyika. Messrs. Carter and Cadenhead, though Englishmen, were employed under the auspices of the Belgian branch of the International Society for the Exploration of Africa. The leading object of the expedition sent out under its auspices is the establishment of centres of civilizing influence and commerce at various points of the interior. When last heard from the explorers were sanguine of soon communicating with Mr. Stanley, who, by the aid of steam launches, is endeavoring to ascend the Congo, which, amid so many perils, he descended three years go. Whether all of the Europeans have met the fate of Messrs. Carter and Cadenhead we have no means as yet of learning."

A Remarkable Publication has been Issued by a Jesuit of high standing in the Order, named Father Curci. Four years ago he published a volume of lectures on the Four Gospels for which he was publicly censured by his superiors. He has now published an entire version of the New Testament, with copious notes. In the preface he makes the following statement: "The New Testament is the book of all others the least studied and least read among us. So much so that the bulk of the laity—even of those who believe they have been instructed, and profess religion—is not aware that such a book exists in the world; and the greater part of the clergy themselves scarcely know more of it than what they are compelled to read in the Breviary and the Missal." Protestants have frequently made this charge, but it is something new to find it in a Jesuit's writing.

Six Centuries have Elapsed Between the Commencement and completion of the cathedral at Cologne, the last stone of which was laid last week. It is one of the grandest religious temples in the world, and of pure Gothic architecture. The cathedral is in the form of a cross, and is 511 feet in length and 231 feet in breadth. The towers are about 500 feet high. The heaviest of the six bells belonging to the cathedral weighs eleven tons.

Last Days of Islamism.—A Traveller Among the mountains of Asia Minor, who had pitched his tent in the province of Cicilia, was surprised the other day by a poor, ignorant Turkish woman coming up to his tent door and asking him if it was really true that the Day of Judgment was near. "On questioning her," he writes, "as to her reasons for making such an inquiry, I found that she had heard the villagers, especially the leading men, express the opinion that the last days of Islamism had come, and that the whole world is about to be judged for its wickedness. To-day I had a long conversation with a Turkish cadi, or judge, the drift of whose conversation took the same direction. These two persons represent the extremes of society among the Turks, yet they are agreed as to the decadence and probable collapse of the Turkish power. A large majority of the Turks are despondent. Their despondency is rather increased than otherwise by seeing their Christian neighbors hopeful, and increasing in prosperity. The Christians are looking in all directions to see what they can do to prepare themselves and their children for the new era that seems to be dawning upon them."

Mrs. Amanda Smith, in a Letter to a Friend, gives the following account of her work in India: "The Lord sent me to India last November. I landed in Bombay and began to work at once. We had three weeks' meetings, many were blessed, and some sinners converted. 'Praise the Lord!' I find the work here different to Britain or America. The influence of heathenism is so strong. Oh, how one's heart aches to see the teeming millions that are yet in the darkness of spiritual midnight! Oh, pray that the time may speedily come when the Gospel day shall take its place, and idolatry and superstition shall have gone forever. My work, is principally among English-speaking people. I speak through an interpreter when addressing a native congregation, and find it hard work, not being used to it. I pray, however, for those who have got the language that God may use them mightily.

"I like India very much; the plains are lovely in winter, but you want to get away in the hot season; the heat is intense, and when the hot winds blow across the plains it is like the bla a furnace. The Lord was so good to open way for me to come to the hills; it is cool a up here, you would scarcely think there was s a climate in India. God has been good to country in that He has so arranged the clim and prepared the people to endure them; all wonderful. I have been here eight mon and have travelled over four thousand miles have numerous calls, but I feel I cannot fil and may start for England about April, if Lord will. 'Glory to God for full salvation in Christ. Hallelujah.'"

A Dietary Test Similar to the one Danie his companions so successfully underwent (iel 1 : 12) has been applied in an English house. An English journal reports that a year's trial of milk instead of beer, the me officer of the Barnsley Poor Law Union that the discipline in the parish infirm better, that the patients like the change there is no deterioration of health, and tha death-rate is lower. He has reduced th of alcoholics during the year just closed $360 to $125.

Bendigo, a Renowned Prize-Fighter, Di London a few days ago. For nearly a quar a century he was notorious for his lawles desperate character. He fought twent regular battles, and carried off many prizes ring. He was frequently in prison for and disorderly conduct, and was looked a hopeless character. During one of his of incarceration he attended service prison church, and as usual sat in a listle tude during the service; but the chaplair as his subject the fight between David an ath, and immediately Bendigo's attenti arrested. He followed the narrative wit est, and at its close, forgetting where gave a loud "Bravo for the little un!" sermon, however, led him to think, a chaplain visited him at his request. By th ing of God he was converted, and has for years been known as a successful prea Seven Dials and some of the worst ne hoods in London.

A Decorated Market Woman is One celebrities of Paris. She keeps a vegetab and is very attentive to her business, but engaged in so humble an occupation sh of the eight women enrolled in the Le Honor. The distinction of belonging to gion is very highly esteemed throughout and the woman who always wears the re of the order is the object of much intere won it by an act of bravery during the Austrian war. Soon after the battle genta, while she was attached to the some capacity connected with the com department, she saw two Austrian soldi relling over a French flag they had c She snatched the prize from them an to the French camp. For this service decorated, and now, though she toils daily bread, she is included in the ran illustrious company among whom the nobles in France are proud to be numb will it be at the last day, when it is fo God has chosen the poor of this worl rich in faith, to be the heirs of the (James 2 : 5).

The Persian Famine Fund.—John Alcony, Ohio, $5.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Works a at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, low as to bring them within the reach of Twelve Sermons on various subjects, with of Mr. Spurgeon, price 35 cents. John T Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, a vol sermons, $2.50. The Treasury of David, cal exposition of the book of Psalms, five as Psa. 118, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth This popular gift-book contains a suita selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings fo in the year, with a blank space opposit graphs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs appear at their respective birthdays. T elegantly bound, and the price is 75 cen tances should accompany orders.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1880. 14th Year. No. 37–New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

AITS OF MESSRS. McCALL, CLARKE AND VEY, OF THE CONGO MISSION EXPE-
ON, with Sketches of their Lives.
NTRENCHMENTS. An Evening Sermon by almage.
STER TOWER. A New Serial Story by Miss Paull (Continued).
ND OF THE 6000 YEARS FROM THE TION IN 1890.
NT EVENTS: The Conventions—Civil Sereform—The Wreck of the City of Vera Cruz Approaching Presbyterian Council—An Im-Scientific Discovery—A Family Feud—A kable Tombstone—A Brakeman's Marvel-scape—A Social Reform—A Bereaved Dove ublic Officer's Scars, etc.

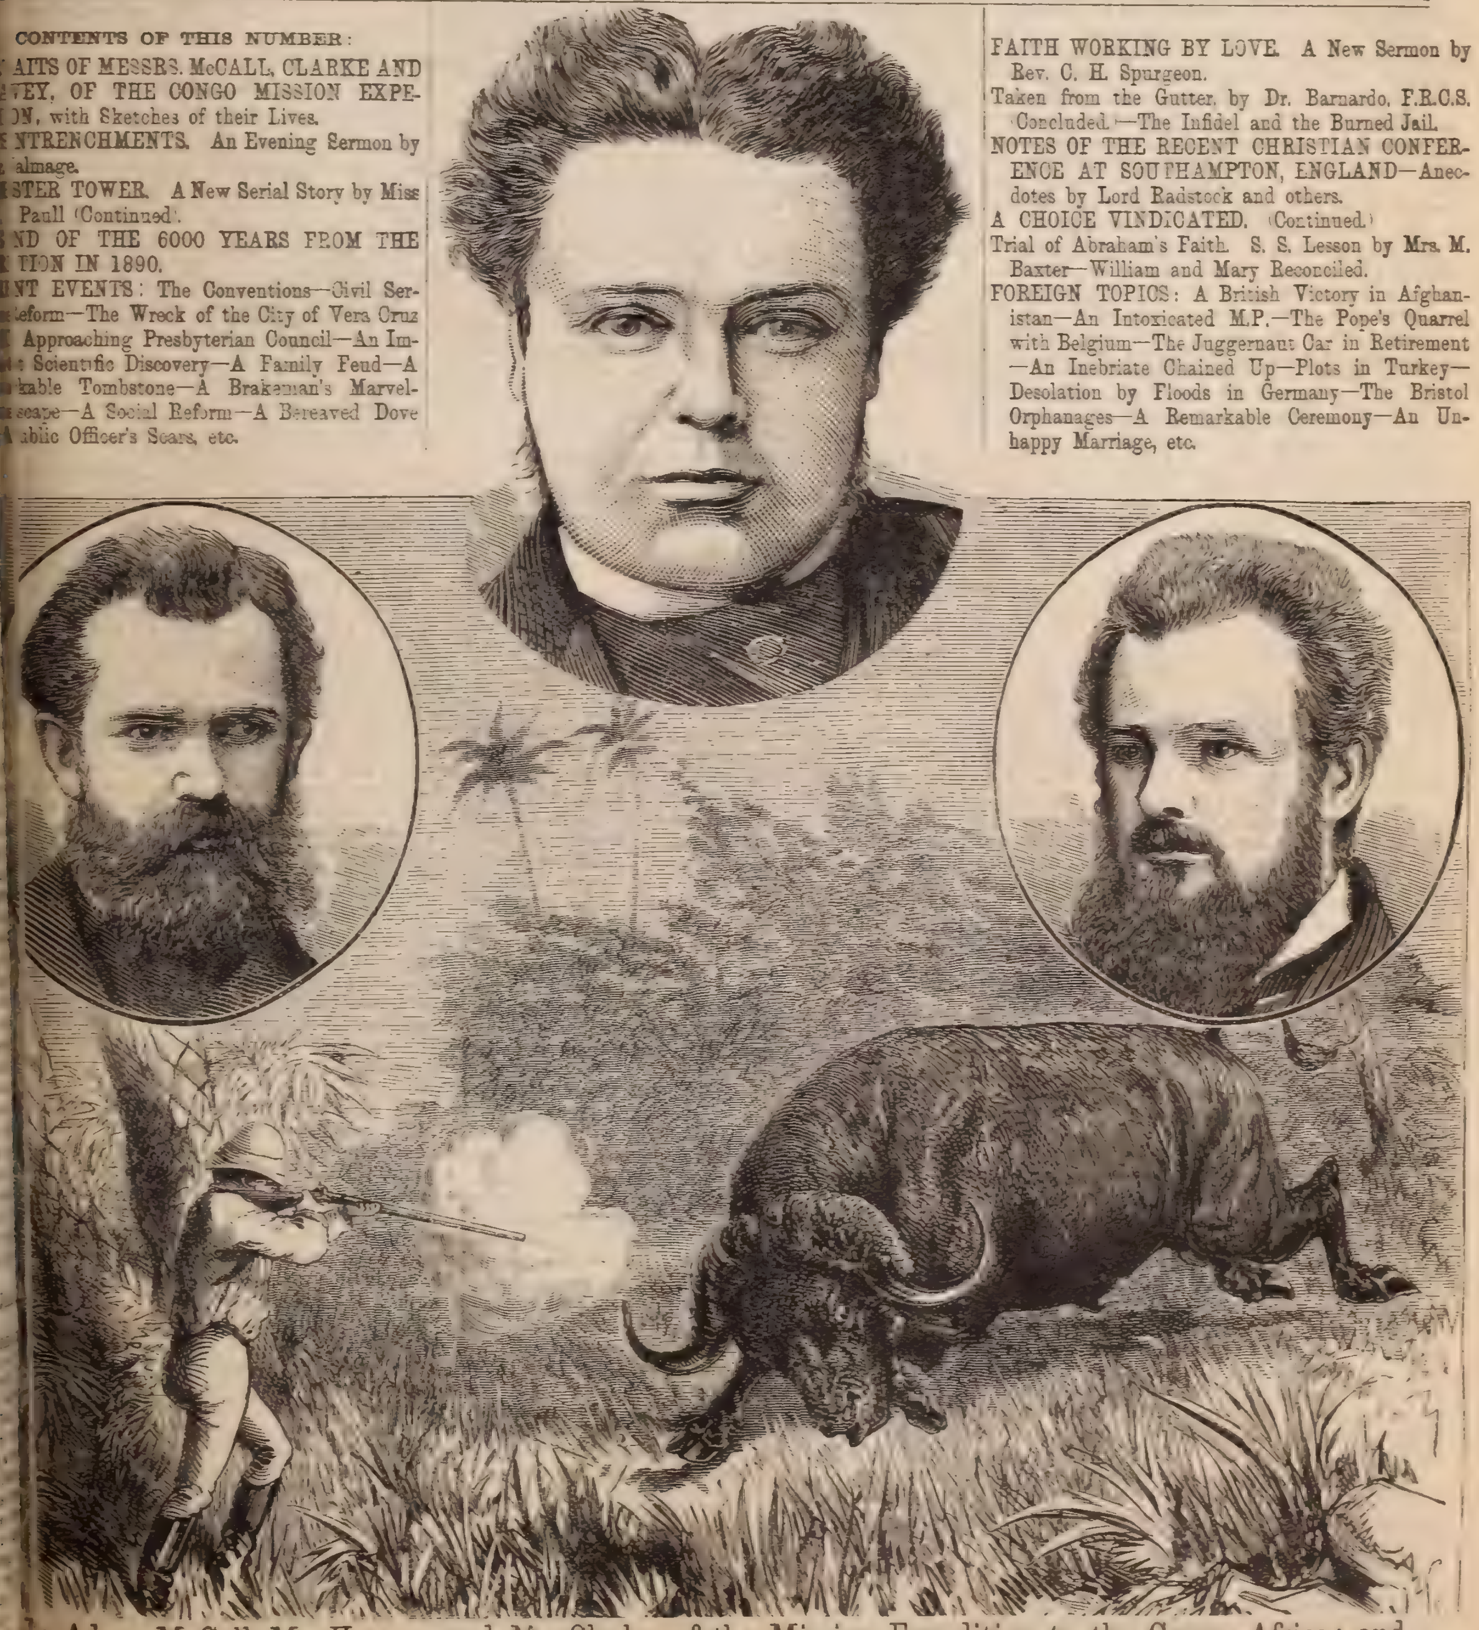
FAITH WORKING BY LOVE. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
Taken from the Gutter, by Dr. Barnardo, F.R.C.S. (Concluded.)—The Infidel and the Burned Jail.
NOTES OF THE RECENT CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE AT SOUTHAMPTON, ENGLAND—Anecdotes by Lord Radstock and others.
A CHOICE VINDICATED. (Continued.)
Trial of Abraham's Faith. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter—William and Mary Reconciled.
FOREIGN TOPICS: A British Victory in Afghanistan—An Intoxicated M.P.—The Pope's Quarrel with Belgium—The Juggernaut Car in Retirement—An Inebriate Chained Up—Plots in Turkey—Desolation by Floods in Germany—The Bristol Orphanages—A Remarkable Ceremony—An Unhappy Marriage, etc.



r. Adam McCall, Mr. Harvey, and Mr. Clarke, of the Mission Expedition to the Congo, Africa; and Mr. McCall's escape from a Buffalo.

MR. ADAM McCALL.

Leader of the Expedition to the Congo.

Birth in 1850—Original Choice of Profession—Becomes a Traveller in Africa—Visits Mission Stations—Returns Home for a Temporary Visit in 1878, and Becoming Converted to Christ, Determines to Work for Him in Africa—Offers his Services to the Livingstone Inland Mission—Becomes Leader of an Expedition—Departs for the Congo River on March 2d, with Messrs. Clarke and Harvey—Incidents of the Voyage.

THIS missionary, whose portrait we give this week, together with those of two of his coadjutors in work for Christ, is the son of a gentleman of good position in the town of Leicester, England, and during a mission service conducted there by the Rev. Newman Hall, LL.B., about the end of the year 1878, was led to give himself to the Lord Jesus Christ, and to consecrate body, soul, and spirit to His service. He was born in 1850, and is, therefore, now thirty years of age.

Having received an education qualifying him for his future career, he adopted the dual profession of architect and surveyor. Love of adventure and research, so characteristic of the highest type of young men, led him to travel during the seven years from 1872 to 1878, inclusive, in South and South-Central Africa, and during this period he covered a distance of twenty thousand miles. During this time he traversed in various directions, and repeatedly, Cape Colony, the Orange Free State, Griqua Land West, Natal, the Transvaal, Bechuana Land, the Matabele country, and the Zambesi valley, visiting the celebrated Victoria Falls and the upper waters of the Zambesi, some two thousand miles inland from Cape Town. During two years of his sojourn in South Africa, Mr. McCall was professionally engaged in the Civil Service of the British Government (Public Works Department, etc.), and throughout the last two years, which he spent in the far interior, traversing regions almost untrodden by white men, he was quite cut off from all contact with civilization, and for twelve months did not even receive a letter. He was then hunting elephant, buffalo, and other "big game." A fierce on one occasion nearly terminated his life. He was out on a hunting expedition, and one of these animals charged madly at him, as represented on our frontispiece, and would infallibly have killed him on the spot, if he had not, with unerring aim, fired at the infuriated quadruped and brought it to the ground before it could come near enough to impale him on its horns. This is only one out of several hair-breadth escapes he had in the course of his African travels.

ATTACK BY A BUFFALO

Though unconverted at the time, he greatly and intelligently sympathized with aggressive Christian efforts, and took the opportunity of visiting the remote and, comparatively isolated stations of the London Missionary Society among the Matabele, and stations of other societies in Bechuana Land and elsewhere. He met also those devoted servants of the Cross, M. and Madame Coillard, the French Protestant missionaries, during their detention as prisoners by the native chief Lobengula.

In the year 1878, after this considerable and most valuable experience in African life and travel, during which God was preparing him for future Christian service, he returned to England to pay a temporary visit to his friends, fully purposing in his heart to go back almost immediately to the valley of the Zambesi, with a view of exploring the Chôbe River (since descended by Major Serpa Pinto, of Spain), and of taking a series of photographic views of the country. But God's thoughts are not man's thoughts, and so, though he had nearly completed all the arrangements to give effect to his intention, he "passed from death unto life"; and all his plans, desires, and feelings about the future were suddenly and totally transformed by his conversion to God, through the preaching of the Rev. Newman Hall. To live for self-gratification was now no longer possible for him, and his earnest inquiry was, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" "Show me Thy way." The Divine response was quickly and strongly borne in upon his conscience.

He felt that there was no alternative but to return to Central Africa, to the "Dark Continent" he knew so well ; not now to hunt the big game of the interior, but to be "a fisher of men"; not as a mere explorer and traveller, but a missionary of the Gospel of Christ. The Master had surely been training him, all unconsciously to himself, for work which He wanted to be done. He had been preparing an instrument for a special service, and now by His Spirit He called him to it. Mr. McCall gladly, and with his whole heart, devoted his life to mission work in interior Africa ; and when the peculiar claims of the Congo region were pressed on his attention, he decided, after much prayerful consideration, to offer his services to the Livingstone Inland Mission, for the purpose of leading this expedition up to Stanley Pool, on the Upper Congo.

He rightly felt that, after his long exile in Africa, and in view of his recent conversion, he needed some time for the study of the Scriptures, and for the enjoyment of Christian fellowship ; and though in certain respects he required no preliminary training, yet he wished to increase his knowledge of medicine by spending the last few months at the London Hospital, and for twelve months he studied in the East London Institute, under the personal superintendence of Mr. Grattan Guinness, where he won a high place in the esteem and regard of all who met him. His interest in the Congo Mission deepened continually, till it became an intense and consuming zeal.

The Congo or

LIVINGSTONE RIVER,

as it has been re-named by Stanley, in honor of the brave missionary pioneer and explorer, David Livingstone, runs almost across Central Africa, and is ten miles broad in some parts, and about two thousand miles long. Henry Stanley, the celebrated explorer, spent three years in crossing Africa, chiefly along the route of the Congo River. That part of Africa is thickly populated, and is supposed to contain fifty million inhabitants, all sunk in heathenism, and to whom only fourteen missionaries have gone out.

On March 2d, 1880, Mr. McCall, with three brethren, Messrs. J. Clarke, Harvey, and Lanceley, together with Mrs. Richards, who intended joining her husband in the mission field, all from the Missionary Institute, embarked on board the Vanguard, lying in the Thames, for Central Africa. Their object is to establish an Industrial Mission Station at Stanley Pool, on the banks of the Congo River, three hundred and fifty miles from the place of debarkation on the African Coast.

When arrived at Stanley Pool, these missionaries will acquire the languge of the natives and reduce it to writing, to teach the people to read in their own tongue, to translate the Bible into it, and also to teach them English. They will be instructed not only in the law and in the Gospel of God, but also in the arts of peace ; shown the advantages of properly-constructed dwellings, and how to build them ; the use of simple machinery to save labor, as for example, the water-wheel for grinding corn and raising water for purposes of irrigation.

The Vanguard, with its missionary expedition on board, passed Plymouth Breakwater on their outward-bound voyage on March 13th, and four days afterward heavy weather commenced ; but on the morning of the 20th, they sighted Madeira. All of the party, except Mr. McCall, were very unwell. He himself says in a letter to Mr. Guinness :

> "This morning very early we sighted land. I jumped up and roused the rest, saying, 'Come, come, turn out, there's Madeira close at hand.' The effect was wonderful. In a few minutes Clarke appeared on deck, then Lanceley, then poor Harvey came forth, looking very pale, and trying hard to smile, and last came Mrs. Richards, looking remarkably well and bright. It was a most lovely morning, the sea placid and the air balmy, and to our right the beautiful islan Puerto Santo, looking fresh and inviting in the morr ing sun. After breakfast we got out our portabl harmonium on to the pretty little poop deck, an united in singing a hymn of praise and thanksgivin to God, 'whose mercy endureth for ever.' Ho sweetly the music sounded in the clear, balmy ai and over the sparkling waters ! Our souls seemed rise up with the songs in grateful adoration to o God."

Having arrived at Teneriffe, and taken twent five donkeys on board, they proceeded to tl Canary Islands, where, according to another le ter from Mr. McCall :

> "Our donkeys are doing remarkably well, no m hap of any kind having as yet occurred. They c tainly do regale us with rather more of their pecul music than we require, especially during the nigh but on the whole they behave well, and do not giv very great deal of trouble. We are now thoroug in the tropics and have hot and lovely weather. have laid aside our European style of dress, and fi the lighter attire acceptable. Harvey is improvi daily ; I am giving him a course of tonics. Clark in his element, and does everything with a right g will. Lanceley is improving, and with training a experience will prove a useful missionary. M Richards is well and in good spirits. We have ev attention shown us by all on board, from the capt down. We are greatly favored, and cannot help f ing that the Lord is blessing and protecting us."

The party next arrived at

SIERRA LEONE,

and as it was essential to the success of the pedition in its early stages to secure a good of carriers, a number of fine Kroo boys were gaged. Mr. McCall says :

> "This morning, April 2d, when it was made kn that I wanted boys, quite a crowd was collected first got two capital head-men, known to the a here ; fine, tall fellows, both over six feet high. I then set to work to procure the other twenty-t boys, as I felt it was wise to have one boy to donkey. After some time a fine lot was colle and I had them ranged up in line in front of me, inspected them severely, refusing the weak-loo and lanky ones. After the number required selected, they were passed in, one at a time, t office of the agent, and I took down their names arranged terms with them. At first they all ref to go to the Congo, saying it was a hard country 'plenty jigger' ; but when I explained to them t was a missionary, and that we were a mission p 'Oh, all right ! you be good man ; you do us right will go for missionary.'"

After leaving Sierra Leone, where, with trouble, at last the Kroo boys were got on b the Vanguard steamed for Mallacoree R where, alas ! she had a cargo of rum and g discharge. Fifteen hundred packages of th jurious cargo were put ashore at Benthy W occupying the ship's company a conside time.

The young missionaries held service in village on Sunday, and on the following da McCall made an excursion up the river wit captain. He administered quinine all rou a preventive, while the ship was lying in the Only one severe case of fever occurred on b and that yielded to treatment. Mr. C writes from this spot to Mr. and Mrs. Gui He says :

> "Last Sunday we had
>
> OUR FIRST SERVICE IN THE DARK CONTINE
>
> We were sorry to find that arrangements ha made to discharge the cargo on that day, and ing there would be no quiet on board, we deci go ashore and have a prayer-meeting in some shady place. We found some of the people on could speak English, being natives of Sierra They asked us if we were to 'have a churc when we agreed they were evidently delighte promised to let the neighbors know, so that al join us. We walked through the native town into the country a short distance, and, having a quiet spot, we held a prayer-meeting and r to the vessel.
>
> "In the afternoon we made our way to the which we had arranged to hold the service. I minutes about thirty assembled, all of whom speak and read English. We had a very hea

e. They seemed to be eager to know the word of od, and they sang Mr. Sankey's hymns with great rit.

"After the meeting one man asked brother Harvey speak with him for a short time. He said he had en cause of offence to one of his brethren then sent, and that in consequence of his conduct they re not friendly; he wished to acknowledge his lt and be reconciled to his brother. Harvey ught the two together, and explained to the offended that the offender wished to confess his fault. er he had spoken a few words to each, they shook ds, evidently with great satisfaction on both sides. offended then brought his wife, and, after an ex- ation from brother Harvey, she also shook hands the offender. They pressed us to hold a second ice on Monday afternoon, to which we gladly sented. I had some English tracts with me, which were very anxious to read. I gave them your ress, and said that if they would write to you re- sting a supply of tracts and hymn-books, I felt ain you would have some sent to them. You hear from them.

Being detained we had meetings also on Monday Tuesday evenings. Some of those present ex- sed a desire to throw in their lot with us. One g man has come with us; he had for two years with Bishop Crowther. He asked to be allowed company us, and to serve us, not for a salary, imply on the understanding that we would care im."

e last tidings received from this party dated April 16th. They were within three sail of Banana, the port at the mouth of Congo. We hope, therefore, that they landed t the 20th of April, and that they are by time well up the country. Now, especially, they need the earnest intercession of Chris- friends, that they may be preserved and ered, and have needed wisdom for their ult task.

MR. JOSEPH CLARKE.

at Aberdeen in 1858, and Early Education— ls into the Hurtful Practice of Novel-reading, Resolves to Study Profitable Subjects—At- ds an Evangelistic Meeting, and is Convert- e to Christ—Devotes Himself to Christian ort and Espouses Missionary Work in Africa.

E subject of this brief sketch, whose por- accompanies those of his companions in e, is a native of "the granite city" Aber- Scotland and was born in the year 1858, now twenty-two years of age. Having re- a moderate education at Buxburne Free h School, supplemented by further in- ion at Stoneywood Public School, where tendance was not particularly regular, his ile studies terminated before he was en years of age.

a long period after leaving school, he all his spare time in the debilitating prac- reading novels, so that when he reached teenth birthday he had forgotten nearly hing of practical and abiding value which acquired at school, He was induced to tock of his mental acquisitions, and the was a determination to equip himself in a manner for the work of life. He at once himself of the opportunities which came nd lay nearest to him. For two winters, eroic resolution and unflagging energy, he such scientific subjects as acoustics, heat, etc., and his diligence was reward- securing first class certificates for pro- y at the examinations. He studied arith- nd algebra also, with a gratifying meas- success. He became a Custom House at Aberdeen. The happy circumstances resulted in his conversion to Christ, we e in his own words:

the evening of the 13th of August, 1874, ded the first evangelistic meeting I ever sent at. That night I was spoken to by Christians, and then decided to live for but I was a considerable time (possibly eeks—I am not certain) ere I was able to Jesus."

ad been brought up in the Free Church land, and now had conferred upon him ce of Deacon, which he conscientiously and successfully sustained for nearly three years. But he felt that he was capable of doing more for Christ than seemed possible in his then sphere of service, and his attention was ultimately directed by the Divine Spirit to the charms and needs of the great foreign mission field. He says:

"My motive for becoming a missionary is simply that I may consecrate all my time to His work. . . . I do not know what first suggested such a course to me, but the desire has been in my mind for a long time. I have often sought to crush it out, and was helped in this direction by my friends, yet in the face of such opposition, it has taken root and grown."

Mr. Clarke was not without some experimental knowledge of the requirements of Christian service, for he had engaged in Sunday-school teaching, tract distributing, visiting the sick, and addressing evangelistic meetings as occasion demanded, and had been much blessed to the conversion of the souls of many who came within the scope of his humble and hearty ministrations, both by speaking and correspondence. Mentally, morally, and spiritually, he is well fitted for the arduous activities of the important work which he has so warmly espoused. The attitude of his mind and the ardent devotion of his heart to African missionary enterprise, may be clearly understood by the following extract from his farewell speech last March:

"Dear friends, I was struck very much, after I came to London, with one thing. It was a dark, foggy day, and I could scarcely see my way about, and there were people with lights of different kinds. I was struck with the great quantity of lights, as country people are. Now, away out in Africa, in some of those large heathen towns, which are, as travellers tell us, about two miles long, there is utter darkness at night. They have no lamps; they have to find their way about in darkness. And the worst of it is that they are also in dense spiritual darkness, not only in the night-time but in the day-time too. So far as the revelation from God is concerned, there is not a single light to light them on their way to glory.

"Just reflect dear friends, that there are hundreds of thousands in the regions of the Congo River who never heard of the living God. Compare that state of things with what we have here. Compare their ignorance with our knowledge. Compare their want of opportunity with our open Bible, our open churches, our prayer-meetings, and our Christian fellowship.

"Does not this appeal to your own hearts and does not your soul cry out before the Lord, 'Send forth light to Africa!' And when you pray for light to go to Africa, will you ask yourself, 'What am I doing to send light to Africa?' It is a question for each of us to consider. We want you also to be foreign missionaries. We want your sympathies to be with us in Africa, and not only your sympathies but your prayers and material assistance."

MR. JAMES HARVEY.

Birth in Kingston in 1852—Early Application to Business—His Conversion at the Age of 20—Successfully Engages in Work for Jesus, and is Led to Consecrate his Life to Missionary Effort in Africa—His Reasons, Estimates, and Hopes.

THIS gentleman, the friend and co-worker in the mission field with Messrs. McCall and Clarke, was born in 1852. His native place is the salubrious and beautiful town of Kingston-on-Thames, in the County of Surrey.

Having received a fair elementary education at the National School, which he subsequently improved and extended by attendance at evening classes, the exigencies of domestic circumstances—his father being dead—necessitated an early application to business, in order that his earnings might contribute to the family exchequer. He, therefore, entered the establishment of a clothier, with whom he remained for some time.

When about twenty years of age, the greatest crisis in the history of an immortal soul occurred. By the Divine enlightenment of the Holy Ghost he was led to see himself as a sinner who needed the forgiveness of the Heavenly Father and the spiritual change effected by the new birth. His cry for mercy was heard, his iniquities were pardoned through Jesus Christ, and through faith in the atonement of the Saviour he was filled with a holy peace, and stepped into the unspeakable freedom and blessedness of the sons of God.

And now the natural desire of a new-born soul began to manifest itself. Upon a profession of his faith in Jesus he was baptized and looked around him for some field in which he might work for the Master. In answer to much prayer for guidance, he was led to choose the mission field as most congenial to his feelings and desires, and though he had been much blessed in connection with open-air preaching and in Sunday-school work (five boys of his class having decided for Christ through his instrumentality), he conceived the hope—and in the strength of that hope he has left his native country and friends and gone into the interior of Africa—that God would more abundantly bless him in the midst of the sable sons and daughters of Ham, in the heart of the "Dark Continent."

Speaking at the valedictory meeting, in London, last March, Mr. Harvey said:

"If I am asked what is my motive for going to Africa and the Congo region, my reply is, Because of the need of the people. That is the chief reason in conjunction with the very important motive that the Lord has said to me, 'Go and preach the Gospel.' I would not place this second to any motive; I would pray the Lord that He would ever keep this prominent before my mind. The chief reason why we go out there is to obey this command and thus do His will. These people on both sides of the banks of the great River Congo, from one end to the other, have not heard the name of Jesus. They do not know anything about the true God. They know nothing about Christ.

"I have often thought what a glorious thing it would be if we, as a party, should be able by the blessing of God to give them the Scriptures, or some portion of them. I know it is a mighty work to translate the Scriptures in their entirety, and most probably not one of us will be able to accomplish this. But if we can only be instrumental in translating a portion and giving it to the people, what a glorious thing it would be! It would be worth living for, or even worth dying for; and I think if each of us had more lives than one to give to the work, it would be worth while to give them to such a glorious work as this.

"We know our path will not be a path of roses. We shall have a great many difficulties. There are the dangers of the climate which we shall have to encounter. Most probably all of us will be taken with fevers many times. When one of our brethren came back from the Congo lately, in consequence of being accidentally injured by a bullet, he told me he had had the fever one hundred times, although he had only been there fifteen months. We expect that we shall not be free from it either, although we believe the Lord is able to take care of us and raise us up. Then there will be the opposition of the traders. They are the determined opponents of the missionaries. Our brethren who are out there are suffering great opposition at the hands of the traders. A large part of the goods sent out there have to reach the traders first, and they have the power to greatly help or greatly hinder the mission work.

"Then there is the opposition of the natives, who, of course, do not know what is good for them. They naturally are unable to appreciate at first the fact that we are bringing the Gospel to them. It is most probable we shall suffer a great deal of opposition and persecution at their hands. We also expect a great deal of opposition from the Jesuits, who will probably make their appearance in due time. They have reached Lake Nyanza, and they are grievously opposing the missionaries who had been favorably received by King Mtesa in that distant part of Africa. We know very well we carry our lives in our hands. We know it is no easy matter and no light work to go abroad to the Congo region. But still we do believe that no matter how great the difficulties are, and even if they were ten-fold more formidable, the Lord is greater than the greatest difficulty. Our confidence is in the Lord. It is this that makes us go forth, and we believe there will be no uncertainty as to the result, namely, that the Gospel we are carrying with us will really be the power of God to the salvation of those poor heathen.

"Our brethren who have gone out there before us have had great success, but I think one reason why they have been so successful is because they have been very much prayed for by God's people. Let us ask you to do the same for us as many have been doing already. May the Lord go with us and remain with you for His name's sake."

SIN'S INTRENCHMENTS.

An Evening Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday, May 2, 1880.

" Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost."—Acts 7: 51.

The Heart a Castle—Its Fortifications—I. Prejudice — Ministers and Churches — Choice Always Possible — II. Social Influences — The Finger of Scorn—Prayerless Companions—Rowland Hill and "Fine Sport"—Two and Two—III. Intellectual Perplexity—A Hundred Questions—The One Point—IV. Pernicious Habits — A Strong Fortress — The Maniac Engineer—God's Matchless Grace—V. Pride and Rebellion—The Crisis of the Battle—A Flank Movement—The Careless Scotchman—" The Tide is Rising!"—Scene at the Battle of Gettysburg.

STEPHEN was within a few hours of martyrdom. These were the last words of his sermon. In a few hours he would be taken out to a precipice, and hurled over the rocks, and then the boulders dropped on him. Just before that hour of martyrdom he looks into the face of the people, and preaches a very plain, honest sermon ; and among other things tells them, " Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost."

Stephen had found out what has been found out in all ages, that there is in the human heart a great capacity for resistance—resistance to good influences, resistance to bad influences. The fact is, the heart is a castle, and it is mightily fortified, and it is not very easily taken. When war opens, and a city or a fortress is to be taken, there are earth-works thrown up in semicircles—one line of fortifications, perhaps, fifteen miles away, another line of fortifications ten miles away, another one mile away ; and all these intrenchments must be taken, and all these fortifications captured, before the fort of the castle is overthrown.

Now I have to tell you to-night that the heart is in a struggle naturally against God. There are intrenchments, there are fortifications thrown up, and we must take them one by one before the soul will surrender itself to God. You know how men will fight for their wives and children when they go into a contest like that. There are lightnings in their eye, and their finger is a spear and their voice is like the whirlwind.

You have heard how the men of O'Brien went into battle. They had fallen, and were wounded and in hospital ; they desired that they might be brought out, and that stakes might be driven into the ground, and they fastened to the stakes, and then with their right arms free they fought to the death. But I have to tell you that the strongest battle ever waged is between Christ and the human soul. It will be my intention for a few moments to show you what are the lines of fortifications to be captured before the soul finally yields ; and I will begin with the outworks.

I. The first line of fortification to be captured is in many hearts against ministers and against churches. Sometimes men are roughly jostled in churches ; they have some difficulty about the pew-rent, or they are in somewise maltreated in the church, and they say, " I want nothing to do with the house of God ; I have had enough to do with the churches of Jesus Christ for the rest of my life." And they have very harsh prejudices against ministers of the Gospel, and all those prejudices are heaped up into a great line of fortification, which must be captured, or their souls will never be taken for God.

PREJUDICE

Now, my brother, is there not one church where you might worship? is there not one minister of religion from whose lips you would receive the truth? That is the beauty of living in a large city like this : you can have your pick of churches and your pick of ministers—churches rich and poor, churches aristocratic and churches democratic ; Calvinistic and Arminian churches ; ministers white and black ; ministers educated and ignorant ; ministers wearing a costly gown or in a plain coat ; ministers argumentative or figurative, poetic or statistical. You have a large number from which to make a selection ; and I think you are willing to confess that to-night there is at least one church somewhere where you can worship, and one minister of the Gospel somewhere through whom you may receive the truth.

Oh, my brother, make your selection, and go to that people and say, " Where thou livest I will live ; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God : where thou dwellest will I dwell ; and may the Lord do to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me." Oh, do you not find your prejudices against churches and ministers of the Gospel giving way? Will you not approach that fortification to-night, crying, Victory through our Lord Jesus Christ?

II. But there is another line of fortification that must be taken before we can reach the soul. In many cases there is the high battlement of SOCIAL INFLUENCES.

There are some of you who move in circles where all the influences are antagonistic to the Christian religion. If to-night you will yield your heart to God, to-morrow you will feel the volleys of sarcasm, and caricature, and scorn, and ribaldry. There are some men in your association who would rather be shot than kneel and cry before God for mercy.

There is a young man who, if he should come to God to-night, would to-morrow at the store, or factory, or shop be greeted by some one who would say, " Well, John, how is your soul? What's the news from Heaven? Getting ready for a fast? You are not mad, I hope. Christians ought not to get mad. When do you expect to be translated?" And some of you find that your associates are among those who ordinarily spend the Sabbath evenings in playing cards, and drinking wine, and smoking cigars, and never using the word " God" save in profanity. You admit that you know better than I can tell you that your social surroundings are a high wall which it is almost impossible for you to get over, and that wall must be taken before you yield your heart to God.

My friend, when you come to die, will you send for those godless companions? What will they do for you when heart and flesh shall fail? When the trumpet sounds, do you want to rise in their resurrection? Though they might come into your sick-room and pour out the medicine, and shake up your pillow, they could not pray if in some paroxysm of physical suffering you should ask for prayer. In all that round of association there is not one man that could pray. Two and two they went into the room. How many go two and two on the way to death! It does not take more than one evil companion to destroy you.

Rowland Hill one night was on his way to Surrey Chapel, and he saw two men by a lamp in the street, and he heard them talking, and one said to the other, " Let's go over and hear old Rowland Hill preach to-night, and we shall have some fine sport." Rowland Hill marked them well, so he would know them. He entered his pulpit, and those men entered the gallery, and came very near the pulpit. The peculiarity of that church is, the pulpit is so near the gallery that last summer, when I was preaching in that very pulpit, they handed me the notices from the gallery into the pulpit. Well, Rowland Hill went on with his description that night, and finally he described the sorrows of the sinner's death-bed : darkness added to darkness—no hope, but despair and agony ; and then he pointed his finger to those two men in the gallery and said, " That will be fine sport for you."

And then he went on describing the day of judgment—that day for which all other days were made—the rocks, the mountains, and the burning seas, and then he pointed to those two men and said, " That will be fine sport for you." And then he went on to describe the eternity of the lost ; no light, no eliverance, eternity, eternity ; and then he pointed to those two men in the gallery and said, " That will be fine sport for you." The truth went straight to their hearts, and then and there they yielded themselves to God. Two and two they had been going down the path of sin ; two and two that night they came into the kingdom of God.

But we must confess what many of you say that social influences are keeping you away from God, away from heaven, away from peace. And yet the Lord Jesus Christ comes to that fortification to-night. He comes over it, he come through it. Victory through our Lord Jesu Christ!

III. There is another line of fortification between your soul and God. It may be about religion.

INTELLECTUAL PERPLEXITY

There are a hundred questions about th miracles ; there are a hundred questions abou the 9th chapter of Romans ; there is a setting passage against passage, in seeming contradi tion. Here a fortification comes up, Colens on the Pentateuch, Renan's " Life of Christ, Thomas Paine's " Age of Reason." High and higher goes the battlement until no huma argument can get over it. Only the Lord Go Almighty can bring down the fortification. The are a thousand questions which you might a me that I could not answer ; questions about th character of God, questions about the immorta ity of the soul, questions about the resurrectio day, questions about why God let sin come in the world, questions as to who is Melchised questions about this, and questions about that

Ah, my friend, we have no interest in the subjects to-night. The one subject now bef us is, that you are a sinner, and that Christ di to redeem you. Let us agree on that one poi Let us take these two theories of our theology a put them together, and that is enough to int duce us into the kingdom of God. Let Ren and Colenzo, great guns, blaze away ; they ca not keep Christ from taking this fortress to-nig He comes and knocks not at the gate of head, but at the gate of the heart ; and while is pounding at that gate I hear Him say, " Blo stained at the door I knock. Whosoever open to Me, I will come in, and sup with h and he with Me."

Oh, are you not willing to-night to surren all these perplexing questions, and ask that pl old-fashioned question, which I read at the op ing of this service, " Men and brethren, w must I do to be saved?"

Christ comes to that fortress, to that specu ive trouble, and intellectual perplexity, down it goes, down it goes forever. You m believe ; you do believe ; you believe now.

IV. But there is another fortification th to be captured before the soul can be take some cases, and that is the fortification of

PERNICIOUS HABIT.

You may say that the Lord Jesus Christ not dispute in your soul's supremacy with st drink ; yet you must give up your dissipatio you can never enter the kingdom of our L Oh, you say, it is impossible for me to giv my habits. I remember that that wall has going up higher and higher, five years, ten y twenty years, thirty years, forty years, going higher and higher, between you and Ch And yet that fortress is to be taken, that forti tion is to come down, the Lord Jesus Chr to save your soul to-night.

Years ago the cholera came to New Orl and there was great excitement, and the p wanted to get out of the city of New Orl and one eventide a steamer put out from city, heavily laden with passengers, and they had been a few hours out the engineer the cholera and died. The captain, in grea turbance, great fright, rushed through the and asked if there was an engineer there, if was any man who could commmand that sh engineer. After a while a man with a pe look stood up and said, I am an engineer, take command of this engine. And so h put in possession of that work, and the ca retired.

But on their way they were awakened by the v lent motion of the ship and machinery, with t or ahead, and they found that the man who h taken the office of engineer was a maniac; as soon as he saw the captain he said, "atan has commissioned me to drive this ship to erdition." By wonderful stratagem they got down, and got him away, and the ship and many passengers were saved.

h, are there not men here who are being engi ered by maniac passion; that do not dare to give up their passions, seemingly commissi ed by the powers of darkness to drive them and to drive them down? Nothing but the et nal God can bring down that influence and de ver that soul. And yet I have known people seemed to think the grace of God were y exhausted. Why, God can come and take th man lying in the very ditch of his iniquity, an save him as easily as He can save the most e and elegant sinner that ever bowed at the of the cross. "Whosoever will, let him c e and take of the water of life freely." Al ough that fortification between your soul an Christ is so strong, this moment I cry, Victo through our Lord Jesus Christ! Down goes t ortress, and Christ the Lord enters.

I have also to remark there is another fo fication to be taken, and that is an the rebellion of the natural heart. This is th ast fortification, but this is the crisis of the ba e. If this be not taken it makes no differen whether the others are taken or not.

THE PRIDE

w sometimes a besieging army, instead of go over a fortification, and through the intre hment, will make a flank movement; and th ne easily surrenders, and I do not know but th Christ in some unexpected way will come up your soul, and within the next five minutes you shall look up any say, 'My Lord and my Go" Oh, you say, the door of my heart has be so long bolted against Christ, the bolts are rusty, the doors are so unused to swinging that Christ might not come in." Then I ; and take the cross of Christ as a battering- and I strike against the door and drive it at Christ may enter with all the charms s grace and all the pardon of His love.

that that door of the soul might to-night the door of that human soul, the back-door! I beat against that door with the s of heaven and the groanings of hell. Oh ha Sinai might open its cannonade! Oh, ha the anxiety of your Christian father, that the rayers of a loving mother, might put their sh ders against that door, the backward door! st open; if it ever surrenders, it must come fro the inside, by cheerful consent, by your wil Then it will come down amid ten thousan booming batteries of the judgment and ete ty. The day of grace is almost gone for The sun begins to dip below the horizon, hat some of us do we must do quickly.

ere was a man walking on the beach in Scotand and the tide was rising, and he did not it was rising. He did not know of any peri and he was walking along carelessly, and who understood his danger stood on the and shouted, "Halloo! The tide is rising; up on the rocks, or your retreat will be f." But he went on, he recognized no peril, no care until it was too late: his retreat ut off, he began to climb the rocks, and lf way up, and the sea came to the ankle, came to the knee, and it came to the and it came to the chin, and with a shriek ished.

to-night the tides of eternity seem to bout us, coming higher and higher. I "Halloo, halloo! the tide is rising, de is rising." "Oh," says some one here, "I don't see any peril." And es on in his thoughtlessness, and he on in sin, and he makes light of it. But de is rising meantime, and after a while an sees his peril, but it is too late. He ome to the foot of the rocks, his eyes rolling terror, his hands flung up; and with a shriek he dies amid a long reverberating echo. Oh, I wish I could ring the bells of heaven to-night so clearly that all the people would come and sit at the gospel feast! Some have come, and yet there is room—room by the side of Christ, room at the banquet of eternal love, and yet, and yet there is room. Room for all this multitude of people. Room for all in all these galleries. I do not ask what is your history, nor where you came from, nor what have been your sins. Whosoever will, let him come.

A surgeon was wounded in the battle at Gettysburg, and he told me afterward that being wounded he could not attend to the sufferings of others, and he could not take care of his own wound, and he lay on the heights of Gettysburg looking off upon that battle. And he saw the armies in the valley, now one army triumphant, now the other. The tide of battle was waving backward and the fate of the nation being decided; and he said the scene was overwhelming as he lay there on the height looking out upon the battle.

So to-night I stand on the height of Zion, and I look off upon the valley of Decision, the forces of light and the forces of darkness in contest about your soul. Now one side victorious, now the other. The tide of battle rolls forward and backward, backward and forward; and the next hour, the next half hour, the next five minutes, may decide the contest. Oh, God help us! If this be our last chance for heaven, let us embrace it. Show this whole audience that now is the time of salvation. Grieve not the Holy Spirit. "My spirit shall not always strive with man." *

"To-day, if ye will hear His voice,
Now is the time to make your choice;
Say, will you to Mount Zion go?
Say, will vou have this Christ or no?"

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 185,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

A CONVERTED JEW'S SUFFERINGS FOR CHRIST.

By the Rev. Burman Cassin, M.A.

THAT devoted man of God, Mr. Fisk, once thrilled my soul by an anecdote he told me. He said that some years previously he had been called upon to baptize an adult Israelite, who had been brought to acknowledge the Lord Jesus Christ. He remembered well the circumstance, and the gathering of his congregation on the week-day evening, and he said he should never forget to his dying day the peculiar thrill that seemed to run through him as he admitted that young Jewish convert into Christ's Church.

What happened to that young man? He was a son of a great and influential merchant in a Continental city. He had been obliged to leave his home for the purpose of business—and he was a young man in a good way of business—but the news of his conversion had travelled home, and he had received letters banishing him from his father's house. However, he heard that his mother was on her death-bed, and he determined that he would go and see whether he could not receive her blessing before she died. He therefore went as quickly as he could.

He arrived at the family mansion. It was a large and important mansion in that city. He knocked at the door; the door was opened by the butler—the old butler that had known him from a boy. The moment the butler saw him, although the eldest son of the house, he slammed the door in his face, and he was driven thus away from his paternal roof. He knocked again. This time, when the door was opened, his sister was running down the steps to the door. He saw her; he rushed toward her; and instead of falling upon his neck, and greeting him with a sister's love, she cast him a look almost diabolical, and she spat in his face. But that was not the worst experience which he had to undergo. Immediately behind his sister was his father, and his father came up to him and gave him a fiendish look, pointed a loaded pistol at his breast, and said if he did not go away from that door he would kill him. That young man had to undergo that for Christ.

The Jews have been persecuted in every country of Europe, and they have had good reason to deplore the spirit of intolerance which has moved many professed Christians. This incident shows that they have learned from their experience lessons of retaliation and are in some instances at least disposed to manifest the very spirit from which they have suffered so much.

HOW A POPISH PRIEST WAS CONVERTED.

ONE day Pastor Chiniquy preached in the great Cathedral of Montreal, a building which would hold 15,000 people, on the Virgin Mary, and argued that, as men were rebels against God, they must seek an intercessor, and as a man would always grant the petition of his mother, the Virgin Mary was the best intercessor. His sermon was very successful, and the Bishop of Montreal complimented him at its conclusion. That evening he chanced to read Matthew 12: 46–50 (and Mark 3: 31-35 was to the same effect), and the thought struck him that Jesus had not answered any petition or complied with any request of His mother after entering upon His ministry. He searched through the Gospel, and found that this was so. At the marriage in Cana He made wine for the guests, not at the request of His mother, but because He took compassion on them Himself.

It seemed as if Jesus had spoken as is recorded in the Gospels with a view to prevent that particular elevation of Mary into an intercessor which he had advocated that morning. A voice like the roaring of thunder sounded in his ears, telling him that he had preached a lie in preaching that Jesus always granted His mother's petitions. He did so as a child, but from the day He and His father were one He refused every one of her requests. He wished to have no interference between humanity and Himself. After passing the night in great mental agony, he next morning met the Bishop and told him of the conclusion he had come to—that it was wrong to pray to the Virgin Mary.

He subsequently became an earnest Protestant Christian, and entered the ministry of the Presbyterian Church, in Canada. The great success that this active Christian has had in bringing 25,000 Roman Catholics of Canada to the study of the Word of God, and into separation from the corrupt communion and superstitious practices of the Church of Rome, marks him as a great champion of the Christian faith, and an undaunted hero in his assaults on the great citadel of scriptural and ecclesiastical error at Rome.

A Situation Obtained Through a Wooden Hat.—A man in search of employment applied to an eminent engineering firm near Birmingham, England, for a situation, but was refused. As he was turning away disheartened, the engineer noticed he had a peculiar hat in his hand. He called the man back and asked him what the hat was made of. The man replied that it was made of wood, and he had turned it himself on a lathe, being too poor to buy a new hat. Explanations followed, from which it was found that the man had invented a lathe which would turn oval articles as well as round ones. His ingenuity won for him the respect of the engineer, and he was at once engaged. This occurred in 1780. and the name of the man with the timber hat was William Murdoch, who afterward became famous as the pioneer of steam traffic in England.

---

* Gen. 6: 3.

ROCHESTER TOWER.

By Miss M. A. Paull.

(Continued from page 551.)

Mrs. Mitchell's Cordiality—Mutual Sympathy—The Clergyman Introduced—The New Pupils—London Babies.

Constance Anerley was shown to her room by Mrs. Mitchell.

"Tea will be ready in half an hour," said the lady kindly; then continued, "I hope you won't mind little Maud having her bed in your room. I ought to have mentioned it, I expect, but I hope you will forgive me; it will be such a comfort to me to feel that she is under kind care at night. She is only five years old, and the nurse will come and take her away at seven o'clock, or earlier, if you wish."

"I have no objection whatever," said Constance, "to her being here, and seven will do nicely."

"Thank you." Mrs. Mitchell hesitated. "I wish I could have met you at the station myself," she added.

"It was very kind to think of sending any one," said Constance.

"Percy was to have gone alone," said Mrs. Mitchell, "but—" she hesitated again, and colored.

Constance quickly guessed what Mrs. Mitchell failed to utter.

"What a fine, gentlemanly boy your son is, and how like you, Mrs. Mitchell," she said, adroitly changing the subject.

The mother's face beamed with pleasure. "Did you like him? I am so glad! Every one almost does, I think, though Robbie is Aunt Lack's favorite. My two girls, Claudia and Esther, come next to Percy, and then Robbie and Alf, Maud and baby make up the family. We lost a dear child between Maud and our little Sydney," and the mother's eyes filled.

She looked so sad and helpless at that memory, so like Constance's own mother had looked in her hours of distress and bereavement, that almost unwittingly the young girl drew near and kissed her.

Mrs. Mitchell seemed pleased, although surprised.

"Forgive me, dear madam," said Constance, "if I have acted strangely. I am so used to trying to comfort; will you not let me sympathize so far as I can in any way with you?"

"Dear Miss Anerley, I see we shall be friends," said Mrs. Mitchell, "and yet, do you know, I almost dreaded; I thought you might be all head and no heart, you are so clever. But, dear me, do pardon me, I am taking up the time you require to refresh yourself after your journey," and she softly closed the door behind her as she hastily quitted the apartment.

"I fancy Aunt Julia Lack will be my only bête noire here," thought Constance.

Mr. Mitchell made his appearance at tea, which had been hastened an hour to suit the arrival of the new governess. A tall, stout, well-proportioned, handsome man, with a florid, handsome-featured face, fair complexion, blue eyes, benign expression, and a general manner of being well-to-do and well esteemed by his fellows, with rather more than a suspicion in his air of being also generally well pleased with himself.

It was really no wonder, for in his home, by his sweet wife, he was continually and continuously worshipped, his tastes, his habits, his wishes were studied, attended to, and fulfilled. She had no will, as it seemed, but to wait on him, to keep the best of everything for him, to beseech forgiveness if she offended him in the least particular, to take his opinions for her own, or if she differed to maintain a modest silence. It was not quite good for the Rev. Rowland Mitchell; but he enjoyed the easy, happy life he led, and was good enough to be generally sweet-tempered and obliging.

In his soft, agreeable voice he greeted Constance Anerley kindly, and expressed the hope that his children would not give her very much trouble.

Then he introduced his two little girls to her, Claudia, aged thirteen, and Esther, aged eleven, and told them not to feel shy, for Miss Anerley would be very kind to them.

They were pretty children: Claudia, fair and sweet, like both her father and mother; Esther, saucy, defiant, with a decided temper lurking in the dark quick eyes which she now turned upon her governess.

"I hope you will be able to make scholars of them, Miss Anerley," continued Mr. Mitchell, in his measured cadence. "At present they do nothing but play, do they, my dear?" and he turned to his wife.

"I have tried, since Miss Ash left, to give them a little instruction each day, dear," said Mrs. Mitchell meekly.

The reverend gentleman smiled tenderly at her as he went on, in that same measured tone in which he had before spoken, "Yes, love, but no one could expect you to do much with all your other duties."

"I have learned more with mother than I did all the time with Miss Ash, I do believe," said Esther impulsively; "because she explains things to us so nicely. I wish mother had time to teach us enough."

"Remember," said her father, looking amused, "that you are speaking in Miss Anerley's presence."

"Oh, if Miss Anerley is worth anything, she won't mind my loving mother best, will you?" she asked, turning her dark eyes frankly, yet inquiringly, upon the new governess.

"Certainly not," replied Constance, smiling. "I should think you had very poor taste if you did not, Esther. All I can promise is that I will try very much to explain things to you, if you will tell me what you do not understand."

"Very good," said Mr. Mitchell. "Now, children, take your seats." The door opened, and a little boy of nine, looking decidedly untidy, made his appearance.

"Why, Robbie, where have you been? You're not fit to sit down with us," said his father.

"I've been fishing, father; I've caught—"

"Never mind now," said Mrs. Mitchell; "go quickly to Ellis and ask her to make you ready for tea."

"I'm ready enough, mother," laughed Robbie; "for I'm awful hungry."

"You hear what grammar is spoken by your pupils at present," remarked Mr. Mitchell to Constance, in a tone blended of annoyance and apology; "there is plenty of work before you in the school-room."

"I am not afraid of work," she answered.

The first evening at Brighton having passed away, and a sufficient introduction for our present purpose having been made of the various members of the Rev. Mr. Mitchell's family, we will once more direct our attention to a scene with which we are already familiar.

The babies of every community form an important part of its population. From them in a few years must arise the workmen and workwomen of the world. A country's future depends upon its babies. What a strange thought that is, as we look upon the wee creatures smiling or crying, all unconscious of their strange and important destiny, only anxious for their present wants to be satisfied. What a sad thought it becomes when we behold the dirty squalor, the sickly misery, the wicked surroundings, among which so many of our babies grow.

Miss Calvert, of the Albert Mission, that noble-souled, true-hearted woman, full of simple Christian love and enthusiastic delight in doing good to her fellows, felt that if her Mission Hall and its adjuncts were to do all the good she desired in the neighborhood, she must establish a day nursery as one of its agencies. It would, without any doubt, be very much better if all mothers could stay at home and learn by constant experience how to take good care of the precious little lives committed to them by the Father of mercies, but there were the penniless wives of drunken husbands, and toiling widows, and destitute mothers, some through their sins, some through the sins of others, who m either work or starve, and their babies ran te ble risks of being left to perish the while.

There were also abandoned mothers who perilled their children's lives, and from wh their children must be saved. Things mi have been arranged in a much happier, more ural way for both mothers and babies, if Calvert, instead of toiling in the Albert St Mission Hall, could have shut up all the pu houses in London, or banished strong d from them, as she would have done with int and prayerful joy.

But we have to meet the wants of a prof edly Christian land, which possesses an une able and terrible rate of infant mortality, wh all good men and women long to check, jus our foreign missionaries long to save the l girls in China, or the neglected, buried-a little victims of parental neglect in Africa. S truly Christian "Miss Ophelias" still hav see to the ablution of these poor little w "Topsies" of ours, and hide their own pai sensations the while as best they may.

One large room was fitted up with simple dles and cots, a few bright pictures were h on the walls; some little chairs and stools low forms and a few cheap playthings ranged around, while in an adjoining r baths were provided and changes of rai were hung, for it was imperative that the dren brought to the Albert Street day nur should in almost every instance be care washed and dressed in clean garments on daily admission.

It is delightful to visit a crèche, or day sery, when the little ones are all in nice for visitors. But there is a great deal of ger and disagreeable work to be done before blessed consummation is arrived at. We not be too thankful that God has raised a of loving women, some to direct and son perform this useful work.

Miss Calvert's aide de camp, as she laugh called her, in the day-nursery, was Emily ley. The somewhat delicate state of her h made it imperative that she should not go an evening except in very warm weather she was anxious to continue to labor in the sion in which her beloved father had been terested, and her love for children amount a passion. Three mornings a week Emmie with the Albert Street babies, expending them the gentle, loving attentions which a solutely necessary to the development of he intelligent babyhood.

And on the mornings she could not come Calvert often said she believed Emmie w for them as much as ever, begging some sary appliances for them from chance vi making up old garments into new for their persons, devising cheap, safe toys, ma empty cotton-reels, or fashioning knitted and rag dolls to amuse them.

Salome Stanley had caught some sligh pulse from the enthusiasm of her frien had already good-naturedly bestowed up institution quite a treasury of toys, to with some more valuable adjuncts to c and cleanliness, such as towels, sponge sheets.

One morning she said to Emily, "I w go to Albert Street with you to-day, Emm am anxious to see little Thomas."

Thomas was a blind child, two years o whom Emmie petted very much, and who case might well awaken commiseration.

Emily Anerley was delighted. So th young ladies set out together, and Salome ley encountered that day a closer conta the absolute wretchedness that attends s guilt than she had ever done before. Sh sometimes believed, ignorant as she was she had herself tasted to the dregs the human woe, the trouble that wrong brings in its train; now she learned how mitigations her own lot possessed over t her still more wretched fellow-creatures.

These poor little babies in the day-nursery, hose still poorer ones outside, over whom no ind earthly hands had as yet spread a canopy f love, yet above all of whom, equally with the nfant heirs of earthly crowns, the tender Shepherd of the sheep and lambs watches ever.

(To be continued.)

HE END OF THE 6000 YEARS FROM THE CREATION, IN 1890.

THE 6000 years from the creation of man are n good grounds understood to terminate in the cond coming of Christ and the Millennium.

is a belief of great antiquity that the SIX AYS of creation foreshadowed the six periods of thousand years each, during the Patriarchal, wish, and Christian dispensations, and that e SEVENTH DAY of rest typefied the seventh riod of a thousand years, of the millennial disnsation. This idea was entertained among the ws long before the birth of Christ; and Scripre warrant for it has been afforded by the atement that "one day is with the Lord as a ousand years" (2 Pet. 3 : 8), and that "there naineth therefore a rest (sabbatismos, a keep- of the Sabbath, a Sabbatical septenary) to people of God" (Heb. 4 : 9). This seventh riod of a thousand years—the Millennium—is own in the nineteenth and twentieth chapters Revelation to commence with the resurrecn of the righteous, the advent of Christ, the ining of Satan, etc.; and after its termination battle of Gog and Magog, the resurrection of wicked, and the burning of the earth take ce.

Bishop Russell says on this subject: "The dition that the earth, as well as the religious te of its inhabitants, is to undergo a great nge at the end of 6000 years, has been found the writings of Pagans, Jews, and Christns; because six days were employed by Alghty God in the creation of the globe, after ich He rested on the seventh; and, as with n one day is as a thousand years, and a thoud years as one day, it was concluded by the balists and Jews that the world was to conue 6000 years; and on the conclusion of this iod there would succeed a Sabbath of a thoud years of corresponding length, a Millenm of rest and of peace. This idea has been ced in the Sibylline oracles, in the poems of siod, in Plato, and prevailed long before the h of Christ, relative to a momentous change ch is supposed to await the earth after a pe d not exceeding 6000 years. We find this extation expressed by the Chaldeans, the Perns, the Egyptians, the Greeks, the Romans—tors, poets, philosophers; and the only diffiy we experience in the examination of the ords collected from the literature of ages is ccount for so great unanimity of sentiment re we cannot discover any source of information, or any authority which so many different ers would consent to acknowledge for a conion so remarkable."

he infidel historian, Gibbon, testifies to the valence of this opinion during the first four uries of the Christian era. He says (chap. 15): The ancient and popular doctrine of the milnium was intimately connected with the sec coming of Christ. As the works of the cren had been finished in six days, their duration he present state, according to a tradition* ch was attributed to the prophet Elijah, was d to six thousand years. By the same anal it was inferred that this long period of labor contention, which was now almost elapsed, ld be succeeded by a joyful Sabbath of a sand years; and that Christ, with the trihant band of the saints and the elect who escaped death, or who had been miraculously revived, would reign upon earth till the time appointed for the last and general resurrection. So pleasing was this hope to the mind of believers that the New Jerusalem, the seat of this blissful kingdom, was adorned with all the gayest colors of the imagination. A felicity consisting only of pure and spiritual pleasures would have appeared too refined for its inhabitants, who were still supposed to possess their human nature and senses. A city was therefore erected of gold and precious stones, and a supernatural plenty of corn and wine was bestowed on the adjacent territory. The assurance of such a Millennium was carefully inculcated by a succession of fathers, from Justin Martyr and Irenæus, who conversed with the immediate disciples of the apostles, down to Lactantius. Though it might not be universally received, it appears to have been the reigning sentiment of the orthodox believers."

Gibbon further states that after the fourth century this view began to decline, the papal corruptions completely obscured it; but since the great revival of religion at the time of the revolutions of 1793, increased attention has been given to the prophecies regarding the millennium, and the views of the Primitive Church respecting it have again become prevalent.

There is another striking type meriting observation in this connection. As God concluded the six days of creation by forming the literal body of the first Adam out of the dust of the earth, and breathing into it the spirit of life, so, at the conclusion of the 6000 years, at the second coming of Christ, God will, by His resurrection power, raise to life and form the mortal dust of His deceased saints into the mystical body of the second Adam—the glorified Church of Christ—and breathe upon them the Holy Spirit in immeasurable abundance.

This expectation of the advent of Christ at the end of 6000 years acquires additional importance from the fact that they appear from the chronological data of the Bible to terminate somewhere about 1890, and thus the birth of Christ was about 4110 years from the creation. All the periods that make up this 4110 years are explicitly stated in Scripture, excepting one interval of 79 years, from Cyrus's first year, B.C. 535-6, until Artaxerxes's seventh year, 456 B.C., and the exact length of this interval is decided by Ptolemy's Canon, and the Histories of Herodotus, Xenophon, Prideaux, etc.

The commonly received Chronology of Usher, which has been adopted in the marginal references of Bibles, places Christ's Nativity about the year 4004, but the recent researches of Clinton and others show that Usher missed out at least 100 years out of the whole period of the Judges, making that period to be about 350 instead of 450 years, as stated in Acts 13 : 20.

Usher gives B.C. 1444 in Joshua 14, as the date of the dividing of the land of Canaan and the beginning of the period of the Judges, and B.C. 1094-5 in 1 Samuel 12, as the date when the era of the Judges ended, and Saul was made king. Now, this gives only 350 years as the period of the reigns of the Judges, whereas Paul said, in Acts 13 : 20, "He divided their land to them by lot, and after that He gave them Judges about the space of four hundred and fifty years (450) until Samuel the prophet; and afterward they desired a king, and God gave them Saul by the space of forty years," etc. Later chronologers, avoiding the errors of Usher, and basing their computations upon the statements of Scripture, arrive at the period of 1870 to 1890 as the end of the 6000 years.

Thus, the 6000 years have been computed by the subjoined writers, who have carefully traced and examined each link in the chronological chain, to terminate at the following points of time: about 1870, by Rev. Dr. Seiss, in his valuable lectures on the "Last Times," and by Rev. Dr. Mahan in his "Palmoni"; about 1872, by Rev. C. Bowen, whose tables were published in 1851 in Elliott's "Horæ Apocalypticæ,'" and by Rev. James Scott, in his "Millennium Vindicated," and also by Edward Flower, in his "Wonders of Divine Arithmetic," and by P. H. Gosse, in "The 6000 Years"; about 1875, by Rev. W. Thurman, in his "Sealed Book of Daniel Opened"; about 1881, by R. Brothers, in his "True Ages of the World" (published in 1794), and by Sylvester Bliss, in his able "Sacred Chronology."

The subjoined table of the Scripture period shows, however, that the 6000 years terminate about 1890; and that we have, in fact, almost arrived at the Saturday midnight of the world's week of 7000 years. The six days are nearly ended, and the seventh day of 1000 years is about to commence. The correctness of the following chronological table can be verified in a few hours by any person who will refer to the Scripture passages quoted.

THE BIBLE CHRONOLOGY OF THE WORLD.

Anno Mundi.	Before Christ.
0	4110	(1) The Creation of Man to the close of the Deluge. (Gen. 5. and 8 : 13–14)........................	1656
1656	2454	(2) Close of the Deluge to the birth of Terah. (Gen. 11 : 10–24)....	222
1878	2232	(3) Terah's birth to his son Abraham's removal to Canaan. (Acts 7:6; Gen. 11 :32; 12 : 1 5)....	205
2083	2027	(4) Abraham's removal to the date of the Exodus. (Ex. 12 : 40; Gal. 3 : 8–17)........................	430
2513	1597	(5) The Exodus to the distribution of the land. (2 yrs. Num. 10 : 11 to 13 : 25; and 45 yrs. Josh. 14.)..	47
2560	1550	(6) The dividing of the land to the end of Samuel's judgeship. (Acts 13 : 20; Josh. 14.)........	450
3010	1100	(7) Reigns of Saul, David and Solomon (40 yrs. each.) (Acts 13 : 21; 2 Sam. 5:4; 2 Kings, 11 : 42)	120
3130	980	(8) End of Solomon's reign to Jehoiakim's fourth year. (1 Kings 11:43 to 2 Kings 25, and Jer. 25.).....	375
3504	605	(9) The 70 years' captivity from Jehoiakim's fourth year until Cyrus' first year. (2 Kings 24 : 8 to 16; Ez. 1.; Jer. 25 : 12)...	70
3574	535	(10) Cyrus' 1st year to the midst of Artaxerxes Longimanus' 7th year (by the common chronology).. (Cyrus 7 years, Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes—Ex. 4 : 6-7—8 years, Darius—Ez. 6 : 1—36½ years, Xerxes, 21 years, Artaxerxes Longimanus (¼ years.)	79
3653	456	(11) The midst of Artaxerxes Longimanus' 7th year to the birth of Christ. (Dan. 9 : 24–26; Ez. 7)... (Daniel's 70 weeks are generally held to begin about A.D. 455-6 in Artaxerxes' seventh year.)	456
4110	0	Total, from the creation of Adam to the birth of Christ.	4110
		Add (for the period of the Christian dispensation.	1890
		Total from the creation of Adam to the Millennium.	6000

(To be continued.)

The Infidel and the Burned Jail.—The Following incident was related by the Rev. H. Webb-Peploe, an eminent English clergyman: "I remember once visiting an infidel in my district who was on his death-bed.

As soon as I spoke to him of religion he said, 'Well, you had better stop that nonsense; I do not fear God, and if there is one, I am quite ready to die.' I paused for a moment, and said, 'My dear friend, it does not matter to God one bit whether you believe in His existence or not. You cannot alter facts. If you owed some builder £10,000, and I paid it for you, and you were to lie in jail, and refuse to come out, and perish because that jail is to be burned, that jail would be burned with you in it, simply because you won't come out, and will not believe that the debt is paid.' 'Well,' he said, 'that is a rum story, sir; nobody ever told me so before. Do you mean that God paid my debt, and it won't touch the fact whether I believe it or not?' 'Yes,' I said, 'it is a fact.' I saw him afterward several times. He renounced his infidelity and became a Christian.

---

* his tradition was that "the earth should be 2,000 s without the law, 2,000 years under the law, and years under the Messiah." One or two hundred ations to the same effect, from the fathers and r writers, are given in Elliott's "Horæ Apocacæ," vol. iv., and in Taylor's "Voice of the ch."

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

SINGLE COPIES can most conveniently be obtained through newsdealers. Any complaint that the CHRISTIAN HERALD cannot be obtained from a particular newsdealer is promptly attended to if we are given the name and street address of the dealer who does not keep it for sale.

NOTICE.

To give our readers an opportunity of introducing the Christian Herald to their friends, we will send the paper post free to any address from 1st October, to 31st December, 1880, on receipt of 25 cents.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Democratic State Conventions Have Been held in Massachusetts and New Jersey during the past week. In Massachusetts the convention assembled at Worcester and nominated Hon. Charles P. Thompson, of Gloucester, as Governor, and Alpha E. Thompson, of Woburn, as Lieutenant-Governor. General Butler attended the convention, and explained the reasons which had led him to come out from the Republican party. He declined a nomination for office, preferring, he said, to fight in the ranks.

In New Jersey an unwieldy convention of 990 members assembled at Trenton on September 1st. Senator Ludlow received the nomination for Governor on the fourth ballot, after an exciting debate. It was considered by the majority of the members the best nomination possible under the circumstances, though not the best that might have been made. A large section of the working-men will, it is believed, owing to personal objections to Senator Ludlow, vote the Republican ticket, who would have voted for any other Democrat who might have been nominated.

The Important Question of Civil-Service Reform was dealt with at the national conventions of both the political parties, and in the letters of acceptance written by the presidential candidates, in so slight a manner as to cause regret in the minds of patriotic citizens. It has become evident to all disinterested observers that much of the acrimony and ill feeling which characterize a presidential contest arise from the fact that the position of over a hundred thousand office-holders is staked on the issue. Until some steps are taken toward making the tenure of office permanent during good behavior, in cases where the political opinions of the holder do not interfere with the performance of duty, the presidential struggle will continue to display its worst features. The practice has been adopted in Great Britain with marked success, and the permanent subordinate employés of the Government perform their duty with equal alacrity under a Conservative or Liberal premier. The secretaries of state receive valuable assistance from the permanent officials, who, having been in their posts during many years, are more familiar with the details of public business than the political heads of the department, and they furnish information readily to their chiefs, although often opposed to them on political grounds. Thus the blunders an untrained politician might unwittingly make, to the national detriment, are prevented by timely information.

It is satisfactory to learn from an editorial article in the New York World that General Hancock is in favor of a reform in this direction, although it was not expressed in his letter of acceptance. The World says, "We happen to know that General Hancock has given this subject of civil-service reform the careful study of many years, and that he shares the fears of most thinking men as to the consequences of a protracted popular indifference to the evils of our existing system."

The need of the reform is so manifest and would operate so powerfully in the direction of peace, that it would be gratifying to see in some Republican organ an authoritative statement that General Garfield is also in favor of its inauguration. We might then be assured that no matter which candidate is elected, a step has been taken toward lessening the agitation of the quadrennial contest.

Republican Prospects in Maine Have Been brightened by the announcement of General Weaver that he is opposed to an alliance between his party and the Democrats. As he has naturally a powerful influence with his supporters, it may be expected that the fusion will not be effected, and thus the State on which so much importance was placed as an indication of the general result appears likely to register a substantial Republican majority.

The Rev. William Adams, D.D., LL.D., President of the Union Theological Seminary of New York, died at his country residence near Orange, N. J., August 31st. He was for many years pastor of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church in this city, and was sincerely respected not only by the members of his church but by the citizens generally.

A singular fact in connection with Dr. Adams's death is that he was appointed to preach the opening sermon before the Presbyterian General Convention which takes place in Philadelphia on September 23d. The Rev. Dr. E. R. Beadle, of Philadelphia, was originally appointed, but died about a year ago, and the appointment was then transferred to the Rev. Dr. Henry A. Boardman, who has also since died. We hope to publish the portrait of Dr. Adams, with a sketch of his life, in the next number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A Project is Under Consideration to Reform a notoriously vicious neighborhood in New York. Some wealthy Christian citizens have been discussing the feasibility of buying up a large portion of the six or seven blocks in the Twenty-ninth precinct of the city, with the object of dispersing a class of persons who live by the proceeds of vice, and of closing the saloons where those persons congregate. The object meets with general approval, but opinions vary as to the wisdom of the plan proposed. About ten years ago the Young Men's Christian Association of Birmingham, England, needed a new building, and the committee purchased at a great cost a notorious haunt of vice, called the Sultan's Divan, and adapted it to the uses of the association, and thus effected a very beneficial change in a depraved neighborhood.

The Wreck of the Steamer, City of Vera Cruz in the hurricane which swept over the Florida coast on Saturday and Sunday, August 28th and 29th, is one of the melancholy catastrophes to which we have become sadly familiar during the last few months. The City of Vera Cruz was an unusually strong wooden steamer, belonging to Messrs. Alexandre & Sons, of New York. She sailed from this port on August 25th for Havana, and thence to Vera Cruz, having on board eighty-two persons, of whom thirty-one were passengers. The first intimation of the disaster was intelligence from St. Augustine, Florida, that five bodies, several mail-bags, and a lot of wreckage had been washed ashore thi miles below that city. Then followed news th eleven persons, three passengers and eig seamen, had drifted ashore on pieces of t wreck.

The narrative of the survivors is a thrilli one, depicting a scene of fearful terror and d tress. The rapid falling of the barometer August 28th warned the captain of an approa ing hurricane, and as a precautionary meas he threw overboard a portion of the car When the cyclone struck the ship it tore aw the skylights and hatches, and sent a torrent water below deck. Soon the engine-fires w extinguished, and in spite of the gallant effo of passengers and crew to save the vessel, sank in about five hours after she encountered cyclone. The boats had all been staved in washed away, and the helpless men and won were floating in the water on doors, articles furniture, and pieces of wreck. The violenc the sea often turned these over, and many w unable to maintain their hold on their frail s ports. The survivors were tossed about thirty-four hours before they reached shore, were in a very exhausted condition.

Among the passengers was Major-Gen Torbert, of the United States Army, who ser with distinction as a cavalry officer in the war, and was afterward appointed Consul-C eral of the United States in Paris. His b was washed ashore with a severe wound on head which he had probably sustained f some piece of the wreck which the waves dashed against him.

The Triennial General Presbyterian Cou which is to meet in Philadelphia, on Septen 23d, and continue in daily sessions until th of October, will be one of the most remark assemblages yet held in this country. It contain between three and four hundred gates from the various branches of the Chu They will come not only from the United S and from the Dominion of Canada, but England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, Fra Holland, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Switzerl India, China, Australia, and Africa. Man them are already well known in this cou by reputation as eloquent preachers and di guished theologians.

A Youth of about Twenty Years threw self from a window on the third floor o Bible House on September 1st, and was k almost instantly. He was a thief who had sentenced to the Reformatory at Elmira, N in 1877, but had afterward been release parole. Notwithstanding the utmost effo the Prison Association to put him into spectable way of living, he persisted in hi ways, keeping bad company, leaving one s tion after another, and rewarding the kin of his benefactors with deception and falsel Finally it became necessary to arrest him a and when that was attempted in the room Prison Association, 66 Bible House, the y man jumped from the window. Keepin company and staying away from his mo house at night were the beginnings of thi and fatal career, which forcibly reminds us "the way of transgressors is hard" (13 : 15).

Chief Ouray, who did Excellent Servic the Government at the time of the Meeker sacre, died August 28th. He had been some time, but it was hoped that his robus stitution would enable him to overcome hi ease, but on Friday his case was consi hopeless, and on Saturday a runner came Los Pinos agency with the report that h dead. He belonged to the Uncomphagre and was one of the most intelligent men race. He took a prominent part in th negotiations at Washington, and it is fear death will delay the settlement a year l The transfer of his tribe from Colora another reservation was strenuously oppos the majority of the Utes, and the arrang was only effected by the strong personal ence of Ouray with his people.

Two Owners of Tenement Houses in New York were fined two hundred and fifty dollars each by Judge Russell, on August 26th, for neglecting to comply with the regulations as to light and space in their property. They were also warned that if they did not proceed immediately to alter the buildings in accordance with the rules of the Board of Health, still heavier penalties would be inflicted. The condition of the dwellings in the lower wards of the city show how necessary imperative measures of this character are to protect the city from the outbreak of an epidemic.

Anthony Comstock's Scars.—In a Notice of the energetic man, who has accomplished so great a work in connection with the Society for the Suppression of Vice, a contemporary gives he following account of Mr. Comstock's wounds which he received in consequence of the uncompromising war, he has waged against vice in New York: "But the work has been no holiday business, as sundry scars on Mr. C.'s person tesify. At the close of a trial he was attacked, truck on the head with a club, which, however, missed his temple—his thick skull—as he laughngly tells us, a particular advantage. A knife was then aimed at his throat, but, missing that, aid open his cheek from near one ear to the orner of his mouth, leaving a very conspicuous ar."

The Photophone is a New Invention which may lead to important scientific results. It is n instrument by which sounds can be produced, eproduced, and transmitted by flashes of light. rofessor Bell, who invented the Bell telephone, also the inventor of the photophone, and he escribed it at the sessions of the Association or the Advancement of Science on August 27th. is based on the important discovery that all aterial substances, with the exception of carbon and thin glass, are sensitive to the influence light, and are capable of giving forth musical ounds according to the rapidity with which it flashed upon them. An ancient legend, genally regarded as fabulous, was that a certain atue on the banks of the Nile emitted vocal unds when the first rays of the sun touched its ow. Professor Bell's discovery shows that ere may have been some truth in the legend. It is not clear what practical results may folw the discovery of this property, but it will ubtless be utilized in some way by the ingenis inventor. It is, however, another proof that are living in the days spoken of by the proph Daniel, when knowledge shall be increased aniel 12 : 4).

A Family Feud of a Peculiarly Acrimonious aracter has raged for more than ten years at a wn near Elmira, N. Y. The quarrel arose beeen two brothers in 1870 over a transaction in ich one brother sold the other some horses, d has increased in bitterness with the lapse of ne. Twice a barn full of grain belonging to e of the brothers has been destroyed by fire, d the other brother has had his barn burned ree times and his dwelling-house once. In h case the owner has charged his brother h being the incendiary. One of the painful idents of the quarrel has been that the ents of the two men, both of whom are over hty years of age, have, after a long life of conal peace, espoused opposite sides in the dise, and have separated in their old age. All s trouble is a lamentable proof of the power an exerts over the passions of men, causing m even to discard natural affection (Gal. 5).

Bereaved Dove.—A Little Girl Living near line of the Erie Railway, near Rathboneville, Y., possessed a pair of doves, who were in habit of flying about in the vicinity. One d, lately, while flying across the railway track, of them came into collision with the smokeck of the Pacific express, which passes that t about 7 o'clock in the morning. The bird killed by the shock. The other circled aut the spot for a few minutes, in evident azement at the sudden disappearance of her e. Suddenly she seemed to realize what had carried the male from her sight, and she rose in the air and flew swiftly in the direction the train had gone. She did not return until about noon. Next morning she was seen to fly away and take a position on the mile-post, near the spot where she last saw her mate the day before. When the express train came along she flew at the locomotive, hovered about the smoke-stack and around the cab, as if looking for her mate. She accompanied the locomotive for a mile or so, and then returned to her cote. Every day since then she has repeated this strange conduct. She goes to her lookout for the train at precisely the same time each morning, and waits until the train comes along, no matter how late it may be. She never goes further than about a mile with the train, returning then to her cote and mourning piteously all day. This extreme instance of the well-known affectionate and gentle nature of the dove shows the depth of meaning there is in many passages of Scripture, such as Isaiah 59 : 11. The dove is also the favorite Scriptural symbol for the Holy Spirit.

A Remarkable Tombstone is Being Prepared for a minister according to his own instructions. A Providence (Mass.) journal says that a minister formerly living in that city, bing desirous that the monument over his grave should be a silent preacher after he is dead, is having constructed a granite reading-desk on which is to be sculptured an open Bible, and on the page the words written, "Be ready, the time is short. These are the words I spake unto you while I was with you, that after my decease ye might have them in remembrance." On the front and sides of the monument will be cut texts of scripture, arranged in the form of human questions and divine answers.

A Brakeman's Narrow Escape from Death occurred recently at Medina, N. Y. A number of freight-cars were backing down to a switch, and the brakeman employed in some way became entangled in the guard-rail which held him firmly by the foot. As the cars approached, death or mutilation seemed inevitable. With rare presence of mind the man threw himself between the rails on his back, and when the first car reached him he seized the brake-rod underneath the car, and with that leverage dragged his foot out of the boot, and clinging to the car he was soon able to creep out in safety. The brakeman's perilous position is a type of the moral position in which careless Christians sometimes find themselves. Thoughtlessness, imprudence, or unsuitable companionship entangles them in a difficulty from which they unhappily do not, like the brakeman, escape without injury to their character, and sometimes the cause of Christ in the world is also brought into disrepute.

A Sailor's Testimony.—The Value of a mother's warning was illustrated recently in the narrative of a sailor who had spent forty years at sea, during which period he had been in the hottest as well as the coldest climates. When he was starting out as a boy on his first voyage, his mother solemnly warned him against the vice of drunkenness, and obtained his promise that he would never touch intoxicating liquor. The sailor kept his promise and prospered. Besides his own welfare being promoted by his abstinence, other sailors had been influenced by his example. One of these met him recently, and said that through his kindness to him when intoxicated on shipboard he had been induced to reform, and was now captain of one of the finest vessels in the port of New York.

A Scientific Blunder Appears to Have Been made in Chicago, which shows how unreliable are the "facts" which modern sceptics frequently use as bases of arguments against the divine origin of the Bible. Some very large bones were recently dug up in that city, and were pronounced by scientific men to be the bones of a mastodon. Inquiries made by the authorities, however, resulted in the discovery that they were the bones of an elephant buried on the spot many years ago by a travelling showman.

FAITH WORKING BY LOVE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Faith which worketh by love."—Galatians 5 : 6.

All Outward Forms Set Aside—Faith the Only Saving Point—The Difference Between Faith and its Imitations—The True Faith Works—Therefore Lives and is Awake—It Works by Love—I. Faith always Produces Love—1. As a Necessity of its Nature—2. By the Beauty it Discovers—3. By Appropriating what it Discerns—II. Love Entirely Dependent upon Faith—Cannot Exist Without it—Flourishes as Faith Flourishes—Cannot Work Without Faith—III. Faith Displays its Power by Love—Faith's Arm—Its Tools—Its Furnace—Its Mould—Its Metal—IV. Love Perfects Faith—A Judge's Grandchild—Faith and Love in the Church.

All ways of justification by human works and outward forms are set aside by the apostle. In one sentence he closes up every road which is cast up by man, and opens up the way of the Lord, even the way of salvation by grace through faith in Christ Jesus Some hope to be saved by ritualism; their hopes are smitten hip and thigh by this word, "Neither circumcision availeth anything;" on the other hand, many are relying upon their freedom from all ceremonial, and place their reliance upon a sort of anti-ritualism—they are smitten by the words "nor circumcision."

As Jews relied upon circumcision, so do many depend upon baptism and sacraments; to these the apostle gives no quarter. Others glory in uncircumcision; they have practised no rites nor ceremonies, their mode of worship is plain, even to unsightliness, free almost to disorder, and of this they are apt to make a righteousness. It is quite as easy to make a self-righteousness out of the plainness of the Quaker as out of the gaudiness of the Romanist; and the one confidence will be as fatal as the other.

The outward, whether decorated or unadorned, whether fixed or free, touches not the saving point; the only thing which can save us is faith in Jesus Christ, whom God has set forth as a propitiation for sin. Faith brings us into contact with the healing fountain, and so our natural disease is removed; it appropriates on our behalf the result of the Redeemer's service and sacrifice, and so we become accepted in Him; but anything short of this must fail; it is the rending of the garment, while the heart is unbroken, the washing of the outside of the cup and platter, while the inner part is very filthiness.

The apostle, however, does more than merely condemn other foundations than those of faith; he distinguishes here between faith itself and its many imitations. It is not every sort of faith that will save the soul. True faith, undoubtedly, will save a man, though it be as a grain of mustard seed; but then it must be true faith—the genuine silver, and not a mere plated article. "Money answereth all things," says the wise man, but then it must be current coin of the realm; for counterfeit money will answer for nothing except to condemn the man who has it in his possession. Real faith will save us, but forgeries of it will increase our peril. Assurance is of God, but presumption is of the devil.

THE TEST OF TRUE FAITH

is that it works—"Faith which worketh," saith the text. To that end it must first of all live, for it is clear that a dead faith cannot work. There must be heart in our faith, and the Spirit of God breathing in it, or it will not be the living faith of a living child of God.

Being alive, true faith must not sleep, but must arouse itself as a child of the day, for a slumbering faith is matter for heart-searching, since sleep is cousin to death. A wakeful faith becomes active, and in its activity lies much of its proof. "By their fruits ye shall know them" is one of Christ's own rules for testing men and things, and we are to know faith by that which comes of it, by what it does for us, and in us, and through us. Faith is not worth having if it is fruitless; it has a name to live and is dead. If it works not at all, it lives not at all, and cannot justify its possession.

A dead God may be served by a dead faith, but living, waking, working faith can alone please the ever-living, ever-working Jehovah. God save us from a dreaming faith and a talking faith, and give us " faith which worketh."

" Not words alone it cost the Lord
To purchase pardon for his own ;
Nor will a soul by grace restored
Return the Saviour words alone."

A further distinction is also set forth, that true faith " worketh by love." There are some who do many works as the result of a kind of faith who, nevertheless, are justified, as for instance, Herod, who believed in John and did many things, and yet murdered his minister. His faith did work, but it worked by dread and not by love ; he feared the stern language of the second Elijah, and the judgments which would come upon him if he rejected the Baptist's warnings, and his faith worked through fear.

The great test of the working of saving faith is this, it " worketh by love." If you are led by your faith in Jesus Christ to love Him, and so to serve Him, then you have the faith of God's elect, you are undoubtedly a saved man, and you may go your way and rejoice in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made you free. It shall be joy to you to serve the Lord, since love is the mainspring of your service.

That is the point we are going to speak upon this morning—the connection which exists between faith and love : " Faith which worketh by love." We may be helped to test both our faith and love while we are speaking of the intermingling and intertwisting of the roots and branches of these two graces, and it will do us good to perform a thorough self-examination. It never does any man harm to overhaul himself and to see in what a state he is, whether he really is right or no ; whether he is prospering in soul or no. I am afraid of our taking our good estate for granted, but I am not afraid of the most self-searching self-inquiry. May God the Holy Spirit bless our ministry to this end this morning !

I. Our first observation will be this :

FAITH ALWAYS PRODUCES LOVE.

" Faith which worketh by love." When faith has anything to do, she walks to the field with love at her side. The two graces are inseparable. Like Mary and Martha, they are sisters, and abide in one house. Faith, like Mary, sits at Jesus' feet, and hears His words, and then love diligently goes about the house and rejoices to honor the divine Lord. Faith is light, while love is heat, and in every beam of grace from the Sun of righteousness you will find a measure of each.

1. This happens by a necessity of faith's own nature. The moment a man believes in Jesus Christ he loves Him as a matter of course. It is possible to trust in another person and not love him, but from the peculiar circumstances of the case, our Lord having loved us and given Himself for us out of the infinite charity of His heart, we are compelled to love Him the moment we repose upon Him. To trust the bleeding Lamb and not love Him is a thing not to be imagined. Faith is a gold ring which, in every case, the heavenly jeweler sets with the beryl of love. Water faith with a drop of God's own dew and it blossoms into love.

The first steps of the prodigal when he comes to himself are all toward his father's house and heart. When he gets home he may take many steps hither and thither about his father's estate, but at the first, at any rate, his face is distinctly toward his Father. Did he not say, " I will arise and go unto my father ?" The first steps of the soul, when it begins to believe in God are desires after him in which there is a measure of love.

The affections are aroused and drawn toward God as soon as there is the slightest degree of faith in the soul. Every believer here knows that. Look back to the day when first you saw the Lord, if you can remember it, the hour you looked to Him and were lightened ; did you not love Him immediately ? Love him ? Ay ! We sometimes fear we loved Him better then than now, though I hope that it is not the case. If any one had asked me, in the first flush of my joy when first I beheld my bleeding Lord, do you love Him ? I should not have hesitated, but replied, " I love Him as my very soul, for He hath redeemed me from going down into the pit." Faith creates love as summer breeds flowers. Our first love came with our first faith by a necessity of nature which can never change.

2. Love grows out of faith yet farther by the discoveries of beauty in Christ which faith is sure to make. Faith is the soul's eye, and its telescope, by which it sees that which is so far off as to be otherwise invisible. Out of this gracious discernment comes admiring love. Faith delights to unveil the superlative beauties of the Well-beloved before the gaze of love, and then faith and love unite in crying out, " Yea, He is altogether lovely." Those who believe can say, " We see Jesus," and those whose hearts are won by Him can add, " We love Him because He first loved us." O that we knew our Lord better ! O that we believed in Him more ! Then should we be knit to Him as the heart of Jonathan was knit to David.

3. Faith creates love, next, by its appropriation of that which it discerns, for while faith is

THE SOUL'S EYE.

It is also almost the mind's hand, by which it grasps the blessing. Love is sure to arise out of a sense of possession. Doth not a mother love her child very much because it is her own ? When we have an interest in a person, so as to call him " my brother," " my husband," " my son," then a sense of property increases our sense of affection. Why, even in dead things, such as gold and silver and goods and lands, when they are a man's own they are apt to be loved, for the affections cling to that which is possessed—" Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."

This tendency is clearly seen in reference to higher possessions, and especially with regard to Christ. If Christ is yours, and faith can say, " Jesus is mine," love alters the sentence and cries, " This is my beloved, and this is my friend." When the faith of Thomas saw Jesus as Lord and God his love gave a musical ring to his exclamation by joying in personal possession, and calling him " my Lord and my God." Love rejoices in Jesus as her own possession, triumphs in Him, and right sweetly sings of love to Him because He is her own husband and Lord. Thus, you see, faith creates love from a necessity of its nature, from the discoveries which it makes, and from its appropriation of the good things that are in Christ.

Surely all these points sufficiently show that faith creates love in the soul wherever it really dwells. Do not, I pray, begin to say, " I am afraid I do not love the Lord as I ought," and so on. Take it for granted that you do not love Him to the full of His infinite deserts, and instead of raising questions about the degree of your love, ask yourself whether you believe in him ? Are you trusting in the Lord Jesus ? Are you confiding in Him ? Because if the root is there the flower will appear ere long.

If thou believest that Jesus is the Christ, thou art born of God, and all who are born of the God of love must themselves love God. Do not talk of trying to love God. You cannot force yourself to love anybody ; who in his senses would ever dream of such a thing ? Such attempt would be utter folly. Love must be free-born, it cannot be bought or forced. We cannot tell what love is, though we feel it. It is a mysterious something, not to be described by the cold maker of definitions ; but it is always a product of something else which goes before it. If you believe, you will love ; if you do not believe, you will never love till you do believe. Go to the root of the matter. Do not try to grow the hyacinth of love without the bulb of faith.

Do you trust Jesus with all your heart, and are you confiding your soul's eternal interests with him ? Then I know that you love Him, though you may for a while be occupied with other pu suits. Love slumbers in you, like fire in a flint or rather, it smoulders, like fire in smoulderin turf, but ere long it will burn vehemently, lik coals of juniper. Look well to your faith an your love will not fail. Remember the lines a sweet poet, and pray that you may sing the out of your own soul :

" Hallelujah ! I believe !
Now, O Love ! I know thy power,
Thine no false or fragile fetters,
Not the rose-wreaths of an hour.

" Christian bonds of holy union
Death itself does not destroy ;
Yes, to live and love forever
Is our heritage of joy."

II. Let me now enlarge upon a second mark : Love is ENTIRELY DEPENDENT UPON FAITH.

" Faith which worketh by love." Love, the does not work of itself, except in the strength faith. Love is so entirely dependent upon fai that, as I have already said, it cannot exist wi out it. No man loves a Saviour in whom he poses no confidence. There may be an admi tion of the character of Christ, but the emoti which the Scripture treats as " love " o comes into the heart when we trust in Jes " We love Him because He first loved us When we have a belief in His love, and a se of it, then we begin to love Jesus, but love Jesus cannot exist without faith in Him.

Certainly, love cannot flourish except as fa flourishes. If you doubt your Lord you think hard thoughts of Him, and cease to l Him as you should. If you fall into trouble, you doubt His wisdom or His goodness in se ing it, the next thing will be that your he will be cold toward Him ; you will begin think your Lord to be tyrannical and harsh you, and you will quarrel with Him The graces must diminish or inrease together.

But because you want to trust yourself a lit and you begin judging your God, and do not pose entirely in Him, therefore it is that have to ask yourself whether you love Him or

Love, again, as it cannot flourish with faith, so it cannot work without it Love great designer and planner, but how to perf it finds not unless faith shows the way. L sits down and says, " I would the world converted to Christ !" but faith goes out preaches the Gospel. Love cries, " I woul God that the children knew of Jesus, and their hearts were renewed even while they yet little ;" but faith opens the Sunday-sc and teaches the young, and trusts in God He will bless the word to their salvation. L must have faith to give it muscle, sinew, strength ; therefore take right good care of faith. Longfellow says, " Therefore love believe, and works will follow spontaneous, as the day the sun."

Love is as Solomon's lily, dropping sw smelling myrrh. How fair to look u Stand and admire its charms. Know, O g that yon lovely flower could not be thus ar were it not joined by its stalk to a living which is hidden underground. Faith is needful bulb, out of which cometh love a perfection of beauty. You look over the city of Mansoul, and you see a gilded dome tering in the sun—that dome is love, and it upon foundations of faith which are laid upon the rock, else would the dome fall in r

Love to God, if it be worthy of the n must be soundly based on confidence in J it cannot abide without it, but is carried by wind and flood, like the house on the Hence we are disposed to judge with pru the outbursts of emotion which we see in ce excitable persons. We hear them sing, yes, I do love Jesus," but we are not so su it when we watch their lives.

We are pleased with such emotions, if arise out of the knowledge of Christ and me faith in Him, but we have too often the semblance of ardent affection without k dge and without humility, without penitence, nd without childlike faith, and therefore we re- ice with trembling. We fear lest the building hich rises up in a night would vanish, like the baseless fabric of a vision," and disappear e the soap-bubble of a child, which, though be adorned with all the colors of the rainbow, ssolves in an instant. See, then, to your ith, since love is entirely dependent upon it. e that you are rooted, and grounded, and set- d, lest the high tower of professed love should on lie in ruins, and indifference alone remain.

III. Thirdly, I advance to another observation ich comes more closely home to the text, ough our previous thoughts have been need- to bring us up to it, aith which worketh by love." For a moment u must permit me to compare faith to an arti- r in metals who is about to prepare some work fine art, such as cunning smiths were wont to duce in the days of wrought iron, when skill d hand-labor were thought much of, and arti- s were produced which are almost worth their ight in silver. Faith, as a smith, strong and orous, has love to be its arm. Faith lifts a finger without love, it is her arm every rning. Faith believes and resolves, and then proceeds to action, but the power with which n work lies in love. Faith without love ld be a cripple without arms.

FAITH DISPLAYS ITS POWER BY LOVE.

ore than this: it is not only faith's arm but tools. "Faith worketh by love." This is h's hammer, and file, and anvil—its every im- nent. You have seen a screw hammer, ch can be made to fit every nut and bolt, ever large or small; love is just such a tool, ove will teach a little child, or evangelize a on. Love can stand and burn at the stake, can drop two mites that make a farthing the offering-box. Love hopeth all things, ureth all things; nothing comes amiss to it. onderfully handy tool is this sacred grace h faith has adopted to work with; it can e and it can cut, it is good for uniting and for breaking; it will avail for anything h faith wishes to perform. Only let faith l love as its instrument, and it can fashion soever divine wisdom telleth it to form.

re than that, love is faith's furnace. All tools in the world will not suffice the smith ss he can blow the coals and create a fervent . What is there, brethren, that can kindle eat of enthusiasm like earnest love to God? h believeth God, and rejoiceth in God; then s in love, and the heart grows hot as Ne- hadnezzar's furnace. The melting fire burns gloriously, and sparks of joy leap upward efrom. What is there that cannot be per- ed if we have love enough? This is the fire which burns in human hearts when the Holy Spirit sheds abroad the love of there; by its heat all things are fused. fire will yet consume all sin and melt all ness; none can quench it, everything must before it. That consecrated artificer called bloweth the coals of love, and plunged into lowing flame, tasks hard as iron become workable. Thus, "Faith worketh by lov ve is more than this, for, when all is melted eady to flow, love is faith's mould; it pours l it does into the mould of God's love, oning its works according to the divine rn of love in Christ Jesus. As Jesus loved en so would we love one another; and as oved the Father, and for love of the Father, He might glorify Him, fulfilled the law and Himself a sacrifice, even so are we willing down our lives for the brethren and for ather's honor. Thus love becomes faith's d, into which it carefully seeks to pour hole being.

hat is more, it is faith's metal, for into the d of love faith pours love itself. Love thus wereth all things." Love is the substance ry good work. Melt it down in the fining nd holiness is love. If there be any vir- eal, consecration, or holy daring, its substance is love. All the grand deeds which the heroes of the cross have performed are composed of the solid metal of love to Jesus Christ. Be it great or be it little, he who hath served God aright hath ever brought into the sanctuary an offering of pure love comparable to the gold of Ophir.

Love, also, is faith's burnisher and file, and with it she finisheth all her work right carefully. Have you never lovingly gone over all your work to give it the finishing touches? Have you not wished to perfect all that you have attempted? I know well what it means. My rough castings—how very coarse they are, and when I fix them I look at them and say, "That will not do, for I see self there; that will not do, unbelief is there; this will not do, too much of self-will is there;" and then I have with tearful love filed down and polished my poor efforts, and found love to be an excellent burnisher, ready to my hand. When Augustine went over all his works to write his Retractions, it was love removing roughness from her work; if we loved more we might have more of retractation work to do.

Thus faith works by love; love is faith's arm, faith's tools, faith's furnace, faith's metal, faith's mould, and faith's burnisher. My hearer, if you are working for God in any other way than this, you will make a mess of it. The law can never help you to such work as God will accept; it is fitted to produce bars for a prison, but not pillars for a temple. You must work for God because you love Him; no other labor except the labor of love can be acceptable with Him.

Some people serve God because they are in religious society, and they must not be thought wanting; hence that blessed guinea, squeezed out by all the ten-pound subscriptions on the list at the top of it—respectable people must put down something, you know. That occasional going out to week-night services is often done because it is expected of you, and not because it is a delight. Even Sabbath assemblies grow to be a weariness, and worship is regarded as a task.

This is not gold, but gilded dross; take it away! This is forced service, devoid of the life-blood of obedience; fruit without flavor or scent. That which is done because a man loves God, because he loves to yield his heart to his God, however humble the service may be, is accepted of God. True affection to Him who redeemed you from going down to the pit never fails to present an acceptable tribute before the living God. May you abound in this to your own comfort and to the glory of Christ.

IV. I close with the fourth remark, which is:

LOVE REACTS UPON FAITH

and perfects it. For while love owes all to faith, faith becomes a debtor to love. Love leads the soul into admiration, and so increases faith. Having loved Christ, having become enamored of Him, love, that hath dove's eyes which can see everything that is fair, spieth out daily more and more of Christ's perfections, and thus she aids the eye of faith.

Love sees among the rest of the Lord's perfections His power, His faithfulness, His immutability; and faith at once concludes, "then I can trust Him more than ever." Knowing more of His power, more of His faithfulness, more of His unchangeableness, I can depend upon Him without wavering. So, if faith's eyes first look to Jesus, love's eyes see yet more, and discover further excellences.

Love, moreover, forbids unbelief, and so helps faith, for love says, "How can we grieve Him by doubts?" Does not true love in every heart, when exercised toward a man or a woman, forbid distrust? Fear in the form of distrust hath torment, and therefore love casts it out. The want of mutual confidence in married life is the death of love, but love is instinctively tender of showing anything like suspicion toward a dear and faithful lover.

Moreover, perfect love casteth out fear, because fear hath torment, and when perfect love has cast out fear, then faith has room to display its strength. Love has not learned to be afraid, nor will she permit the work of faith, to become the labor of a shrinking, crouching slave. Dread! Where can that find a lodging in the heart that loves?

You hear very proper people sometimes cry out against certain of us because they say we speak as if we were on the best terms with God, and were familiar with the Lord Jesus. Sarcastically they speak what is soberly true; in their blindness they have hit the truth; it is even so. To them God is a stranger, and I doubt not that the language which we use may well seem to them strange and almost profane, and it would be profane if they were to use it, being what they are. I do not accuse them of open sin, but I do say, and will say, that he who is not a child of God cannot fitly use expressions which are most becoming from the lips of those who are the sons of God.

A child may say to his father what no one else may dare to say, and yet he has more reverence for him than any one else. Your child shall rightly behave toward you in a manner which you could not tolerate in a stranger. Look at the judge on the bench, with that big wig and those solemn robes; the prisoner at the bar and the court and the jury must all be very respectful and distant, but I warrant you when his lordship reaches home his grandchild has no dread of grandpapa or his robes.

Oh, beloved, this is the joy of love, that it brings us into such close personal intercourse with God in Jesus Christ that trembling, slavish fear is gone, and loving God, we are familiar with Him, and trust Him implicitly.

My final word is this: let us, dear friends, as a church and people be working people. Faith works, let us work because we have faith. Dear friends, do.

GET TO WORK FOR THE MASTER;

you, I mean, who stand all the day idle. Go, work to-day in the Saviour's vineyard. Oh, my beloved brethren, I beseech you, do not relax your energies. Continue to be a lively, energetic church. Now that so many Sunday-schools need teachers, I charge our friends not to let that blessed part of the service flag. Here are dozens of schools crying out for teachers. The children come and there are none to instruct them. Should it be so?

If you are to be a working church you must be a loving church, because faith works by love. You must love one another much, and love Christ more, and love the souls of perishing sinners; yes, love them so that you will not let them perish if you can do anything toward their salvation. Personal doing of good to men is needed if love is to be real. The love of Jesus made Him seek and save the lost, and if ours be worth the name we shall be engaged in the like holy endeavor.

But if you are to be a working church and a loving church, you must be a believing church, for that is the bottom of it all. Faith works by love. Get home, then, to prayer, and renew your faith in Jesus. May the Holy Ghost lead you anew to the dying love of Jesus. I often go straight away back to the cross from which I started when I set out for Heaven.

The devil says to me, "You are no Christian." I do not think he knows much about it, but I have before now tried to show him some evidences that I am a Christian, and he has only puffed at them. I find the short way is to go right away to the cross and say, "I rest on Jesus only." Satan cannot deny that you are a Christian when you stand there. Go and do your first works, and believe in Jesus as you did at the first, and abide in Him evermore. As sinners, cling to Jesus still, and let him be everything to you. Constant faith will create fervent love, and fervent love will do persevering work; so shall ye be a people zealous for good works. The Lord bless every one of you, for Christ's sake. Amen.

[Portion of Scripture read before Sermon—
Galatians 5.]

TAKEN OUT OF THE GUTTER.

A True Incident of Life on the London Streets.

By Dr. T. J. Barnardo, F.R.C.S.

(Continued from page 572.)

HERE in London they had lived that awful life of wretchedness which so many of these poor children of our streets know : begging from door to door where they dared, feeding upon garbage when all else failed. Occasionally, but that was very seldom indeed, sleeping in a lodging-house when they were so "lucky" as to earn the few pence necessary for their "doss ;" more frequently creeping, as upon this occasion, into some narrow passage, or some empty half-built house, or under some cart, or in the market places under a truss of sweet old hay—quickly finding in any of these refuges of the desolate, that oblivion from all their daily troubles which sleep happily affords to the young, even though, alas ! they should be street arabs.

In the course of conversation I discovered that Arthur was most anxious to get away to some place where he could be sure of remaining undiscovered by the older brother from whom he had escaped. Him both the boys feared with a nameless horror, dreading lest they should indeed again fall into his power. I have seldom seen fright more fully expressed in a boy's face than when, upon a subsequent occasion, Arthur imagined his "big brother" had discovered his whereabouts.

On the whole Arthur was a noble fellow, and I could not but admire his unselfish protection of his little brother. I have said they begged in the streets and fed upon garbage. This was true rather of the older than of the younger brother. The former had begged and fought for the scraps by which life was sustained. But the best and choicest morsels were generously and freely given to "Little Bobbie," while Arthur, brave fellow, contented himself with whatever might be left. If some kind passer-by or poor person in one of the lodging-houses gave them a trifle in money, a morsel of food, or a half-worn threadbare garment, the best and chiefest invariably came to Bobbie's share, however sore might be Arthur's needs.

It may be easily imagined that I did not leave these two poor boys where I found them. My heart was moved with admiration for the heroism of the one, and with tender compassion for the infancy and helplessness of the other. A very few words of explanation to the elder boy was all that was required to overcome his objections, and then they willingly accepted my invitation to come to the HOME at Stepney, where they could both live together, be instructed in all things needful, be really happy, and by and by become useful men.

Away we went, reaching, about four o'clock in the morning, the dear old refuge in Stepney Causeway, into which many such storm-tossed little barques had ridden in safety. The two boys crept, just as they were, into some old hammocks in the receiving room, and slept undisturbed till about twelve the next day. Then, after the necessary cleansing and rehabiliation in clean, wholesome garments, they were formally received among the other inmates of the HOME.

* * * * * * *

Two years passed happily and usefully, during which Arthur showed that he possessed unusual qualities of mind for one brought up as he had been. He quickly mastered the more rudimentary subjects taught in the school, evinced a great taste for arithmetic, and even aspired to a higher knowledge of mathematics. "Little Bobbie" was less remarkable in this respect, but was perhaps on the whole the more loveable boy. His fair innocent face, roguish eyes, and dimpled, rounded chin were beautiful to behold, especially when one reflected over the misery from which he had been so lately rescued. I used to watch them often out of my own little window which overlooked the playground, and notice, with indescribable delight and pleasure, their innocent and merry sport.

One day a dreadful change came.

Arthur sought me, his face deadly pale and every limb trembling, while beads of perspiration were breaking out over his forehead.

It was the old story ; he wanted to leave the HOME at once, and had quite made up his mind to go. He was much obliged to me, he said, for all my kindness, but he had determined to go. Could I allow him to go that very night—and "Little Bobbie" too? In great consternation I sought his reasons, and was relieved when he told them. It seems that some of his companions in the Home had told him that they had observed, during the last two or three days, a heavy, ill-looking fellow, lurking about the top of the street, who answered the description of the brother from whose influence he had fled. Whether it was really his brother or not who had been seen, I cannot say, but Arthur's peace of mind was gone. His fears suggested the near proximity of as this brother was called. "And you see, sir," explained the boy between his sobs, for now his tears flowed freely, "it isn't any use, I couldn't stay and be happy any more. I'm much obliged to you, sir. You have been a good, kind friend to me—the best I ever had ; but if 'Bad Bill' was only to get me and 'Little Bobbie' once more, he'd make us as bad as himself ; and now I feel I'd rather starve than steal."

"BAD BILL,"

It was with difficulty I repressed my own emotion, and endeavored to induce Arthur to be calm and view the situation more cheerfully. For while he was speaking a gleam of hope shot across my mind. The previous day I had had an interview with a gentleman about to leave for one of our colonies, and he had suggested that if I were disposed to send boys to Canada, he would gladly undertake their care and do what was possible for them. Reflecting over this now, I saw a means of helping these two hapless children.

I said to Arthur, "I think I can aid you, if you will but leave your case in my hands. Remain quietly in the house to-night, do not appear at the door or window or in the street, and you will be quite safe. I will see that a policeman walks up and down in front of the door to keep watch. By to-morrow I think I shall have prepared a plan by which you will escape your brother's bad influence, and yet be able to save 'Little Bobbie' from wandering out on the streets to suffer cold and hunger again." Arthur's eyes were again full of tears, but this time they were tears of eager thankfulness. The poor boy even kissed my hand as he left the room.

The inquiries I made were so far satisfactory that my friend, who was returning the following week, expressed his willingness to take charge of the two lads, and was sure he could on landing at once obtain for them a good home in our North American colony. Accordingly, I informed the boys of the prospect that lay before them. Little Bobbie, who was in the room, when he heard of going across the sea in a big ship, exhibited his somewhat hazy notions of geography by asking "if it wasn't down Wapping way, sir?" Although I smilingly shook my head, the connection between ships, the sea and the waterside of East London was established in his mind with great satisfaction. I explained however the vast distance at which Canada really was. I pointed out the advantages which would lie before the boys if they went, and added that the great ocean rolling between them and England would effectually prevent "Bad Bill" from following them. I explained also that in the country to which I wanted them to go there were few beggars and still fewer dishonest people ; that there they might be happy and useful, and if they both loved and followed the Saviour they would become in time honorable and useful men.

TO CANADA

The compact was sealed that very night. Hasty preparations were made for their outfit and departure, and in a few days I accompanied them to Liverpool, from which port they sailed for Montreal.

I heard some time afterward that shortly after landing they had both been adopted by a well-to-do farmer who had no family of his own and were giving great satisfaction. But I was not prepared to receive the letter from which the following is an extract, which reached me i about a year after their departure.

> "We are very happy here—father and mother lov us ever so much, and say we are never to go awa from them again. I can ride a pony now, and I g into school every day by myself. Mother says Bobb need not go yet awhile. We do not forget you, dea sir, and your great kindness to us when we were s unhappy and so poor."

In this letter were photographs of "my boys, as I must still call them, which I preserve t this day. But it was difficult to recognize i their bright, happy looks, bronzed faces, an well-grown, comfortably clad forms, the tw wretched lads whom I had picked up in Ho water Court in the November of 1871.

* * * * * * *

Five years more passed rapidly away. Mea while they were becoming acclimatized t Canada and endeared to their adopted parent forgetting in their present happiness their pa wretchedness, but not, as it proved, losing ho of that Saviour whose love and mercy they ha learned to know when in Stepney.

I still received occasional tidings of their we fare. Eighteen months ago the followi reached me :

> "You will, I think, be surprised at what I have tell you. You know I took three of the best pri given last year by Mr. White. Well, father and have talked the matter over, and they asked me i would like to enter the University. At first I scarc knew what to reply, it was so much beyond my hop But Mr. White told father that if I only did as well th (he meant worked as hard) as I had done in schoo would, he said, reflect credit on my teachers. T evening, dear mother came to my room and cri and said she hoped the Lord would guide me ; then I told her what I had written to you, that I been praying that I might some day be permitted preach the Gospel, and that I thought the offer I ahad to-dy was an answer, and then she cried ag and kissed me, and went and told father. . . . S am to go next term !"

The letter from which I quote tells its o tale more eloquently than could any words mine. Hitherto, for good reasons, I have frained from committing this story to paper. such a case identification may be easy, an would not injure in any way the hopes and p pects of "my boys." Besides Arthur may day return to England a recognized and hono servant of his Lords. But I am sure if he d he will feel as thankful as I shall be, if the of his early struggles and poverty, and of subsequent goodness of God to him, shall h moved the hearts of those who read it to s immediate succor to the HOME which has b in his own and numberless other instances the "shadow of a great rock in a weary land.

NOTES OF A CHRISTIAN CONFEREN AT SOUTHAMPTON, ENGLAND.

Anecdotes by Lord Radstock, etc.

AN exceedingly interesting conference held during the three days, August 10th to 12th, in the grounds of the Deanery, Southa ton, England. The subject for the first d consideration was the Development of Spiritual Life : 1. By submitting to the wil God. 2. By committing all to the care of Go By trusting entirely to the faithfulness of G

At one of the afternoon meetings, the Re Hopkins, in showing the importance of kn edge to the Christian, told, as an illustra what had happened to a friend of his in Y shire, who, though practically a poor man, o an estate in that county. One day a geol told him there was on his estate an abundan iron ore. Believing this to be true, he fe once that he was no longer poor but rich. so it is the office of the Holy Spirit to reve s the boundless riches that are treasured up in hrist. Speaking in reference to the words, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, nd to cleanse us from all unrighteousness," he entioned that ough converted at the age of fourteen, did not alize until twenty years afterward the full eaning of the word "cleanse." She tells us at the moment when she did realize it, was ne of the intensest moments of her life.

MISS HAVERGALL,

Having explained Christian thoroughness to equivalent to Christian perfection, Mr. Hop-ins went on to show in what senses the word perfect" is used in the Bible; carefully apply-g all these uses of it to the necessities of the hristian life.

Lord Radstock then gave an address founded the words, "Your Lamb." He related how year ago was on the point of deciding to give mself to Christ, but he feared the world and great power over him. "He told me," said rd Radstock, that, "if he became a Christian, was afraid he could not keep it up." I re-ied, "No, you won't keep it up a day." Tak-g out my pencil, I said: "Why does not my ncil fall? Because I hold it up. Of course u will fall unless held up by God." Lord Rad-ck, said the officer had since that time been essed in leading many a soul to Jesus.

A SWEDISH OFFICER

Mr. Clifford said, "I had a besetting sin ich was a continual injury to me. It was a of thought. In 1874 through the kindness Lord Mount-Temple, I was introduced to two erican friends who pointed out two passages ich brought deliverance to me. The first was de 24, 'Now unto Him that is able to keep u from falling,' etc. The other was Luke 74, 'That we, being delivered out of the hand our enemies, should serve Him in holiness d righteousness all the days of our life.' These o passages were so brought home to me, that ave been very largely delivered from the sin er which I grieved. In my experience the best eipt for the cure of life's worries and troubles simply to thank God for them when they me (Thess. 5 : 18)."

Major Whittle followed in a few impressive d weighty words on Gen. 17 : 1, "Walk before and be thou perfect" (meaning sincere). He d: "A great difficulty with me in the early rt of my Christian life was that I did not know ether I had spiritual life or not. I was helped o light and liberty by hearing a brother from gland read Col. 1 : 12, 14."

The Rev. Mr. Cleworth related some of his own eriences and added: "I heard of a gentleman o educated and kept a large number of hans, and who always went to God for his plies. Sometimes, however, he gave way to temper. But one day while repeating the rd's Prayer, and just as he came to the dox-gy 'Thine is the power,' he said to himself, his is what I have not acknowledged in my . All power is His, and He can save me from besetting sin.' The gentleman said to the nd who told me of it, 'I won't say more, but shall ask my wife if there has been any ange in me since then.' My friend inquired the gentleman's wife and she answered, 'He not lost his temper for eighteen months.'"

The Rev. E. Hopkins said: "I have heard of an who had been a gloomy Christian, but had eived a blessing at the Oxford Conference. en he went home he was so altered that his e said to a friend, 'Oh, my husband is so ered that I fear he is going to die.' She ught he was becoming too bright and too ppy for earth. If our lives were what they ght to be, such cases would be so common as surprise nobody."

r. Hopkins also told how a lady received

A CASKET OF JEWELS.

e day she accidentally touched a secret spring l out flew jewels far more precious than any he others which the casket contained. Oh t our eyes might be opened to see our casket riches in Christ!

The Rev. Webb-Peploe related an instance of a young lady who had found Christ through attending the meeting he conducted for the anxious, at the last Mildmay Conference. He said: "Quite unexpectedly I met her in the country under remarkable circumstances. I had been preaching on the faithfulness of God, and was returning to the rectory when a lady put out her hand in the dark. She told me that before she went to the Mildmay meetings, she had been resting on fears and hopes and feelings. Then, for the first time she felt, as I spoke, that her salvation rested on facts. I asked her if she had understood the full Gospel as expounded that night. 'Oh!' she said, 'you don't know my circumstances, you don't know what I have to bear.' I met the girl's difficulty thus: Looking up at the bright stars, I said: 'Now, look up there! Don't think of me, but think of God, and say, God, I can't expect you to help me in my difficult position!' She answered, 'No, I cannot say that.' 'Then,' I said, 'look up again and say, Lord my difficulties are great, but Thou art a great God. Thou canst keep me, and I commit my all to Thee.' She felt the words blessed to her."

Lord Radstock urged all God's people present to lift up their hearts to Him for those Christians who seem powerless for service; for weary souls who have long been struggling, and for the self-satisfied and self-righteous. "I remember meeting a lady," said Lord Radstock, "who had been trying forty-five years to find peace in vain; but one verse of the eternal Word flashed light into her soul."

A REMARKABLE CONVERSION.

"About fourteen years ago, I met an officer who had been brought up in a Jesuit college. The rebound led him to atheism—at least he professed to be an atheist. In the course of our conversation he said: 'I don't love religion. I don't like reading the Bible, and I like all things you people call bad, and I can't give those things up.' I said, 'In order to come to God you have to give up your will. You are commanded to come. If you tell a soldier to come, it is disobedience if he says, "I'll think about it." You are conscious of two powers, one leading you to Christ, and the other drawing you toward evil. But you can come through Jesus.'

"As he heard of Jesus, a gleam of light seemed to visit his soul. I asked him, if he had seen Jesus on earth, whether he would have wanted to be saved? He said, 'I think I should.' Under the influence of what I had said he then prayed and said, 'O Lord, you know I don't love you. I love the world and sin, but you said you'd save sinners; will you save me?' And he mentioned the availing name of Jesus. I said, "Now, do you think that prayer will be answered?' He replied, 'I don't know.' I said, 'Suppose you wanted to know something about the army, you would turn to the Book of Regulations,' and I referred him to the Bible as the book of regulations for man, and it said, 'Him that cometh unto Me, I will in no wise cast out.' He took hold of that wondrous truth, has been greatly blessed to his brother officers, and leads a Christian life."

A WONDERFUL TRANSFORMATION.

"Some years ago I went with a clergyman into some houses in his parish where he was afraid to go alone. I said, when we entered, to the people we found there, 'Do you know anything about the great God?' 'Yes,' said one of them, 'we know He'll send us to hell by and by.' I told them God loved them all, and had sent His own Son into the world to save them. A year afterward I saw a lovely face, a face lit up with Christian light and joy. A lady told me that that was the face of one who was in that abode of shame at the time I called with the clergyman. She had said to herself, 'I cannot stop here.' She had come away from her evil associates, had betaken herself to the loving Saviour and become a true child of God."

A LONG VOYAGE FOR LIGHT.

"I knew a dear old man who, fifty years ago, was awakened by God's Spirit in Australia. So anxious was he about his soul that he resolved to come to England to see if he could get help. Fearing bad influences on the voyage, he got a captain and seamen who agreed that they should read the Scriptures together every day. He went up and down this country seeking light and help everywhere, but in vain. He returned to Australia and there found Christ. It is no matter where we go, if we don't go to Him.

"A Greek priest said to me some years ago that he tried to make his people feel the difference between a Saviour and my Saviour. That is an all-important point. Only the other day, a dear young saint who had found her all in Christ departed this life, saying, 'This is indeed blessed, but what will the glory be?'"

WILLIAM AND MARY RECONCILED.

By J. B. Gough.

I ONCE picked up a man in the market-place. They said, "He is a brute; let him alone!" I took him home with me, and kept the "brute" fourteen days and nights, through his delirium; and he nearly frightened my wife out of her wits, one night, chasing her all about the house, with a boot in hand: but she recovered her wits, and he recovered his.

He said to me, "You wouldn't think I had a wife and child?"—"Well, I shouldn't."

"I have, and—God bless her little heart—my little Mary is as pretty a little thing as ever yet stepped!" said the "brute."

I asked, "Where do they live?"

"They live two miles away from here."

"When did you see them last?"

"About two years ago."

Then he told me his sad story. I said, "You must go back again."

"I mustn't go back—I won't—my wife is better without me than with me! I will not go back any more. I have knocked her, and kicked her, and abused her. Do you suppose I will ever go back again?"

I went to the house with him. I knocked at the door, and the wife opened it. "Is this Mrs Richardson?"—"Yes, sir."

"Well, that is Mr. Richardson. And Mr. Richardson, this is Mrs. Richardson. Now come into the house."

They went in. The wife sat on one side of the room, and the "brute" on the other. I waited to see who would speak first, and it was the woman. Before she spoke she fidgeted a great deal. She pulled up her apron till she got hold of the hem, and then pulled it all out again. Then she folded it all up closely, and jerked it through her fingers an inch at a time, and then she spread it all down again, and then she looked all down the room, and said, "Well, William!"

And the brute said, "Well, Mary!"

He had a large handkerchief around his neck, and she said, "You had better take the handkerchief off, William; you'll need it when you get out."

He began to fumble about it. The knot was large enough; he could have untied it if he liked, but he said, "Will you untie it, Mary?"

And she worked away at it; but her fingers were clumsy, and couldn't get it off; their eyes met, and their love-light was not all quenched; she turned her arms gently, and he fell into them. If you had seen those white arms clasped about his neck, and he sobbing on her breast, and the child looking in wonder first at the one, and then at the other, you would have said, "It is not a brute; it is a man with a great, big, warm heart in his breast."

A Minister was Killed by a Rattlesnake on August 15th. A dispatch from Santa Paula, Ventura County, Cal., says: "The Rev. J. W. Guiberson, who has held many offices of trust in the State, and who was one of the pioneers of this county, was bitten by a rattlesnake yesterday, and died last night from the effects of the wound."

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

(Continued from page 575.

Love or Duty?

BECAUSE of this undefined fear that Claude was becoming attached to me, as Miss Richards said, I had kept away from the Parsonage as much as possible during the vacations, and I had avoided Claude as much as our old friendship would allow me, until sometimes my conscience had accused me of rudeness and unkindness.

But, after all, I had hoped it was but a fear. Claude loved me, it was true, I argued to myself, and liked to bring me presents, and to give me pleasure; but then it was only natural that he should do so, when we had been brought up together, and learned together, and played together, and had had every thought and scheme in common. It was nothing more than that. So I had argued with myself. But Miss Richards's words had revived my old fear, and increased it a hundredfold.

I was very glad when, a minute or two afterward, the village clock struck five, and I could make an excuse to leave. Miss Richards had evidently noticed my embarrassment, for she said kindly, as she wished me good-by,

"I hope I have not troubled you, May dear, but my heart is so full of anxiety about Claude just now, that I have spoken perhaps more strongly than I ought to have done."

I went home very perplexed and troubled, but the next day my thoughts were turned into an entirely fresh channel by the sudden illness of my dear father. I will not dwell upon the sad time which followed those days and nights of alternate hope and fear, and then the close to our watching, and the terrible realization that Maggie and I were among the number of the fatherless children, prayed for, Sunday after Sunday, in the Litany.

Miss Richards was very kind to me during that time of trouble, giving me advice and help as I needed them, and relieving me greatly from the sense of heavy responsibility which rested on me.

Claude was still from home, but he wrote a kind little note of sympathy to me when he heard of my father's death. He said he was very sorry that he was away at the time; had he been at home he would have done all in his power to save me any unnecessary care and anxiety, in my time of sorrow.

I tried to hope that this was only brotherly sympathy and kindness, such as Claude had always shown me from childhood. I answered the letter by a short note, thanking him for his kind expression of sympathy, and telling him a little of our future plans—how Maggie was going to live with her aunts in the old Manor House at Branston, and how I hoped very soon to obtain a situation as governess or companion, where I could earn enough money to keep me in comfort and independence. By return of post came a second letter from Claude. I almost trembled when I saw his handwriting on the envelope; I had not intended to open a correspondence with him. And when I took the letter from the envelope, and saw its length, I was still more troubled and afraid. Then I read the letter, and when I had read it once, I read it again, and yet again. And now this letter lay on the table before me, still unanswered, and post-time was drawing nearer and nearer. I looked at it once more, although I knew almost every word of it already.

Claude began by stating his utter disapproval of my scheme of obtaining a situation, as companion or governess. I was not fitted for it, and he would never allow it to be carried out. And then he went on to tell me that he had far different plans for my future—plans which had mingled with his boyish dreams, and which had been for years the one idea of his life.

And then he told me how he loved me, how there was no one on earth that he had ever cared for except myself, and how he felt that the time had now come to make me his wife, and to take me to a home of my own, where I should be taken care of, and cherished, and loved, more than any wife had ever been before. He said it was hard for him to put into a letter all the feelings of his heart. He had never planned to tell me all this by writing, but he felt compelled to write off at once, as soon as he received my letter, and the more so as, by a curious coincidence, by the very same post he had heard of the sudden death of his uncle Charles, who had left him a large sum of money, quite sufficient, Claude said, to enable him to marry, and to take me to a comfortable home.

At the end of the week, he said, he hoped to be with me, but he could not wait till then to tell me all this, for he feared that I should in the meantime be answering some dreadful advertisement, and be making another and a very different engagement. He concluded by urging me to write by return of post, as he longed to know that the whole matter was finally settled and arranged.

The more I read this letter, the more persuaded I felt that Claude never, for a single moment, entertained the possibility of my refusing him; he seemed to look upon it as a matter of certainty that I should be only too glad to do as he asked me. He was evidently utterly unprepared for anything but an immediate and hearty acceptance of his offer.

And now what answer should I give? I pressed my throbbing temples, and tried to think the matter over calmly and deliberately.

Did I love Claude Ellis? Yes, undoubtedly I loved him very much indeed; not in the same way, it is true, as I had imagined that I should love the one who was to become my husband, but still I loved him very warmly, as a sister loves a dear brother who has been everything to her since she was a little child. And surely a different kind of love for Claude might, and probably would, come in my heart after we were engaged.

And although Claude was certainly not at all like the husband that I had pictured to myself in the days long ago, yet still he would be a kind, loving husband, and I might be very happy if I were his wife.

And I was so fond of Claude that I felt it would make me very miserable to feel that there was any estrangement or coldness between us, as there undoubtedly would be if I refused to be his wife. Our old friendship, which had lasted so long, would practically end, and when we met we should feel restrained and uncomfortable in each other's presence. I could not bear to think that such would be the case.

And then Miss Richards—how anxious she evidently was that I should use my influence with Claude! What would she say if I were to refuse him? How strange she would think it! How grieved and disappointed she would be!

And yet, with the thought of Miss Richards came the recollection of what she had told me of Claude, as we sat together in the arbor. Should I be happy with one as my husband who scorned the Book I loved best on earth, who slighted and neglected the Friend who was to me the chiefest among ten thousand? Should I be happy with no family prayer in my household, with no reading of the Word of God, and with religious topics forever banished, because husband and wife thought so differently about them? Would the love between us be perfect, the confidence unsullied, when there was one subject—and that one the subject nearest to my heart—on which we had no communion; one Name, and that one the Name above every name, which neither of us ever mentioned to each other? Should I be really happy, really contented with such a state of things?

And then came another question. Even supposing I should be happy, was it right for me to accept Claude's offer? Was it right in God's sight for me to marry one who was not a Christian? I knew there was a text somewhere in the Epistle to the Corinthians which spoke on this point. I opened my Bible and looked for it, and I found it in 2 Corinthians 6:14: "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness?

It was a very clear command, and could not be mistaken. And yet I tried to argue myself into the belief that it did not apply to me. For, in the first place, I reasoned, Claude was not a heathen as those Corinthians were. He did not worship gods of wood and stone. He was looked upon as a Christian, and lived and had been brought up in a Christian family. But the word unbeliever, conscience answered, surely includes every one that is not a believer.

Was Claude a believer? Could I honestly say that he was a true believer in the Lord Jesus Christ? Would Claude himself like to be thought a believer? Could I from my heart say that I thought Claude was safe in Christ, resting his soul on Christ for salvation? No, I was obliged sorrowfully to admit to myself that such was not the case. But then, I argued, I am no perfect. Who am I, that I should set myself u to be better and more holy than Claude? Wh am I, that I should say Claude is not go enough for me?

And yet, the line of distinction in the text wa evidently drawn, not between perfect people an imperfect people, but between believers and un believers. Was I, then, a believer? that was th question: was I in deed and in truth a believe in the Lord Jesus Christ?

I dared not say that I was not, for even as asked myself the question, a day years ago cam back to my mind, a day when Mr. Ellis had bee giving us a Bible lesson and had appealed to u very solemnly to decide for Christ.

I remembered how anxious and serious I ha felt as I left the Bible class, and how I had com home and shut myself in this very room where was now sitting. I remembered how I had close the door behind me, and had resolved not t leave the room until I had laid my sins on J sus, and had looked to Him by faith as my ow Saviour. I remembered how all my sins ha risen up before me that day as they had nev done before; and how, one by one, I had take them to Christ to be atoned for and forgiven.

And then I remembered the peace which ha followed, and how, for days afterward, life ha been entirely new to me, and my thoughts an feelings and wishes had been entirely differe from what they were before. And since th time, though I had very often grown carele and indifferent, still I had never been hap when I was not walking closely with God, an I had always longed at such times to be back the sunshine and light of His presence agai So then it seemed as if the command in the te did apply to me.

But surely if I married Claude I might u my influence with him for good. He loved m very much, and, as Miss Richards had said, had more influence with him than any one ha

Was it right for me to throw away this oppo tunity of doing good? Was there not a te which said that husbands, "who obey not t Word," might yet, without the Word, be "w by the conversation of their wives?" And did n St. Paul say, "What knowest thou, O wi whether thou shalt save thy husband?" Sure these verses justified me in thinking that if I ma ried Claude he might, through my influen become a Christian.

And yet, when I turned to these passages, a read the context, I saw that they clearly referr to those wives who were converted after th marriage—that such were told not to leave th unbelieving husbands, but to remain in that st in which they were called, and to such, and such alone, the promise about being the mea of saving their husbands applied. It had e dently nothing whatever to do with those w were converted while they were still unmarri nor did it, in the very slightest degree overthr the clear command I had just read: "Be ye unequally yoked together with unbelievers"- command which applied to the unmarried lievers as plainly as the command in the Epistle applied to the married ones.

(To be continued.)

TRIAL OF ABRAHAM'S FAITH.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 19th, Gen. 22: 1-14
Golden Text, Heb. 11 : 17. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IT was not sufficient that Abraham's faith in the promises of God should be put to the proof by the long delay in their fulfilment; another a severer test must be applied to him, that he might learn the great lesson that "with God all things are possible" (Matt. 19 : 26). Some are apt to think that when their faith feels strong—i.e., when there is nothing particular to try it—that it really is stronger, and when in the moment of great trial all faith seems to leave them, then they are apt to be discouraged as though all had been a delusion. This arises from the dangerous practice of looking to their faith rather than to its object. The Apostle Peter says (1 Pet. 1 : 7) that the trial of our faith is "more precious than of gold which perisheth." In earthly things everything which is meant to endure must first be tried. A new bridge, or a railway embankment is put to a far greater strain than it is meant to bear ordinarily, that it may be proved that that which can stand the greater strain can, as a matter of course, stand the lesser.

All had been set in order in Abraham's household. The child of promise was born and grown up, the bondwoman and her son were no longer there to dispute the rights of the heir of promise, all was going on well; but there was no room for the exercise of faith, all had become sight. And then it was that "God did tempt (or try) Abraham, and said unto him, Abraham, and he said, Behold, here I am. And He said, Take now thy son, thine only son, Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt-offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of." Had not God said unto him, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called" (chap. 21 : 12); how could this be possible if Isaac were to die? Abraham allowed not time for such reasoning as this. He "rose up early in the morning, and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him and Isaac his son, and clave the wood (intended to consume his own son) for the burnt-offering, and rose up and went unto the place of which God had told him." This was faith and this was obedience. Whenever we have clear direction from God, and we begin to reason about it, the light becomes dim and we get into confusion. If ever there were a case in which it might seem that God had made a mistake it was this one. Had Abraham allowed his imagination to picture the probable temptations to unbelief and to harsh judgment of God, which might assail him if he carried out God's command, or had he considered what might be the effect upon Sarah or his household, what kind of reputation he would obtain among the Canaanites, or by what means he could justify God in requiring the life of his son at his hands—his courage would have failed him.

But our Golden Text tells us that "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac; and he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son, of whom it was said that in Isaac shall thy seed be called; accounting that God was able to raise him up even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure." Abraham did not understand how God could reconcile this command with His promise; but that was not his affair, God was responsible alike for all that He promised, and for all that He commanded, and it was for Him, and not for Abraham to reconcile what to man seemed irreconcilable. Abraham knew how to give God His place as the Infinite in wisdom and in power, and he knew that it belonged not to the creature to criticise the ways of the Creator, or consult his own thoughts or feelings as to what was God's declared will.

The life of a true Christian is called to be as much a life of faith as was Abraham's. The enemy of souls seeks to make our lives as intricate as possible. For instance, it may be that some kind of service for the Lord is laid so strongly upon the heart of some child of God that it is a burden night and day, and at the same time either physical strength fails him, or family circumstances, or want of means hinder him. The enemy suggests that it is cruel of God to place His child in such a position, and often such a one wearies his brain incessantly to devise means to accomplish that which he believes to be God's will. Now, a confidence in God which can trust Him in the dark, would lead such a child of God to hand over the matter entirely to Him, with an absolute abnegation of his own will, a complete ceasing from any effort of his own to set forward that to which he feels himself called, and a quiet steady waiting for God Himself to render possible that which at present seems impossible.

Every complication in the life of a child of God is permitted in order to bring him into this condition of absolute confidence, of expecting and allowing God to work out His own will in His own way. When, for instance, in a large Home Mission work, it seems exceedingly necessary to extend the operations, to build, or to open new branches, etc., how common it is to see the most distressing, heart-rending appeals to the feelings and consciences of God's people, as though they were wholly responsible if the enterprise does not succeed, and does not succeed at once. It seems to us to give the lie to so many of the faithful promises of our God, when His people, who allege that they are doing His work, always write as though God were forsaking them, and their only hope was from man. "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want," said the Psalmist; surely, if the Lord is our brethren's Shepherd, they will not want, for He leads them by still waters, not agitated waters of chronic distress. And when it does happen, as an exception in their lot, that they must walk through the valley of the shadow of death in their work, if He is leading them, they "will fear no evil." The shortest and surest way of receiving help from man is to seek it only from God, who has the hearts of all men in His hand. Ezra (8 : 21-23) was ashamed to require of the king a band of soldiers and horsemen to help him and the Jews against the enemy in the way: "because we had spoken unto the king, saying, The hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek Him; but His power and His wrath is against all them that forsake Him. So we fasted, and besought our God for this, and He was entreated of us." Oh, for such a spirit now!

In complications of business, in our relations with visitors and with servants, O how we need to walk by faith, expecting nothing from man, everything from God!

Abraham acted in faith. "And when he saw the place afar off, he said unto his young men, Abide here with the ass, and I and the lad will go yonder and worship and come again to you." He was sure that even though Isaac should die, he would be restored to him. He took the wood, the fire, the knife, but Isaac missed one important feature of their worship. He said, "My father, and he said, Here am I, my son. And he said, Behold the fire and the wood; but where is the lamb for the burnt-offering?" If Abraham's faith had failed him, it might well have been at this moment. Only the Spirit of God could have given him wisdom to answer as he did in the spirit of prophecy, "My son, God will provide Himself a lamb for a burnt-offering." How Abraham broke the tidings to his son that God required his life in sacrifice, when "he built an altar and laid the wood in order; and bound Isaac, his son, and laid him on the altar upon the wood," is not told to us.

"And Abraham stretched forth his hand, and took the knife to slay his son." It was enough, his whole will was laid down, he was fully conquered, his faith was proved to all generations. "And the angel of the Lord called unto him out of Heaven, and said, Abraham, Abraham." The patriarch was in the habit of paying immediate attention to God, therefore he did not wait to accomplish the slaying of his son before he answered, "Here am I. And God said, Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou anything unto him; for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me." It was now an established fact that God could count upon Abraham, and Abraham could count upon God. In the most trying circumstances the patriarch proved that he walked before God, and neither considered himself nor his son, but only the will of his God. In our personal difficulties, or in those of our work, God is carrying on our education. A few dollars more or less is a little matter to God—whether we care for so many dozen or so many hundred blind or orphans, etc., is not so much the object God has in view—He has many other workers besides—but that we ourselves should be subdued to Him, that we should let all our life and all our work pass through His hands—this is the object which He seeks.

But God had called for a burnt-offering; could He draw back? "Abraham lifted up his eyes and looked, and behold, behind him a ram caught in a thicket by his horns; and Abraham went and took the ram, and offered him up for a burnt-offering in the stead of his son." God had provided a temporary sacrifice, but only as a type of the great enduring Sacrifice which He would yet provide. Could Isaac ever forget that his life had been required, that he was a redeemed soul, that he had lain once upon the altar; and could he live other than the life of living sacrifice? Can we, who have been redeemed by the blood of Christ?

It may be that God intended, by this trial of Abraham's faith, to teach him more of his own purposes of redemption than he knew before. When He said, "Take now thy son, thine only son, Isaac, whom thou lovest," was it not a figure of God's Son, whom He loveth, and whom, nevertheless, He wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities? When Abraham laid the wood on Isaac which he had prepared for the burnt-offering, did not the heart of God see already His own Son on Calvary bearing His cross? And when Abraham said, "My son, God shall provide Himself a lamb for a burnt-offering," may not Abraham have perceived some glimpse in the far distance of that "Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world"? (John 1 : 29). "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day," said our blessed Lord, "and he saw it, and was glad." May it not have been on this very occasion that Abraham saw the day of Christ?

But although Christ Himself is the one perfect burnt-offering, yet we who are members of His flesh, and of His bones, are by that very fact bound to the life of living sacrifice which He led. Isaac was spared, and we are spared from eternal death, but only that we may die to ourselves instead of for ourselves. God's Lamb has died for us that we may not have to die for ourselves, and has redeemed our life from all littleness. Now, therefore, we die to ourselves that we may live unto Him; all is forfeited, unpermissible, which is not for Him; we live in Christ, and all outside of Christ is death to us, to the real life which we are living in Him. Abraham called the name of the place Jehovah Jireh (i.e., the Lord will see or provide; see margin). He had learned something of the future in this agonizing trial.

"And the angel of the Lord called unto Abraham out of Heaven the second time, and said, By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord; for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son; that in blessing, I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed;" . . . and God repeated His former promises with the addition, "And thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice." How often is the promise of being made a blessing to others annexed to faithfulness and obedience—"Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men" (Matt. 4 : 19). Every noble heart longs more to be made a blessing than even to be blest.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

General Roberts, the British Commander in Afghanistan, has succeeded in reaching Candahar in time to relieve the garrison there. By a rapid march from Cabul he arrived at Candahar, a distance of 316 miles, on September 2d. Ayoob Khan, who had inflicted so serious a reverse on the British troops under General Burrows, opened communications with General Roberts, but he was informed that the only terms open to him were unconditional surrender. In forty-eight hours after his arrival, General Roberts attacked the Afghans, without waiting for reinforcements, and achieved a decisive victory. He captured twenty-seven guns, and pursued the enemy up the Argand-ab valley. The march and the victory are considered to be the most brilliant exploits of the war. The question is now being agitated whether it would not be wise for Great Britain to hold Candahar, which is regarded by many Anglo-Indians as the key to Afghanistan, and a deputation has waited on the Government in London to urge that course; but no definite arrangement has as yet been made.

Ireland is Described in the Cable Reports as generally quieter during the past week, owing to the abundant harvest and an increased confidence in the Liberal Government being well disposed toward the people. There are, however, sufficient causes for disquietude apparent, and it is certain that wholesale evictions would cause serious disturbances, which would not be suppressed without bloodshed.

A discreditable scene was witnessed in the House of Commons on September 3d, when one of the leaders of the Irish party entered the House in a state of intoxication. He delivered a wild speech, in which he insulted the chairman of the committee, and denounced members generally as infidels, Scotch Presbyterians, contemptible nonconformists, and despicable shopkeepers. He was reprimanded by the Speaker and expelled for the remainder of the sitting. Subsequently one of the Irish members, on behalf of the Home Rule Party, apologized to the House for the disgraceful conduct of his intoxicated associate.

The Departure of the Ambassador of Belgium from the Papal Court has been a severe blow to the Pope. France and Germany have defied him, but Belgium has always been compliant and his faithful friend. It is publicly stated that the cause of the rupture was the discovery that the Pope had been playing a double part toward the Belgian Government. The Government charge him with writing to the Minister for Foreign Affairs in one way, and sending an opposite set of instructions to his bishops.

Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia are Plotting to become united. This will be a new source of trouble to Turkey. The Sultan has been warned by Germany and by Austria of what is going on, and urged to occupy the Balkans with Turkish troops. The authorities of Bulgaria are understood to be unfavorable to the project of union with Eastern Roumelia, and to discountenance the efforts which are being made to bring it about; but it will be difficult, if not impossible, to suppress without military force the operations of the populations concerned. The Sultan has plenty of troubles on hand, and no sooner does one seem on the eve of a peaceful settlement than another starts up. The Turkish Empire is clearly falling to pieces, and whether its defenders will be able to prevent its wreck and dissolution is extremely doubtful. What with rectification of frontiers demanded from her by Europe, and the rising up against her of long subject populations, the Turco-Mohammedan Empire is nearly "dried up" as predicted, Rev. 16 : 12.

Frightful Desolation through Floods is Reported from Upper Silesia, Bohemia, Moravia, and East and West Prussia. The entire valley of the Oder forms a huge inland sea. Railway bridges have been swept away; all the factories are under water; twenty-five villages have been completely submerged, while fifteen are partially under water. No estimate can be formed of the rs on acres of corn which the Oder has swept down and carried away in its furious course. One great land-owner stated that he had lost 700 acres by the inundation. In the district of Oderberg, though the outbreak of the water was sudden and severe, no lives have been lost. A handful of heroic men went about in boats rescuing the inmates of the submerged houses, from which nearly 300 persons were brought off in safety. In Friedland about a tenth of the harvest is destroyed, and almost all trace of the railway has disappeared. In Ostrau five persons were drowned. In Plania nothing is now visible but the church spire and the roofs of the houses. No such desolation has been known in Moravia since the year 1813.

Mr. George Muller's 41st Report has just been issued for the twelve months ending May 26th, 1880. His institutions for maintaining orphans and for carrying on Home and Foreign Missions have received altogether $4,243,000 since 1834, as the result of prayer and faith, without asking any one for a contribution. Also, 5,947 orphans have been from the first in his Orphan Homes, and nearly 2,000 are there at present. Fine large Orphan Houses have been erected at a cost of $559,000. Mr. Müller was born on September 27th, 1805, and is therefore seventy-five years old. For the last five years he has been evangelizing in America and Europe, as his son-in-law, Mr. James Wright, manages the institutions. Mr. and Mrs. Müller intend to sail for America again on September 16th, in the Sardinia. A life and portrait of Mr. Müller appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD October 9th, 1879.

The Wife of a Working-man in Glasgow is a confirmed drunkard, and her husband has been summoned before the magistrates for the means he employed to keep her from drinking during his absence from home at his employment. He has been in the habit of chaining her to her bed by the ankles before he left home in the morning, and securing the chain with a padlock. On his return at night he released her until morning, when he chained her up again. The neighbors protested against the man's treatment of his wife, but the woman, when examined, acknowledged that her husband had been uniformly kind to her in spite of her continued misconduct, and that if she were free she should not be able to keep away from the drink. The magistrates in consequence released the man, after cautioning him.

Aristocratic Marriages are not Always Productive of happiness, though they are highly esteemed in the world. An American lady was married in 1869 to Count von Hatzfeldt, a German nobleman. He has found the alliance a hindrance to his official advancement, and last week he procured a divorce from her so as to enable him to accept high position in the Government, which he could only occupy on that condition. A man who would sacrifice his wife to his ambition could not have been a very good husband in the past.

The Juggernaut Car in Retirement.—The Indian correspondent of an American journal says that the famous car of Juggernaut was not as usual dragged through the streets of Puri on the 9th of July; and it seems that, by religious custom or law, if it be not drawn on the ninth day of the car festival, twelve years must elapse before it is again used. The fact of the car not being brought out this time is attributed by the natives to "an act of unpardonable negligence on the part of meddling Government officials."

A Singular Incident in Natural History Occurred lately at Chester, England. A thrush in a happy state of freedom was trilling its notes in an orchard below the city walls, near the wishing steps, when its music excited similar efforts from a caged bird of the same species, which was suspended in front of the adjacent houses. These feathered songsters persevered in raising their melodies to higher and higher efforts, as if in earnest rivalry, when suddenly the bird among the trees darted from its perch upon the wicker cage of its competitor, broke the bars, entered it, and commenced an assault upon the musica captive, the owner of which, hearing the un usual noise, came out, took the aggressor pri oner, and sold it into bondage. The passionat thrush could not bear the existence of anoth bird superior in the powers of song to itself, an in attempting to destroy its rival lost its fre dom. The same spirit of envy has before no wrecked the lives of talented men, and eve Christians have suffered from it. The achiev ments of one may be more brilliant than thos of another, but if they have issued in the furthe ance of the same cause there ought to be neith envy nor jealousy manifested, especially when w remember "that it is God who worketh in yo both to will and to do of His good pleasure, (Phil. 2 : 13), and that "to every one of us given grace according to the measure of the gi of Christ" (Eph. 4 : 7).

A Remarkable Ceremony was Performed Madagascar, the large island on the south-easte coast of Africa, a few weeks ago. The island w at one time given over to the grossest forms idolatry, and the missionaries on their arrival e countered fierce persecution. The latest a counts report the opening and dedication of t Palace Church at Antananarivo—an elegant sto building. The Queen, the Prime Minister, a many of the higher officers and their familie were among the congregation. An interesti feature of the proceedings was the reading, the Prime Minister, of a narrative of "the orig of the praying" and the Queen's conversio "It was not through any human instrume tality," said the speaker, "that the Queen fi became a Christian, but through the influence the Word of God, blessed by the Holy Spiri and I will show you the very Bible by which s was led to believe." He then took from a ta in front of the Queen a not very clean copy the Bible printed by the British and Forei Bible Society in 1865, and holding it up, p ceeded to narrate how its perusal had been ble ed by the Spirit of God to Her Majesty's c version to Christianity.

Dr. Parsons, the Missionary Murdered Turkey recently, while carrying relief to t starving people near the Sea of Marmora, was a former occasion in imminent peril of dea while engaged in the work to which he gave l life. A Turkish newspaper correspondent say "Some years ago Mr. Parsons, riding alone, u armed and with nothing of value about him sa a small package of Bibles and Testaments, w stopped by three desperadoes, who comman him to disburse in their favor. 'I have money about me,' mildly remarked the missi ary. 'What are you carrying in your pack there?' roughly asked one of the men. 'O good books,' was the answer; and taking Bible out, by dint of exhorting and talking th hardened criminals were persuaded to purch and pay for a Bible apiece, they leaving mo with him who had intended stripping him of he had. This is but an instance of his cour and gentleness."

The Second Volume of The Christian Her comprising Nos. 37 to 62 (July to Dec., 1879), ma procured, elegantly bound in cloth, at this of Price $1.75.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchm (London) for August may be obtained at the offic THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Price six cents.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Works are on at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at price low as to bring them within the reach of every Twelve Sermons on various subjects, with photog of Mr Spurgeon, price 35 cents. John Ploughm Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, 60 ce The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, a volume of sermons, $2.50. The Treasury of David, a homi cal exposition of the book of Psalms, five vols., a as Psa. 118, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth-Day This popular gift-book contains a suitable pas selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for every in the year, with a blank space opposite for a graphs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. Spur appear at their respective birthdays. The boo elegantly bound, and the price is 75 cents. Re tances should accompany orders.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, Rev. W. M. HAY AITKEN, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1880. 14th Year. No. 38—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAIT OF THE LATE REV. WM. ADAMS, D.D., LL.D., with Sketch of his Life.

THE DAY-DAWN. A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

ROCHESTER TOWER. A New Serial Story by Miss M. A. Pauli (Continued).

The Broken Jug: A Temperance Story.

THE END OF THE 6000 YEARS FROM THE CREATION IN 1890.

PORTRAIT OF MR. W. GROSER, the Secretary of the English Sunday-School Union.

CURRENT EVENTS: The State Elections—Gen. Weaver's Canvass—An Aged Missionary's Death—The Meetings at Northfield—Dr. Talmage's Tour—A Heathen Ceremonial in Brooklyn—A Fountain of Gold—The Fall of the Flying Fairy—Sudden Disappearance of a Converted Chinaman, etc.

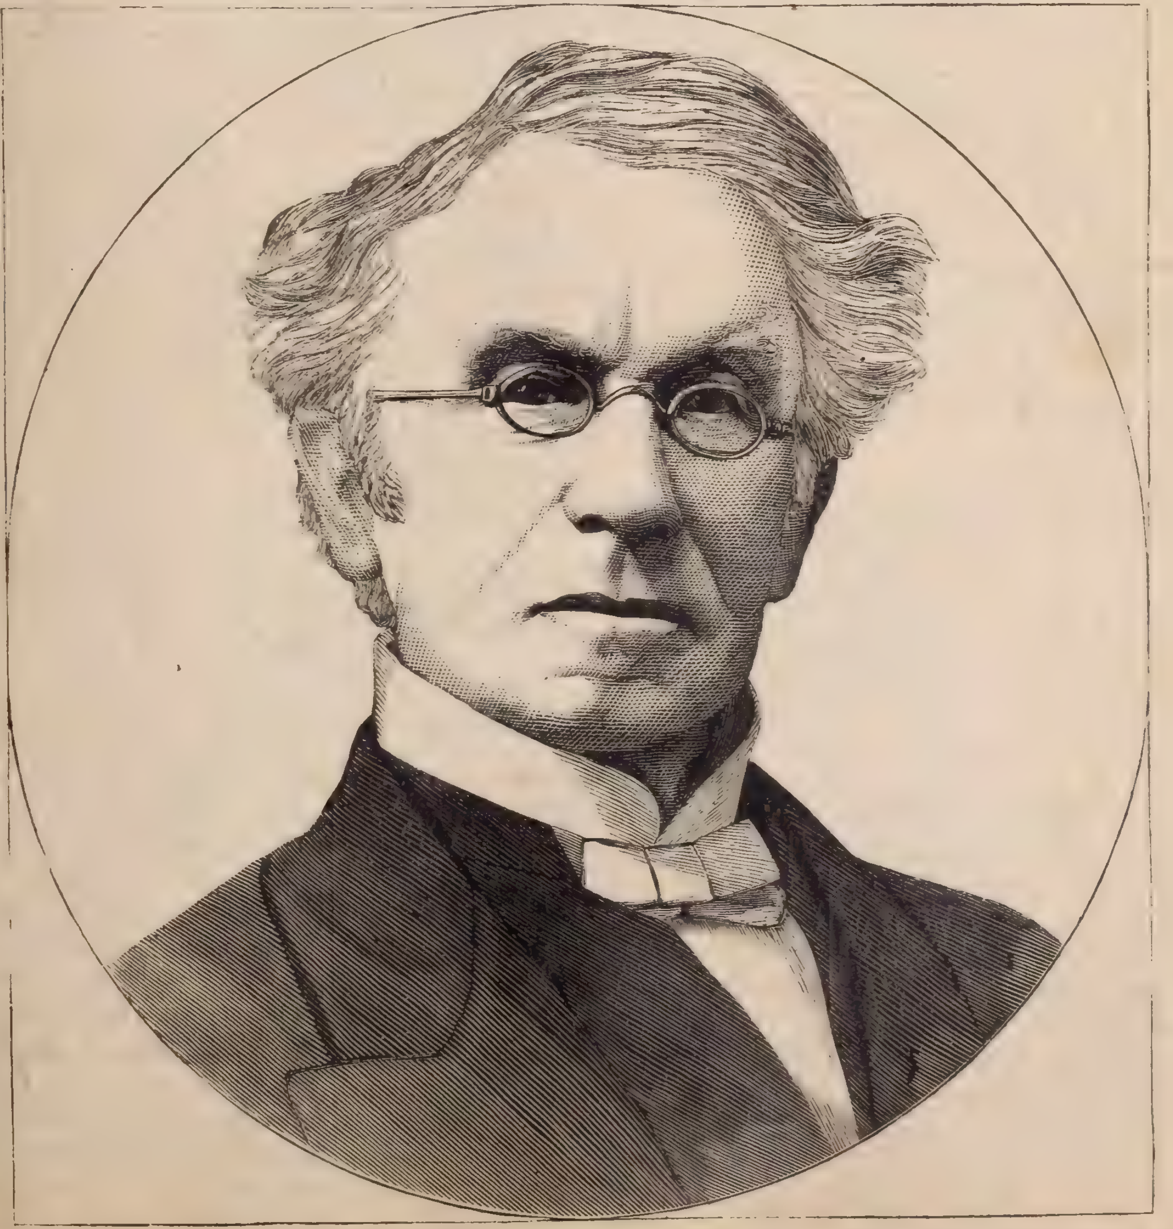
TEN COMING WONDERS. By Rev. M. Baxter.

REDEMPTION BY PRICE. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

A CHOICE VINDICATED. (Continued.)

Review of the Quarter's Lessons. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.

FOREIGN TOPICS: Prorogation of the British Parliament—Miles of Flame in Canada—Birth of a Spanish Princess—Prince Napoleon's Aspirations—An Ambassador Offended by an Actress, etc.



The late REV. W. ADAMS, D.D., LL.D., President of the Union Theological Seminary, N. Y.

THE LATE REV. WILLIAM ADAMS, D.D., LL.D.,

President of the Union Theological Seminary.

His Puritan Ancestors—Birth and Education—Settlement at Brighton—Illness and Visit to New York—Invitation to the Broome Street Church—His Forty Years' Labor—The New School Controversy — The Evangelical Alliance—Resignation and Seminary Work—Illness and Death.

IT would have been difficult to find an emblem more appropriate for the beautiful and useful life just closed, than the small sheaves of ripe wheat which on Friday, September 3d, were fastened to the corners of the casket which held all that was mortal of the Rev. William Adams, D.D., LL.D. On that day, in the church where for so many years his voice had been heard declaring the truth as it is in Jesus, the congregation who had listened to him, and his fellow-workers in Christ's vineyard, who knew his work and valued his fraternal spirit, met together to do honor to the memory of the dead pastor, who had "come to his grave in a full age like as a shock of corn cometh in its season" (Job 5 : 26).

For forty years Dr. Adams had preached the gospel in New York, and he occupied one of the foremost places among the Presbyterian ministers of America. Deeply loved by his large congregation, he was highly esteemed by his friends in the ministry, who with one accord, and without a symptom of jealousy, had for many years regarded him as their leader and representative. It was, therefore, no common loss which drew together at that funeral gathering, professors, preachers, scholars, bankers, merchants, and distinguished citizens of all ranks, all moved by a sense of bereavement. Dr. Adams occupied a place in the Church which it will be no easy matter to fill, and he occupied it in a manner that won from all who knew him hearty respect and good-will.

There will probably appear at an early date an exhaustive memoir of so distinguished a man, which will contain interesting details of his life and work, which at this early period are not accessible. The following brief sketch will, however, imperfect as it necessarily is, suffice to convey to our readers some idea of the character of one so deservedly held in high repute by Christians of all denominations.

Dr. Adams came of a line of DISTINGUISHED ANCESTORS.

When Charles I., King of England, was fighting under the tutelage of Strafford his battle of "Thorough," and the civil and religious liberties of England hung in the balance, many good men turned their eyes westward, and in despair of their own country, came here to enjoy the freedom which day by day was becoming more insecure in their native land. Among these was John Adams, of Devonshire, who sailed in 1632, and settled at Braintree, Mass. From him descended the two Presidents, John Adams and John Quincy Adams, and also, in another line, the distinguished minister who is the subject of our sketch.

On his mother's side too, his pedigree is an honored one. Her maiden name was Elizabeth Ripley, and she was a lineal descendant of the famous Governor Bradford, who was prominent among the brave pioneers who landed on Plymouth Rock in 1620 from the Mayflower.

The John Adams whose name figures in the war of independence as a brave captain, who did good service in the fight for liberty, hailed from Canterbury, Ct., and was the grandfather of Dr. Adams. Thus while scions of European houses treasure the records of their forefathers' glories, Dr. Adams could point to a descent from a line of heroes, whose struggles had always been on the side of religion, of truth, and of freedom.

BIRTH AND EDUCATION.

He was born at Colchester, Ct., on January 25th, 1807. His father was at that period Principal of the Colchester Academy, but he removed soon after the birth of his son to Andover, Mass., where he took the charge of Phillips Academy, a position he held for more than twenty years. He was intensely devoted to his profession, in which he was eminently successful. He was a man of rigid and conscientious integrity. As he was a thorough scholar and an able teacher, his career at Andover was brilliant and useful. Many men who have been well known in American annals were greatly indebted to his conscientious and able teaching. He was a strict believer in simplicity of style in writing, and impressed his opinions on this subject on the minds of his pupils, and much of the beauty and force of Dr. Adams's sermons can be traced directly to the early teachings of his father. Nor was it as a teacher of secular learning only that John Adams was distinguished, he was an earnest and consistent Christian, and lost no opportunity of disseminating gospel truth; and when in 1833, being then a little more than sixty years of age, he resigned the office at Andover and went to Jacksonville, Ill., he devoted his efforts to Sunday-school organization, and was successful in establishing over five hundred Sunday-schools. He died in harness at last, about ninety-one years of age.

William Adams studied in Andover College under his father's superintendence, and there acquired the foundation of the education which all who knew him acknowledged to have been of a thorough and profound character. From Andover he removed to Yale College, which he entered in 1823, at the age of sixteen. He was from childhood a devoted student, and made rapid progress in classical and mathematical studies. At this period the young man was exceedingly delicate in health, and twice during the four years he was at Yale his close application to study brought on complete prostration and stretched him on a bed of sickness.

Having resolved soon after his conversion to give his life to the service of his Master in he returned to Andover after graduating at Yale in 1827, and at once entered himself as a student in the Theological Seminary there, under the care of Drs. Stuart, Woods, and Porter. Several students who have since become well-known clergymen were his classmates at this institution; among them were the Rev. Dr. George B. Cheever, and the Rev. Dr. Schauffer, afterward a missionary to Turkey. After graduating again at Andover, he was, while still at home in his father's house, licensed to preach at Boston by the Suffolk South Association, in the spring of 1830. He was soon after ordained and installed pastor of the Congregational Church in Brighton, near Boston.

THE MINISTRY,

During the following three years he labored very successfully, and the congregation at the Brighton Church grew rapidly. While living at Brighton he formed the acquaintance of Miss Magoun, of Medford, Mass., whom he married in the early days of his ministry. The weakness of his constitution which had manifested itself at Yale became again alarmingly apparent at the end of his three years' labor at Brighton. Mrs. Adams also suffered from ill health, and their medical attendant prescribed for both a trip to the South. As often happens in the lives of God's people, this dispensation of Providence, which, at the time, appeared alike to minister and people inscrutable, was in reality a blessing to the Church at large. It opened the way to a more extended sphere of labor, in which there were larger opportunities for usefulness.

During his southern trip Mr. Adams visited and finding his stay here beneficial to the health of himself and his wife, he consented to occupy for a short time the pulpit of the Pearl Street Church, then vacant. The sermons he preached there were remarkable for their simplicity of language, clear, vigorous thought, and stirring eloquence. They attracted the attention of Christians throughout the city, and led to an invitation being presented to him from the Central Presbyterian Church in Broome Street, which, after much thought and prayer, he accepted.

NEW YORK,

At that time (1834) the Broome Street Church was in the centre of business life and activity. Then it was surrounded by the residences of merchants and business men, which soon afterward were removed northward to localities then considered country districts. Dr. E. F. Hatfield, who at that time was also pastor of a church in Broome Street, and who soon became one of the new minister's most intimate friends, speaking recently of his intercourse with Mr. Adams, said, "When I entered the seminary at which we both studied fifty-one years ago, he was a member of the senior class, and though my junior in days he was my senior in study. Even then the premonition of what was to be was manifest in all his intercourse with the students. Everybody respected him then, as everybody has respected him since. In 1835 I came to the city of New York. He only preceded me some seven or eight months, and from that time to the present our lot has been cast together. Side by side we have pursued our way—myself at the farther end of Broome Street, he in the central part of Broome Street. Through all the period of our intercourse his memory has been precious to me."

TWENTY YEARS

did Mr. Adams labor in the Broome Street Church, and the steady and uninterrupted growth of the church and congregation bore witness that the blessing of God was upon him and his work. A revival of religion took place soon after his settlement, and he threw himself into the work with indefatigable energy. Nor was the labor of preacher and pastor sufficient to satisfy his insatiable appetite for Christian work. The columns of the press, both religious and secular, were indebted to his pen for articles which, like his sermons, were characterized by their chaste and elegant language as well as for their earnestness and power. The initials W. A. at the foot of an article soon became an indicatio to newspaper readers that something worth reading was above, and they were never disappointed

In 1843 the University of the City of New Yor conferred upon the Broome Street pastor th degree of Doctor of Divinity, and in 1869 he re ceived from the College of New Jersey at Prince ton the LL.D. degree. When the disput arose in the Church which ultimately led to division between the Old and New Schools, an the burning questions of Calvinism, fellowshi with other churches, and the attitude of th Church toward slavery were argued with so muc bitterness, Dr. Adams took an active part in th debates on the side of the New School. Bu when in later years an effort was made to brin about reunion, he was selected to be chairman the Reunion Committee, and by his tact, gentl ness, and Christian spirit did much to promot the project. At the meetings of the two assem blies in New York, when the preliminaries wer definitely arranged, Dr. Adams appeared befo the Old School Assembly in the Brick Church, t present the cordial greetings of the assemb with which he was connected. His address, cha acterized by dignified humor, tender pathos, i spiring eloquence, and deep Christian feelin made a deep impression on his hearers.

Mr. J. Alexander Patten, who knew him wel speaking of this period of his history, gives th following description of Dr. Adams: "In ap pearance Dr. Adams was a tall, erect, finely pr portioned man, who, although evidently begi ning the decline of life, was hale and vigorou He had regular, well-defined features, and cheerful, intellectual face. His eyes were brig and penetrating, his mouth was expressive much decision of character, and his brow h not less of physical symmetry than evidences mental endowment. To this striking and tractive presence he added manners at once po ished and fascinating. He exhibited an eas becoming dignity, but he was very affable a approachable, being so finished a gentleman. public and private his bearing was marked by entire self-possession and a happy adaptabili to circumstances and persons. He had a geni companionable disposition, and none save nobling qualities of heart.

"His lecture on the 'Catacombs of Rome,' to a crowded audience in Association as one of the most interesting ever given ew York audience. Of the many thou- who have visited these monuments of hristianity in the Eternal City, I believe ams was the first to read and interpret y the Greek and Latin inscriptions on and he has thus furnished a key to all students whereby the mysteries of reve- d the facts of history may be understood reciated.

sermons were all able, and showed his eological as well as literary culture. He eached such a thing as an indifferent —it was, in fact, an impossibility with hile he did not turn aside from the f religious argument, he interweaved reasoning attractive cullings from liter- l much that was imaginative. Powerful larly arguments, they were also affect- tian appeals to sinners. His voice was hough of full compass for the largest , and his tall, erect figure imparted ad- mpressiveness to his delivery."

IE MADISON SQUARE CHURCH.

Dr. Adams was elected Moderator of al Assembly, which met in Washing- on his way home accepted an invita- each in Philadelphia. The result of was, that an invitation was tendered ecome the permanent pastor of the ; ut after giving the matter his prayer- ration, he deemed it his duty to de- ffer.

he Broome Street Church had grown, ministrations of Dr. Adams, to be the esbyterian church of the city. It was wded when he preached, and often to be turned from the doors because o room to accommodate them. The ad been growing steadily uptown, and e members of the church were forced ong distance to attend divine service. ded to abandon the old church and ew edifice. Madison Avenue and rth Street was selected as the site, now known as the Madison Square n Church was opened by Dr. Adams r, 1854.

er twenty years Dr. Adams labored e congregation in its new and more home. The success which, by the God, he met with in Broome Street still. As pastor and preacher, he at- espect and won the confidence of his y his manly, straightforward life, and sing hostility to all forms of evil he good-will of Christian citizens of than his own.

eus Prime, one of his valued friends, owing graphic sketch of his char- is work at the Madison Square is courtly and elegant manners, that e distinguished ornament of the and brilliant circles at home and so thoroughly natural to him that repel but rather attracted the less d the 'common people,' who gladly aster, were drawn to the disciple mple in his habits and gentle in his mes a servant of Christ.

in this city was more easily or more proached by all classes and condi- e in want of advice and aid. The him. The troubled poured into the tale of their trials, and his ct and sweet sympathy with every him a friend indeed. What a sorrows this good man bore is only who bears all ours.

sehold knew him as their best ys grew into usefulness and dis- his eye, and he has often said to us man, now nobly doing for Christ as a man of business in active e of mine.' Those whom he bap- he afterward joined in marriage, lies rose up around him to call d.'

In 1873 Dr. Adams had the pleasure of welcoming to New York the Evangelical Alliance, an assembly of distinguished divines unexcelled by any assembly that ever met on the American Continent for piety, learning, and usefulness. His address on that occasion was characteristic of the man, evincing as it did the profound love of the brotherhood by which we are taught to distinguish the man who has drunk most deeply of the spirit of the Master (John 13 : 35). It closed with the following eloquent words :

"The object of our Conference is neither political nor ecclesiastical. We come not to discuss forms of Church organization or government, or anything which is extrinsic and casual. We meet to manifest and express our Christian unity."

* * * * * * * *

"Welcoming one another to these Christian assemblies upon the earth, greeting every occasion like this for the expression of Christian courtesy, confidence and love, beseeching you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake and for the love of the Spirit, that you strive together in your prayers to God, that coming together with joy by the will of God we may with you be refreshed, our thoughts run forward with gladness to the time when all the true servants of Christ, coming from the East, the West, the North and South, with their bosoms full of sheaves, shall meet together at the harvest home in the end of the world. In the very words of Dean Alford, whose personal presence we miss among us—words which were chanted at his funeral service in Canterbury Cathedral :

"'Ten thousand times ten thousand
In sparkling raiment bright,
The armies of the ransomed saints Throng up the steeps of light.

"''Tis finished—all is finished,
Their fight with Death and Sin ;
Fling open wide the golden gates,
And let the victors in.

"'Oh, then what raptured greetings
On Canaan's happy shore !
What knitting severed friendships up,
Where partings are no more !'

"So it is that our hopes of heaven enter into the welcome we once more give you, in the name of the Lord Jesus and of Christian brotherhood."

Soon after the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, Dr. Adams resigned the pastorate of the Madison Square Church to become President of a position which had been pressed upon him twice before, in 1840 and in 1871. It was a time of trial for both the pastor and the church. Nothing but a sense of duty could have brought Dr. Adams to sever a connection so happy and so useful. A munificent gift of $300,000 from the late Mr. James Brown, which was afterward supplemented by further donations amounting to $300,000 from other friends of the seminary, had been made principally through the efforts of Dr. Adams, and he considered it his duty to give to the work his personal labor at a period when the prospects of usefulness were so largely increased. How deeply he felt the separation may be gathered from the following extract from the letter in which he tendered his resignation :

THE UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY,

"Pleasant as it would be to me, gratifying beyond expression, to retain to the very end of life the name and title of pastor—that name by which I have so often been addressed by you in all times of your sorrow and your joy, and which I never have heard or read without a quick response of tender affection—impossible as it is for me to relinquish it without actual suffering, nevertheless it is my clear conviction that a due regard to your interests, individual and collective, requires the sacrifice on my part, so that you may at once take measures which may secure the full and undivided services of another pastor."

On Sunday, April 19th, 1874, Dr. Adams preached his farewell sermon to the congregation of the Madison Square Church. He had presided over the society then for a term of forty years, and his sermon was devoted to a retrospect of the events of those years. It was from Deuteronomy 8 : 2, "And thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee and to prove thee, to know what is in thy heart, whether thou wouldst keep His commandments or no." He announced in this sermon that the church had a membership of three thousand persons. On May 4th, 1874, the Presbytery of New York passed a resolution of regret at his leaving the pulpit, and a week later, May 11th, he was installed as President of the Union Theological Seminary.

The same thoroughness and conscientiousness which had characterized Dr. Adams as a pastor distinguished him

AS A PROFESSOR.

In addition to his regular lectures, he devoted much of his time to individual and separate instruction to the students.

It was his custom to call some one of them to him every day, and, taking him into the chapel, have him go through the whole service. He would first have him preach an original sermon, and then read a hymn and offer a prayer. At the conclusion of these exercises he would criticise the efforts of the student kindly but severely. This instruction was esteemed by the students as one of the most valuable features of their training at the seminary. Every Wednesday afternoon the students were in the habit of meeting for the purpose of reading essays and having debates. Dr. Adams always presided over these meetings, and, at the close, would sum up the arguments, with remarks of his own. These were always very happy, and were so highly esteemed by the students that they occasionally brought in their friends to listen to them.

ILLNESS AND DEATH.

Dr. Adams had consented to deliver the inaugural address at the General Council to be held on September 23d, at Philadelphia. Dr. E. R. Beadle had originally undertaken that duty, but his sudden death had rendered a new appointment necessary. Dr. Henry A. Boardman was then selected to fulfil the duty but, he too, though in his usual health when he accepted the post, had died, and the duty was then assigned to Dr. Adams. He had looked forward to the council with considerable pleasure, but soon after the close of the seminary session he was seized with a serious illness which soon developed alarming features. He was anxiously and tenderly watched by his family, but he rapidly sank, and on August 31st he peacefully passed away.

His last words were words of affectionate farewell. He said to a friend standing by his bedside : "I want you to say good-by and give my love to my sisters, to my dear brothers in the ministry, to my colleagues in the seminary, to my students, to my old parishioners, and to my many friends."

Although Dr. Adams wrote many separate articles for the press, he has not left many published works. At the time when his last illness came upon him he was engaged in collecting and arranging some of the articles and tractates already published into book form. His first extended work was given to the press in 1859, and was entitled "The Three Gardens — Eden, Gethsemane, and Paradise." Apostasy, redemption, and final blessedness are the themes, and the work is really a system of theology in an eminently practical and pleasing form. This was followed by an edition of Isaac Taylor's "Spirit of Hebrew Poetry," with a biographical introduction (1861) ; "Thanksgiving : Memories of the Day and Helps to the Habit" (1865), and "Conversations of Jesus Christ with Representative Men" (1868).

From early life to the close he was a warm friend and supporter of the American Board of Foreign Missions, and was the personal friend of a large number of its missionaries. After the reunion of the Presbyterian Church he was elected President of its Board of Foreign Missions, and devoted himself assiduously in committee to the details of the work. The American Bible and Tract Societies and other kindred institutions enjoyed his efficient co-operation.

Dr. Adams leaves a wife and four children to mourn his loss. His first wife died after four years of wedded life, without issue, and Dr. Adams afterward married her sister, who survives him.

THE DAY-DAWN.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Preached on Sunday Morning, Sept. 12th, 1880.

[His First Sunday Morning Service after his Return from the West.]

"The day is at hand."—ROM. 13 : 12.

Friendly Greetings—The Key-Note of the Next Year's Work—The Element of Gladness Needed—Creation's Laughter—The World's Outlook should Arouse Gladness—The Day-Dawn in the World's History—The First Rays—I. Diplomacy instead of War—The Alabama Difficulty—The Canadian Fishery Dispute—The Lesson of the British Elections—Our Own War might have been Averted—The Indian Wars Provoked by the Whites — II. The Compression of the World's Distances—The Church will use Scientific Inventions—Something Great soon to Happen—III. Facts Chronological and Mathematical—Strange and Mysterious Things—The Veil between this World and the Next getting Thinner—Remarkable Incident of War Horses in a Thunder-storm—The Victory Certain—How can an Unwounded Christian meet Christ?

GOOD-MORNING! Back from the mountains and the seaside, and the springs, and the farm-house, your cheek bronzed and your spirits lighted, I hail you home again with the words of Gehazi to the Shunamite: "Is it well with thee? is it well with thy husband? is it well with the child?" On some faces I see the mark of recent grief, but all along the track of tears I see the story of resurrection and reunion when all tears are done: the deep ploughing of the keel, followed by the flash of the phosphorescence.

Now that I have asked you in regard to your welfare, you naturally ask how I am. Very well, thank you. Whether it was the bracing air of the Colorado mountains twelve thousand feet above the level of the sea, or the tonic atmosphere of the Pacific coast, or a bath in the surf of Long Island beach, or whether it is the joy of standing in this great group of warm-hearted friends, or whether it is a new appreciation of the goodness of God, I cannot tell. I simply know I am grandly and gloriously and inexpressibly happy.

It was said that John Moffatt, the great Methodist preacher, occasionally got fast in his sermon, and to extricate himself would cry "Hallelujah!" I am in no such predicament to-day, but I am full of the same rhapsodic ejaculation. Starting out this morning on a new ecclesiastical year, I want to give you the key-note of my next twelve months' ministry. I want to set it to the tune of Antioch, Ariel and Coronation. During the summer a new stop has been put in this great organ—a new trumpet-stop—and I want to put

A NEW TRUMPET-STOP INTO MY SERMONS.

In all our Christian work you and I want more of the element of gladness. That man had no right to say that Christ never laughed. Do you suppose that He was glum at the wedding in Cana of Galilee? Do you suppose Christ was unresponsive when the children clambered over His knee and shoulder at His own invitation? Do you suppose that the evangelist meant nothing when he said of Christ: "He rejoiced in spirit?"

Do you believe that the divine Christ who pours all the water over the rocks at Vernal Falls, Yosemite, does not believe in the sparkle and gallop and tumultuous joy and rushing raptures of human life? I believe not only that the morning laughs, and that the mountains laugh, and that the seas laugh, and that the cascades laugh, but that Christ laughed.

Moreover, take a laugh and a tear into an alembic, and assay them, and test them, and analyze them, and you will often find as much of the pure gold of religion in a laugh as in a tear. Deep spiritual joy always shows itself in facial illumination. John Wesley said he was sure of a good religious impression being produced because of what he calls the great laughter he saw among the people. Godless merriment is blasphemy anywhere, but expression of Christian joy is appropriate everywhere.

Moreover, the outlook of the world ought to stir us to gladness. Astronomers recently have disturbed many people by telling them that there is danger of stellar collision. We have been told through the papers by these astronomers that there are worlds coming very near together, and that we shall have plagues and wars and tumults, and perhaps the world's destruction. Do not be scared. If you have ever stood at a railroad centre, where ten or twenty or thirty rail tracks cross each other, and seen that by the movement of the switch one or two inches the trains shoot this way and that, without any colliding, then you can understand how fifty worlds may come within an inch of disaster, and that inch be as good as a million miles. If a human switch-tender can shoot the trains this way and that without harm, cannot the hand that for thousands of years has upheld the universe keep our little world out of harm's way?

Christian geologists tell us that this world was millions of years in building. Well, now, I do not think God would take millions of years to build a house which was to last only six thousand years. There is nothing in the world or outside the world, terrestrial or astronomical, to excite dismay. I wish that some stout Gospel breeze might scatter all the malaria of human foreboding. The sun rose this morning at five o'clock and thirty-seven minutes, and I think that is just about the hour in the world's history. "The day is at hand."

I. THE FIRST RAY OF THE DAWN

I see in the gradual substitution of diplomatic skill for human butchery. Within the last twenty-five years there have been international differences which would have brought a shock of arms in any other day, but which were peacefully adjusted, the pen taking the place of the sword.

That Alabama question in any other age of the world would have caused war between the United States and England. How was it settled? By men-of-war off the Narrows, or off the Mersey? By the Gulf Stream of the ocean crossed by a gulf stream of human blood? By the pathway of nations incarnadined? No. A few wise men go into a quiet room at Geneva, talk the matter over, and telegraph to Washington and to London, "All settled." Peace, peace. England pays to the United States the amount awarded—pays really more than she ought to have paid—but the United States is not honest enough to return it. But still, all that Alabama broil is settled—settled forever. Arbitration instead of battle.

So, this recent quarrel about the Canadian fisheries in any other age would have caused war between the United States and England. England said, "Pay me for the invasion of my Canadian fisheries." The United States said, "I will not pay anything." Well, the two nations say, "I guess we had better leave the whole matter to a commission." The commission is appointed, and the commission examines the affair, and the commission reports, and pay we ought, pay we must, pay we do. Not a pound of powder burned, not a cartridge bitten off, no one hurt so much as by the scratch of a pin. Arbitration instead of battle.

France will never again, I think, through peccadillo of ambassador, bring on a battle with other nations. She sees that God, in punishment at Sedan, blotted out the French empire, and the only aspirant for that throne who had any right of expectation dies in a war that has not the dignity of even being respectable. What is that blush on the cheek of England to-day? What is the leaf that England would like to tear out of her history? The Zulu war. What meant the rising up of the English nation at the ballot-box last spring, overthrowing an administration which they thought was getting fond of military glory? It meant this: that the people of England want no more war. Down with the sword, and up with the treaty.

We in this country might better have settled

OUR SECTIONAL DIFFICULTIES

by arbitration than by the thrust of the Philanthropy said to the North, "Pay certain amount of money for the purchas slaves, and let all those born after a time be born free." Philanthropy at t time said to the South, "You sell the and get rid of this great national con trouble." The North replied, "I won cent." The South replied, "I won War! War! A million dead men, ar tional debt which has almost ground tion to powder.

Why did we not let William H. S
New York, and Alexander H. Step Georgia, go out and spend a few days trees on the banks of the Potomac and matter over, and settle it, as settle it th rather than the North pay in cost of billion seven hundred million dollars South pay four billion seven hundred million dollars, the destroying angel le first-born dead in so many houses a from the Penobscot to the Alabama.
men, whose sons fell in the strife, d think that would have been better? O have come to believe, I think, in thi that arbitration is better than battle.

I may be mistaken, but I hope th war between Christian nations is en barians may mix their war-paint, an and Zulu hurl poisoned arrows, bu Christian nations have gradually le war is disaster to victor as well as v and that almost anything bought is bought at too dear a price. I w that this nation might be a model of for arbitration. No need of killing dian. No need of sacrificing any General Custers. Stop exasperatin man, and there will be no more arro from the reservation.

A general of the United States ar repute throughout this land, and wh has been in more Indian wars than officer, and who has been wounded again in behalf of our Governmer against the Indians, told me within that all the wars that had ever occ country between Indians and whit been provoked by white men, and was no exception to the rule. W arbitrating with Christian nations, l barbarians carry ourselves in a man cative of contest.

I inherit a large estate, and the rich with fish, and the woods are s birds, and my corn-fields are silken Here is my sister's grave. Out y that large tree, my father died.
comes, and proposes to drive me possession of my property. He back, and crowds me on, and crow closer corner and still closer corne a while I say, "Stand back; don any more, or I'll strike. What rig to come here and drive me off of I got this farm from my father, from his father. What right have here and molest me?"

You blandly say, "Oh, I kno you do. I belong to a higher ci cut my hair shorter than you do.
this ground to a great deal better do." And you keep crowding crowding me on into a closer cor corner, until one day I look aro suffering family, and fired by the hew you in twain. Forthwith comes to your funeral to pronou comes to my execution to anat
You are the hero. I am the culprit

Behold the United States Go the North American Indian. Th stood more wrongs than I would would have struck sooner, deeper.
is right in defence of a Brookly
New York home is right in def on the top of the Rocky Mountai fore this dwindling red race dies complete- . I wish that this generation might by com- ustice atone for the inhumanity of its pre- sors. In the day of God's judgment I rather be a blood-smeared Modoc than a ling United States officer on an Indian res- on! One man was a barbarian and a sav- nd never pretended to be anything but a ian and a savage. The other man pre- d to be a representative of a Christian . Notwithstanding all this, the general t with war and the substitution of diplo- skill for the glittering edge of keen steel ign unmistakable that "the day is at find ANOTHER RAY OF THE DAWN compression of the world's distances. a slow, snail-like, almost impossible thing have been the world's rectification with n hundred millions of population and no means of communication; but now, h telegraphy for the eye and telephonic y for the ear, and through steamboating lroading, the twenty-five thousand miles world's circumference are shrivelling up significant brevity.

Kong is nearer to New York than a few go New Haven was; Bombay, Moscow, , Melbourne within speaking distance. e a telegraphic chart, and by the blue the telegraphs of the land, and by the s the cables under the ocean. You see portunity this is going to give for the vements of Christianity.

ress may be months or years in build- after it is constructed it may do all its twenty minutes. Christianity has been its batteries for nineteen centuries, and on in the work through other centuries; n those batteries are thoroughly planted, rtresses are fully built, they may do all rk in twenty-four hours.

orld sometimes derides the Church for of movement. Is science any quicker? ot take science five thousand six hun- fifty two years to find out so simple a the circulation of the human blood? e earth and the sky full of electricity, ook five thousand eight hundred years even guessed that there was any practi- hat might be made of this subtle and lement.

good men take possession of all these forces, and all these agencies of inven- not know that the redemption of the l be more than the work of half a day. not last Wednesday read the queen's the proroguing of Parliament the day London? If that be so, is it anything s to believe that in twenty-four hours communication can reach the 'whole

e Christ should descend on the na- ny expect that Christ will come among ns personally—suppose that to-morrow the Son of God from a hovering cloud scend upon these cities. Would not e known all the world over in twenty- s? Suppose He should present His a few words, saying, "I am the Son came to pardon all your sins and to our sorrows, to prove that I am a su- being, I have just descended from the you believe me, and do you believe Why, all the telegraph stations of would be crowded as none of them crowded just after a shipwreck. I tell things to show you it is not among sibilities or even the improbabilities will conquer the whole earth, and do , when the time comes. There are RETOKENINGS IN THE AIR. ng great is going soon to happen. I nk that Jupiter is going to run us hat the axle of the world is going to t I mean something great for the ssing and not for the world's damage happen.

I think the world has had it hard enough. Enough, the London plagues. Enough, the Asiatic choleras. Enough, the wars. Enough, the shipwrecks. Enough, the conflagrations. I think our world could stand right well a procession of prosperities and triumphs. Better be on the lookout. Better have your observatories open toward the heavens, and the lenses of your most powerful telescpoes well polished. Better have all your Leyden jars ready for some new pulsation of mighty influence. Better have new fonts of type in your printing-offices to set up some astounding good news. Better have some banner that has never been carried, ready for sudden procession. Better have the bells in your church towers well hung, and rope within reach, that you may ring out the marriage of the King's Son.

Cleanse all your court-houses, for the Judge of all the earth may appear. Let all your legislative halls be gilded, for the great Lawgiver may be about to come. Drive off the thrones of despotism all the occupants, for the King of heaven and earth may be about to reign. The darkness of the night is blooming and whitening into the lilies of morning cloud, and the lilies reddening into the roses of stronger day—fit garlands, whether white or red, for Him on whose head are many crowns. "The day is at hand!"

III. ONE MORE RAY

of the dawn I see in facts chronological and mathematical. Come, now, do not let us do another stroke of work until we have settled one matter. What is going to be the final issue of this great contest between sin and righteousness? Which is going to prove himself the stronger, God or Diabolus? Is this world going to be all garden or all desert? Now let us have that matter settled. If we believe Isaiah and Ezekiel and Hosea, and Micah and Malachi, and John and Peter, and Paul and Christ, we believe the former, that it is going to be all garden. But let us have it settled. Let us know whether we are working on toward a success or toward a dead failure.

If there is a child in your house sick, and you are sure he is going to get well, you sympathize with present pains, but all the foreboding is gone. If you are in a cyclone off the Florida coast, and the captain assures you the vessel is stanch and the winds are changing for a better quarter, and he is sure he will bring you safe into the harbor, you patiently submit to present distress with the thought of safe arrival.

Now I want to know whether we are coming on toward dismay, darkness, and defeat, or on toward light and blessedness. You and I believe the latter, and if so, every year we spend is one year subtracted from the world's woe, and every event that passes, whether bright or dark, brings us one event nearer a happy consummation, and by all that is inexorable in chronology and mathematics I commend you to good cheer and courage. If there is anything in arithmetic, if you subtract two from five and leave three, then by every rolling sun we are coming on toward a magnificent terminus. Then every winter passed is one severity less for our poor world. Then every summer gone by brings us nearer unfading arborescence. Put your algebra down on the top of your Bible, and rejoice.

If it is nearer morning at three o'clock than it is at two, if it is nearer morning at four o'clock than it is at three, then we are nearer the dawn of the world's deliverance. God's clock seems to go very slowly, but the pendulum swings and the hands move, and it will yet strike noon. The sun and the moon stood still once; they will never stand still again until they stop forever. If you believe arithmetic as well as your Bible, you must believe we are nearer the dawn. "The day is at hand."

There is a class of phenomena which makes me think that the spiritual and the heavenly world may after a while make a demonstration in this world which will bring all moral and spiritual things to a climax. Now, I am no spiritualist; but every intelligent man has noticed that there are strange and mysterious things which indicate to him that perhaps the spiritual world is not so far off as sometimes we conjecture, and that after a while, from the spiritual and heavenly world there may be a demonstration upon our world for its betterment. We call it magnetism, or we call it mesmerism, or we call it electricity, because we want some term to cover up our ignorance. I do not know what it is.

I never heard an audible voice from the other world. I do not say that there may not be persons who have heard voices from the other world. I am persuaded of this, however, that and that perhaps after a while, at the call of God—not at the call of the Davenport brothers, or Andrew Jackson Davis—some of the old scriptural warriors, some of the spirits of other days mighty for God—a Joshua, or a Caleb, or a David, or a Paul—may come down and help us in this battle against unrighteousness. Oh, how I would like to have them here—him of the Red Sea, him of the Valley of Agelon, him of Mars Hill.

THE VEIL BETWEEN THIS WORLD AND THE NEXT IS GETTING THINNER AND THINNER,

History says that Robert Clayton, of the English cavalry, at the close of a war bought up all the old cavalry horses lest they be turned out to drudgery and hard work, and bought a piece of ground at Naversmire Heath, and turned these old war-horses into the thickest and the richest pasture, to spend the rest of their days for what they had done in other days.

One day a thunder-storm came up, and these war-horses mistook the thunder of the skies for the thunder of battle, and they wheeled into line—no riders on their backs—they wheeled into line ready for the fray. And I doubt me whether, when the last thunder of this battle for God and truth goes booming through the heavens, the old scriptural warriors can keep their places on their thrones. Methinks they will spring into the fight and exchange crown for helmet, and palm-branch for weapon, and come down out of the king's galleries into the arena, crying, "Make room! I must fight in this great Armageddon."

My beloved people, I preach this sermon because I want you to

TOIL WITH THE SUNLIGHT IN YOUR FACES.

I want you old men to understand before you die that all the work you did for God while yet your ear was alert and your foot fleet is going to be counted up in the final victories.

I want all these younger people to understand that when they toil for God they always win the day; that all prayers are answered, and all Christian work in some way is effectual, and that the tide is setting in the right direction, and that all Heaven is on our side—saintly, cherubic, seraphic, archangelic, omnipotent, chariot and throne, doxology and procession, principalities and dominion; he who hath the moon under His feet and all the armies of heaven on white horses.

Brother! brother! all I am afraid of is, not that Christ will lose the battle, but that you and I will not get into it quick enough to do something worthy of our blood-bought immortality. Oh, Christ! how shall I meet Thee, Thou of the scarred brow, and the scarred back, and the scarred hand, and the scarred foot, and the scarred breast, if I have no scars of wounds gotten in Thy service? It shall not be so.

I step out to-day in front of the battle. Come on, you foes of God, I dare you to the combat. Come on, with pens dipped in caricature. Come on, with tongues forked and viperous and adderous. Come on, with types soaked in the scum of the eternal pit. I defy you! Come on! I bare my brow, I uncover my heart. Strike! I cannot see my Lord until I have been hurt for Christ. If we do not suffer with Him on earth, we cannot be glorified with Him in heaven. Take good heart. On! On! On! See! the skies have brightened! See! the hour is about to come! Pick out all the cheeriest of the anthems. Let the orchestra string their best instruments. "The night is far spent, the day is at hand."

ROCHESTER TOWER.

By Miss M. A. Paull.

(Continued from page 583.)

Salome's Visit to the Albert Mission—The Little Blind Boy—A Gift of a Canary—Project of a Christmas-tree—The Minister's Visit to Brighton—Salome's Difficulty.

Salome Stanley went along the room used as a day-nursery, and she discovered that even these little babies, many not at all prepossessing in looks, had power to awaken in her a strange and abiding interest. She had declared that she was not fond of children when Cecil and Emmie had invited her to visit the day-nursery in Albert Street. She now found that she had answered ignorantly. Little Thomas was delighted with the sweets she brought him, and then she asked him whether he had ever heard a bird sing. The child nodded assent. He had a meek, quiet little face, to which the sightless eyes gave a strangely plaintive expression.

"Would you like to have a little bird come here to live, to sing to you?"

Thomas nodded again.

"Then, so you shall; a little beautiful golden canary-bird," said Salome, forgetting that color had no meaning to the little blind boy. "I will bring it to you next week, and it shall be your very own little bird. What will you call it?"

"Tommy," said little Thomas, his face brightening.

"Tommy? Very well; this shall be Tommy."

"What can I do to please them?" asked Salome then, of Emily Anerley, looking round with a yearning sweetness in her gaze that brought sympathetic tears into the eyes of Emmie.

"Sing to them," she replied; "they will like that."

Salome did not hesitate, but trilled forth in her rich, delicious voice a lovely little hymn about the

"Happy land, far, far away,"

and the Albert Street babies drank in the sweet sounds, the low wailings of some sickly ones were hushed, the older ones at play paused to hear, the sleepy ones were soothed to slumber, the nurses listened entranced. Miss Calvert entered the room, but paused on the threshold, her sweet, pale face flushed, intent, aglow, thrilled with emotion, and when the last notes died away there was a moment's hush. It was like a spell.

"Thank you," said Miss Calvert, softly, when the noise of little voices began again; "thank you; that has been a real treat to them, and to all of us. Do repeat it some day."

Salome was astonished and pleased to find how much pleasure she had given. Henceforth there was a new interest for the lonely woman.

Next week the canary, "Tommy," in a green cage, found its way to the day-nursery, and was hung very near little Thomas. The bird became an object of the deepest interest to all the babies, and it was very long before the charm of novelty around its cage at all wore away.

Hardly a week passed after this that Salome did not accompany Emmie to spend one morning among the children. The music of child-love was in her soul, although the melody had never hitherto been called forth. She possessed too deep a nature not to have in her that grand maternal instinct which makes women who are true to themselves encompass every little child with a surpassing tenderness.

Cecil Anerley, who, through the many months that had now elapsed since Salome Stanley had first awakened in him the power to love, had never as yet ventured to reveal that affection, lest the revelation should banish her from his presence, took heart at her coming forth from her seclusion, and his spirits, which has been less buoyant than usual of late, rose again. He had, poor fellow, been sadly suspicious that she did not wish him to speak to her on any such subject as the love which was ever uppermost in his thoughts.

He began now to hope she might some day be persuaded to accompany him to a Band of Hope meeting, or to the free breakfasts which, each year, directly the weather became at all wintry, were set on the tables at the Mission Hall every Sunday morning.

"Don't you think, Emmie," said Salome Stanley, one day, "that the day-nursery wants to be made a gayer place for all those dear little lives to be spent in?"

"I am afraid there are no funds," said Emmie. "I believe Miss Calvert strains a point as it is to provide this room; it involves a good deal of actual expense; the nurses and the food, so much good milk every day, and so much washing and firing."

"To be sure," said Salome; "but I think they really must have a Christmas tree. Miss Calvert will not object if I undertake to give them one, and to save her all trouble and expense. Such a treat will make it seem a real Christmas to myself also. And the pretty things, not actually gifts to the little ones, may be hung about the room, and make it look less bare. Children's eyes want feeding as well as their stomachs. Now, Emmie, do you believe I can manage it so as to be a surprise to all the small folks?"

"Easily," replied Emmie, "if we give them a holiday on Christmas day; I mean if Miss Calvert expects their mothers and friends to keep them, as I think she does—I know she did last Christmas. Why, Cecil and you and I might get it ready that afternoon. I should think it just exactly the proper way to spend my Christmas."

"So should I,' agreed Salome. "How I wish Constance could have been at home with us."

"She will spend her Christmas at Canterbury, I expect," said Emmie; "I forgot to tell you that I heard this morning."

"At Canterbury!" repeated Salome.

"I told you how dear Mrs. Mitchell is ailing, and Canterbury is her native air. So the younger ones, and their mother, and Constance are to visit the grandmother there, while the elder ones will have their holidays at home, and Miss Julia Lack will be housekeeper."

Salome looked mischievous as she replied, "I am glad I am not one of the elder Mitchell children."

As Mr. Ferguson sat in his study one afternoon, a lady visitor who wished to speak with him was announced by Mrs. Poddikins, the landlady. It is to be lamented that the minister did not look very amiable at that moment. He was in no humor for an interruption to his studies, and he dreaded the waste of half an hour or more in talk regarding some tea-meeting or Christmas-tree, which he considered women could manage quite as well by themselves.

He mentally wished there were a good many more girls in his congregation of the type and temper of Constance Anerley, who, so far from intruding her company upon any one, gave them all far too little of it.

Indeed it must be confessed that on this particular Tuesday morning the Rev. Hermann Ferguson was feeling decidedly cross. The day before he had made an excuse to himself that he felt "Mondayish," and had accordingly run down to Brighton, as he alleged in the sanctum of his inner consciousness, to brace himself up for further warfare against sin by inhaling the fresh, invigorating sea air along the fine esplanade and pier of that beautiful watering-place.

If he chanced to meet Constance Anerley and her pupils taking their matutinal exercise in the same place, he was fain to acknowledge beforehand that it might add greatly to the pleasure of his visit. He had also fully made up his mind to dine with his old friend, Rowland Mitchell.

Unfortunately when he met Constance and her pupils they were returning home from their walk, and when he laughingly suggested that they should prolong it in his honor, although he had been warmly seconded by Esther and Robbie, their young governess had firmly declined to do so, alleging as the reason the near approach of the Christmas holidays and the le already arranged to be accomplished that ing.

He could therefore only walk back with to Steyne Place, and then proceed alone Pier and Aquarium, which did him very less good than he had anticipated. Even their short walk together she left the con tion so much to the children as greatly concert him, while during dinner and t was as quiet and cool to him as if ther been no previous friendship between them which could entitle him to her kindly con tion.

This had chafed the Rev. Hermann Fe considerably. He would have wished treat him almost as a second father—cer at least, as an elder brother. Could h read Constance aright he would have that it was precisely her dread of such a re ship as the former which always kept h distance from him, and prevented that trustful manner in her toward himself wh so much coveted.

"Was there any other fellow admiring was a thought that flashed itself across his
"and did Constance act so foolishly as to to think about love affairs?"

With this burden of disappointment him, brought over from yesterday, and shaken off, the knowledge that a your sought his presence, while the only you whose presence he sought kept hersel from him as much as possible, was not likely to increase his amiability.

He grudgingly bade Mrs. Poddikins sh visitor to his study.

"Mr. Ferguson, can you spare me a f utes, for I want to consult you?" The was Salome Stanley. He looked up in s rose from his chair, shook her hand, and her to be seated.

"Consult me?" he asked, as he again own seat.

"Mr. Ferguson, I have to thank you f spiritual good," she continued, in her s voice, always so full of musical cadences pression. "I was feeling, when I came h ter, unrepentant, almost madly defiant "Is it possible?" he asked, growing ed. "I thought you were unhappy, but know to what extent."

"I have to thank you, in the first pla went on, "for an introduction to Christian family, and to the friendship people who have troubles themselves, never seem to doubt the unfailing intere God takes in them. That in itself h stay to me. Gradually they have led cially Emily Anerley, to take an interes side affairs, and I know that also is good; it is teaching me how many yet enjoy. Your sermons have enlight
I feel I can now confess that I am no disbeliever, but that Christ is very dea

"I am so glad, so thankful!" he s tone of deepest sympathy.

"I should like to make an open conf my faith in Him, in the readiest ma occurs to me, by becoming a commu your chapel the next time the Lord's commemorated there."

"Nothing could give me greater satis
he said.

"Where I have received so much should like to acknowledge my inde my submission, my love to my Savi oh," she added, still speaking in her us voice, but with a depth of passion Hern guson had never heard in it before, " drink a drop of intoxicating liquor an a confession of my love to Christ."

"But, my dear Miss Stanley—" he

"Hear me, Mr. Ferguson, and then ten to you—I will be glad to listen to said. "How Christians can look abr the land and see the enormities, the the heathendom which strong drink c still commemorate the life and deat

Saviour in intoxicating liquor, is altogether past my comprehension. Strong drink has cursed my life. How do I know that if I come to the Lord's Supper at your chapel it may not curse my physical existence also? If others as unlikely as I am to fall have fallen by its use, how shall I know that even the wine used in the sacrament will not cause me to fall?"

"But surely," he said, "though I respect your motives in this matter, your painful experiences have made you conjure up horrors which are very unlikely indeed to happen. Surely you have never heard of any one commencing a career of vice by drinking wine at the Lord's Supper, yet you have almost implied as much."

(To be continued.)

THE END OF THE 6000 YEARS FROM THE CREATION, IN 1890.

(Concluded from page 583.)

We reproduce again this week the table of the separate periods which compose the whole period of 6000 years, and append explanations regarding those separate periods.

THE BIBLE CHRONOLOGY OF THE WORLD.

Anno Iundi.	Before Christ.
0	4110	(1) The Creation of Man to the close of the Deluge. (Gen. 5. and 8 : 13–14)........................	1656
1656	2454	(2) Close of the Deluge to the birth of Terah. (Gen. 11 : 10–24)....	222
1878	2232	(3) Terah's birth to his son Abraham's removal to Canaan. (Acts 7:6; Gen. 11 :32; 12 : 1 5)....	205
2083	2027	(4) Abraham's removal to the date of the Exodus. (Ex. 12 : 40; Gal. 3 : 8–17)........................	430
2513	1597	(5) The Exodus to the distribution of the land. (2 yrs. Num. 10 : 11 to 13 : 25; and 45 yrs. Josh. 14.)..	47
560	1550	(6) The dividing of the land to the end of Samuel's judgeship. (Acts 13 : 20; Josh. 14.)........	450
010	1100	(7) Reigns of Saul, David and Solomon (40 yrs. each.) (Acts 13 : 21; 2 Sam. 5:4; 2 Kings, 11 : 42)	120
130	980	(8) End of Solomon's reign to Jehoiakim's fourth year. (1 Kings 11:43 to 2 Kings 25, and Jer. 25.).....	375
504	605	(9) The 70 years' captivity from Jehoiakim's fourth year until Cyrus' first year. (2 Kings 24 : 8 to 16; Ez. 1.; Jer. 25 : 12)...	70
574	535	(10) Cyrus' 1st year to the midst of Artaxerxes Longimanus' 7th year (by the common chronology).. (Cyrus 7 years, Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes—Ex. 4 : 6-7—8 years, Darius—Ez. 6 : 1—36½ years, Xerxes, 21 years, Artaxerxes Longimanus 6¼ years.)	79
553	456	(11) The midst of Artaxerxes Longimanus' 7th year to the birth of Christ. (Dan. 9 : 24–26; Ez. 7)... (Daniel's 70 weeks are generally held to begin about A.D. 455–6 in Artaxerxes' seventh year.)	456
10	0	Total, from the creation of Adam to the birth of Christ.	4110
		Add (for the period of the Christian dispensation.....	1890
		Total from the creation of Adam to the Millennium ..	6000

The following remarks are explanatory of the even component periods which make up the o years in the foregoing chronological table:

1) The 1656 years consist of the generations m Adam to the close of the Flood which are en in Gen. 5 and 8 : 13, 14, as follows: Adam Seth, 130 years; Seth to Enos, 105 years; s to Cainan, 90 years; Cainan to Mahalaleel, ears; Mahalaleel to Jared, 65 years; Jared to och, 152 years; Enoch to Methuselah, 65 rs; Methuselah to Lamech, 187 years; ech to Noah, 182 years; Noah to the close he Flood (Gen. 8 : 13, 14) 600 years. These rvals altogether amount to 1656 years.

) The period of 222 years between the Flood Terah's birth is given in Gen. 11 : 10-23, as subjoined. The Flood to Arphaxad, 2 s; Arphaxad to Salah, 35 years; Salah to r, 30 years; Eber to Peleg, 34 years; Peleg to Reu, 30 years; Reu to Serug, 32 years; Serug to Nahor, 30 years; Nahor to Terah, 29 years. Total amount, 222 years.

(3) Terah did not beget Abraham until he was 130 years old, as is shown by Gen. 11 : 32; 12 : 4; for when he died at the age of 205 years, Abraham, who then migrated to Canaan, was 75 years old. Gen. 11 : 36 might seem to contradict this: "Terah lived 70 years, and begat Abram, Nahor, and Haran," but the first mention of Abram among the three does not imply his being the eldest, any more than the mention of Shem before Ham and Japhet implied Shem to be the eldest of Noah's sons, for Japhet is expressly called the eldest, Gen. 10 : 21. Thus, although Terah was 70 years old at the birth of his eldest son (probably Haran, as his daughter was old enough to marry Nahor, Gen. 11 : 29), yet he was 130 years old at the birth of Abraham.

(4) The 430 years' sojourning (Ex. 12 : 40) of Abraham and his posterity commenced with Abraham's going forth to Canaan, Gen. 12 : 1-5 (2048 B.C.), when God made a covenant with him (Gal. 3 : 17), and ended with the Exodus, after which the Law was given at Sinai (Ex. 19 : 1). Dr. Hales renders Ex. 12 : 40 according to the Masorite, Samaritan, and Septuagint versions, "Now the sojourning of the children of Israel (and of their fathers) while they sojourned in the land of Egypt (and in the land of Canaan) was 430 years.

(6) In Acts 13 : 20 we read, "He gave unto them Judges about the space of 450 years until Samuel the prophet" (including, of course, Samuel's judgeship): and this approximately corresponds with the periods mentioned in the Book of Judges, and is held to be the correct account by Clinton, Hales, Cunninghame, Bliss, Bowen, Shimeall, etc. It is noticeable that there is thus exactly 580 years from the Exodus to the 4th year of Solomon, when the temple began to be built, and any definition of this period as being 480 years must be a mistake for 580 years.

Thus the component parts of the 450 years given in the Book of Judges are as follows: From the dividing of the land to the death of Joshua (Josh. 23 : 1; 24 : 29), 19 years (this period, as well as the next 11 years, is not explicitly stated in Judges, but is given by Dr. Hales, Elliott, Bliss, etc., on the authority of Josephus, and other historians); from Joshua's death to the death of the surviving Egypt-born elders (Josh. 24 : 21; Jud. 2 : 10, 11), 11 years; servitude under Chushan (Jud. 3 : 7, 8, 9), 8 years; rest under Othniel (Jud. 3 : 9, 11), 40 years; servitude under Eglon (Jud. 3 : 12, 14), 18 years; rest under Ehud and Shamgar (Jud. 3 : 15, 30, 31; 4 : 1), 80 years; servitude under Jabin (Jud. 4 : 2, 3–23; 5 : 31), 20 years; the subsequent rest (Jud. 5 : 31), 40 years; servitude under Midian (Jud. 6 : 1), 7 years; rest under Gideon (Jud. 6 : 14; 28, 8 : 33), 40 years; Abimelech, as judge (Jud. 9 : 6, 22, 23, 54), 3 years; Tola (Jud. 10 : 1, 2), 23 years; Jair (Jud. 10 : 3, 5), 22 years; servitude under Ammon (Jud. 10 : 6, 8), 18 years; Jephthah, as judge (Jud. 11 : 32; 12 : 7), 6 years; Ibzan (Jud. 12 : 8, 9), 7 years; Elon (Jud. 12 : 11), 10 years; Abdon (Jud. 12 : 13, 14), 8 years; servitude under the Philistines (Jud. 13 : 1), 40 years (it is supposed that this 40 years is the same as Eli's 40 years, 1 Sam. 4 : 18, and that during part of this time Samson judged southwest Israel for 20 years contemporarily with Eli, Jud. 13 to 16 : 31); Samuel's judgeship after Eli's death until Saul's election (1 Sam. 7 : 2 gives 20 years, and about 10 years more seem to have elapsed, 1 Sam. 7 to 9), 30 years. These brief periods altogether amount to 450 years, which is expressly mentioned in Acts 13 : 20, while in Judges the first 30 and the last 10 years are not definitely stated, and have to be estimated approximately.

(8) This period of 375 years consists of the reigns of the kings from Rehoboam to Jehoiakim's 4th year, which are given in Kings and Chronicles as follows: Rehoboam, 17 years and a few months, 1 Kings 14 : 31; 15 : 1; 2 Chron. 12 : 13—Abijam, 3 years, 1 Kings, 15 : 1, 2—Asa, 41 years, 1 Kings 15 : 9, 10—Jehoshaphat, 25 years, 1 Kings 22 : 42—Jehoram, 8 years, 2 Kings 8 : 17—Ahaziah, 1 year, 2 Kings 8 : 24, 26—Athaliah, 6 years, 2 Kings 11 : 1, 2, 3, 20, 21—Jehoash, 40 years, 2 Kings 12 : 1—Amaziah, 29 years, 2 Kings 12 : 21; 14 : 1, 2—Azariah (called Uzziah), 52 years, 2 Kings 15 : 1, 2; 2 Chron. 26 : 1, 3—Jotham, 16 years, 2 Kings 15 : 32,33—Ahaz, 16 years, 2 Kings, 16 : 1, 2—Hezekiah, 29 years, 2 Kings 16 : 20; 18 : 1, 2—Manasseh, 55 years, 2 Kings 20 : 21; 21 : 1—Amon, 2 years, 2 Kings 21 : 18, 19—Josiah, 31 years, 2 Kings 11 : 26; 22 : 1—Jehoahaz, 3 months, 2 Kings 23 : 31—Jehoiakim, 4 years and a few months, 2 Kings 23 : 36. These reigns altogether amount to 375 years.

(9) The 70 years' captivity is here commenced in Jehoiakim's fourth year (Dan. 1 : 1–11, Jer. 25 : 1; 46 : 2), when the King of Babylon defeated the King of Egypt, and Jehoiakim became subject to Babylon instead of Egypt (2 Chron. 36 : 6). This is the date at which these 70 years are also commenced by Bliss, Birks, Browne, Chapin, Clinton, Cunninghame, Habershon, Hales, Jarvis, Usher, and the Duke of Manchester. Zedekiah, who afterward reigned 11 years, was the mere deputy and vassal of Nebuchadnezzar, being left to rule over the few Jews that remained at Jerusalem. It is universally allowed that Cyrus' first year was the end of the 70 years, as intimated in 2 Chron. 36 : 21, 23, and Ezra 1.

(10) This 79 years is the only link in the chronological chain of 4110 years from Adam to Christ that is not precisely defined in Scripture. The deficiency is, however, supplied by historical authorities, such as Herodotus, Xenophon, Josephus, Petavius, Prideaux, etc., and by Ptolemy's Canon, which is confirmed by the most careful astronomical observations, and by more than twenty eclipses. From these sources it appears that Cyrus (Ez. 1 : 1), after the death of Darius the Mede, reigned as sole monarch for 7 years. Then Cambyses (or Ahasuerus, Ez. 4 : 6) reigned 7 years and 5 months; and Smerdis (or Artaxerxes, Ez. 4 : 7) reigned 7 months.

Then Darius Hystaspes (Ez. 6 : 1) reigned 36 years 6 months; and Xerxes continued on the throne for 21 years; being succeeded by Artaxerxes Longimanus (Ez. 7 : 7), from whose seventh year in 457 B.C., the 70 weeks (Dan. 9 : 24), or 490 years, are dated by the general concurrence of commentators. All standard chronologers agree as to Cyrus' first year, the end of the 70 years' captivity, being about 535–6 B.C., and the commencement of the 70 weeks or 490 years being about 456 B.C., leaving about 79 years from Cyrus' first year to Artaxerxes' seventh year.

(11) The 70 weeks (Dan. 9 : 24) have been generally understood since the earliest ages of the Christian church to signify 490 years (a day being sometimes put for a year—Gen. 29 : 27; Numb. 14 : 34; Ezek. 4 : 6), and to have commenced their fulfilment about 457 B.C. (Ez. 7 : 9), when Ezra went up in the midst of Artaxerxes' seventh year "to restore and build Jerusalem." As respects its subdivisions of 7 weeks, 62 weeks, and 1 week, the 7 and 62 weeks were to reach "unto Messiah the Prince" (Dan. 9 : 25), when Christ was first offered to Israel by the Baptist's preaching and by the commencement of his public ministry about A.D. 26, and afterward "Messiah was cut off, but not for Himself," at the period A.D. 27–33, and in A.D. 70 Jerusalem was destroyed (ver. 26). Then the last week will follow at the close of the Gentile dispensation with "the Prince that shall come" (the Antichrist, Napoleon), making a 7 years' covenant with the Jews, and breaking it in the midst of the 7 years, and being himself destroyed at their termination. Thus the year-day fulfilment of the prophetic period of Daniel's 69 weeks of years, or 483 years from King Artaxerxes' seventh year, until the public presentation of Christ to Israel as their Messiah in A.D. 26–7, furnishes the last link in the chronological chain—viz., 456 years from Artaxerxes' seventh year to the birth of Christ.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

SINGLE COPIES

can most conveniently be obtained through newsdealers. Any complaint that the CHRISTIAN HERALD cannot be obtained from a particular newsdealer is promptly attended to if we are given the name and street address of the dealer who does not keep it for sale.

NOTICE.

To give our readers an opportunity of introducing the Christian Herald to their friends, we will send the paper post free to any address from 1st October, to 31st December, 1880, on receipt of 25 cents.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The State Elections which Took Place last week have resulted, as was expected, in the two great political parties scoring one victory for each. Arkansas has been carried by the Democrats by a majority of over 50,000, and in Vermont the Republican ticket has been carried by 25,000 majority. The total vote in Vermont was about 5700 larger than in 1876. Of these 5700 new votes, the Republicans appear to have secured about 3600, the Greenbackers 1500, and the Democrats 600.

General Weaver, the Presidential Candidate of the Greenback party, arrived in New York on September 11th. He is about to commence a vigorous canvass of this State, in which he feels confident of polling over 40,000 votes. He said, in the course of conversation with a reporter, "There are no discords in the party. All is harmonious." When questioned as to the vote of the party in detail, he said: "I predict 100,000 in Missouri, and as many in Illinois. In Indiana we shall poll a large vote—a vote which will astonish both parties—and we may even carry the State. There will be near to 65,000 votes in Maine, and in this ratio throughout the Union."

The Election in Maine on Monday Last, the result of which at the time of writing had not been published, is one that all parties agree in regarding as of an unusually important character. There were four tickets in the field—the Republican, the Fusion, the Prohibition, and the Enforced Prohibition. There were also two amendments to the State Constitution voted upon, for which separate ballot-boxes were provided. The first amendment provides for the election of Governor by a plurality instead of a majority of all the votes cast. The second amendment provides for changing the terms of office of Senators and Representatives to conform with the amendment adopted in 1879.

The National Campaign against Polygamy which at one time seemed likely to be abandoned, is to be prosecuted with vigor. Attorney-General Devens, it is announced, will, upon his return from Minnesota, begin the preparation of several of the most flagrant cases, to which the Supreme Court of the United States will give special precedence over other business. The principal points to be first decided will be the challenging of jurors, and the mode in which they should be impanelled, where there is a suspicion that they are themselves living in polygamy. When these points are settled, there is a more hopeful prospect of success on the merits of the question.

The Death of Mr. Marshall O. Roberts, at Saratoga, on September 11th, removes from New York society a citizen well known for his benevolence and the interest he took in any effort made to ameliorate the condition of the poor. He was stricken with paralysis on Tuesday, September 7th, and never recovered consciousness from the time of his seizure. Mr. Roberts was born in New York in 1814, and he commenced his business life as assistant in a grocery store. He soon exhibited the remarkable commercial sagacity which, as time passed, enabled him to acquire a large fortune. Quiet and unobtrusive in all he did, the large amounts he gave away, were frequently given indirectly or anonymously, so that no one knew absolutely how much he had contributed to any cause. Many individual cases are known, however, in which men struggling under difficulties were visited by Mr. Roberts, who, unsolicited and with rare delicacy, proffered timely aid. He was formerly connected with the church at the Broadway Tabernacle, but latterly had worshipped at Calvary Church.

Fourteen Persons Supposed to have been drowned in the wreck of the City of Vera Cruz have, it is reported, come ashore safely on a life-raft. A letter from Titusville, Fla., received September 10th, stated that fourteen survivors of the wreck had landed there. No names or details are given in the letter, and it is doubtful whether the writer refers to those already known to have been rescued, and the relatives of the passengers and crew are in a state of agonizing suspense. On the one hand it is said that there was no life-raft on the wrecked vessel, and on the other it appears improbable that Titusville, being 200 miles from the spot where Mr. Owen and his companions landed, that the person who sent the information can have referred to that party.

Chief Ouray's Successor has been Appointed, at a grand council held August 31st at Los Pinos, Colorado. There were four candidates for the position, two of whom were Guero and Peah, the former claiming it by right of promotion, being second in rank. But his known hostility to the whites prevented his promotion. Sporanau, the third, had no desire to be head chief, but wanted a dual combination, he and Sapovonari to rule jointly. Sapovonari, who is fifty years old, was ultimately chosen. He has considerable force of character, a large following, and had the confidence of Ouray to such an extent that he was left in charge last winter during his absence in Washington. The Utes have killed five of Ouray's best horses, that they may accompany him to the "happy hunting grounds."

The Services Conducted by the Rev. Samuel Colcord, in Chickering Hall, New York, which were so largely attended last season, will be recommenced on Sunday next. It is announced that the large choir will have the assistance of Miss Henrietta Beebe, who has promised her services to aid in the work.

Mr. Moody's Invitation to the Meetings at Northfield, Mass., was accepted by a large number of Christians of all the evangelical denominations, from nearly all the States, from Canada, and from Europe. One of the most interesting parts of the first day's meeting was the reading of telegrams from Canada, Glasgow, Scotland, and from Baltimore and other parts of the Union, expressive of strong interest in and sympathy with the meetings. Many letters were read by Mr. Moody to the same effect. Most were from individuals, but some from churches stating that they would hold meetings for the same object in concert with the meeting at Northfield. One of these had fifty signatures. Meetings were held in the new seminary established by Mr. Moody, in the Congregational Church, and in the open air. They were principally devoted to earnest prayer for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and to short addresses of a thoroughly personal and practical character. At the experience meetings it was obvious that the Holy Spirit was moving those present to a higher degree of consecration, to the confession of sin, and a determination in God's strength to live closer to Him in the future.

One of the speakers said: "I have been groaning all summer for such a meeting as this. A leading worker said to me some time ago that he had spent a fruitless year, and he knew the reason; he had been envious of Moody. He went to Mr. Moody and made his confession, and came away with his face aglow and his heart full. He has seen uninterrupted success for all of the months since. My little son once failed to come out to meet me. When I found him he would not look me in the face. He kept his back toward me, until he resolved to make confession of a fault he had committed, when he showed deeper love to me than before. Thus I have kept my back toward God, but I turn now my face to confess toward God."

Dr. Talmage has Returned from his Tour in California, Colorado, and the Western States. At the Tabernacle prayer meeting on Friday evening he said: "There may seem on the part of some a great absurdity in my modes of summer rest. You ask: 'In seven thousand miles of travel and in many public addresses, is there any recuperation?' I answer, the hardest and weariest thing I ever do is to do nothing. The most restful place in the world to me is the car of an express train going a mile a minute. Rest with me is not idleness, but change of occupation."

With reference to the reports of his midnight explorations he said: "Leadville differs from other cities in having its wickedness on the surface, and with open doors, instead of being hidden as in other cities. All that story about my exploring Leadville hour after hour, until after midnight, with some friends, is newspaper enterprise. [Laughter.] All the exploring I did was in about six minutes, from the wide-open doors of the gambling-houses on two of the main streets; but the next day it was telegraphed all over the United States, and some of the religious papers have been reading me a lesson. Leadville's faults are on the surface, and need no exploration."

Dr. Talmage visited Utah, and of that State he said: "The Governor of Utah Territory and prominent citizens charged me to speak on this Mormon question after my return, and I shall execute the commission, and shall lay before you some appalling and startling facts on that subject. We are all familiar with the comedy of Mormonism, but the tragedies have not yet been told."

At the Presbyterian Council to be held in Philadelphia next week, in consequence of the death of the Rev. Dr. William Adams, who had been designated to preach at the opening of the council, the Rev. Dr. William M. Paxton, moderator of the General Assembly, it is understood will welcome the delegates. The Horticultura Hall, where the council will be held, will be decorated for the occasion with the flags of all countries. There will be large banners of England Scotland, Ireland, France, Germany, Switzerland Italy, Spain, Bohemia, Holland, and Hungary On each banner will be the seal of the nation i represents, and on scrolls will be painted th names of those prominent in the introductio of the Presbyterian Church in each country. Th France banner will be headed in large letters b the word, "Huguenots," while on the Englis standard will be the word "Puritans." In addition a canvas will be prepared representing a arch made up of stones bearing each the nam of one of the twenty-four branches of the Presbyterian Church.

We hope to publish next week the portra and life of Dr. McCosh of Princeton, with whom the idea of the council primarily originated.

San Francisco is the City Mr. Moody has been led to select as the scene of his next winter's work. His family will remain in Northfield, so that his daughter may avail herself of the advantages of the new seminary which he has just established. In choosing San Francisco as his new point of effort, Mr. Moody has not overlooked the many difficulties to be met there; he has been impressed rather with the need which the difficulties indicate for such a work as God has enabled him to perform in other places. He is conscious of the many discouragements he will probably encounter, but he relies, as he has done before, on the help of God, and believes that with the co-operation of the churches the city will be deeply stirred. All Christians should pray for a blessing on his work in the great city of the Pacific coast.

A Heathen Ceremonial was Performed in a Brooklyn cemetery on Sunday, September 5th. The following description of the rites observed shows how dense is the spiritual darkness in which these people are enshrouded, and how urgent is the necessity of the churches making a vigorous and systematic effort to give them the Gospel. As the funeral procession proceeded to the cemetery of the Evergreens, a Chinaman, seated beside the driver of the hearse, threw slips of rice-paper into the street. The purpose of this was said by one Chinaman to afford the dead man a clue to retrace his way, should he desire to return home; but another said that the papers were thrown out to catch the attention of the evil one, who always pursues the dead, and thus to detain that potentate until the body is safe from his clutches under ground. At the grave the dead man's clothing was burned, and rows of candles and bunches of slow-matches were inserted in the earth at the foot of the mound and lighted. Rice, chicken, mutton, and tea were then placed beside the grave, that the soul might eat and drink to strengthen it on its journey onward.

The Chinamen living in our midst involve us in a grave responsibility. Such ceremonies as these prove that they are the victims of superstition and heathenism, and God will not hold us guiltless if they are able to say, "No man cared for our souls" (Psa. 42 : 4).

A Mountain of Gold is Said to have been Discovered in California.—A dispatch to a daily journal from Calistoga says: "An excitement has existed in this vicinity for the past fortnight over the report that the Hot Springs at this place contain large quantities of gold in solution. A. C. [illegible]or, who recently bought the Hot Springs property, has been at work for the past two weeks extracting gold from the water. The result hitherto attained showed that he has succeeded in extracting $1060 from ten barrels of water. The gold is of the utmost fineness, and the springs in the locality are very numerous, and the volume of water is exceedingly large. It would be useless to attempt to estimate their value if they continue to yield as rich a return as experiments thus far have proved."

The proprietor of these springs will doubtless be the object of more envy than any man living, and many will seek his friendship, now that he appears to be possessed of inexhaustible wealth. But his possessions alone can never give him happiness, and are worthless in comparison to the well of water springing up into everlasting life, which Jesus has promised to those who ask him (John 4 : 14).

Rev. Daniel Lindley, D.D., the Aged Missionary, died at Morristown, N. J., on August [illegible]. He sailed from Boston to Zululand in South Africa in 1834. During eleven years he and his wife labored among the Zulus, and though they did much good and acquired considerable influence among the natives, so that Dr. Lindley was frequently consulted by the British authorities at the Cape on matters of importance, they were yet not privileged to see a single soul brought to Christ. But when they left Zululand, in 1873, after laboring there thirty-eight years, they left as the fruit of the blessing of God on their work a flourishing Christian Church at Inanda, with a native pastor. At their departure a farewell sermon was preached, at the close of which the native minister, Thomas Hawes, said that the Zulu Christians were left orphans: they had gathered to bury their father and mother. The missionary, he said, knew all, from the governor to the poorest man, and he is called by all, "Unicwawes," Father. His authority might have been greater than the chief's, but he governed not. He was as meek as a little child. He added, "His wife has taught our wives and daughters, and by precept upon precept, and an unwavering example of goodness and faithfulness, done her work for Christ." Mrs. Lindley died lately in New York, and Dr. Lindley, not long after her death, was stricken with apoplexy, and died at the residence of his son, at the age of eighty years.

That Sunlight Changes the Color of Glass is one of the discoveries of scientific men, and at the session of the Science Association, at Boston, Mass., last week, one of the most interesting papers read was on the character and extent of these changes. The lecturer said, "Every kind of glass, except some of the white flint glass, such as is used for fine glassware and optical goods, shows some change of color after long exposure to sunlight. It is interesting to know that some of the colors seen in the windows of old cathedrals now, must be different from what they were when the glass was first put in. It is a curious fact that, whatever change the color of a glass may have undergone under the influence of sunlight, the original tint can be restored by exposing it to the heat of a glass-stainer's kiln."

This scientific fact illustrates an important truth in the Christian life. A Christian actively engaged in business or in other worldly affairs too often finds the lamp of his soul becoming dim, his life is not the expression of the faith and love that were the mainspring of his actions at the commencement of his Christian career. The only mode of restoring the glass to its original color is the mode God often adopts with the backslider, and in the furnace of affliction the soul is restored.

The Sudden Disappearance of a Chinese youth has caused considerable excitement at Springfield, Mass. He graduated from the Springfield High School last June, and had given evidence of his conversion to Christianity. He had written to his father, who is one of the highest of the Chinese nobles, though not of royal blood, about his conversion. The father wrote a very indignant letter, and ordered him to return home, threatening to starve and beat him into renouncing his views. As the boy was determined to be true to his new faith, he looked upon his return to China as going to almost certain death; still he started quietly with other boys for Boston, whence they were to sail for home by way of Europe. But he suddenly disappeared at Springfield. It has been suggested that he may have resolved on keeping hidden for a year, when he will be twenty-one, and can become a citizen of the United States.

The Fall of "the Flying Fairy," whose performances at a New York theatre have been advertised by large placards throughout the city, occasioned considerable alarm in the audience on September 7th. The dangerous performance has attracted large crowds to witness it, and no less than four accidents have occurred to the performers during the short time they have been here. The actress who was injured on Wednesday, fell from a wire suspended at a considerable height, head foremost to the stage, and it was at first feared that she was killed, but it was found that her injuries, though painful, were not fatal. That so many spectators should have paid their money to witness such an exhibition, and that a manager should have been willing to pander to so depraved a taste, shows that when men are spiritually dead they experience a morbid craving for amusements to excite them, and to fill a void Christ alone can permanently fill.

REDEMPTION BY PRICE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Ye are not your own: for ye are bought with a price."—1 Cor. 6 : 19, 20.

The Redan of the Gospel — The Mercantile Theory of the Atonement—Vested Interests in Self Bought Up—A Series of Contrasts—I. Compensation and yet Gain—Have You Made a Good Bargain?—You Have Saved Your Life—Gained Peace and Joy—A Grand Reversion—The Loss an Actual Gain—II. High Value and Yet Lowliness—The Value God sets on Man—Sanctity of Man, Even of his Body—The Preciousness Not Our Own—The Goods and Chattels of Christ — III. Security and yet Watchfulness—IV. Consecration and yet Perfect Liberty—Unconsecrated, Unredeemed—No St. Monday in the Week—V. Submission and yet Expectancy—The Christian's "Great Expectations"—Are You Your Own?

ATTACKS have often been made upon the central doctrine of the Gospel—namely, the doctrine of redemption or atonement, for it is well known to be the Redan of the gospel.* These onslaughts have in many instances been very craftily made; they have professed to be mere corrections of our phraseology, but were essentially assaults upon the truth itself. We believe that in and through the blood of Jesus we have redemption, and that we have been ransomed from destruction by the Mediator's death, the Lord Jesus having bought us by the suit and service which He rendered in our place and stead.

When we speak very plainly upon this point, certain pretentious divines, whose custom it is to sneer at the old theology, at once raise objections to what they are pleased to call "the mercantile theory of atonement." With weak minds an ugly phrase stands for argument, but in this case there is really nothing horrible in the description, even if it be allowed all its force. There may have been among us certain persons who carried ideas of the shop and the counter into their notion of redemption, but we maintain that even these were nearer the truth than those who reduce the ransom paid by the Lord Jesus to nothing, and make His redemption a meaningless figure of speech.

Within the idea of purchase lies hidden the essence of the Saviour's work, and therefore it is to be adhered to.

HE IS COMING YET AGAIN

to complete the redemption of the purchased possession, and we shall not forego our hope to please the squeamish. Paul, at any rate, was not afraid of the mercantile theory, if so men please to call it, for he writes, "Ye are bought;" yea, to make it still more sure, he puts it, "bought with a price." This is put very strongly, and there is no planing it down. If it means anything it must mean that a price was paid for us; instead of our being forever captives under bondage and death, a ransom has been found, according to that ancient saying, "Deliver him from going down to the pit: I have found a ransom."

The fact is, the objection is not merely to the mercantile expression: the objection is to the very idea of substitution and vicarious sacrifice. The pretence is that mistaken words are criticised, but it is a mere pretence; the gun is aimed at Christ's bearing divine wrath in our stead—this is the doctrine which they cannot endure. They will have to aim very often and burst their cannon before they will be able to destroy our belief in the truth of substitution while we have the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah remaining in the inspired volume, and other passages of sacred Scripture to the like effect.

Even if they could disprove the doctrine of vicarious suffering, and show that substitution is an ignorant fancy, the best thing they could do would be to wring their hands in agony, because they had blotted out the brightest star that ever shone amid the storm-wrack of a tempestuous conscience. No truth within the circle of theology is so eminently consolatory to souls burdened with sin as the great fact that Jesus Christ bare the sins of many, and carried away on His own shoulders the transgressions of His people. Let others believe or disbelieve, I nail my colors to the cross where Jesus my Lord paid His blood as a price for me.

---

* The Redan was the principal fort of Sebastopol, the Russian stronghold of the Crimea, besieged by the British and French in 1854. It was at the storming of that fort that so many British troops were slaughtered.

A phase of this redemption which we do not often think of seems to me to be suggested by the text. There was a time, brethren, when we thought ourselves to be our own. Now, saith my text, "Ye are not your own." "Why?" "Because ye are 'bought with a price.'" Bought from whom? May I not fairly say that, in one sense, ye were BOUGHT FROM YOURSELVES?

Where else is the force of the expression, "Ye are not your own?" Through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus a compensation has been given to you for yourselves, so that your rights to yourselves are now the property of your Lord Jesus. That independence and liberty which once you delighted in is now surrendered.

Our vested interest in ourselves, though it never was a true property at all, is once for all surrendered to Him who has laid down His life for us. We have received at the Lord's hands a thousandfold for all that we hand over to Him: the price is so great, so altogether beyond all computation, that we gladly yield our unworthy selves to be the Lord's for ever and ever. I shall want you to remember this form of redemption, and to that end I will set it first among the points to which I shall call your attention.

Dear brethren, let us try at this time to feel the force of the truth that we are bought with a price, and are not our own, for it must not remain a dead letter, it ought to affect our hearts and influence our lives. I shall try to set it forth to you in a series of contrasts, which I may compare to the double glasses of a stereoscope: they will, I trust, aid you in seeing more clearly and feeling more forcibly. We can never be too much affected by this important practical truth. O that the Spirit of God would press it home upon our hearts and consciences!

I. First, I see in the text compensation, and yet gain. Compensation is intended to make good a loss, but in our case the transfer of ourselves from self to Christ is a clear gain. Compensation, then, first—"Ye are not your own: for ye are bought with a price." You have surrendered as believers your right and property in yourselves.

HAVE YOU MADE A GOOD BARGAIN?

Assuredly you have; for, first of all, you live, and had you retained your supposed right to yourself you would have died. He that saveth his life in such a sense, by keeping it to himself, shall lose it. You were, in fact, already dead while you lived, because you were living in pleasure, and finding that pleasure in yourself; but now the Lord has given you a new, high, noble, divine life. Is not that a compensation indeed for giving up the grovelling life of the flesh?

He has given you in addition to life peace: you are now at rest in Jesus. As a believer you know that your sins are forgiven you for Christ's name's sake, that the Father Himself loveth you, that you are accepted in the Beloved, and safe in Jesus' hands. You enjoy great peace; deep, lasting, ever-flowing. Is it not much better to have peace and to be Christ's than to be like the troubled sea that cannot rest, and belong to yourself? One drop of sacred peace is an abundant recompense for the yielding up of yourself to Jesus.

In addition to peace you have joy. Sometimes when it is at flood your happiness is as much as you can bear you know what it is to be carried off your feet by a whirlwind of intense delight when you are musing upon your Lord and His love to you, and the price paid to win you. O the joy, the unutterable blessedness which is the fruit of the Spirit! What delights grow on the bitter tree, the cross! No clusters of the vine can equal the fruit of Calvary's cross. I am sure that whatever earthly joys you have given up you are abundantly compensated for them all by the joy you find in the purchase price which Christ Jesus gave for you.

And then you have a grand reversion; a hope which looks across the stream of death to a better land; a hope of immortality with Christ, of likeness to Him, and association with Him, and glory with Him forever. Why, my friend, if there had been a kingdom to renounce, if there had been a world of self-denials, and ten thousand pleasant things to be given up, you might have been well content to be repaid by such a price.

But then we must not forget that the supposed loss is an ACTUAL GAIN.

It is a fine business when a man is compensated for a loss, and yet the loss itself becomes an advantage to him; yet most emphatically this has been our case; for aught that we have lost for Christ's sake we may truly count as clear gain. We have only lost that which dishonored, injured, and enslaved us. Blessed loss! What were we without Christ? We were the slaves of self; but if set free from self, we are indeed set free from a worse than Egyptian bondage, whose wage is death. It was inevitable that we must have some master or other, but all our former masters were tyrants. Now, brethren, we are set free from Satan, and is not that a gain to be delivered from the prince of the power of the air?

Once we served the world and it was our lord, but what gain it is to feel that we are no longer the servants of men, because we are bought with a price! Instead of needing that aught should be given to us as a recompense for self-surrender, we can reply, We find our joy and our delight in being altogether Christ's, and the very height of our ambition is that by and by we may live entirely according to the will of God. O that this much desired were fully come! for we shall never know perfect liberty until we reach that lofty degree, and then we shall be ready to step into the glory. The Lord help us in it.

So much then on the first point: the Lord Jesus has by His blood given us compensation, and yet there never was a loss, but an unspeakable gain.

II. Look at the text again, and you will see in it high value and yet lowliness: "Ye are not your own: for ye are bought with a price." Value is clearly here, for we are bought with an immense price. How great a store ought man to set by himself as before God, for he is a purchased possession! God thinks not lightly of man, but esteems him sufficiently in divine condescension to buy him with the richest price conceivable. He lost the angels and would not pay a penny for them, but when man had fallen He laid down His life to ransom him.

You, my dear friend, should have the very lowliest view of youself, but yet do see how God has exalted you! "What is man, that thou art mindful of him, O God? and the son of man that thou visitest him?" Yet He does visit him. He has visited him so as to take his nature into union with the divine. More than that, He visited him so as to redeem him with pangs and anguish unutterable. If you want to know see Christ upon the cross, and mark His wounds. You are not a thing to be trifled with. Do not reckon so cheaply of yourself as to stoop to become a mere money-grubber or earthworm. You are worth more than that. Do not fancy that you ever can truly be yourself while you are living for any human object or any earthly aim: you are too precious to waste yourself on fading flowers.

THE VALUE OF YOURSELF,

You are a being of God's making, in the first place. In His own image, remember, He made you, and nothing but sin could spoil you; but now you have been bought, and therefore have become a costly thing, more costly than a mere creation. In the Lord's house you ar not a vessel to dishonor, a broken crock to b flung on the dunghill, and another obtained i your place; but you are a vessel unto honor f for the Master's use, since He has paid for yo so dearly. "Ye were not redeemed with co ruptible things, as silver and gold, from you vain conversation; but with the precious bloo of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish an without spot."

There is a sanctity about a blood-bought ma or woman of the highest degree: the Lord ha purchased him with His life. A sanctity su rounds even these frail bodies, for the apostle speaking about them in the text now before u Let me read what he says upon them—"Wha know ye not that your body is the temple of th Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have God, and ye are not your own?" Never, ther fore, give up your body to idleness, drunkenne or any form of uncleanness. Paul spea especially of fornication as a thing not to thought of among the saints; because the bo has been valued by God at a great price, a purchased accordingly, and must not therefo be defiled by an impure conversation.

I want you, then, to think of yourselves, y believers, as precious things. The Lord says each one of His own beloved, "Since thou wa precious in My sight, thou hast been honorab and I have loved thee." You are "the precio sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold." U yourselves only for honorable purposes for G puts honor upon you.

Now look at the other side of the pictu you are precious, but you must yet be lowly, whatever value there is about you, you do belong to yourself. "Ye are not your ow Though precious enough to have been boug with a price, yet none of the preciousness yours. Believers, you are the goods and chat of Christ: as you were once sold under sin, are you now "bought with a price." "I bear
my body," said Paul, "the marks of the L Jesus," as if he had been branded with Chri name, as sheep and cattle often bear the ma of their owner.

I wish I could get into the mind of all here thought which burdens my own heart, that should esteem ourselves as blood-bought m as being sacred things, as holy as the gol candlestick, or as the golden table of the sh bread, and yet think of ourselves as being very least and lowest in the Lord's house, cause we are not at all our own. Our honor in our owner. God forbid that we should gl in anything except that we belong to Chr Paul cried, "Whose I am, and whom I serv and this we too will say with hearty exultati
We will walk with holy boldness as the Lo own, but yet with deep humility as not our o

III. Thoughtfully let us consider ano contrast: "Ye are not your own: for ye bought with a price:" this brings before mind security and yet watchfulness. Fi security. You will not be lost, for He who o you is able to keep you.

IF YOU WERE TO PERISH, WHO WOULD BE LOSER?

Why, He to whom you belong, and "ye not your own," ye belong to Christ. My h of being preserved to the end lies in this that Jesus Christ paid far too much for me to let me go. Each believer cost Him heart's blood. Stand in Gethsemane, and His groans: then draw near and mark bloody sweat, and tell me, will He lose a for whom He suffered thus? See Him han on the tree, tortured, mocked, burdened wit awful load, and then beclouded with the ec of His Father's face, and do you think suffered all that, and yet will permit thos whom He endured it to be cast into hell?

He will be a greater loser than I shall perish, for He will lose what cost Him His surely He will never do that. Here is security, you are the Lord's portion, and He not be robbed of His heritage. We are hand that bears the scar of the nail; we hidden in the cleft of a rock—a rock that was riven for us near nineteen hundred years ago. None can pluck us from the hand which redeemed us ; its pressure is too warm with love and strong with might for that.

Now turn the picture over : look at the other side of the medal. Here is reason for watchfulness. "Ye are not your own : for ye are bought with a price," therefore take great care of yourselves, and keep your hearts with all diligence, for you are a king's treasure. If a thing is my own I may do what I like with it, but if it is entrusted to my care I must mind how I behave toward it, or else I shall be an unfaithful steward.

Come, come, friend, you may play with yourself if you like, if you are your own, but if you belong to Jesus Christ, I charge you, by the love you bear Him, and by the dignity of His sacred character, and by His death—the price He gave for you—do not pollute or degrade yourself.

Ye are safe in the Lord's hands, therefore rejoice ; but mind ye take the other side of the truth, and watch so as to keep your garments white, by walking close to God, for "ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price."

IV. A fourth contrast, well worthy to be worked out in your private meditations, is and yet perfect liberty. There is consecration. You are to-day to dedicate yourself wholly and entirely to the Lord, because you are not partly redeemed, but wholly redeemed. Do you make any provision for the flesh, dear friend? Do you keep back any faculty you possess from Christ? Is not this a robbery of your Lord? How would you like to think of that particular reservation as being unredeemed? Would you be content to believe that no blood of Christ has ever fallen to redeem that part of you?

CONSECRATION,

Which portion is it which is to be unconsecrated? Is it the body that you would pamper and indulge? What, have you an unredeemed body then? Are you satisfied that it should be eaten of the worm, and never rise from the dust? or do you give to Christ your loving heart, but reserve your thinking mind to yourself, and say, "I will invent my own beliefs, and not yield my judgment to the dicta of revelation"? What, my friend, have you then an unredeemed intellect? What is to become of it in that day when only those things shall be gathered into heaven which have been bought with blood, and owned by Christ? In that day when He maketh up His jewels He will not put another man's goods among them.

Do not reserve from Christ even your second-class powers. Withhold not your voice, but sing for Jesus, or speak for Him, if you can ; write for Jesus, paint for Jesus—ay, make and mend garments for His sake. Do not reserve from Christ any minor power that you possess, but ask God to enable you to consecrate the skill of your fingers to Him as well as the force of your arm, for even your least members are bought with a price. Your time is included in the purchase, for there is never a moment when you are unredeemed. Some people think, perhaps, that they are off duty now and then ; let me ask them, Are you ever off the roll of redemption? Is there one *St. Monday in the week in which you are an unredeemed man, and may be your own or the devil's? Suppose you die that day? What then?

As this consecration holds good for all times, o in all manner of ways. You are consecrated o Christ to do whatever you can do to His lory ; to suffer whatever you can suffer as He ys it upon you, and, above all, to be as well as o do and to suffer—to be forever the Lord's. here is a great deal in actually being Christ's, ven when you are not actively engaged ; when ou are neither praying, nor singing, nor working, but as it were standing still, it is well to be as the sweet flowers in the garden, which exhale the perfume of their innermost hearts in silent surrender to the passing gales. O that we may be full of grace, and may the wind of the Divine Spirit scatter abroad the sweetnesses of our inner life, even when we are scarcely conscious of it!

But, then, there is with this a perfect liberty. I do believe that to be consecrated to Christ is, when we come to the bottom of things, the sure way to give to all the faculties of our nature the fullest possible play. Vice is the indulgence of the passions. True. Therefore some think it joy ; but if all the passions of a man of every sort were to be exercised in their right harmony and proportion, as they would have been had he remained in his first estate, then perfect virtue, and not vice, would have been the result, and in that virtue manhood would have found a delightful liberty. The propensities of our nature as nature—not as fallen nature—will have their right indulgence when they own a complete subservience to the will and law of God.

Liberty to sin is slavery, liberty from sin is freedom. There is no liberty to a man like that of being under law to God. If we are encased within the compass of the law, we are no more restricted than a bird which is imprisoned within the boundless expanse of air, or a fish which is shut in by the ocean. Do not think, therefore, that the more a Christian you become the more you will feel of restriction and bond ; say rather that you will rejoice in the more of such freedom as good men alone can understand. The fact is that self-denial itself will become no self-denial, but a supreme joy, when once the heart is perfectly loyal to its Lord.

V. To close, I will mention

A FIFTH PAIR OF CONTRASTS :

Submission and expectancy. These are both suggested by my text. Submission : "Ye are not your own," and therefore God has a right to do whatever He wills with you. We cannot tell what He may do with us yet, but if we must suffer week after week of pain upon our bed, He has a right to lay us there and chasten us in every limb.

If the Lord says, "Go into your room and cough all the winter through, and then melt away with decline," we must bow before His decree, remembering these words, "Ye are not your own." Or if He says, "Come down from your position of comfort into hard work and poverty," again you must remember "ye are not your own." Or if He says, "Migrate across the seas ; go to a new country, cut every tie and break the fondest connections," you must cheerfully obey, for "ye are not your own." If the call of duty should be, "Go, preach the gospel among the heathen ; go and die among them ; find a grave where malaria shortens life, or cruelty brings sudden death ;" you must go without a question, for "ye are not your own."

Ours not to raise questions or debates, for those can only be legitimate among persons who are their own.

"Ours not to reason why :
Ours but to dare and die," for we are not our own. Submission, absolute submission, is the rightful position of the blood-bought.

Side by side with that comes expectancy. I could not do much for myself if I were my own, but if I am Christ's I expect that He will do great things for me. Do you see those two boys? neither can do much for himself, but one of them has great expectations. And why? Because he has a kind and wealthy father, of whom he expects great things. He says, "I am my father's son, and he will take care of me." It is the same with us : our great Owner's goodness and power have raised our expectations.

Look at this body of mine, it must decay, and become mere dust ; but my Lord has bought it, and be sure He did not purchase it to let it end in corruption. It is not my own, therefore I feel sure that He who owns it will fit it up again in nobler form than it now wears, and make it bright and glistening like His own, not liable to pain, or sickness, or decay. I know He will. If this body were only mine I should expect there would be an end of it when the grave-digger hides it in the earth ; but if it be my Lord's, He has paid so much for it that He must have some grand intention concerning it. He sees in this body the raw material out of which His grace and power can make something that shall glorify Himself. Is there not warrant for great expectations in our belonging to Christ?

We are not our own : then these minds of ours—depend upon it He will enlarge them : He will increase our mental calibre, and make His property more worthy of its owner. You say, dear brother, "I shall never be much of a man ; I have but small capacity for learning." Well, what you have belongs to Christ, and He will sanctify your talents and increase them, and give you wisdom to use them for His honor. You do not know what you may yet become. You will know more after you have been in heaven five minutes than all the doctors of divinity on earth ; for there you shall know even as you are known. You shall know Christ, and see Him, and rejoice in Him beyond all that you can now conceive.

At any rate, a piece of clay that lies in the pit all its own has no destiny before it, but when it has been purchased by the potter, and beaten and prepared, and when it feels itself revolving on the wheel, it has just reason to believe that it will bear a useful part in time to come. It might say, if it could speak, "I am not my own lump of clay ; I have been bought with a great price, and therefore something is to be made of me. It doth not yet appear what I shall be, but when He that fashioneth hath finished me I shall, no doubt, be worthy of the hand that has wrought this upon me."

Raise your expectations as high as ever you will, God meaneth to do for you exceeding abundantly above what ye can ask or even think : according to the riches of His glory in Christ Jesus He will show the exceeding greatness of His power in you that believe in Jesus Christ. Blessed are the men, then, of whom it is true, "Ye are not your own : for ye are bought with a price."

Now, I finish by this question :

"ARE YOU YOUR OWN,

dear hearer?" I can imagine some sitting here saying, "Of course I am ; I do not believe in surrendering myself to God." Well, then, if you are your own you will go to your own place, and where your own place is read the Word of God and discover. There shall you find that those who know not God shall be driven from His presence : if they are their own they must be their own comforters and their own helpers, but far off from God shall they be driven for evermore.

Are you anxious to be saved, my dear hearer? Then the way of salvation is, that you believe in Jesus Christ ; but it is an essential part of that believing that you do surrender yourself to Christ. If He will save you, shall He have you to be His possession? If He will buy you, will you be His? If He will redeem you, will you confess that you are not your own? Many a man is unable to find peace because he wants to be independent, and demands to have his own will and way.

Surrender! That is a necessary exhortation to every revolted one who would be restored. Surrender! Surrender at discretion! God cannot treat with rebels while they carry their weapons in their hands. Down with your weapons! Cry to Him, "Lord, I am dying, starving, perishing ; wrath is upon me : only let me live and be cleansed, and I will be Thine forever, as Thy grace shall help me to be." He will accept you : He does accept you now if that is the utterance of your heart ; and you, too, may go away and sing, "I am Thine, and Thine alone,

This I gladly, fully own."

God grant it, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

[Portion of Scripture read before Sermon—Psalm 116.]

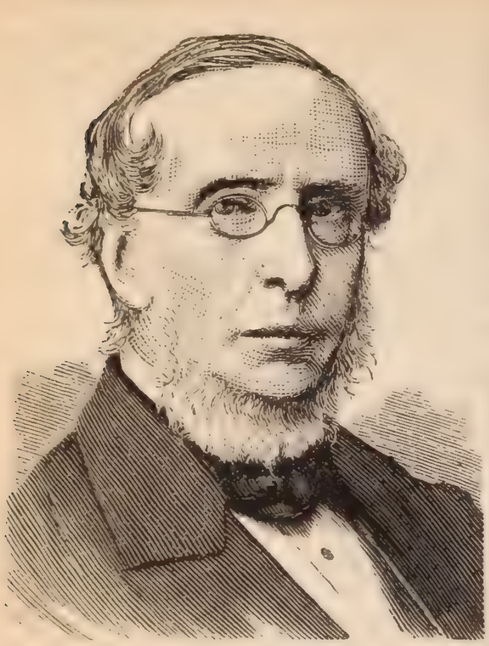
---

* Those workingmen in England who spend Sunday dissipation, and are in consequence unable to work e following day, are accustomed to say they are keeping St. Monday."



MR. W. GROSER,

Hon. Sec. of the London S. S. Union.

THIS Christian gentleman is the well-known and highly respected senior Secretary of the Sunday-school Union, London. He was born in the British metropolis on Aug. 21st, 1803, and is, therefore, now in the seventy-seventh year of his age.

His parents appear to have appreciated the value of Sabbath-school instruction, and at seven years of age he was sent to the Eagle Street Sunday-schools, High Holborn, London, and remained there until he was sufficiently insructed to engage himself in the blessed work of imparting religious instruction to others. He therefore became a teacher of a large class of exceedingly ragged and destitute boys and young men in Saffron Hill, a portion of London which has been completely transformed, architecturally and morally, since the time when Mr. Groser engaged in his self-denying enterprise in its once benighted neighborhood.

The school which constituted the scene of his devoted activity was a branch of the Silver Street Sunday-school Society, an organization which in its day did some noble work for the Master and the welfare of immortal souls.

In the year 1824, being then only twenty-one years of age, he was appointed by his colleagues, who clearly discerned those noble, self-sacrificing, and business-like qualities which have ever since secured for him the confidence and commendation of all with whom he has worked, to represent the Saffron Hill School in the meetings of the North-London Auxiliary of the Sunday-school Union, and in 1830 he was unanimously elected by its committee as a representative to the Parent Committee.

His capacities for business developing, and his unabated ardor in the work making itself everywhere manifest, he was in 1834 appointed Secretary to the Library and Reading Rooms; and in the year 1843 was heartily appointed to the honorable and onerous post of Corresponding Secretary of the Union, which had been previously occupied with distinction by the late W. H. Watson, Esq.

For ten years Mr. Groser acted as President of the Weekly Training Class for Sunday-school Teachers, and in this way imparted much valuable instruction in a most effective and affectionate manner, for which his numerous pupils have reason to remember him with grateful esteem. Since 1863 he has edited that well-known and ever-welcome favorite of the little ones, the Child's Own Magazine.

When younger, and capable of bearing more fatigue than at present, it was Mr. Groser's delight to take a very active part in personally visiting the country unions and their affiliated schools, and to conduct the correspondence incidental thereto. He was privileged to bear a share in the celebration of the Jubilee of Sunday-schools in 1831, and would most gladly have borne a portion of the severe labor associated with the centenary celebration lately held had physical strength permitted. We need scarcely add that Mr. Groser's services are, as indeed are those of the officers and committee of the Sunday-school Union, wholly gratuitous, rendered for the Lord's dear sake, and anticipating alone His final and abiding reward.

THE BROKEN JUG.

A Temperance Story.

Peter Stokes's Trouble—His Son Robert's Disgrace—Secret Marriage — Robert Breaks his Father's Ale Jug—The Minister's Visit—Brighter Days.

PETER STOKES was a Somersetshire man, who had for many years successfully managed a small farm in this fertile English county. His industry and neighborly kindness caused him to be much respected by all who knew him; and the feftility of his farm, situated in the rich lands at the southern foot of the Mendip Hills, enabled him to obtain a living comfortably sufficient for his plain and simple habits.

But he had one sore trouble. His only son Robert was a drunkard, and often caused his father many a heartache by his sottish habits. In his youth Robert seemed likely to turn out respectable, and worthy of his father. He was then very useful on the farm, and on the market days at Bristol he was regularly sent off in charge of a wagon-load of potatoes or of the prickly teazles, for which Somersetshire is noted, and which are so valuable in the manufacture of cloth. It was these market-days which ruined him at last; for as he passed through the pretty village of Langford, or, farther up the hills, came to the "Darlington Arms" inn, he used to bait his horses and call for a draught of beer or cider for himself.

While drinking this on the bench outside the public-house, he gradually formed a close acquaintance with one Jack Tiller, a blacksmith, of Langford, who was fond of a glass, very talkative, and always full of jokes. His merry speeches delighted Robert, who was of a cheerful turn of mind, like his father, and thus tempted him to spend many a quarter of an hour listening to Jack's jests, when he ought to have been driving the horses on toward Bristol.

Of course, while waiting for the end of the stories which the blacksmith so often began, Robert's glass would get empty, and his friend would then tell him to "wet his pipe again," and at the same time call for another glass for himself. And so a love for drinking gradually stole over the good-tempered and active youth, and began to produce painful fruits; for on one occasion he came into Bristol so stupid from the liquor he had taken by the wayside that he missed his way, and lost so much time in finding it again that he was too late for the market.

Another week he was robbed of all his money by two clever rogues, who invited him to drink with them, and then picked his pockets when he had become sufficiently intoxicated for their purpose. His father saw with grief that it would not do to entrust Robert with the Bristol journey any more, and therefore in future took the wagon himself, as he used to do when his son was a child.

But the love of drink and of low company had now become too strong with Robert to be shaken off. He did try for a while to keep steady, and not go beyond the "one or two glasses" which his father had told him he did not object to. But whenever he sat down with a lively group at the public-house, "the one or two,' always became one or two more; and thus Bob again and again got so tipsy that his companions had to ad him home in a reeling and stupid state.

To make matters worse, he had, unknown to his father, married Jack Tiller's daughter, Sally, a dressy, flirting girl, who had "set her cap" at Robert for some time, for although she saw he had a weakness for drink, yet he was good-looking, and his father was supposed to have saved money. As soon as the marriage came to the ears of Mr. Peter Stokes, he induced a neighboring farmer to take Robert into his employ, and for a while the young man was more sober, and worked with much of his former industry.

But Sally was not a true helpmate; she spent much of her time in gossiping; and when Robert came home in the evening he seldom found a comfortable supper prepared for him. He therefore often found his way to the public-house, and gradually relapsed into his old habits, to the fresh grief of his father. His master also warned him that he must quit his service the next time he was seen drunk. This occurred very soon, and Robert was at once discharged. Poverty and disgrace now followed closely on his heels, and if it had not been for Robert's good-tempered disposition, and occasional help from his father, he would have had to enter the poor-house. But from time to time some of the neighboring farmers gave him odd jobs, and his wife, being obliged to stir herself, was able to earn a few shillings by washing, and by keeping some poultry.

They had now been married several years, and had a family of young children. Tom, the eldest of these, became a favorite with his grandfather, who took him off his parents' hands and adopted him as his own child, and as he grew up gave him as good an education as the district school afforded.

One fine evening in May, Mr. Stokes returned from Wells Market, where he had made some good bargains, and was, consequently, in a very pleasant humor. Sending his grandson to the public-house for a jug of ale, he sat down by the open door of his clean kitchen, and there rested before partaking of the bread, cheese, and cold bacon which the girl had got ready for him. In less than ten minutes Tom came back with a troubled face, and holding out the jug empty, but dripping, and upside down, "Look here, grandfather; see what father has done!"

"Father!" said Mr. Stokes; "why, what do you mean? How's this? What has father to do with this large hole in the jug?"

Tom then explained it all. He had gone briskly to the inn, and had the jug filled with foaming ale. Just as he came out of the door with it, among a group of idlers he saw his father, Robert, who was plainly the worse for liquor, and called out to the boy, "Halloa, Tom, lad! what's got there? Ale! and very good, too! Bring it here, I say!"

Tom said, "I can't, father. 'Tis for grandfather's supper. He's just come home tired from market."

"So be I tired, lad," said Robert; "and if the ale be good for father, ain't it good for me too?"

So saying, he rushed after Tom, who in his haste to get safe off with his ale, tripped over a stone, fell flat on the ground, and broke the jug. A roar of laughter was raised by the bystanders at the inn door. Poor Tom, however, secured the broken jug, and ran home to his grandfather to tell what had happened.

When Mr. Stokes heard him repeat the words, "If the ale be good for father, ain't it good for me, too?" he seemed struck with deep thought. Again and again he repeated the words to himself; but, saying nothing further to Tom, he turned to the table and silently ate his supper.

The next day the minister happened to call on Mr. Stokes, and the conversation turned upon Robert, and among other matters the breaking of the jug was mentioned, and the speech which had accompanied it. The good man, who had known Robert all his life, spoke kindly and feelingly of the sad condition of the poor fellow. Mr. Stokes also said: "Since last evening, sir, I have been thinking whether I really did all my duty to Robert by keeping him out of harm's way. I brought him up, you know, to take a glass now and a glass then, and perhaps if it had not been for that he might never have become what he is. Do you think, sir, I could do him any good now by giving it all up myself, and then trying to get him to follow my example, just for his own good, for the good of his wife and family, and of his immortal soul? I often think what will become of his soul, sir, if he continues as he is."

His visitor, while admitting that he did not think there was any danger of Mr. Stokes ever becoming too fond of ale, yet praised his fatherly feelings, and to encourage his good resolution, quoted the holy words of God's Book (Rom. 14 : 21), "It is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak." He added that, although flesh and wine may have their use in the proper place, yet that when, as in Robert's case, it is plain that there is no power of self-control for moderate use, then duty points to total abstinence, and God will bless the efforts to save a weak brother.

Mr. Stokes thought over the matter still further after the clergyman had gone, and the same afternoon he walked over to Robert's cottage, and had a long and earnest conversation with him. What passed between father and son we do not know, but from that time forward Robert was again a useful help to his father, and neither the old man nor the young were known to drop in at the public-house for "a glass or two," and it became a familiar household word between them, that a jug with the bottom out was the best jug to fetch beer in.

But better than this, the good minister's interest was deepened in Robert Stokes, and having prayed for his welfare in secret for some time, at length pleaded personally with him to give himself to Christ, which he happily did, and is now an exemplary member of a Christian Church.

TEN COMING WONDERS,

Which will Probably Occur During the Next Five Years.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

THE following initiatory Ten Coming Wonders may be expected to be completely accomplished between the present year 1880 and 1885, if the End of this Age is indeed to be about 1890.

I. Unwonted frequency, as the End approaches, of wars, rumors of wars, famines, pestilences, and earthquakes, together with the abounding iniquity and dissemination of false doctrines, notwithstanding the increased preaching of the true gospel to all nations (Matthew 24 : 6–14); and simultaneous going forth of three unholy, wonder-working, frog-like, fierce demon spirits, under the year-day sixth vial, while the mystic Euphrates is drying up, to gather the nations of the earth and of the whole world, by democratic revolutions and gigantic military preparations, to the war of the Great Day of God Almighty toward Armageddon (Revelation 16 : 13–16)—the first demon spirit from the Dragon or Satan, a spirit of Antichristian Infidelity, manifested in daring avowals of Atheism, Rationalism, Spiritualism, and increasing apostasy from Christianity; the second from the wild beast or Roman Empire, a spirit of Revolutionary Democracy displayed, in the form of Radical Demagogism, Republican upheavals, Communism, Socialism, and general tendency toward lawless insubordination and conspiracy; the third from the false prophet of Popery and Mahometanism, a spirit of Ultramontane and Moslem fanatical zealotry, as exhibited in pilgrimages, crusades, so-called holy wars, political-religious intrigues, rallying their adherents to the defence of the standards of their superstitions.

II. Progressive dissolution of the Turkish Empire, as predicted by the mystical "drying up of the Euphrates," under the year-day sixth vial in Rev. 16 : 12, and separation of Bulgaria and Syria from it, thus completing its redivision into the FIVE COUNTRIES which it originally conquered and formed into its present territories, and which will be the five toes on one foot of Daniel's symbolic human image (Dan. 2 : 31–45)—the five kingdoms in the Eastern half of Cæsar's Roman Empire. Four of these will be, according to Dan. 8 : 22, 23, the Four Horn Kingdoms of Alexander the Great's ancient Macedonian Empire, re-established as four distinct and separate kingdoms, as in ancient times, viz., 1. MODERN GREECE, enlarged northward so as to include Thessaly, Epirus, Macedonia, etc.; 2. EGYPT, "the King of the South" (Dan. 11 : 40), with perhaps Palestine added to it; 3. SYRIA, "the King of the North" (Dan. 11 : 40), together with Armenia and the greater part of Asia Minor; 4. CENTRAL TURKEY, corresponding with ancient THRACE-WITH-BITHYNIA—i.e., European Turkey south of the Balkans and east of Macedonia, together with some part of Asia Minor; and the fifth kingdom will be BULGARIA, with part of Servia and perhaps Roumania, etc., added to it.

III. Victorious war of France against Germany, leading to its reacquirement of all territories west of the river Rhine and to marvellous changes in the map of Europe, so that in the western half of Cæsar's Roman Empire the existing sixteen * kingdoms or states will be formed into exactly five kingdoms, corresponding with the five toes on one foot of Daniel's image as follows: 1. BRITAIN, legislatively separated from Ireland and India; 2. FRANCE, with the addition of Belgium, Luxemburg, and part of Holland, Rhenish Prussia, Switzerland, and with whatever of Baden, Bavaria, and Wurtemberg is not added to Austria; 3. SPAIN, with Portugal added to it; 4. ITALY; 5. AUSTRIA, separated from Bohemia, Moravia, and Galicia, because they are north of the Danube, and perhaps also subjected to changes as regards its connection with Hungary. On the North African coast Algeria belongs to France, Morocco may be added to Spain, and Tunis and Tripoli to Italy (Dan. 2 : 40–45; 7 : 24; Rev. 13 : 3).

IV. Alliance of the ten rulers of the above-mentioned ten nations—namely, five in the western and five in the eastern Roman Empire—in a TEN-KINGDOMED CONFEDERACY, as prefigured by Daniel's Ten-horned Wild Beast, and the subsequent rise among them of a Napoleon, as an eleventh Little Horn, or ruler of a little state, situated in the ancient Grecian Empire, in fulfilment of Dan. 7 : 27—"The ten horns (out of the Roman Empire) are ten kings that shall arise, and another shall rise after them, and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings," etc. Whether he will subdue three of the ten horns before or after making his Jewish covenant time will show.

V. Confirmation of a seven years' covenant or league, at the distance of exactly seven years and seventy-five days before the consummation or end of this age, between this Little Horn, or Napoleonic "prince that shall come," and many of the Jews, to promote their secure resettlement in Judea, in fulfilment of Dan. 9 : 27, as predicted by more than one hundred expositors—"He ('the prince that shall come,' mentioned in the previous verse) shall confirm a covenant with many for one week (seven years), and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations shall make it desolate, even until the consummation."

VI. Extraordinary stir, agitation, and revival throughout the Christian Church, and proclamation of the midnight cry, on account of the foregoing five events, convincing many that the end of this age will be in about seven years, and that Christ's Second Advent to translate to heaven watchful Christians will occur within about two years after the covenant. This agitated awakening will be the fulfilment of the painful travail of the sun-clothed woman, before the birth and catching up to heaven of her man-child, the company of translated watchful Christians in Rev. 12; and also of the prophetical parable of the ten virgins in Matt. 25, who, while in a midnight condition of slumbering and sleeping, are all anxious to arise when the cry shall be raised by many preachers, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet Him!"

VII. The renewal of the Jewish morning and evening sacrifices in a rebuilt temple at Jerusalem, at the exact date of 2300 days before the cleansing of the sanctuary, according to Dan. 8 : 2, and therefore about 250 days after the date of the covenant. Also the 69 weeks mentioned in Dan. 9 : 25 (if destined to have a future literal-day, as well as a past year-day accomplishment) will be fulfilled as 483 literal days, commencing with a decree to rebuild Jerusalem simultaneously with the 2300 days on the day of the renewal of the Jewish sacrifices, and reaching to the Second Coming of Messiah the Prince in the air, which will consequently be 483 days after the day of the renewal of the Jewish sacrifices.

VIII. Aggressive Eastern policy of the Napoleonic Horn during the two or three years following his Jewish Covenant or League, in pursuance of his destined career as the Wilful King in Dan. 11 : 21–30, his deceitful working, and entering peaceably upon the province of Judea, and becoming strong with a small people, and his great war against the "King of the South," the sovereign of Egypt, and sanguinary defeat of the Egyptian army, and two subsequent expeditions against Egypt, and growing hatred of the covenant, etc. Thus will he "wax exceeding great toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land," as predicted in Dan. 8 : 9.

IX. The Second Advent of Christ into "the air," or atmospheric heavens, and the resurrection of the bodies of all deceased saints, and their ascension, together with 144,000 watchful living Christians, translated like Enoch and Elijah, without dying, to meet Christ in the heavens, at the distance of two years, and between one and three weeks after the date of the Napoleonic-Judaic Covenant (1 Thes. 4 : 16, 17; 1 Cor. 15 : 51, 52; Rev. 14 : 1–5; 12 : 5; 4 : 5; 3 : 10; Matt. 25 : 10; 24 : 37–41; Luke 17 : 28–30; 21 : 36; 1 Peter 5 : 4; Dan. 9 : 25).

X. Unparalleled religious revival and worldwide preaching of a special gospel message to "every nation and kindred and tongue and people. Fear God and give glory to Him, for the hour of His judgment is actually come," in fulfilment of the First Angel Message and the First Seal in Rev. 14 : 6, 7; 6 : 1, 2. This will chiefly continue about nine months after the Second Coming of Christ into the aerial heavens, and the resurrection and translation of saints. It will be accompanied by the latter-day outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon all flesh, predicted in Joel 2 : 28–32, and prefigured on a small scale by the Holy Spirit's descent on the day of Pentecost, described in Acts 2. There will afterward be two more Angel Messages proclaiming the fall of Babylon, and denouncing eternal torment against those who shall worship the Napoleonic Antichrist's image or receive his mark on their foreheads or hands (Rev. 14 : 8–11).

After the foregoing Ten Wonders, there follow Thirty more Wonders during the subsequent five years (probably between 1885 and 1890) in connection with Napoleon's final persecution of Christians for three and a half years until he perishes at Christ's descent upon Mount Olivet (Zech. 14; Rev. 19).

---

* In 1859 there were not merely sixteen but actually twenty-one different kingdoms or states in the Western Roman Empire, which has to be formed into only five kingdoms. But in 1860 six Italian states, Sardinia, Tuscany, Parma, Modena, the Sicilies, and the states of the Church, were formed into one united Italy, so the total was reduced from twenty-one to sixteen. The addition of Venetia to Italy, which took place in 1866, was predicted in April, 1865, in the author's pamphlet, "Menacing Perils." The present sixteen distinct kingdoms or states are Britain, France, Holland, and part of Luxemburg (both under the King of Holland), Belgium, Rhenish Prussia west of the Rhine, Switzerland, Baden, Southern Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Austria, Morocco-with-Fez, Tunis and Tripoli.

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

(Continued from page 590.)

The Choice Made.

WHEN I began to think over Claude's offer with a more unbiassed mind, I was driven to the conclusion that Claude was far more likely to lead me away from Christ than I was to lead him to become a believer. For surely if I had not enough influence now to persuade him to love better things—now, when he was so anxious to win my favor—surely afterward, when he felt certain of my love, he would not be more likely to be led in an entirely different direction. Surely I should become worse, and Claude would become no better. I should be less of a believer, and he would remain still an unbeliever.

To do evil that good may possibly come is entirely opposed to the whole teaching of the New Testament; nowhere is the faintest hope held out that such a course will result in good. And I could undoubtedly expect no blessing from God on my endeavors to lead Claude aright if I had acted in the face of God's command and had gone in direct opposition to His clear injunction: "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers."

And so I felt, when I had thought the whole matter carefully over, that it came to this, Was I willing to shut Christ out from the first place in my heart, and put Claude there instead? Or, on the other hand, was I willing to give up Claude, and hold all the closer and firmer to Him who had for years been my hope and my refuge?

Christ's love or Claude's! Which should I choose? I could not have both, for I felt that to have both was impossible. Choosing Christ, I should offend Claude; choosing Claude, I should forfeit the love and the favor of Christ. Christ or Claude—which?

A verse, which I had learned as a child, came suddenly into my mind, and looking up to the sky above me, in which the sun was once more shining, I repeated it aloud, for it seemed exactly to express the earnest cry of my soul:

"My heart is fixed, O God,
Fixed on Thee;
And my eternal choice is made,
Christ for me."

Christ for me. Christ's smile, Christ's favor, Christ's blessing: these are my choice. Whatever it costs me, I cannot, I will not give them up.

I knelt down, and thanked God from the bottom of my heart for showing me the clear, the sure, the right way for me to take. And then I took up my pen to answer Claude's letter.

It was not an easy task to answer that letter, for I did not wish to wound Claude or to pain him, and I felt sure he would be so utterly unprepared for what I felt obliged to say.

Lest I should in any way raise his hopes, I began at once by telling him how difficult I felt it to write, and how much it cost me to tell him that what he had asked me to do in his letter was quite impossible. I thanked him for all his love for me, and for the kind way in which he had spoken of me; but I made it as clear as possible that, though I hoped always to remain his friend and sister, yet I could not be his wife.

I did not tell him my exact reason for refusing him, for I felt that Claude would not in the least degree understand it; but I told him that my mind was fully made up, and I begged him at once to dismiss the idea of it from his own mind. I tried to write very decidedly and yet very kindly, and with the remembrance of our old friendship and love vividly impressed on my mind.

I ended by expressing my sorrow for giving him pain, and my earnest hope for his future happiness. I begged him to let no coldness and estrangement come between us on account of this, but to let our old friendship be strengthened and increased rather than weakened and lessened.

I was not at all satisfied with this letter when it was finished, but there was no time to rewrite it, for post-time was close at hand, and the advertisement in the Times newspaper must be answered at once, or I should lose the situation.

When both the letters were gone I tried to dismiss the subject from my mind, and when it came back to me I endeavored to turn my tired thoughts into prayer, and in this way found comfort and relief.

The following afternoon, as I was writing letters in the little school-room, which was the next room to my bedroom, and the window of which also looked out over the garden to the hills beyond, I heard a hasty step on the stairs.

Maggie was spending the day with a playfellow of hers in the village, and it was not Maggie's step. No, I knew the step well, and my heart beat fast, and I felt myself growing paler and paler every moment.

The door opened, and Claude entered without any ceremony. He looked tired and troubled, and his clothes were covered with dust from his long journey.

"May," he said, "I got your letter this morning, and I have come off at once. The Fitzgeralds thought I was mad, I believe; I started up from the breakfast-table, and said I must catch the nine-o'clock train. But I could not have waited another day; it would have been utterly impossible, May."

I tried to speak, but my heart was beating so quickly now that my words seemed as if they would choke me.

"And now, May," Claude said hurriedly, sitting down by my side and taking my hand, "I want you to tell me what you meant by that cruel letter you sent me; or, rather, I want you to tell me that it was all a mistake, all a delusion, that you have thought better of it since, and that you wish you had never written it. I want you to tell me, May, darling," he said in a lower voice, "that the dream of my life is to be changed into a reality this very week. I want you to tell me that the bright days which I have always said were in store for us both are now close at hand."

"Claude, dear Claude," I said, as soon as I was able to speak, "you have my answer; as a sister, as a friend, I will always love you, but I cannot, cannot be your wife."

"And pray why not, May?" he said, impatiently rising, and walking toward the window; "what absurd idea have you got in your head now? Who or what is to hinder you from becoming my wife, I should like to know?"

"Claude, I cannot," I said; and the tears would come, in spite of all my efforts to keep them back.

"But what is your reason, May?" he said, pacing up and down the room; "you must have some reason for what you say, and I cannot rest till you tell me what it is. What is it, May?"

"I had rather not tell you all my thoughts about it, Claude," I said; "it would be very difficult, and would cost us both much pain. And, Claude," I said earnestly, "it would do no good; my mind is quite made up: I cannot do as you ask me, so please do not press me for the reason, Claude."

"But I will know it, May," he said, almost angrily. "I am not going home till you have told me; so you had better let me hear it at once."

And then I felt that, perhaps, it was sinful cowardice which made me afraid to tell Claude my reason; perhaps I was grieving my dear Lord and Master by being ashamed of Him, by being ashamed to tell Claude what it was that I held far more dear than his love for me, even the priceless, the everlasting love of my Lord. And yet how could I do it? Claude unexpectedly came to my help.

"May," he said quickly, "do you love any one better than me—is that it?"

"Yes, Claude," I said in a low voice; "there is one love which I hold more dear than yours—that is it."

"Who is it, May?" he said impatiently; "I didn't know you knew any one else well enough; who can it be?"

"It is no one on earth, Claude," I said; "I mean the Lord Jesus Christ."

"What nonsense, May!" he exclaimed. "Whatever in the world has that to do with it? I am not going to interfere with your religion; you may be as religious as ever you please—a perfect saint if you like; I won't hinder you. So now put all those absurd notions out of your head, and let us talk about the future. That matter is settled; you shall be twice as religious after you are married as you were before."

"But, Claude, it is not settled," I said; "you know I could not expect to be happy, or to enjoy God's presence, if I was disobeying His clear command."

"And pray what command do you mean?" said Claude; "really, May, this is too absurd!"

I opened the Bible and handed it to him; there was a mark against the verse in the Epistle to the Corinthians, and his face clouded over as he read the words.

"I wish that verse was cut out of every Bible in the world," he said angrily; "I wonder how many people's happiness has been ruined by it; and it is perfectly ridiculous! Why, May, you don't even understand the wording of the text, you can't even read it in Greek, and yet you are going to overthrow all my plans and schemes for the future, and spoil all my happiness in the world, just for the sake of that one obscure verse."

I could not help noticing how much Claude dwelt on his own plans, and schemes, and happiness in the world, and how he looked at the matter quite from his own point of view, and not at all from my side of the question.

"No, Claude," I said calmly, "I cannot read it in Greek, but I understand quite enough of it to make me quite sure that if I were to consent to marry you I should be grieving my best Friend by disobeying His clear command."

"Why, May, that just shows you know nothing at all about it," he said. "That verse has no more to do with you than it has with that table; it was spoken to the Corinthians, who, before Paul preached to them, were an ignorant lot of heathens, and all it means is, that Christians are not to go and marry heathens. I'm not a heathen, bad as you seem to think me."

"But," I answered, "it says unbelievers, and surely that means those who are not believers. Claude, are you a real believer in the Lord Jesus Christ? Can you honestly say that you are? Would you like to be called a believer by the world?"

Claude could not answer this question, so he quickly turned the conversation into quite a different channel.

"And so you set up yourself as too good for me, May, that's what it is! You think yourself far too saintly to be joined to a poor heathen like me!"

"No, Claude, indeed it is not that," I said; "Indeed it is not. I am not good at all; very, very far from it; but I do trust that I have come to the Lord Jesus, and that I believe in Him. Yes, though I am very imperfect and sinful, oh, Claude, I do hope that I am a believer," I said, with tears in my eyes.

"Yes, darling," said Claude, in quite a different tone, "I know you are everything good; I sometimes wish I were more like you. Won't you help me to become better, May? Won't you save me from myself, and teach me to love what you love? Come, May, it is my last chance; surely you will not refuse me?"

And Claude took hold of my hand, and looked up pleadingly into my face.

It was a dreadful temptation, and a fierce struggle was going on in my mind. While Claude had been angry and impatient it had been comparatively easy to be firm, but now, now that his voice was so pleading and so tender, now that his hand was laid so lovingly upon mine, now that his eyes were actually full of tears, I felt my resolution giving way, my faith failing.

(To be continued.)

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

5. Lesson for September 26th. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

UR lessons for the past quarter have treated he origin and of the early history of man.
mon says of his God, "He hath made every-; beautiful in His time" (Eccles. 3 : 11);
we look around us upon squalor, misery, deformity, degradation, sickness, and
, and how much of the beauty has been ed!

, if men would but think what was the ose of God in their creation, if they would nce their small and senseless independence od, and come into His plan concerning
. how much more noble, how much more y, would the lives of many be! "The hath made all things for Himself," so the object of our creation is frustrated if we r ourselves. The time we spend in making nent is lost if after all we cannot wear it.

en sin entered into the world, it set the of man's being in contrary currents to the and will, and thoughts of his God. It is mply that man is guilty of such and such he stands in a different position, sees with eyes, has other feelings than those which lanted in sinless Adam and sinless Eve.
g as God was the Centre of all things to they were out of reach of all evil. Sin be produced, except lust hath conceived
: 15); and if the lust or desire is ever tood, sin can have no foothold, and tempmust fail. Sickness and death could only where the flesh, whose every fibre was l to serve the purposes of God, began to he self-will, which was incapable of right-rning it. "By one man sin entered into orld, and death by sin" (Rom. 5 : 12).
was no other entrance-door for death: it by sin."

the Fall came the promise of a Saviour, order to have our part in the work of that , we must first have taken our part in the
. As long as we have any reliance on what or what we do, or what we hope from es, so long shall we regard the work of rd as a make-weight to help our own and we shall gauge our own feelings and erience of our own souls for the certainty redemption, instead of looking quite the finished work of Jesus, expecting to epted in the Beloved" (Eph. 1 : 6).

like the tender love of our Heavenly that the first death which He records in rd is that of a saved soul, who "ob-witness that he was righteous" because th he offered unto God" (Heb. 11 : 4).
ing His children, God begins at the be-and no other lesson must be taught sacrifice is understood. God can have to do with any soul, except in the way ment, until the question of sin is settled.
's work and all His providences are to bring unsaved souls face to face with claims upon them, and their utter ino meet them; and the blessed Spirit kes use of these means is always at hand to every one who takes heed "the Lamb which taketh away the sin of the world."
nd of religion except the grace of God
: Jesus finds its type in Cain's offering.
much the foreshadowing of earnest outotion as of rationalism: it is man's way
g to God independently of a Mediator:
's thought and man's work: reason or in the place of faith.

ext lesson was from God's Covenant
h. Cain's posterity increased, not only ers but in influence, until the whole s overspread with violence, and God t one man on earth who walked with here had been one other, Enoch, among ndants of Seth, of whom the same tess borne. "Enoch walked with God: was not, for God took him" (Gen.
).

ame of Enoch means "consecrated, l," as Abel's name signifies "breath," beautifully teaching us that the breath or the life of the soul is in the atoning and cleansing blood of Christ, through which we obtain witness that we are righteous; while walking with God is the life of consecration or dedication unto which we are blood-bought. "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and was not found, because God had translated him; for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God" (Heb. 11 : 5). True consecration is to please God in every moment, in every action.

"Mercy rejoiceth against judgment" (Jas. 2 : 13), and God's covenant with Noah was one of mercy. He bound Himself by His own word to destroy the earth no more by water. In every covenant which God has made with man, He has bound Himself; and in those instances in which man's part is more prominent, as, for instance, in circumcision, still God's covenant is a gift. "He gave him the covenant of circumcision" (Acts 7 : 8). When the kings of Judah made a covenant with God, the responsibility seemed to be chiefly on their side (2 Chron. 15 : 12; 34 : 31). God's covenant with Noah is shown in 1 Peter 3 : 21 to be a figure of baptism. It is not baptism but the blood of Christ which puts away "the filth of the flesh;" but the burial with Christ in baptism—so long as we remain buried out of our own sight, out of the sight of others, and out of God's sight, because we are only to be seen in Jesus—gives us "the answer of a good conscience toward God by the resurrection of Jesus Christ."

We next came in the course of our Lessons to the Life of Abraham. It may occur to us whether other men were called of God as was Abraham, and whether they did not respond to the call. In Gen. 6 : 3 the Lord said, "My Spirit shall not always strive with man." This leads us to infer that the Spirit of God did strive with every man. In Rom. 1 : 18–21 we see how God holds men in general to be without excuse when they know not God. "Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them. For" (Alford's translation) "from the creation of the world His invisible things, even His eternal power and divinity, are plainly seen, being perceived by the things that are made; so that they are without excuse: because though they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither gave thanks." This passage teaches us that God holds every man as individually responsible to acknowledge, at the least, the God of creation by thanksgiving made to Him, even where they have had no other revelation of Him.

It is probable that Abraham was one of those with whom the Spirit strove on this ground, and that he bowed before the great Creator, and sought to know more of Him; and "then the God of Glory appeared unto our father Abraham when he was in Mesopotamia" (Acts 7 : 2). There is no doubt that God deals with all men according to the light they have received—"according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not" (2 Cor. 8 : 12). We have seen how one link after another was broken which bound Abraham to the past. No sooner did he know God as a Person, and as having a right to dispose of him, than he was called to act upon his knowledge, and to do so at a cost. He must leave his country, for now, as a believer in God, he was bound to place himself at God's disposal, to live where He willed, and not where he willed himself. He was to leave his father's house, because he had found a better Father; and he was to leave his kindred, because God was about to make him the head of a kindred whose relationship to one another is their relationship by faith to the living God.

Abraham's life was called to be in everything a life of faith: he must "look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal" (2 Cor. 4 : 18). God promised to give him a country, "and He gave him none inheritance in it—no, not so much as to set his foot on: yet He promised that He would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child" (Acts 7 : 5). "By faith he sojourned in the land of promise" (Heb. 11 : 9). He staked nothing on speculations as to how he should obtain possession of it, but everything on the immutability of God's Word. Thus we read in Heb. 11, "By faith . . . he went out;" "by faith he sojourned;" "by faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac" (verses 8, 9, 17). We might add: by faith he cast out the bondwoman, by faith he sent Eleazer to seek a wife for Isaac; for all the life of this man of God was a justifying by faith of the spoken Word of his God.

In his intercourse with Melchisedec and with the king of Sodom we learn how little hold things temporal had upon this man of God: he was ready to give tithes to the one—he would not so much as receive a thread or a shoe-latchet from the other. In the history of Hagar we learn how Abraham's faith had become a living power in his own family, and how the bondwoman and her son had themselves learned to hold intercourse with the living God. We see from Abraham's intercession how the real power to help others is in prayer, by holding firmly on in our pleading with God. Although He did not save the whole city of Sodom, yet He remembered Abraham, and saved Lot from destruction and from his worldliness too.

There is one passage in the life of this man of faith that we have not yet considered: it was the death of Sarah, who "died in Kirjath Arba; the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan: and Abraham came to mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her" (Gen. 22 : 2). But he was not yet in possession of so much ground as to bury Sarah in, and he said to the sons of Heth, "I am a stranger and a sojourner with you: give me a possession of a burying-place with you, that I may bury my dead out of my sight" (ver. 4). The children of Heth offered him permission to bury his dead in the choice of their sepulchres; but no, there must be no mingling between the children of this world and the men of faith, even in their death.

"Thou art a mighty prince among us," said the sons of Heth; but Abraham did not acknowledge the honor, for he was separated unto God; and just as he would receive none of the spoil from the king of Sodom, he would not receive as a gift from man that which God had insured to him by promise. So he bowed himself to the people of the land, and said, "If it be your mind that I should bury my dead out of my sight; hear me, and entreat for me to Ephron, the son of Zohar, that he may give me the cave of Machpelah, which he hath, which is in the end of his field; for as much money as it is worth he shall give it me for a possession of a burying-place amongst you" (verses 7–9). Ephron offered the land as a gift; but nothing would induce Abraham to lay himself under obligations to unbelievers: he could lay them under obligation to him, as in the case of the king of Sodom, but for himself he was "free from all men." Thus the transaction was carried out, and the burying of his dead in the land which God had promised him was an act of strong faith that the land should belong to his posterity.

Are we thus independent of man? Are we determined as God's children never to enrich ourselves at the expense of, or take advantage of the unconverted, that they may be able to perceive that we are setting our affections on things above and not on things on the earth? (Col. 3 : 2). Abraham had no believers around him with whom to compare himself: his only thought was, Is this or that consistent with the position of a man who lives to justify his God? In our Dispensation, in the teaching of the New Testament, we learn on every page what ought to be the life of faith and separation in a follower of the Lord Jesus. When shall we see men and women who live out in every detail the holy teachings which Christ has given us?

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The British Parliament was Prorogued on September 7th, and unless affairs occur of such serious importance that Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues require its assistance it will not reassemble until February next. The Queen's speech, delivered by the lord chancellor, was of the usual formal character.

The obstruction offered by the House of Lords continues to be a leading topic in the country, and it promises to cause a breach between the two sections of the Liberal party. The old Whig section, to which Lord Hartington and several prominent Liberals belong, is averse to radical changes in the constitution of the Upper House, but Mr. Chamberlain and the members of the Radical section protest strongly against the action of the Peers and demand a sweeping reform and curtailment of the legislative powers of the Hereditary Peers. Liberal orators during the recess will probably agitate for reform. Two things are deemed necessary—that a vote of a clear majority of all the members in the House of Commons may override the decision of the House of Lords, and that the number of Peers in the Cabinet shall be reduced.

Peace between Russia and China, so Seriously menaced for some time, appears to be assured. A dispatch from Berlin says: "Private advices from St. Petersburg announce that the differences between Russia and China have been finally arranged, and the new treaty will be signed at Pekin." The Marquis Tseng, the Chinese envoy engaged in the negotiations, is expected to leave St. Petersburg in about two weeks.

An Explosion in the Seaham Coal Mine, near Durham, England, on September 8th, will, it is believed, result in the death of 165 men. There were unhappily an unusually large number at work in the pit at the time of the explosion, as a flower show was to be held the next day, and many of the workmen had changed their time of work in order to attend it. Both shafts of the mine were blocked by the explosion, and though unremitting efforts have been made to release the imprisoned miners, only those in the upper seams have been rescued. Late reports say that a fire has broken out in the mine, which destroys all hope that the men can ever be rescued alive. Many of them were unmarried, but the catastrophe will make 76 women, widows and 284 children, orphans.

Miles of Flames are Reported as Having devastated the country in Lower Canada. Crops, houses, and forests have been consumed, and many lives have been lost. The fire commenced in the forests near Upton, in the Province of Quebec, and burned for some time u. checked. On September 7th the wind rose an carried the flames to the village, and before night a district six miles wide was burning. At least five hundred persons are rendered homeless and penniless, and a large number of others have lost their lives in the flames.

The Birth of a Spanish Princess, on September 11th, has allayed European anxieties as to the succession to the throne of Spain. It was feared that should there be no issue to the king's marriage the crown would descend to a woman who is unpopular in Spain, and thus the troubles which have agitated the country for so many years would be renewed. The birth of an heir to the Spanish throne is attended with antiquated ceremonies of state. No fewer than 200 high officials of the kingdom have been expecting momentarily for the last week a royal summons to the palace. Ministers, diplomats, judges, councillors, bishops, and every member of the royal family are required to present themselves when the child is born. One of the first acts of the king is to place the heir on a golden plate and exhibit it to the throng of invited guests in the antechambers of the queen's apartments.

Prince Napoleon has Openly Announced his candidature for the Presidency of the French Republic. He criticises, in an interview with the correspondent of an Italian journal, the Republican leaders and the constitution. He professes to be an ardent Republican, and to desire that the government be of a more pronounced Liberal type. His main contention at present is the revision of the constitution and the reform of the Senate. He is willing to await the expiration of the Presidential term of M. Grévy, and frankly announces himself a candidate for the succession, believing that when France shall have the opportunity to choose by universal suffrage between Grévy, Gambetta, and Napoleon, she will decide for himself. It will be remembered that the late Emperor Napoleon III., when he was a deputy, professed similar views, and when elected President swore to maintain the constitution.

Threatened Famine in India.—A Dispatch to the London Times from Calcutta says: "Several districts are threatened with famine, where the rainfall during June and July was from five to six inches below the average. The situation causes great anxiety, though it is too soon to give way to a panic, as a good rain during September would avert the possibility of an actual dearth."

The South American War.—It is reported by an English journal that a preliminary treaty of peace between Chili and Peru has been signed at Lima. Its principal articles are that Peru shall surrender the war-vessels Mancocapac and Atahualpa, raze the fortification of Callao, surrender all the artillery of Callao, engage not to augment the navy for twenty years, and reimburse to Chili the cost of the war. Chili engages to pay half of the exterior debt of Peru.

The Missionaries in Africa.—The English missionaries of the Congo Mission have visited Sanda, on the route between San Salvador and Stanley's Pool (their objective point), three times. The people of the towns which they have visited, though generally very suspicious, and ready to oppose their coming at first, generally desire to hear fully the Gospel message. In some instances they have asked the missionaries to remain and teach them. The roads are much better than those from the coast, and donkeys are much more useful. The missionaries are anxious to push on at once to Stanley Pool, but are convinced that it is wiser to proceed with caution.

The Destructive Cyclone which Passed over the Island of Jamaica on August 18th, is described in Jamaica journals received this week. The hurricane lasted nine hours. It unroofed houses, tore up large trees, blew cars from the track, destroyed every wharf in the city but one, and sank nearly all the shipping in the harbor. It was the most destructive storm ever nown there, and several lives are reported lost. The roaring of the wind was terrible, and the rain fell in torrents. The lunatic asylum was badly injured. A piece of iron roofing weighing nearly a ton was torn off it and carried a distance of 150 feet, and an iron railroad bridge over the river was twisted out of place a distance of sixteen inches, so that trains could not cross. The loss is estimated to be at least five million dollars, as the coffee, pimento, and banana crops are wholly destroyed. It is feared that unless prompt assistance is rendered by the British Government, a famine cannot be averted.

An Ambassador was Offended by an Actress at Copenhagen lately. The notorious Sarah Bernhardt was being fêted at the Danish Capital when the German minister made a complimentary reference to the French nation. Mdlle. Bernhardt retorted with a remark which implied that she hoped Alsace and Lorraine would yet be wrested from German hands. The minister, who had made himself somewhat ridiculous previously by his fulsome praise of the actress, was so incensed that he left the banquet in a rage.

An Ominous Speech was Recently made by M. Gambetta, who is probably the most powerful statesman in France, which shows that the peace of Europe is of a very precarious character. He said that the immense standing army now existing in France, which entails so heavy a burden on the taxpayers, is a necessity in order that "what remains of France may remain entirel ours; that we may count on the future, an know that in the things of this world there is justice imminent which comes at its own d and hour." This speech indicates that if ci cumstances occur which seem to promise a r versal of the results of Sedan, a desperate war b tween France and Germany would be cor menced.

The Palace of the Inquisition is to be Sold l auction. An auctioneer has issued a notice th on an early day he will sell the building in Rom Italy, in which heretics were in bygone da put to the torture. The halls of the tribun with the chains, dungeons, torture-cells, a associations of every sort, are in the market, a will be positively knocked down to the highe bidder. This Inquisition was built in 1614, a though the cruelties practised there were ve horrible, it never attained the bad notorie which was earned by the Spanish Inquisition. is one of the significant signs of the times th its owners find they have no further use for and desire to get rid of the place.

A Man was Executed on his Wedding-day Madrid on July 22d. He and the woman married had committed a murder, and at t trial the man was condemned to death and t woman to ten years' imprisonment. They pe tioned for permission to be married, and the request was granted. The ceremony conclude the bridegroom was led away to execution a the bride to the cells. It is difficult to co ceive of a ceremony usually so bright and hop ful being conducted under circumstances so d tressing as those which surrounded this weddi in the Madrid prison, and which were render necessary by the crime of the principal actors.

The Baroness Burdett Coutts's Marriage Mr. Ashmead Bartlett, the young American ge tleman, is delayed by the financial arrangeme and settlements inevitable in connection with income of $1,500,000 a year. It is stated th Mr. W. H. Smith, M.P., ex-First Lord of t Admiralty, will give away the bride at the w ding, which will probably not take place yet six weeks. It is doubtful whether Mrs. Mon her sister, will allow her to remain at the he of Coutts's Bank in London, after the marria The baroness is said to have first seriously co templated this marriage with Mr. Ashmea Bartlett during the yacht cruise that she ma to the Mediterranean last autumn in his co pany, and in that of Mr. Irving the tragedi Before this she had frequently stated her int tion to adopt him as her son.

Fighting Duels with Swords is still a B barous custom among German students. T thirds of the Bonn students are said to bear p manent marks of the sword on their faces, a many are most unpleasantly disfigured as a sult of these encounters. At Heidelberg, one the prettiest spots in the neighborhood of t town, is the well-known tavern "Zur Hirs gasse," on the banks of the Neckar, in the g dens of which the duels regularly take place one particular day of the week, several be fought on the same afternoon, one after other. This is the result of the ungodly Ritt ism and infidelity that is rife in Germany.

The Persian Famine Fund.—D. C. M. L Morristown, Tenn., $1; I. M., Brandy Station, $10.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Works are on s at the office of The Christian Herald, at prices low as to bring them within the reach of every o Twelve Sermons on various subjects, with photogr of Mr. Spurgeon, price 35 cents. John Ploughma Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, 60 ce The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, a volume of f sermons, $2.50. The Treasury of David, a homil cal exposition of the book of Psalms, five vols., as as Psa. 118, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth-Day B. This popular gift-book contains a suitable pass selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for every in the year, with a blank space opposite for a graphs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. Spurg appear at their respective birthdays. The book elegantly bound, and the price is 75 cents. Ren tances should accompany orders.

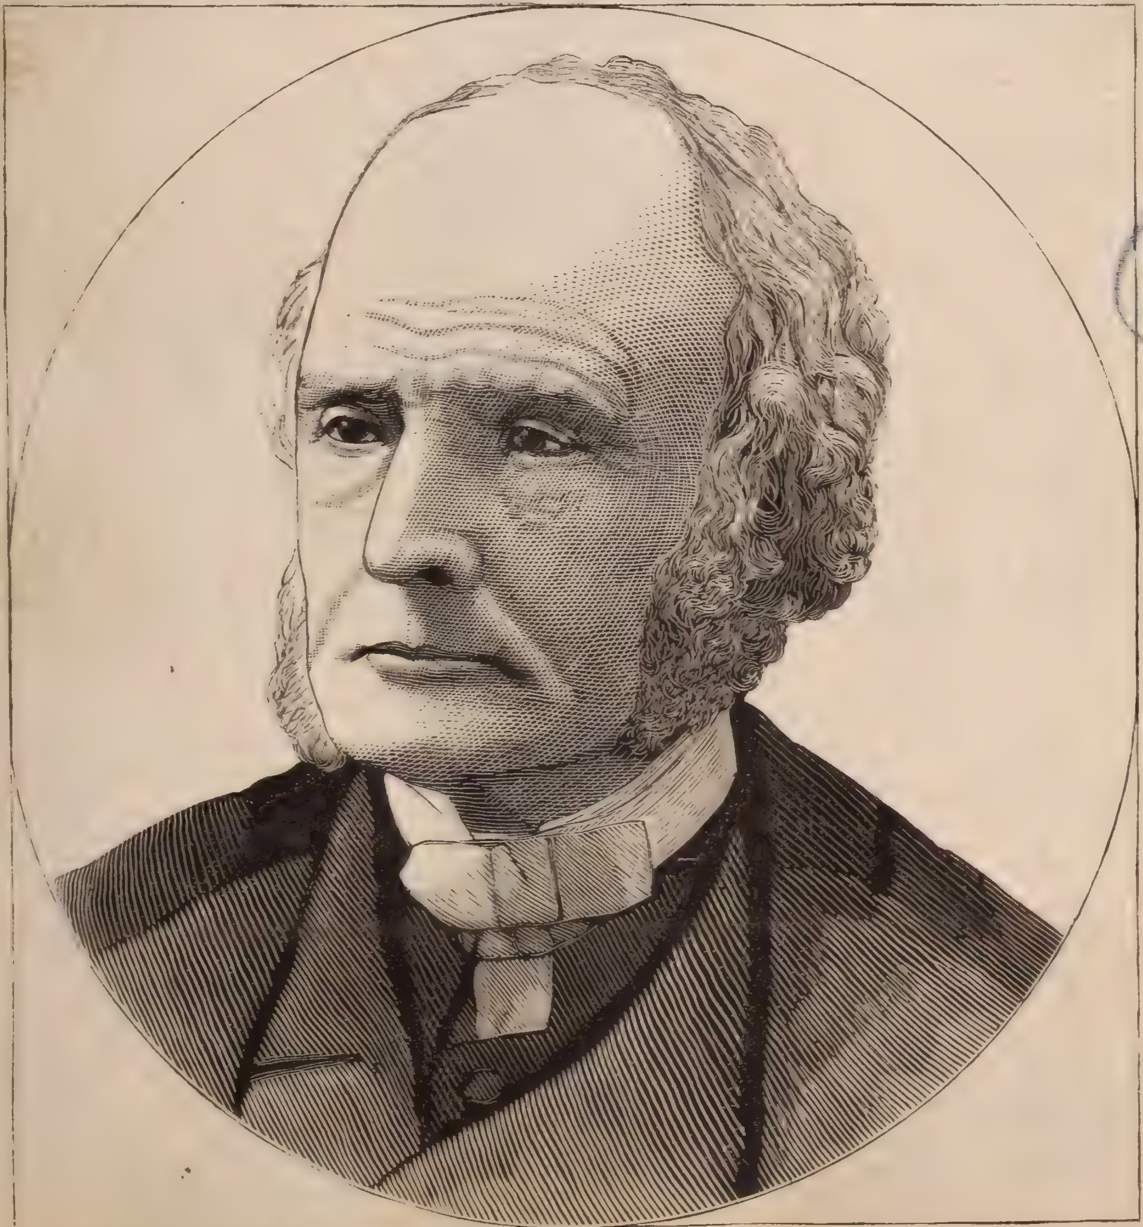
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, Rev. W. M. HAY AITKEN, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1880. 14th Year. No. 39—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAIT OF DR. McCOSH, the President of Princeton College, with a Sketch of his Life.
MUST THE CHINESE GO? A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
ROCHESTER TOWER. A New Serial Story by Miss M. A. Paull (Continued).
A Dream and its Sequel, by Rev. W. Haslam.
NOT HALF A MAN. A Temperance Story.
THE THREE FROG SPIRITS.—I. Spiritualism. By Rev. M. Baxter.—A Swearer's Prayer Answered.
CURRENT EVENTS: Two Important Campaign Speeches—The Indications of the Maine Election—The Passion Play in New York—The Meetings at Northfield—The Salvation Army's Sortie—The Triennial Episcopal Convention—A Belgian Nobleman in an American Prison, etc.
PROPHETIC PERIODS TERMINATING IN 1890.
THE GLORIES OF FORGIVING GRACE. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
Mr. G. Muller's Escape from being Shot.
A CHOICE VINDICATED. (Continued.)
Isaac's Prosperity. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The Lost Ships—Labor Troubles in England—The Condition of Asia Minor—The Sultan Denounced by a Priest—Cruelty in a Convent—An English Vicar's Hat, etc.



Cut

The REV. JAMES McCOSH, D.D., LL.D., etc., President of Princeton College.

REV. JAMES McCOSH, D.D., LL.D., etc.,

President of Princeton College.

Dr. McCosh at Home—Mental Characteristics—Birth and Early Years—Work at Arbroath and Brechin—The Disruption—Literary Works—Appointed to Queen's College, Belfast—Visit to America—Elected President of Princeton—Successful Administration—The Idea of a Pan-Presbyterian Council—Dr. McCosh Sketches the Plan—Three Visits to Europe to Promote it—First Assembly at Edinburgh—Personal Details.

A RAILROAD ride of a few miles from Princeton Junction, on the Pennsylvania Road, takes the visitor through a delightful scene of rural beauty, into the centre of a cluster of imposing stone buildings grouped on the elevated ground on each side of the little depot. This is the famous Princeton College, and in the beautiful house on the brow of the hill, surrounded by noble trees, well-kept lawns, and rare flowers, lives the president of the college, the renowned Scottish metaphysician, the Rev. James McCosh, D.D., LL.D., etc. The house is of the Italian order of architecture, and is the finest presidential residence of any college in the United States. From its windows the eye ranges over a scene which for exquisite loveliness in field and foliage is not surpassed in any country in the world; and far away on the distant horizon is the delicate blue line which indicates the open sea.

In a spacious library where the tables bear evidences of the extent and variety of the literary labor performed there, we are introduced to Dr. McCosh. In person tall, with a stoop of the shoulders as if the attitude of profound study and meditation had become habitual to him, with an intellectual countenance, silvery hair, and a grave, dignified bearing, in keeping with his character, he receives all comers, whether students or visitors, in a kindly, genial manner, in which is mingled the courtesy and dignity of the Christian gentleman.

THE PRESIDENCY OF PRINCETON.

Regular lectures to the students of the college, frequent sermons, contributions to the Princeton Review and other periodicals, and the multitudinous and varied questions which must be decided every day by the president of a college in which there are nearly five hundred students, form but a portion of the work Dr. McCosh finds time to perform, for he has nearly always in preparation for the press some weighty volume full of sound reasoning and requiring profound thought. We ask the doctor how he contrives to get through a mass of labor which would appall the majority of men. His reply is worthy the consideration of all who suffer from the effects of arrears of work, a very common form of ill which often produces nervousness, petulance, and, in its aggravated form, insanity. He said: "I give my mind wholly to one thing at a time, and I have the power of passing from one occupation to another immediately and without any interval of wasted time." Dr. McCosh added, for the encouragement of his listener, who obviously regarded such a power with feelings akin to envy, "That power is not natural; I acquired it." How valuable such an acquisition is, it is unnecessary to point out.

The reign of Dr. McCosh at Princeton has been singularly successful in all ways. Mainly by his exertions, the claims of the college have been brought under the notice of wealthy and generous men, who have contributed to the funds during his residence there, two million and a half of dollars. Some of this has been expended in the endowment of professors' chairs, and some of it in new buildings and in the renovation of those already existing. Among the edifices newly erected are, the School of Science and the Library—the latter a handsome octagonal stone building, with a roof of stained glass, and plentifully furnished with books. One new building near the entrance to the college grounds attracts general attention, and it has a special interest from the circumstances of its erection. In 1873 a young man of great promise was drowned at sea, and when his will was opened, it was found that he had bequeathed twenty thousand dollars to erect a structure in connection with Princeton College, to be used as a House of Prayer. This building is the realization of that bequest.

Walking through the extensive grounds of the college, many of the students are met, singly and in groups. Dr. McCosh, with that ready memory which has distinguished leaders of men of all professions, greets each by his name, and speaks a few cordial words, which show that his knowledge of the young man is not confined to his face and name. It is clear that Dr. McCosh's influence extends throughout the college, and as it was at Rugby in the time of Dr. Arnold so at Princeton, no young man feels himself too humble or too insignificant to be beyond the pale of the president's interest. It is very gratifying to find that this influence has been the means of spiritual good, for Dr. McCosh has labored earnestly, in conjunction with the other professors, to maintain and to raise the religious character of the college. Thus as it was in the days of his distinguished predecessor Jonathan Edwards, the present president of Princeton, while not neglecting the secular branches of education, is sincerely anxious that every student should have experimental knowledge of the way of life.

EARLY YEARS.

Dr. McCosh is a naturalized citizen of the United States, and had already acquired a wide reputation as a successful professor before coming to reside in this country. He was born in Aryshire, Scotland, in 1811. His father was an extensive farmer, who resolved that his son should have the benefit of a thorough education. After gaining the rudiments in the parochial school, he proceeded to the University of Glasgow at the age of thirteen, where he studied for five years, and won much distinction in the various classes. Thence he removed to the University of Edinburgh, where he studied under Dr. Chalmers, to whom so many of the ablest men of the day were indebted for the development of their powers of thought and expression.

In 1835 James McCosh was

LICENSED TO PREACH,

and was elected as their pastor by the members of the Presbyterian Church at Arbroath, in Forfarshire, Scotland. In 1838, after three years' successful labor at Arbroath, he was appointed minister of the church at Brechin, in the same county, where with his colleague he had a roll of communicants numbering 1400. At Brechin, the peculiar gift Dr. McCosh possesses of training the minds of young men and women of fifteen years of age and upward became manifest. His Bible classes became famous in the locality, and he had a regular attendance at them of over 150 persons.

During his pastorate at Brechin occurred the great disruption of the Church of Scotland. Dr. McCosh considered "the interference of the Government with the independence of the Church and the liberties of the people" as detrimental to true Christian progress, and he enthusiastically espoused the doctrines and principles of the Free Church. When the ministers and congregations resolved to leave their religious homes rather than submit to what they believed to be an unscriptural and improper supremacy, Dr. McCosh was one of the most prominent leaders in the movement. He not only labored incessantly as a Free Church minister, but went to different parts of the country to assist in forming and organizing new churches. During this period he often rode a distance of thirty miles in a day, and preached three times. He also undertook, in conjunction with a few other ministers, a tour in England, to explain the origin and principles of the Free Church, and to collect money for the building of the new churches required by the "outed" congregations.

At the close of the gigantic effort that followed the disruption, Dr. McCosh resumed the philosophical studies it had interrupted, and in 1850 he published his work on "The Method of the Divine Government, Physical and Moral." The sterling qualities of this book were quickly recognized on both sides of the Atlantic, and the reputation of Dr. McCosh became worldwide.

In it he dealt with the objections to revealed religion which had been urged by German and French as well as British sceptics, and showed that even on their own ground of philosophy the religion of the Bible was based on sound philosophical principles. The publication of this work brought Dr. McCosh into prominence before the public, and the University of Glasgow conferred upon him the degree of LL.D., which was the precursor of many similar distinctions he has since received.

In 1851 Dr. McCosh was appointed by the British Government, Professor of Logic and Metaphysics at Queen's College, Belfast, Ireland, and for sixteen years he conducted a most successful work in that institution. He labored, not only as a professor in the college, but took an active and deep interest in the cause of national education, in the prominent religious questions of the day, and in the management of the affairs of the Irish Presbyterian Church. During this period he published, in conjunction with Dr. Dickie, his work on "Typical Forms and Special Ends in Creation," a book scarcely less popular than the one on the Method of the Divine Government. His special endeavor in this work was to show the unity of plan and method traceable in the vegetable world.

The work which more than any other established the reputation of Dr. McCosh as a metaphysician was published in 1860, and was entitled "The Intuitions of the Mind Inductively Investigated." In this work he vigorously attacked not only the scepticism of Hume and his followers, but the more dangerous doctrines of Mill and the utilitarian school of writers. Powerful replies were made to this work, but in his rejoinders, issued from time to time, Dr. McCosl successfully combatted the false doctrines pu forth by the enemies of the truth as it is ir Jesus.

In 1866 Dr. McCosh visited

AMERICA,

and made an extensive tour through the country, and two years afterward he received th announcement that he had been elected President of the College of New Jersey, Princeton The reputation he had achieved at Belfast, wher he had given much attention to the subject c academic instruction, and had done efficient service in the cause of university reform, no doub influenced the minds of his admirers in this country, and the result has demonstrated the wisdo of their choice.

Not only has the administration of D McCosh at Princeton been a financial succes but the number of students has doubled, th number of professors largely increased, and th course of study vastly enlarged so as to en brace all branches of knowledge. So succes ful has been the actual work directly upon th students, that no less than six young men who studies he has directed are now occupying di tinguished positions as professors in various co leges. One of these, Mr. Archibald Alexand is now Professor of Mental Philosophy in C lumbia College, New York; a second was r cently appointed Professor at the University Minnesota, and a third succeeded Dr. McCosh Belfast.

Dr. McCosh's pulpit efforts have, like his le tures, met with genuine approval in this count and in Europe, nor have they been limited the denomination with which he is most clos connected. To an audience principally Unit ian, in Boston, Mass., he delivered a series of l tures on the Evidences of Christianity; preached an evangelical sermon at Harv University, and in 1867 he accepted invitati to preach the special anniversary sermons Great Britain to the ministers of the Congre

"Wicked!" he ejaculated. "I should call it good, dear, kind. But, no," he added, reluctantly, "you have not, you have avoided me."

"And if you could know all you would avoid me," she said bitterly.

"Salome, never!"

"Cecil Anerley," she said, rousing herself at last, "I am very unhappy. I am afraid to take any one into my confidence. Is it possible that I ought to trust you—you who have just given me the highest proof a man can of his trust and admiration and faith?"

Cecil turned and looked at her anxiously. He half dreaded and yet longed for her confidence. The chivalry toward women that had been conspicuous in the pure character of his father Cecil had inherited, and Salome Stanley felt instinctively that he was worthy. But a thousand conflicting emotions made her pause. She must crush his hopes, she must give him pain, she must inflict a wound which to Cecil at this moment would perhaps appear incurable, though she might not believe it to be so herself, and all for her own selfish ends. She could not accept his love, poor, poor, Cecil! ought she to try to retain his friendship? Would it be womanly in her to remain in the same house with the Anerleys? Yet, oh, how she dreaded a change!

(To be continued.)

THE THREE FROG SPIRITS.—I. SPIRITUALISM.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

Marked Going Forth of the Three Frog Spirits under Sixth Vial in 1848—The First Spirit of Antichristian Infidelity in the Form of Spiritualism—Mediums are Possessed by Demon Spirits—Demons not Fallen Angels but, Deceased Wicked Human Souls—Teachings of Spiritualism—It is Predicted in Rev. 16 : 13, 1 Tim. 4 : 1-3, to Arise Just Before Christ's Second Advent.

THREE unclean, frog-like, miracle-working, demon spirits of antichristian infidelity, revoutionary democracy, and Popish and Mahometan crusading fanaticism, are predicted under the year-day sixth vial, in Revelation 16 : 12-14, o be the disturbing, intriguing agencies which shall go forth unto the kings of the earth and of THE WHOLE WORLD, to gather them to THE WAR OF THE GREAT DAY OF GOD ALMIGHTY, at the same period as the "drying up of the mystic Euphrates," or dissolution of the Turkish Empire, shall be progressing toward its inal accomplishment. This period of the year-ay sixth vial and drying up of the Euphrates is enerally held to have commenced about the year 820, and will continue until the dissolution of he Turco-Mahometan Empire, at some point of me between 1882 and 1890, because the preicted 1260 years of the duration of the Mahomtan Antichrist commenced between A.D. 622 and 630, and therefore end between 1882 and 890.*

The going forth of these three frog-like spirits announced in the middle of the sixth vial, and is remarkable that in 1848, nearly midway beween 1820 and 1882, these frog spirits went rth in a very marked manner in the form of iritualism and democratic revolution and suitical political intrigue.

The three respective sources from which the ree spirits go forth are stated to be: 1. The ragon, which is explained in Revelation 12 : 9 be Satan; 2. The Wild Beast with seven ads and ten horns, which represents the political Roman Empire under the seventh Napoleonic adship, "wounded to death" at Waterloo, but ginning to be healed in 1848 by Louis Napoleon's election over France as Republican President (Revelation 13 : 3); 3. The False Prophet or wild beast with two horns, representing the ecclesiastical Roman Empire, which consists of the twin religious horns or antichristian systems of Popery in the Western Roman Empire, and Mahometanism in the Eastern Roman Empire. A comparison of Revelation 13 : 11-17 with 19 : 20 shows the false prophet to be the name of the two-horned wild beast.

Their going forth indicates an extraordinary fresh diffusion of their evil principles.

THE FIRST SPIRIT

of Antichristian Infidelity going forth from Satan appeared in a new and startling manifestation in 1847-8 in North America, in the form of so-called modern SPIRITUALISM, which is nothing else than revived sorcery, necromancy, and demonology. It arose in the neighborhood of Rochester, New York, and subsequently has spread, more or less, through all the United States, and, in a less degree, in Great Britain and various parts of Europe. Its mediums are possessed by demons in much the same way, although not generally in so violent a form, as the demoniacs mentioned in the Gospels, out of whom our Lord ejected the unclean spirits. They are expressly spoken of as being like frogs, which are much more active in the darkness of midnight than in the daytime, and so mediums generally prefer dark circles and an exclusion of light before they can obtain manifestations from the spirits. The unclean nature of these spirits is sufficiently shown by the project of the abolition of marriage and the substitution of promiscuous free love, which is entertained by many spiritualists; and, in fact, the most advanced of them openly avow their desire to see the Christian religion wholly destroyed, and supplanted by Pantheism and Socialism.

The three spirits are also declared to be the miracle-working spirits of devils, or in the original Greek, of demons, which, in its most usual Greek signification, denotes the spirits of deceased wicked persons, and not the spirits of Satan's fallen angels, who are a totally different class of evil spirits. These demons are, in fact, the disembodied spirits of thousands of deceased infidels, such as Paine, Voltaire, and Hume, and deceased democratic revolutionists, such as Danton, Robespierre, Mirabeau, and the first Bonaparte, and deceased Jesuits, such as Ignatius Loyola, the Inquisitors, and Machiavel, etc., who are allowed to go to and fro among mankind at this period, and invisibly to incite and energize them to such infidelity, revolution, and superstition as shall plunge them all into the war of the great day of God Almighty, so as to bring them eventually under the leadership of the final Napoleonic Antichrist, who will be the modern incarnation of those spirits.

In regard to the true grammatical meaning of the word demons, incorrectly translated devils, in this passage in Revelation 16 : 16, "They are the spirits of devils, working wonders," the learned Dr. Seiss, of Philadelphia, United States, justly says, in his "Last Times:"

"Though demons are referred to about eighty times in the New Testament, and are even said to be of different kinds, they are never mentioned in a way to show that they are the fallen angels. They are never assigned a celestial origin. They are never referred to except in connection with our world. Satan is never called a demon."*

"It is to be regretted that in our English Bible the translators have always used the word devils instead of demons. John refers to numerous authors who have maintained, by a multitude of quotations from Greek, Roman, and Jewish writers, that the demons are the spirits of dead men, particularly of such as maintained bad characters while living. They live in our atmosphere, wander about our world, awaiting the final judgment, and constitute, perhaps, the most efficient agents for the accomplishment of Satan's infamous designs against the peace and good of our race."

Although Spiritualism only arose in 1847-8, it has spread with almost more rapidity than any other false religion ever did. There are said to be in the United States some twenty newspapers and periodicals principally devoted to it, besides numerous other literary treatises. Many persons of eminence and high talent in various professions are its advocates, and it claims altogether one million believers, but, at a moderate computation, it has perhaps influenced and infected a quarter or half a million persons sufficiently to make them practical unbelievers in orthodox Christian doctrines.

Spiritualism is often introduced by the apparently harmless proceeding of table-turning and table-tipping. Then some one in the circle often becomes developed as a medium, that is, a person under the mesmeric control of evil spirits, who from time to time enter into and take possession of the medium's body and faculties of articulation, so that at such periods the medium utters not his own thoughts or words, but those of the evil spirits possessing and controlling him.

The demon spirits speaking through the mediums profess to be departed spirits, whose bereaved relatives on earth they then make communications to. They often profess to be the deceased spirits of eminent philosophers, poets, statesmen, and theologians, and deliver lengthy communications in keeping with the character they assume. These utterances are sometimes couched in an elevated tone of piety, at other times in an infidel, antichristian tone; but they are believed in by numbers of infatuated spiritualists as a new gospel superseding the old Bible.

Spiritualism is a manifest fulfilment of the prophecy in 1 Timothy 4 : 1, 3: "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils (in Greek, teachings of demons); forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats," etc. It is markworthy that already many spiritualists advocate the abolition of marriage and the substitution of free love, of unhallowed libertinism, and some of them recommend a vegetarian diet, or even fasting, as conducive to bring the mediums more under the influence of the spirits. Spiritualism is nothing else than a revival of ancient sorcery, witchcraft, necromancy, clairvoyance, and possession by familiar spirits. It is, therefore, not surprising that extraordinary supernatural prodigies are often wrought by the mediums, just as by the Egyptian magicians and the Witch of Endor in olden time.

It is also a fulfilment of the predicted falling away or apostasy from Christian faith just before the Second Advent of Christ, as stated in 2 Thess. 2. "The day of Christ shall not come, except there come the falling away first (in Greek apostasy), and the man of sin shall be revealed who shall sit in the temple of God," etc.

During the last few years other forms of antichristian infidelity, such as Rationalism, Positivism, Neology, and Colensoism, have defiantly held erect their serpent crests and hissed forth their profanities. Avowed scepticism, euphoniously styling itself Secularism or Freethought, has its halls, lecturers, such as C. Bradlaugh, and professors in London, and every large British town, and is estimated to circulate annually in Britain twenty-eight million copies of publications among the class of artisans and mechanics.

(To be continued.)

An Episcopal Warning to Englishmen.—The Bishop of Manchester has been commenting on the condition of English society. There are great chasms in it, and disorganization everywhere. He said people are living too easy, luxurious, and selfish lives, and many of them lived as if they had never read Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," and it would be well to prepare for a dark day in England.

---

* The Mahometans date their calendar from A.D. 2, the hegira or flight of Mahomet. It was not til A.D. 630, however, that they captured Mecca in abia, which is the Mahometan metropolis for pilgrims, the same as Rome is the Roman Catholic metpolis. The Rev. W. Girdlestone, in his "Exposition of the Prophecies," published in 1820, maintained the 1260 years of the Mahometan Antichrist to commence in A.D. 630, when Mahomet captured Mecca, and therefore to end in 1890.

* Dr. Seiss's "Last Times" is a very attractive and popularly written work on the prophecies, as is also his Parable of the Virgins and Wonderful Confederation, here quoted. He holds much the same views regarding the Jews, the Tribulations of the latter-day Napoleonic Antichrist, etc., as are here set forth.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

SINGLE COPIES

can most conveniently be obtained through newsdealers. Any complaint that the CHRISTIAN HERALD cannot be obtained from a particular newsdealer is promptly attended to if we are given the name and street address of the dealer who does not keep it for sale.

NOTICE.

To give our readers an opportunity of introducing the Christian Herald to their friends, we will send the paper post free to any address from 1st October, to 31st December, 1880, on receipt of 25 cents.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Precise Result of the Maine Election has not yet been officially announced, and the victory is claimed by both Republicans and Fusionists. It is evident, however, that in either case the majority must be very small, and it indicates that the Republicans in that State have been losing ground for some years.

The election was watched with considerable interest, not so much on account of its direct issues, but as affording an augury of what may be expected in that State in November. From that point of view the result is a disappointment to Republicans, who hoped that a decisive majority in Maine would have an influence on the elections in Indiana and Ohio. Maine, therefore, even if Mr. Davis is elected, is useless for that purpose. It must, however, be conceded by Democrats that the contest in November will not be fought under circumstances so favorable to them as the one just concluded. It would appear that the Republicans in Maine are about equal in number to the aggregate vote of Democrats and Greenbackers. In the State elections they have fought under one banner, but in November, if Gen. Weaver persists in his resolution of not amalgamating with Democrats, it is obvious that the Republicans will gain an easy victory. The first announcement of the heavy Greenback vote was followed by a serious decline of national securities on the Wall Street market.

Two Important Campaign Speeches, Conspicuous above others on account of the character of the speakers, have been made during the past week. The issues have been presented from the point of view of the Democrats by ex-Governor Horatio Seymour, and of the Republicans by Senator Conkling.

Mr. Seymour's speech was delivered at Utica, N. Y., on September 15th, and was designed to rebut the assertion made early in the campaign by Mr. Schurz, that the conflicting interests of the community now appeal so strongly to the Government as to require a higher order of statesmanship in the administration than sufficed in the earlier days of the Republic. Mr. Seymour contended that the danger implied in the assertion does not exist; that the several States are competent to deal with the conflicting interests alluded to; and that any such danger demanding exceptional ability in the Government is liable to be developed by the centralizing policy which he charged the Republican party with fostering.

Mr. Seymour objected strongly to the use of the word "nation" in connection with the Federal Government, but, as his observations proved, he does not so much dislike the word as the idea of solidarity it conveys to a citizen. The United States unquestionably form one nation in the great family of nations, but Mr. Seymour is jealous, in common with many thoughtful citizens, of the rights of the separate States, on which he considers there is a danger of the Central Government encroaching. This danger undoubtedly exists, and one powerful means of developing it lies, as we have frequently pointed out, in the immense amount of patronage wielded by the Federal Government in the appointment of one hundred and six thousand civil servants, who are appointed and discharged, to a great extent, on political grounds. Until this system is altered, the centralizing tendency will grow, no matter which party is in power.

Senator Conkling's Speech in New York, on September 17th, was the occasion of one of the largest gatherings of the Republican party in the city that has been seen for a long time. As might have been expected, Mr. Conkling adopted the attitude of a strong partisan, and placed in their strongest light the grounds on which the Republican party leaders base their claims for a continuance of power. The sectional issue occupied a prominent place in his argument, and he dwelt with considerable energy on the commercial superiority of the Northern States, and their large contribution to the national wealth as compared with their share of political power. On personal questions Mr. Conkling contended that the issue was rather between parties than between men, but he paid a distinct and explicit tribute of praise to the Republican Presidential candidate, despite his own well-known preference for General Grant.

One of the most effective parts of his address, and one which was received with tumultuous applause, was that in which he denounced the murder of the Chisholms and the failure of Mrs. Chisholm's effort to punish the perpetrators. On this subject there was evidently a very strong feeling in the audience.

A letter was read at the commencement of the proceedings from Gen. Grant, regretting his inability to attend, and announcing his intention to cast his vote on November 2d for the Republican candidates.

The Woman's National Christian Temperance Union will hold its seventh annual meeting in Clarendon Street Church (Dr. A. J. Gordon's), Boston, Mass., commencing Wednesday, October 27th. One delegate from each congressional district throughout the Union is expected to attend, in addition to the State and central officers who are ex-officio delegates. The call, which is signed by Miss Frances E. Willard, the President of the Union, whose life and portrait appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Aug. 5 asks that the "local auxiliaries observe Saturday, October 23d, as a day for special prayer for God's blessing and guidance upon this national convention, which will be called upon to consider a new plan of representation and other subjects of vital interest to our great and growing work for God, and home, and native land."

The Passion Play is to be Produced on the stage of Booth's Theatre, New York, at an early date. The manager stated to a reporter that he intended to bring it out in his grandest style, and to employ 250 performers in the representation. The play is to be similar to the one acted in San Francisco some months ago, which was stopped by the authorities, who feared a breach of the peace would result from its continuance. It differs from the Ober-Ammergau play, in that the crucifixion scene is omitted. It is arranged in three preliminary tableaux, without dialogue, followed by five acts of one scene each. The first represents the death of St. John the Baptist, introducing the offering to King Herod of the head upon a charger. The Last Supper, the Garden of Gethsemane, and the arraignment before Pontius Pilate, are leading scenes. The final one is the Ascension.

It is difficult to characterize this theatrical enterprise as it deserves. Play-writers have raked the gutters for subjects such as Zola's "Drink." They have gone to the divorce courts and haunts of vice for their plots; and they have found such subjects attract large audiences; they should have been satisfied, and have had the grace to leave the Gospel alone. Anything more horrible can scarcely be imagined than that men whose souls are in peril should hear of the plan of salvation God has revealed, and instead of accepting it, turn it into a dramatic representation as a money speculation. It is an indecent outrage which the law should prevent.

Ex-Governor Paul O. Herbert, of Louisiana, who died in New Orleans on August 29th, ult., was born in Herville Parish, December 12th, 1818, and in 1840 was graduated at West Point, served for two years subsequently as instructor of engineering, and then resigned from the army, becoming a planter and afterward State Engineer of Louisiana. He was Colonel of the 12th United States Infantry in the Mexican War, and distinguished himself at Molino del Rey and Chapultepec. In 1852 he was elected Governor of Louisiana, under the new constitution, and served four years.

The Meetings at Northfield Called by Mr. Moody terminated on Friday, September 10th, amid a scene never to be forgotten. Devout thankfulness to God for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit moved every heart, and all felt strengthened for future service. Mr. Moody's farewell words were: "My experience for the past ten days is this. I have got a great lifting up, and am myself very small. A dying child said to her papa, "Lift me up higher, higher, higher;' and as he lifted her, the soul took its flight. So I am saying, 'Higher, higher, higher, Lord.' When you go home, get a few to unite with you to work, and expect great things from God; and we shall hear glorious reports from all parts of the world. I expect a better year this year than ever before."

One of the results of the meeting was the offer to Mr. Moody, by a capitalist who had been attending all the meetings, of $25,000 to found a boys' school at Northfield, similar to that for girls; which was opened on the 15th.

One of the Most Remarkable of the Meetings at Northfield was a gathering in one of the tents in which men had been sleeping for the night, throwing army blankets about them and stretching themselves upon the ground. Mr. George Needham, in describing it, said: "There were times when the floor of that tent was covered with people, all crying for God's mercy. They would fall upon their faces at one impulse in prayer, such was the power of God's Spirit working within them. There were such confessions! Merchants, ministers, Christians, all had confessions to make. One merchant could not wait until he got home to amend for an injury he had done a fellow-being, and sat down and wrote him a long letter. Letters of repentance were written by many others. One deacon wrote to his pastor at home to meet him, as he had a confession to make to him on his arrival home. It really seemed as if the spirit of God had opened every heart."

The Third Chicago Pastor who has exchanged an American for an English pulpit within the last two years is the Rev. H. M. Paynter, who has accepted a call to labor in London in connection with the Mildmay Mission Hall. Mr. Paynter has done valuable service not only in Chicago, but in many of the States and in Canada, his preaching tours having been signally blessed in the conversion of souls.

Gospel Tent, used by the Baptist City n of New York, for regular daily services the past three months, was closed on Sep- 14th, the mission having secured, for the gs during the ensuing fall and winter, don Hall, on East Thirteenth Street, near Avenue. At the concluding services S. MacArthur D.D., presided, and ad- were delivered by Revs. J. F. Elder, B. Hull, Pastor, John Q. Adams, and Much good has resulted from these and it is hoped that the blessing of continue to attend them in their new gian Nobleman Died in the Prison on ll's Island, New York, on September 3d. been sentenced, under the name of Henry to three months' imprisonment for petty and had nearly served his time when aken ill and died. Just before he breath- ast, he gave the hospital authorities the of his wife, who on receiving notice of applied to the Belgian Consul for as- The inquiries instituted by that licited a sad history, which is vouched Mr. de Braekeleer, the President of the Society.

al name of the dead prisoner was Baron de Reiffenberg. He was a member of Belgian family with whom he had d. He came on a visit to this country ears ago, and was at that time well sup- money. Here he married a domestic and commenced a career of dissipation, on exhausted his funds. Mr. de Braeke- knew him in Europe, assisted him for e, but finally had to refuse him further He then took a room in a low neigh- where uneducated foreigners abound, ed a precarious subsistence by writing r them. He continued his dissipated en he had funds, and at last committed for which he was imprisoned. He of unusual intelligence and was high- ed, but he died at the age of forty- iminal in jail. Thus he sowed iniquity d vanity (Prov. 22 : 8).

ken Writes from Boston "I have just Consumptives' Home and the other t institutions carried on by Dr. Cullis. al home there is a lady who has not twenty-three years, nor walked for I never saw a more remarkable in- he power of God to gladden the heart. although often suffering acute pain, nimation, assenting or dissenting by remarks are made to her, and some- ng what she wants to say on a slate. ay upon day, week upon week, year a picture of contentment and peace, r tired of telling how much she enjoys e of Christ always with her. There y patients in the Consumptives' ne near their end, others under the evival of health which is characteris- disease. Cleanliness, order, and com- bservable everywhere. The six or lings are a wonderful testimony to vidence, for they were erected by ontributions, and the great work in ied on without any endowment."

from a Camp-Meeting at Lane, Kan., by Commissioner Railton, of the rmy, in the latest number of the Sal- On Saturday, September 4th, the he camp-meeting marched out with recision to the neighboring village. were formed in the village, the in- inging chairs and seats out for all to listen, and at the second stand a egation assembled ; the road being he horses, buggies, and wagons of in from all the surrounding district. d them with a notable conversion n, who had for years been lost to all luences, gave way to Christ in the ng and fell all his length uncon- Master's feet. Almost the whole crowded around to see the end, and what was their astonishment when he arose and with the greatest calmness and deliberation told how God had restored to him the joys of salvation. The final scene of the next evening and of the camp was a minister's daughter, who had been one of the sturdiest resisters of the Holy Ghost, tearing from her hat a bunch of artificial flowers, and rejoicing in the sanctifying power of God.

Mr. Railton has issued an earnest appeal for pecuniary assistance in carrying on the work. The American contingent has found it necessary to apply to England for funds, and is still in pressing need of money for the fall campaign.

The Triennial General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church is called for October 6th in New York, and is expected to continue in session during two weeks. The meetings will be held in the Church of the Holy Trinity, of which Dr. S. H. Tyng, Jr., is rector. The bishops, of whom there are sixty-two, will form one house, and a representation of four clergymen and four laymen from each diocese will form the other. The latter number 504, and as this number is considered by many members to be somewhat unwieldy, a proposition will be considered to reduce the delegation in future so as to bring the total to about three hundred. Important questions connected with the ancient constitution of the church will also be submitted to the convention, as well as the ordinary questions relating to church work.

An Opium-Eater's Confession.—At a Temperance mass meeting held recently in St. Louis, Mo., a Methodist minister well known in the neighborhood excited considerable surprise by confessing that for some time he had been a confirmed opium-eater. He stated that by God's grace he was now cured, but the sufferings he endured while the victim of the habit were horrible. He commenced by taking doses of one grain each, but as the habit grew upon him he increased the dose until he took twenty-five grains at a time. He stated his conviction that the habit of opium-eating was indulged in to an extent of which the public had no idea, and he earnestly commended the subject to the attention of temperance advocates. He believed that in St. Louis alone there were 10,000 persons who were addicted to the habitual use of opium, and who were surely becoming victims of its galling chains, or had already become so. It was sold in that city by the dram, ounce, and pound, yet the physicians only used it by the grain. In fact, the physicians were the smallest consumers of the drug, and yet it was brought to the city in enormous quantities. It was bought by people who were perfect slaves to it.

An Appalling Instance of Degradation was revealed in New York on September 16th, which shows how low men are capable of sinking, even in this age of boasted civilization and refinement. The Superintendent of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children summoned a man and his wife before the Jefferson Market Police Court. He stated that the couple were supported by their children, whom they had trained to beg and steal for them ; they also received money from their eldest daughter, who was living a life of shame at their instigation. Such a case proves that human nature unregenerated has in it infinite capacities for infamy of the basest and most shameless kind.

Taking the Chances.—The Brutal Murder of a young man, which shocked the citizens of New York a few days ago, is a remarkable instance of the false estimate placed on life and its pleasures. The murdered man was highly esteemed among his associates, but the circumstances connected with the brawl in which he met his death indicate that he was living a life of careless sinfulness. In answer to an appeal made to him not many days before the one on which he was killed, he said : "If I was sure that by dying at this moment I should go to heaven, I would prefer to take my chances and live a little longer." How terribly the chances he took have become certainties no living man can tell.

THE GLORIES OF FORGIVING GRACE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace."—EPHESIANS I : 7.

The Sequel to Redemption—The Joyful Doctrine —I. The Measure of Forgiveness—1. Not According to the Character of the Offender—Two Royal Brothers—2. Not According to Human Conceptions of God's Mercy—3. Not Limited by Human Guilt—The Unpardonable Sin—4. Nor by Time—5. Not According to the Sinner's Sorrow—6. Nor the Strength of his Faith—II. The Manner of Forgiveness—Absolutely Free—Granted with Royal Ease—Full and Complete—Certain and Irreversible—Unfailing Renewal—III. The Manifestation of Pardon—Through Christ, not Through a Human Confessor—Illustration of a Forgiven Child—Love Rising out of Pardon.

LAST Sunday morning the subject was redemption, "Ye are not your own : ye are bought with a price." The sequel to redemption is pardon : the text gives us that doctrine, for it tells us that redemption through the blood of Jesus involves the forgiveness of sins. Our subject at this time shall be the forgiveness of sin, the measure, mode, medium, and manifestation of it as set forth in the words before us. May the Holy Spirit sweetly open up to us the glories of our sin-forgiving God, and cause us to exult in the riches of His grace!

Beloved friends, no one can say that we have before us a theme which is unpractical, speculative, and fanciful ; no one will be able to charge the preacher with discoursing upon a subject with which his hearers have little or nothing to do, or wandering into barren fancies which cannot affect their actual lives. It is true that some sermons are barely human, and might as well have been addressed to the inhabitants of Jupiter or Saturn as to ourselves ; but such shall not be the case with our discourse.

We have no hair-lines of metaphysical subtlety before us ; our theme runs parallel with the beaten track of every-day life. Sin is, alas, too familiar with us. We have all committed it, the slime of the serpent has been upon us ; we are affected by it still, as an adder in the path it biteth at our heels, and it will be our daily trial, like the fiery serpents in the wilderness, till we enter the promised rest.

Sin as a thing of the past cannot be forgotten : was there ever a sorer bondage than that with which it made us serve with rigor? Sin as a matter of affliction for the present is not to be ignored : was there ever a sterner fight than we have to wage against evil without and within? Sin as a danger still ahead must not be overlooked : were there ever rocks or quicksands more terrible to the mariner than temptations to sin which yet lie before us on our voyage to heaven? Sin is always around us. Nothing can be more practical than the doctrine which deals with sin and its removal, and no news can be more pleasant than the tidings of remission.

It is my earnest desire, dear friends, that many this morning may come to believe in

THE JOYFUL DOCTRINE

of the forgiveness of sins. It is an article in the Creed, but I want it to be a substantive in your lives. Most men say that they believe it, but their belief is often nominal, and a nominal faith, like nominal wealth, only makes the absence of the reality the more deplorable.

In two instances there is clearly no faith in forgiven sin ; and the first is in the case of those who have never felt that they are sinful. How can he who does not believe in the existence of sin believe in the forgiveness of it? His whole confession on that matter belongs to the region of fiction. If sin is not a terrible fact to you, pardon will never be more than a notion.

A second class of persons who do not believe in forgiveness are those who know the guilt of sin, but are not yet able to believe in the Lord Jesus for the remission of their transgressions. They need to be admonished as Luther was by the godly old monk. When he was greatly distressed under conviction of his guilt the aged man said, "Didst thou not say this morning in the Creed, 'I believe in the forgiveness of sin'?" Luther, like many more, had repeated those words, but had never grasped their meaning.

As the giving of Jesus Christ, by whom justice is satisfied, was an act of free favor on the part of God, so the giving of the pardon which comes through Jesus Christ is in the same manner a matter of absolute grace, and by no means of debt or obligation. Do not, therefore, whenever you speak of our Lord's satisfaction which He made to justice, think that justice has eclipsed mercy; or, on the other hand, whenever you speak of the grace of God in pardoning sin, do not imagine that mercy has blinded the eyes of justice; for it is a part of the Christian faith that in the death of Christ justice shines out full-orbed like the sun at midday, while mercy is glorified after a like fashion.

Our text speaks of "the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of His grace," and from it we learn the measure of forgiveness, the manner of it, and the manifestations of it. O for heavenly light while we view this grand truth! Illuminate us, O thou Spirit of all grace!

I. From the text we learn

THE MEASURE OF FORGIVENESS.

Hear ye this, ye burdened souls, ye self-condemned spirits, ye that have shut yourselves out from hope of mercy—hear me earnestly, I pray you, that your souls may live. It may be while I am speaking to you your minds will be quieted, and you will find the key which will unlock every door in Doubting Castle, and you will be set at liberty from Giant Despair.

1. Observe, then, that the measure of forgiveness is the riches of God's grace; and this statement leads us to observe that it is not the character or person of the offender which is the measure of mercy, but the character of the offended One. Is there not rich consolation in this undoubted fact? The pardon to be hoped for is not to be measured by you and what you are, but by God and what He is.

In matters of offence and forgiveness the rule almost always holds good, that pardon becomes likely or unlikely, easy or difficult, not so much according to the offence as according to the character of the person offended. One man will forgive a grievous wrong, while another will not overlook a wry word.

Take an instance from English history: John had most villainously treated his brother Richard in his absence. Was it likely that when he of the lion's heart came home he would pass over his brother's grievous offence? If you look at John, villain that he was, it was most unlikely that he should be forgiven; but then, if you consider the brave, high-souled Richard, the very flower of chivalry, you expect a generous deed. Base as John was, he was likely to be forgiven, because Richard was so free of heart, and accordingly pardon was right royally given by the great-hearted monarch.

Had John been only half as guilty, if his brother Richard had been like himself, he would have made him lay his neck on the block. If John had been Richard and Richard had been John, no matter how small the offence, there would have been no likelihood of pardon at all. So is it in all matters of transgression and pardon. You must take the offence somewhat into account, it is true, but not one half so much as the character of the person who has been offended. Suppose I were asked at this present time to reconcile two persons who are at enmity: if the one who evidently had been injured was one of certain brethren around me whose forgiving spirits I have long relied upon, I should feel my task to be easy, whatever the offence might have been: but I know some others about whom I should say, "I don't know. I am afraid I shall not get on the right side of them. I shall have to approach them very carefully; however small the offence, it will be hard to remove their anger." I know certain persons of old; they are quick-tempered and ready to be aggrieved for small reasons, and they are slow in burning out, having fine memories for an affront. It is hard to get a forgiving word out of such sour spirits.

You see, the nature of a pardon materially depends upon the character of the pardoner. Let us establish this fact, and then see what light it throws upon the probability of pardon to any of you who are seeking it. With whom are you dealing? You have offended—who is he whom you have offended? Is it one whose anger is quickly aroused? No, the Lord is long-suffering, and exceedingly patient.

Is it possible for you to look at the Lord Jesus and doubt His willingness to forgive? He whose eyes wept over a guilty city, He whose hands were weary with incessantly doing good to those who despised Him, He who gave His feet to the cruel nails for His adversaries, and who at last poured out the life-floods of His heart for those that mocked Him, He must be willing to forgive! The measure of forgiveness, then, lies in the riches of divine grace, and this may encourage the chief of sinners to expect mercy.

2. Again, since the forgiveness of sins is "according to the riches of His grace," then it is not according to our conceptions of God's mercy, but according to that mercy itself, and the riches of it. We conceive hard things of God at times, we measure His corn with our bushel, we feel that He cannot pass by this and that crime, but that in certain points His grace may be vanquished by human wickedness. Our ideas of God's mercy are narrow, and we think Him to be altogether such as we are. Listen, then: "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are My ways your ways, saith the Lord; for as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are My ways higher than your ways, and My thoughts than your thoughts."

Is there not a fountain in this truth overflowing with comfort to the most cast-down one, whose bleeding heart is smarting under the lash of an angry conscience? I think if I had heard this truth plainly stated years ago, I should not have remained so long in bondage, but I should have risen to my feet and have run to the Saviour and have found peace at once.

3. If, again, the measure of mercy is "according to the riches of His grace," then can be set by the amount of human sin which can be forgiven. Sin is no trifle, and yet pardon is no impossibility. Nobody can measure the greatness of the guilt of a single sin: it is a world of iniquity. People talk of little sins, but there are no such things: the least rebellion against God is an intensely great evil. Yet there are degrees of sinning, and one offence may be greater than another, and one man's offences may be far more rank and crying than those of his neighbors.

NO LIMIT TO PARDON

If it be possible that one of my hearers has committed all the grosser sins, has heaped them up, has raked the kennels for them, has committed crimes in a way scarcely to be spoken of, committed them again and again, until the amount of his sins has become well-nigh incalculable, yet this does not render his forgiveness impossible. If there be one here who has gone to such an extreme of sin that he must set himself apart as being above all ordinary sinners, worthy of a special place in hell, worthy of a red-hot bolt from the right hand of the avenging God, yet pardon may be granted him. Hear me, O my friend! thou hast not gone beyond the power of God to pardon thee, for the measure of His pardon is "according to the riches of His grace."

"All manner of sin and of blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men." There is a sin against the Holy Ghost which shall never be forgiven, but that is unpardonable only for this reason—that where once it is committed the man never seeks forgiveness, nor desires it; that sin kills his conscience, for it is a sin which is unto death, and the sinner henceforth goes gayly down to destruction, never seeking forgiveness. If you seek mercy, be you who you may, you shall have it, if you will believe in Christ Jesus. If all the sins of all mankind were heaped upon you, you sought mercy by confession of sin and fa in Christ, you should not be denied, but your should be blotted out, "according to the ric of His grace."

4. Another comfortable conclusion follows f this, that no limit is set to the time in whic man has sinned, so as to bound the reach grace by the lapse of years. Our text does say that there is forgiveness of sins accordin such and such a time of life, but "according the riches of His grace." It is a blessed t to come to God when you are young, a thin sing of throughout the rest of your existe Happy day when my young heart first leape the sound of the Saviour's name!

But oh, if gray hairs are covering your h and years have ploughed their furrows on brow, think not the forgiveness of sin to be possible to you. What though your remai days are so few that a little child may them, and the last of them will soon flicker into darkness, yet if you will come and put trust in Jesus, your transgressions shall va and your soul shall be even as a new-born c for Christ makes all things new. "Accor to the riches of His grace:" this reaches the est man, this brings hope of mercy to the aged woman. I think you are more likely received than anybody," according to the r of His grace."

5. Let me draw another inference. If pa be "according to the riches of His grace," not according to the bitterness of the sorrow has been felt by the sinner. There is a n abroad that we must pass through a peri keen remorse before we can expect to be ac ed with God. "Yes," says one, "I do wonder that such a person was pardoned, for years he was ready to destroy himself i despair; he scarcely slept, he forgot bread, he went about wringing his han agony."

Beware of doting after this fashion.
must be sorrow for sin in every true bel and there will be; but the best form of s for sin generally follows forgiveness, and not precede it. I never hated sin so mu when I knew that God had forgiven me.
all my soul do I sometimes sing to myse choice lines of Mr. Monsell:

"My sins, my sins, my Saviour!
How sad on Thee they fall;
Seen through Thy gentle patience,
I tenfold feel them all.

"I know they are forgiven,
But still their pain to me
Is all the grief and anguish
They laid, my Lord, on Thee.

"My sins, my sins, my Saviour!
Their guilt I never knew Till, with thee, in the desert
I near Thy passion drew;

"Till with Thee in the garden
I heard Thy pleading prayer,
And saw the sweat-drops bloody
That told Thy sorrow there."

"Ah, but surely," saith one, "I knew a who was months and years in distress ab sin." I know such a person now. I kn who was five years an unbelieving seeker, was a fool for being so. There was no why he should have been in the dark so lo the sun had arisen; his eyes were blindfol his own folly. If he had believed in Christ right off he might have had the f ness of sin at once. Half of that which down in biographies as the work of the S
the work of the devil, and the result of u

John Bunyan gives a long story in Abounding," and I am thankful that he but he never meant that we were to imit in his unbelief and hard thoughts of Those hideous doubts and horrible fea not the work of the Spirit of God; the the work of John Bunyan's vivid imag and the devil together; they had nothin with the pardon of his sin except that th dered him from finding it month after

Your business, poor guilty sinner, is to believe that mercy is dealt out by God to sinners, not according to their despair and remorse, but "according to the riches of His grace."

6. And so let me say that the measure of God's forgiveness is not even the strength of a man's faith. The measure of God's forgiveness is "according to the riches of His grace." You, dear soul, are to come and trust in what Jesus Christ did when He bled away His life for sinners, and then your pardon shall be measured out to you, not according to the greatness and strength of your confidence, but according to the immeasurable mercy of the heart of God. You may have faith but as a grain of mustard-seed, your faith may only dare to touch the garment's hem of the great Saviour, you may get o farther than to say, "He hath said, 'Him hat cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out,' nd I do come to Him: if I perish, I will perish rusting Him," and yet that faith will save you.

I would your faith were stronger; I believe it ill be so before long: but if it be only as the reen blade which timidly springeth up from the oil in the cold spring and is almost afraid of e biting wind, if there be but life in it, if it live one upon Christ Jesus, it will suffice for salva- on. Jesus saith to the weak believer as well to the strong saint, "Thy faith hath saved ee; go in peace."

I feel half envious of men who can speak with e tongue of eloquence, for this theme deserves tter speech than mine; and yet if I had the ngues of angels I could not set forth to you one lf of the comfort which is to be found in this arming subject. My bare and unadorned style ay not ill beseem the matchless beauty of the ace which stands before you in its own native eliness.

II. In the second place, I am going to spend a le time, as God may help me, in speaking on hen I see in the mode and manner of forgive- s, first of all, absolute freeness, "according he riches of His free favor," for that is the aning of the word "grace." God forgives e because of payment made by them in any n. If we could bring Him mountains of gold silver, they would be nothing worth to : if we bring Him tears in rivers or alms in s, or resolves, vows, and promises in count- numbers, all will amount to nothing as a e of grace. Forgiveness, like love, is unpurchasable by us. God's pardons are absolutely ee. He forgives because He chooses to for- , out of sheer pity to the sinner, out of clear, ixed compassion, but with no adulteration of ything like bribe or price.

THE MANNER OF FORGIVENESS.

The manner of forgiveness is "according to riches of His grace."

orgiveness is absolutely free. ' Then why should not you have it? Oh, you who have said "It will never come to me"—why not to you? "Oh," you have said, "I am not prepared." Why should it not come to you though you are unprepared? Is preparedness a sort of price? Since it comes freely, why not to you?

"According to the riches of His grace:" this is a royal ease. When you and I give away money to the poor, we have to pause, and see how much is left in our purse; we have to calculate our incomes to see whether we may not be spending too much in charity; but those who have great riches can give and not calculate; even so God when He grants forgiveness gives it "according to the riches of His grace." He never has to think whether He will have grace enough left: He will be none the richer if He withholds it, none the poorer if He bestows it. There is a magnificent ease about the benefaction of God: He scatters the largesse of His ner right and left with unstinted liberality.

You have not to extract forgiveness from a hand fast closed: God is more pleased to pardon than we are to be pardoned. When the prodigal son laid his head in his father's bosom, and his father kissed him, who had the most joy, think you, the son or the father? I know the prodigal's heart overflowed with gladness, but then the father's heart was more capacious, and when he said, "This my son was dead, and is alive again; was lost, and is found," there was an incalculable depth of delight in the expression. It was the father who called for music and dancing, feasting and merriment: I fear the son was hardly so demonstrative in his delight.

"According to the riches of His grace:" that means unquestionable fulness. The man who is forgiven of the Lord is but altogether absolved. There is a theology which teaches that when a man believes in Jesus Christ he is pardoned up to a point, but in future he may get into arrears again, and if he does not see to it he may again be accused, and summoned before the judgment-seat. This is not our theology. We believe in Him who said, "I give unto My sheep eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of My hand."

NOT HALF FORGIVEN,

I believe that when Jesus Christ died for His people He did not make atonement for half their sins, but for all of them; and in that day when He said, "It is finished," there was a virtual wiping out of all the score of all His redeemed from the book of God's remembrance. Hence His salvation is complete, and those who have it are altogether delivered from the ruin which sin involves. If you come to Christ He will grant you deep, full, living, substantial pardon, such pardon as will put you among God's children, such pardon that God will have no back reckonings with you, no calling of you to account at some future time; such pardon that you shall be as much accepted as if you had never sinned, and God shall love you as though your whole life had been spent in His fear.

Again, the text implies, irreversible certainty. "According to the riches of His grace." For God to pardon and then afterward to condemn would not be "according to the riches of His grace." If Her Majesty were to issue a free pardon for a criminal, and then afterward hang him, it would be poor work: it would not be according to the riches of her favor certainly; and if you and I get pardon through Jesus Christ, we can no more be lost than God can become poor in love. Believe in Christ Jesus, and get a pardon for thy transgressions under the sign manual of Jehovah, and thou art clear forever.

Once more, it suggests unfailing renewal. It is "forgiveness of sins according to the riches of His grace." It does not mean forgiveness up to a certain point, and then if you sin again no more forgiveness; but daily forgiveness for daily sin, a fresh spring rising for fresh thirst. Joseph Hart sings:

> "This fountain from guilt not only makes pure,
> And gives, soon as felt, infallible cure,
> But if guilt removèd, return, and remain,
> Its power may be provèd again and again."

We may come to Christ as freely to-day as we did thirty years ago, and find ourselves washed white again: God grant us to know all this in our own souls.

III. Our last word is to be upon

THE MANIFESTATION

of this pardon. "In whom we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of His grace." Here we see that forgiveness of sin comes to us entirely through Jesus Christ our Saviour, and if we go to Jesus Christ, fixing our eyes especially upon His atoning sacrifice, we have pardon by virtue of His blood.

I see nothing here about any human priest: Christ is priest enough for us. I see nothing about absolution by man. No: "In Him we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins." It must be a very dangerous thing to be hoping for pardon because you have confessed to a mere man; whatever manipulations may have been performed upon his shaven head, it must be a very risky thing to have your salvation depend upon whether or not he was properly ordained by a priest of higher rank. We escape all such perils by going to the Fountain-head, even to Christ Himself, the one Mediator between God and man.

According to God's command we trust Jesus and receive pardon, not in word only, but in spirit and in truth. There is no hazard in faith in Jesus, for all those who have tried it will tell you how blessed the result has been in their own cases. Pardon by any other means is impossible, but by Jesus Christ it is certain. Everything else fails, but faith in Christ never fails.

"Am I not, then, daily to confess sin?" Yes, daily as you commit it, but not under the garb of misery, as though you were an unpardoned criminal. Are you not a beloved child? Confess sin with the certainty that you are forgiven, and that still the sentence of forgiveness runs on and includes these present and future sins as well as all that are past. You are to humbly sue for continued mercy, but you are not to pray as if you were at enmity with God and miserable under a sense of His wrath. Far better is the spirit which sings "O God, I will praise Thee, for though Thou wast angry with me, Thine anger is turned away, and Thou comfortest me." That is the way to talk. If you believe, you should speak in that fashion. No longer is the weight and burden of sin lying on your conscience and heart: your load is lifted; you are forgiven.

If your child has been offending you, and you are angry with him, he feels ill at ease in your presence. At last you say, "My boy, it is all gone now; do not offend again. You are quite forgiven; come here, and let me kiss you." Does he reply, "Father, I am afraid"? If so it is evident that he does not understand that you have forgiven him; and even if he receives your kiss, but still remains unhappy in your presence, it is clear that he does not believe in you or in the sincerity of your forgiveness. As soon as the light dawns on his mind "Father has quite put all my fault away," then he is merry in his play and easy in his conversation with you.

Now, be with God

LIKE A CHILD AT HOME.

Do not act to Him as if still He frowned upon you. He smiles. Do not pray to Him as if you dreaded Him, and thought He would smite you. He cannot smite you: He has smitten Christ instead of you. Your debt has been paid, and can never be demanded of you. Christ nailed the receipted bill to His cross in the face of heaven and earth and hell. Eternal justice cannot charge you now with sins which were, once for all, charged on your great Substitute, and borne by Him.

I want you to feel the love which rises out of pardoned sin. You must love Him who has removed all your iniquities. I want you to feel the zeal which finds fuel in the forgiveness in sin. Bring your alabaster box, and pour the ointment upon His head who has forgiven you so freely. There are no workers like pardoned men; there are no givers like pardoned men and women; there are no lovers like pardoned men and women; there are no singers like pardoned men and women; there are no saints before the throne, no courtiers at the right hands of the eternal Sovereign like those who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

Come, then, ye guilty, and receive forgiveness in Christ! Come, ye vilest of the vile, the door is set open for you, and a loving heart invites you through these lips. I am full of hope that you will come. You must come. Love will constrain you to believe in my Lord. Oh, may the Holy Spirit compel you now to come to the Saviour, and to be cleansed from all sin. When you have obtained mercy hasten to tell others of the boundless mercy of the God of love, and of the riches of His grace displayed in forgiving you all trespasses. God bless you for Christ's sake. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Ephesians I].

NOT HALF A MAN.

A Temperance Story.

Father's Home-coming—Mark Rayton is Tempted by Joe Trimmell—The Flag is Struck—The Last Man to Leave the "Morning Star."

"HURRAH! here's father!" Four little screams of delight; the rapid pattering of four little pairs of feet; and then four little forms precipitating themselves on a big, burly man in working clothes. Such was the scene which might have been witnessed one fine summer evening in the little village of Crawton.

One seized the water-can which he held on one arm, and another the coat which he carried on the other; while the two smallest, grasping a hand apiece, contentedly trotted along beside him. We are not to suppose that the assault was made without a show of protest on the big man's side. As a matter of fact, he gave a great shout as soon as he was laid hold of, and said, "Hullo! young uns, what's up?"

But Mark Rayton knew what was up fast enough. To tell the truth, he had been expecting this very onslaught; and when it is remembered that Mark Rayton was set upon in exactly the same way the night before, and the night before that again, and indeed for scores of nights past, there was not the slightest occasion for his wonder at the young people's behavior on that particular evening. It was only Mark's funny way, and was in fact as much a part of the performance as the attack itself.

By this time Mark's wife had come to the gate—a neat little woman, with a smiling face and a sparkling eye. "Ah! lass, here we are again," was his greeting as he stooped down to kiss her. "It is nice to be home again," said Mark Rayton, as the group entered the house; "I've been looking forrard to this all day."

Bess had been looking forward too, though she did not say so. A happy pair were Mark Rayton and his wife; and all the happier for past recollections, for time was when Mark cared more for the public-house parlor than for his home, and spent there the money which should have been put into his wife's hand on the Saturday night. It was no happy home then; but since Mark had given up the public-house they had been leading the most cosey and comfortable of lives.

However tired Mark might be after his day's work, a romp with the children was perfectly delightful to him. See him now tossing the little one to the ceiling. See how patiently he bears the steady thumping of four young fists upon his legs as a substitute for a drum. See how careful he is not to notice little Tommy, who, out on a foraging expedition, is plunging his fat little hand into every available pocket. What children wouldn't run to meet such a father as that? Bess used to say, jokingly, that he was the biggest baby of the lot, and Mark was not at all ashamed to confess it.

By and by, the children put safely to bed, Mark and his wife might be seen, arm in arm, taking their evening walk, looking, as more than one said, as if they were lovers rather than married people of long standing. Truly in all Crawton there wasn't a happier pair than Mark and Bess Rayton.

* * * * * * * * *

"Mark, you're not half a man. You're a perfect milksop! I never heard a man talk such twaddle in all my born days. I shouldn't have believed it, Mark Rayton, if the whole village had come and told me of it."

These almost violent words fell from the lips of Joe Trimmell, an acquaintance of Mark's. They had met after their day's work, as they were proceeding to their respective homes.

"Well, Joe," said Mark, "I don't see I've said anything so very foolish after all. I've got a comfortable home through giving up the drink. My wife is happier, my children are better clothed, and that's a good deal to show for it, I think."

The only answer Joe gave at first to these words was to pluck a leaf from the hedge, roll it into a ball, and cast it from him with great violence, accompanying the action with a look of great disgust.

"Now, Mark, be a man of sense, do, and don't talk such trash and nonsense. Who's asking you to get drunk, and ruin your wife and family, and all that sort of thing? All I said was, 'Show yourself a man, and shut up people's mouths;' for what are they saying about you? Why, they're saying Mark Rayton's afraid of a pint of beer."

Joe Trimmell continued:

"I'm proud to call Mark Rayton my friend; and as he's done me a good turn before now, I want to do him a good turn now. I want these fellers, Mark, as calls you a coward, to eat their own words—that's what I want."

Poor Mark felt in his soul he was yielding. How he despised himself as he stood there, scarcely able to say a single word for himself. There were plenty of arguments he might have used, had he been only brave enough to have done so. He might have said point-blank, "I'm afraid of a pint of beer; I'm too weak to stand it. Let men call me what they will; I'd rather be called hard names than break up my home, and be a drunkard again." This course would have taken the bull by the horns. Joe Trimmell might have fretted and fumed, and looked disgusted, but he would not have been able to answer it satisfactorily.

Joe Trimmell could now see plainly that a little more pressing would settle Mark altogether, and so he said:

"Do you mean to tell me, Mark, that you're afraid of a single glass—that you're weak enough, and fool enough, to be knocked over by a sip of beer? Tell me so right out, and I shall know what to do. Only don't call yourself a man after that, that's all."

Mark was obliged to answer this plain question; so he stammered out, his heart giving him the lie all the time—

"I dare say a single glass wouldn't hurt me, Joe. Of course I should be able to stand that all right. I hope I'm not so weak as that."

"If you'd gone and signed the pledge, and been a teetotaller, I'd be the last man to say to Mark Rayton, 'Break your word,' though I don't believe in your milk-and-water fellers at all. But you're not a pledged man, and so you're free to take it or leave it, as suits your fancy."

"No," Mark said, "he wasn't a pledged man;" though now he dearly wished he had been.

And yet, was he not? How vividly he remembered a little scene in which a sweet face looked up pleadingly into his, and his looked down lovingly into hers, and how from the lips of the one there came a promise: "I'll have nothing to do with strong drink any more." Was he not a pledged man after all? he thought. He did not venture, however, to refer to this scene, for Joe Trimmell, he knew, would be ready to laugh at the whole thing as a pretty bit of sentiment, and nothing more.

Mark struck his flag at last. With feigned cheerfulness he said,

"Well, Joe, just as you like. I ain't afraid as far as that goes; and if it'll show those fellers how as Mark Rayton is as much a man as any of 'em, then here goes."

"That's right, old feller; I knew you were made of the right metal, and only wanted a little hammering to ring out true," said Joe heartily.

Soon they were within the "Morning Star." Sitting down at one of the tables, how Mark's heart smote him as he found himself there again! His wife and his four little children seemed to float about him, and beckon him away with tears in their eyes. But he had gone too far to heed them now, and so he set himself steadily to stifle his thoughts and blindfold his imagination. There were many things to help him. There were the sprightly tones of a fiddle, playing away a merry tune; there were the loud and hearty welcomes of many fellow-workmen; and there was the strong beer, for which the "Morning Star" was so famous. Mark hadn't been made so much of by his mates for many a long month, and it was pleasant, after being a black sheep for so long, to find one after another grasping his hand, pushing their glasses over, and accounting it a personal favor for Mark to partake of them. He was quite a little king among them; what wonder was it that, after a bit, he should have been so carried away by the scene as to forget even Bess and his little ones?

Poor Mark! he had got upon an inclined plane, and was rapidly going down. One glass led to two; two glasses led to three; and so on and on until they were past counting.

Meanwhile the little ones lay in hiding, eagerly awaiting their father's return, ready to pounce out upon him as usual when he should be near enough. At least, they had been lying in wait; but when so long a time passed, and Mark did not come, they grew tired, ran home to tell mother, and more than one went to sleep with cheeks wet with tears of disappointment. But Bess did not go to sleep; she watched on with a face white with anxiety and a heart nearly bursting. She is prepared for what is coming. For her the bright sunshine is all gone, and winter has come with its pitiless hail and its icy blasts. Poor Bess! it is a sad prospect for her now.

A drunkard's home-coming has been too often described to need detailing here. We will draw a veil over the scene. Let it suffice to know that Mark Rayton was the last to leave the "Morning Star," and that, of all the drunkards who reached their homes that night, there was none worse than he.

(To be continued.)

PROPHETIC PERIODS TERMINATING IN 1890.

The Seventy Jubilees—The 2520 Years or Seve Times—The Fifty Jubilees—The 2300 Years o Daniel—The 1335 and 1290 Years—The Justinian Code of Laws as a Landmark.

THE 3500 years or seventy Jubilees is a perio of which Elliott in his "Horæ Apocalypticæ" says, in his concluding chapter: "Seventy year marked the length of Israel's waiting-time for th redemption from Babylon and seventy weeks o years the time of its further waiting for its pri mary redemption by the First Advent of Christ So seventy Jubilees may define the mystic period of Israel's whole existence as a peopl from the Exodus to the epoch of both the nat ral and the spiritual Israel's perfect redemptio at the Second Advent of Christ."

Hence, these 3500 years of seventy Jubile (each Jubilee being fifty years), commencin with the epoch of Moses' mission and the Exod between B.C. 1600 and 1610, will terminate b tween A.D. 1880 and 1890.

THE 2520 YEARS

is spoken of in Leviticus 26 : 18, 19, 24, 28, a Daniel 4 : 16, as seven times or years; a year reckoned in the Bible to consist of 360 days l erally, and in the symbolic year-day fulfilme 360 years. Therefore, seven times denotes sev multiplied into 360 years, which gives 25 years. This period was to measure the durati of the chastisement of the Jewish nation f their disobedience, and also the duration of t Four Gentile Empires represented by Nebuch nezzar's prophetic human image, which were inflict the chastisement throughout the peri called the Times of the Gentiles.

These 2520 years have two fulfilments—e ing respectively in A.D. 1815 and 1890—primar from about B.C. 705, the epoch of the carrying the ten tribes of Israel into captivity in Assy by Shalmaneser the Assyrian King, from whe the 2520 years end in A.D. 1815, the close of t French revolutionary epoch, when Jewish em cipation commenced—leaving the interval of years to elapse before the end of this age in 1 —and secondarily from about A.D. 630, the rise Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, to wh Daniel said, Thou art the head of gold (Da 2 : 38), and thus the 2520 years reach to A 1890 as the end of the Times of the Gentiles, represented in their whole length by the prophetic Image prefiguring the four Gentile Empires of Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome.

Nebuchadnezzar's maniacy during the literal seven times or seven years, as described in Daniel 4 : 16–25, typified the heathen aberration from God of the four Gentile monarchies during the mystical seven times or 2500 years. And as Nebuchadnezzar became like a wild beast during those seven years, so the four Empires are prefigured as four wild beasts, a lion, bear, leopard, and ten-horned beast, indicating their godless, rapacious, destructive character. Nebuchadnezzar in his vision saw them under the semblance of a human monarch, but the prophet Daniel viewed them more correctly as wild beasts.

At the close of the 2520 years Nebuchadnezzar's Image will, in a certain sense, be reconstructed by the great Antichrist (who will be a Napoleon), arising to supremacy over the kingdoms prefigured by it, and re-enacting in his short and marvellous career the exploits of Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander the Great, and Cæsar. The ten toes of the Image will then appear distinctly by the whole Roman empire becoming divided into exactly ten kingdoms, five in the west and five in the east—viz., Britain separated from Ireland, France extended to the Rhine, Spain with Portugal, Italy, Austria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Thrace, Turkey, and Bulgaria.

"In the days of the ten kings" of those ten toe kingdoms (Dan. 2 : 44) "the God of Heaven shall set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed"—that is, the millennial kingdom of Christ, who, as "the Stone cut out of the mountain without hands," shall smite the Image and shiver it to atoms.

The 2500 years is a period of

FIFTY JUBILEES

—that is to say, fifty times fifty years—at the end of which the great Jubilee of Jubilees will be fulfilled. The last Jubilee that was observed appears to have been at the Great Passover that was kept in Josiah's eighteenth year (2 Chron. 35 : 19) and which is stated in the margin of reference Bibles to have been about the year 610 before Christ. From this epoch of B.C. 610 there re exactly 2500 years, when we may expect, at he personal descent of the King of Israel upon he Mount of Olives (Zechariah 14 : 4), the great Jubilee trumpet to be blown, all fetters to e broken, the Christian Church and the Jewish nation to enter upon their promised inheritance, and an era of universal freedom and happiness o be ushered in.

THE 2300 YEARS

Dan. 8 : 13, 14) are stated by Daniel to be the ength of time occupied by the period of the re-establishment of the daily sacrifice, and a subsequent time of desolation by an Antichrisian power, called the Little Horn. The 70 weeks which commenced in 455–6 B.C. (the eventh year of Artaxerxes) were to be determined, or rather cut off (Dan. 9 : 24), from the 300 years, which therefore began at the same ime with those 70 weeks. Thus the year-day ulfilment of the 2300 years is from 555-6 B.C., he date of the renewal of the Jewish sacrifices nder Ezra (Ez. 7 : 8), until 1844-5, when vents occurred preparing the way for the speedy enewal of the sacrifices, the cleansing of the anctuary of the Holy Land, and the partial resoration of the Jews.

It is most remarkable that on March 21st, 844, as the event proved, this period of 2300 ears did end in accordance with the predictions f expositors, made several years previously. On that day the Sultan of Turkey, yielding to he expostulations of the five great Powers of urope, signed a celebrated edict, or Hatti-heriff, revoking and annulling a long-estabshed Mohammedan law by which Moslems who dopted another religion were condemned to be xecuted. Thus the avowed national opposion of the Turkish Government by its official nactments to Christianity ceased, and liberty for religious worship was granted, constituting the initial cleansing of the sanctuary. One result is that since 1844 the Jews have returned in increasing numbers to Jerusalem. The 2300 years were mentioned in connection with the Grecian goat (Dan. 8), and refer chiefly to the territory of the Macedonian Empire, which consisted in a great measure of Turkey; therefore "the cleansing of the sanctuary" at the end of the 2300 years must have relation principally to Turkey and the Holy Land.

TWO OTHER IMPORTANT DATES

likewise ended in 1844–5; the 1260th Mohammedan year terminated then, according to the reckoning of the Turks, who calculate by lunar instead of solar years, and who reckon their calendar from Mohammed's flight or Hegira in A.D. 622. Also the 391 years of the sixth trumpet (Rev. 9 : 15), dated from the fall of Constantinople in 1453, ended in 1844–5, when the Turkish woe introduced by that trumpet passed away by the enactment of the Hatti-Sheriff, above referred to, and Turkey then ceased officially and professedly, as a nation, to be a woe to Christendom, so far, at least, as this, that it no longer decreed death to Moslems who became Christians.

The principal fulfilment of these 2300 days is, of course, as 2300 literal days at the close of this Gentile Dispensation. They will thus be equal to about 6 years, 4 months, and 20 days, reckoning each year to consist of 360 days—i.e., 12 months, of 30 days each. They will terminate simultaneously with the 1290 days at the distance of 45 days before the end of the 1335 days, and they will consequently commence somewhere between eight and ten months after the date of the seven years' covenant that is to be made between the Napoleonic Antichrist and the Jews. Their commencement will be marked by the renewal of the Jewish daily sacrifices in a rebuilt Temple at Jerusalem (Dan. 8 : 14).

THE 1335 AND 1290 YEARS

(Dan. 12 : 11, 12) are both of them generally considered to begin simultaneously with the 1260 years. The date of the commencement of these three periods has been reckoned by many writers, such as Dr. Croly, Dr. Cumming, Cuninghame, Bickersteth, etc., to be when the Roman Emperor Justinian promulgated his famous Code of Laws, in which he gave greatly increased power to the Pope and the clergy—establishing, in fact, the Papacy's temporal power. Now, Justinian's Code of Laws was progressively published during the years extending from A.D. 529 to 554-5, an epoch of twenty-six years, and it is most remarkable that exactly at the distance of 1260 years from that epoch there occurred the extraordinary French revolutionary epoch of twenty-six years, from 1789 to 1815. Justinian's Code of Laws has been maintained to be the starting-point of the 1260, 1290, and 1335 years, by more than FIFTY-FIVE EXPOSITORS, and further investigation of prophetic treatises would no doubt add to this list.

Hence the 1335 years, commencing in A.D. 555, at the completion of Justinian's Code, which established the temporal power of the Pope, terminated in 1890, as the time of millennial blessedness of which it is said, "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the 1335 days; thou shalt stand in thy lot at the end of the days." For then will be completed the resurrection of all the saints and adjudication of them of their inheritances, so that they shall all stand in their respective lots. The words, "Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the 1335 days, but go thou (Daniel) thy way till the end be; for thou shalt rest and stand in thy lot at the end of the days"—i.e., these 1335 days (Dan. 12 : 12, 13)—plainly imply that Daniel—and along with him other saints—will stand in his lot after the resurrection at the end of the 1335 days (both year-day and literal-day).

The 1290 years, reckoned from A.D. 554–5, terminate in A.D. 1844–5 as the epoch of the pouring out of the year-day sixth vial, which, during the subsequent 40 years, weakens and dries up the mystical Euphrates or Turkish Empire and Mohammedan power, preparing the way for the return of the Jews to Palestine, and at the same time the three unclean spirits of Antichristian Infidelity, Democratic Revolutionism, and Romanist and Mohammedan fanaticism, go forth with renewed power throughout all the nations, to gather them to the first war of Armageddon. (See Rev. 16 : 12-16.)

The passage in Daniel 12 : 11, 12, mentioning these 1290 and 1335 years, reads thus: "And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days." Now, undoubtedly, the principal ultimate fulfilment of these two periods is at the very close of the Dispensation, as 1290, and 1335 literal days, commencing with the taking away of the renewed Jewish sacrifices and the setting up of the abomination of desolation—the Napoleonic Antichrist's image—in the rebuilt Temple at Jerusalem for three and a half years; but in the typical year-day fulfilment of these periods, as 1290 and 1335 years, they commence with the public and national establishment of the Pope's temporal authority, and setting up the Papal abomination of desolation throughout Christendom, and the taking away of pure Evangelical worship. The incipient accomplishment of this was by Justinian's Code and Decree in support of the Pope in 533–55, and its fuller accomplishment was by Phocas' Decree in 606-7, still further increasing the Pope's power.

(To be continued.)

MR. G. MULLER'S ESCAPE FROM BEING SHOT.

Mr. George Muller, the founder of the celebrated orphanages at Bristol, England, who is about to revisit this country, had some years ago a providential escape from being shot, which is thus recorded in the fourth part of his biography:

"In November, 1847, I had a most remarkable deliverance, which to the praise of the Lord is here recorded, as it is a further illustration of how the Lord watches over His children. I was laboring for a little while at Bowness and Keswick, in Cumberland, in the ministry of the word in October and November. When at Keswick I stayed with my dear wife in a large boarding-house, in which, however, we were then alone, except a single gentleman. Just before we left I heard that the gentleman, lodging in the same house, had shot himself during the night.

"Two days after, I received from a Christian brother at Keswick the following information respecting the transaction: 'Dear Mr. Müller; The tender and Almighty care of our loving Father was never more over you, and indeed over all of us, than in your stay as Keswick. Mr. . . . was quite deranged for two or three days before you left. Without any control he had been walking about his room for the last two days and nights, with loaded pistols in his hands. Furthermore, he had taken into his head that you were going to kill him. How gracious of God, that He spread His wings over you, and over dear Mrs. Müller, so that Satan could not break through the fence, to hurt even a hair of your heads. Speaking after the manner of men, there was nothing to have hindered him coming into the room, where many of us had come to tea with you that evening for prayer and reading the Holy Scriptures. He might have fired among us; but the Lord was our refuge and fortress, and preserved us from danger, which we knew not of. He shot himself in the neck and the breast, but is not dead. He has a strait-waistcoat on. I assisted in cutting his clothes off, and in other little offices, needed at such a time, and told him of Christ's love in dying for poor sinners. What a scene his room presented. Pistols lying in gore. Bloody knives, lancets, and razors strewed about the floor.' The poor man lived afterward a little while in an asylum."

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

(Continued from page 606.

Support in a Trying Moment.

What if, after all, Claude was right? I queried. Might not I be indeed the means of leading him to better things? Miss Richards seemed to think so, and Miss Richards was a good woman.

And yet my conscience told me plainly enough that the opinion of a good woman could not make a wrong action right. Was it right or wrong in the sight of God? That was the question, and every time I put it to my heart, the same answer came, in clear unmistakable terms: "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers."

I saw the path of duty clearly before me, a hard and difficult path, so hard and so difficult that I nearly despaired of ever being able to tread it.

The temptation was indeed fierce and strong, and I was on the point of yielding. Claude saw this and spoke still more tenderly, and pressed the advantage he had gained as far as possible.

I darted up one earnest, imploring cry to my Lord for help. My prayer did not, even in thought, resolve itself into words, but it was the language of my innermost soul. And it was not left unanswered. Four words came into my mind at that moment, which enabled me to gain the victory.

As clearly as if the sunbeams which were streaming in at the window had written them on the wall of the room, these four words flashed across me: "For My Name's sake."

Ah! here was a motive, strong enough to enable me to overcome the greatest temptation; here was a motive, strong enough to enable me to conquer all those desires and wishes of my heart which were urging me into disobedience to my Lord's command. "For My Name's sake; is it too much to bear for Me?" I heard Him ask me; and, in a moment, all His infinite love for me, all His self-denial for my sake, all His travail of soul, all that He underwent to save me, and bless me, crowded upon my mind, and was followed by the question—

> "All this I bore for thee,
> What canst thou bear for Me?"

My mind was made up; I would parley with the temptation no longer.

I drew my hand away from Claude's gently but firmly. "Claude," I said, "do not let us make each other more miserable by going over and over the same ground. You will never be able to move me. I can only repeat what I have told you before. As a sister, as a friend, I will always love you, but I cannot be your wife. Claude," I went on, as he was beginning to speak, "that is my final answer, so please say no more about it."

I suppose I spoke very decidedly, though I had tried to speak calmly, for Claude was very angry. A change passed over his face in an instant; I do not think he had dreamed for a single moment that I should be able to withstand his arguments and his persuasions.

He walked to the window and looked out on the garden below.

"Then I am to look upon this as final, May?" he said bitterly.

"Yes, Claude, as quite final," I replied; "you will never be able to move me from my resolution, dear Claude. But you will not let our old friendship end, will you? Why should we not be brother and sister to each other still?"

"Oh, there are two sides to that question," said Claude proudly; "I keep out of the way of those who think themselves too good to associate with me. There are plenty of other people who will be glad of my friendship."

And so Claude left me without another word. He went out of the room, slamming the door after him, and a moment afterward I saw him hastily cross the lawn, and go out at the garden-gate. And I knew, as well as if I could read the future, that that was the last time I should see him pass through that gate.

For Claude's was a proud, imperious nature, and the more I thought the matter over, the more I felt sure that his pride was wounded, quite as much, if not more, than his affection. He had thought it next to impossible that any one, and above all a poor, friendless girl like myself, should refuse to be his wife. He had found he was mistaken, and he was mortified and vexed at the discovery.

When I was left alone I felt as if I had gone through a great storm, and had come out of it wearied and exhausted. My mind was too tired even to pray. I pushed aside the letters I was writing, and looked out over the distant hills. But after a time, when I was calmer and in a more restful state of mind, I opened my Bible at the place where it had been so often opened the last two days, and read again my Master's word of command.

And then I was enabled, though with tears in my eyes, to thank Him that through His grace I had been strengthened to keep it.

This time I read the whole passage through to the end of the chapter.

The last two verses were the very words I needed just then: "Come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be My sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty."

I looked up into the sky, in which the sun was fast setting, and said, with a thankful heart, "Lord, by Thy grace I have come out; I have given up the affection which would have drawn me away; I have separated myself from the love which, however sweet, would have cut me off from Thy presence and from Thy love.

And, even as I said this, the Master's answer came with tenderest comfort to my heart: "I will receive you, nay, I have already received you, and I will be a Father unto you, and you shall be My child, My daughter, saith the Lord Almighty."

I heard Maggie's voice at this moment, so I hastily rose, wiped away the tears which were now only tears of joy and thankfulness, and went to meet her.

"How happy you seem to-night, May," she said, as we sat together at supper; "you have not looked so happy since—since—" Her lip quivered, and tears came into her eyes.

I held out my arms to her, and she came and sat on my knee, as she used to do when she was a little child, laid her head on my shoulder, and sobbed.

"What is it, Maggie darling?" I asked, stroking her long fair hair with my hand.

"Oh, May," she sobbed, "if only we could be together; if only I had not to go away and leave you. I counted the days this morning on the almanac, and there are only nineteen more."

"Poor little Maggie!" I said; "what shall I do without you?"

"And what shall I do without you, May," she said. "My aunts are very kind, but they are not like you; you are just like a mother to me. I shall never be a good girl, May, when I haven't you to talk to me, and when I can't tell you all my troubles."

"But you can tell Jesus, Maggie," I said, "just as you have always told me, and He will help you and comfort you far, far better than I could do."

"Yes, May," she said, putting up her face to be kissed, "I will tell Him every day; I promise you that I will."

"And then you can write to me, Maggie," I said. "Look here what I have brought for you. I had meant to have kept it till the last day, but perhaps I had better give it to you now."

I went to a drawer and brought out a neat little desk filled with paper, envelopes, pens, stamps, and everything necessary for letter-writing.

Maggie was charmed with it, and was quite as merry as she had been sad before, and began to plan at once how many letters she would write me every week, and what she would say in them. She said she should tell me everything, even what time she got up every morning and went to bed every night.

Dear little Maggie! how well I can picture her to myself as she looked on that memorable evening in my life, on which I had refused to be Claude Ellis's wife.

Those last days which Maggie and I spent together in the old home were very happy ones. I took every opportunity I had of deepening in my little sister's mind the lessons I had tried to teach her from a child, and which she had always loved so much. I had great reason to hope that they had not been in vain, but that my dear little Maggie was in deed and in truth a child of God.

We were very busy sorting and packing ou various possessions, and leaving all in th house in readiness for the sale which was t take place immediately we left.

I had received a satisfactory answer to my application for the post of companion, saying tha Sir William Trafford, after due inquiries of m referees, would be glad of my services as companion to his daughter, Miss Evelyn Trafford and would be glad to know on what day I shoul be able to commence my duties at Alliston Hal

I did not see Claude again before I went away The day after his visit to me I heard that h had again left home, and had returned to h friends in Scotland.

The evening before we left Acton I went u to the parsonage to say good-by. Miss Richards received me very kindly, but we were bot constrained in our manner, for we were thinking of the same thing, and neither of us liked mention it. We spoke of the weather, of n future plans, of the sale of the furniture, of M Ellis's health, and of a variety of other thin and people; but Claude's name was careful avoided, and that which was filling our though was entirely kept out of the conversation. it was no wonder that our talk flagged at time and that we were very far from being natural at our ease.

Just as I was leaving, I remembered how ki Miss Richards had been to me through r motherless life; always ready to help me wi her advice whenever I needed help, and ve patient in listening to the small home worr which had crowded upon me when I first to upon myself the cares of housekeeping.

"Miss Richards," I said, "you have been li a mother to me; I shall never, never be able thank you enough for all you have been me."

"Oh, no, May," she said warmly, "you m not speak of that; you have been quite as m or more to me, dear. You have been a brig sunbeam here, May. You have often bright ed my life since I came here."

"Oh, Miss Richards," I said, "I never drea that I could make you any happier."

"You did it without dreaming then, dea she said, smiling; "and May," she add "what has passed between you and Claude make no difference in your love to me, will You will still treat me as a friend, and let hear from you sometimes, won't you, dear?"

"Oh, Miss Richards," I said, "will you me write to you? Then you are not very an with me?"

"Angry with you! why?" she said; " refusing Claude?"

"Yes," I said, "for giving Claude the swer I did."

"No, dear," said Miss Richards; "I was v much surprised, I own, and very much dis pointed. I had counted so much on your in ence with Claude, and was building my hopes it far more than I ought to have done. since then, May, I have sometimes thou that, perhaps, I ought not to blame you. I that I had been looking at the matter enti from my point of view—mine and Claude's— that, perhaps, dear, you had a reason for refus Claude, a reason of which I should not and c not disapprove. May," she said, taking hand very kindly, "would you mind telling your reason?"

(To be continued.)

ISAAC'S PROSPERITY.

S.S. Lesson for October 3d, Gen. 26 : 12–25. G len Text, Prov. 10 : 22. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

E read, regarding Ishmael and Isaac, ither, because they are the seed of Abra- a, are they all children : but, in Isaac shall seed be called. That is, They which are the lren of the flesh, these are not the children of : but the children of the promise are ted for the seed" (Rom. 9 : 7, 8). The life aac originated in the promise of the living received by faith ; and when his life was red at his father's hands, it was preserved e Word of God, again received and held by Thus he is the type to us of a life having igin and its continual support in the Word romises of God : "We brethren, as Isaac are the children of promise" (Gal. 4 : 28). 's was not a life of sorely tried faith, like of his father ; he stood on the ground Abraham had won for him, as the pioneer path of unlimited trust.

may be there are Abraham souls and Isaac among us. Some are called of God to be rs for others ; they venture on ground the majority of believers are not bold h to tread upon : their ruling aim is to be a blessing, to open the path for those who t so fitted to break up the way. There are nes in the life of most advancing Christians their experience is more of the Abraham ter ; when alone, unaided, and misunder- by man, they go forward where all seems where the Word of God is their only but sure warrant ; while at other times they as Isaac did, upon the realized promise, now something of rest and satisfaction. n Abraham had sent Eliezer to Mesopo- that he might seek a wife for Isaac, we he was returning with Rebekah, that went out to meditate (or to pray) in the t eventide" (Gen. 24 : 63). Thus we hat he was a man of prayer. The favor- cumstances in which he was placed, the es of God regarding him, did not render l communion with God less necessary for We often come across those who lay hold of some truth of God, either forgiveness or the power of God over sin : all is a reality to them for some days or weeks, en their feelings get cold, zeal flags, they discouraged, because they are expecting h of yesterday to do for to-day, instead g daily and hourly in communion with Every gift or knowledge which we receive d is an accession of life, and life needs stained and exercised ; just as in our life, air, food, and water are necessities, with our spiritual life. Daniel, in the the affairs of the kingdom, found time three times a day (Dan. 6 : 19). The said, "Seven times a day will I praise (Ps. 119 : 164). Paul said, "Pray with ing" (1 Thes. 5 : 17).

Rebekah came near to the spot which e her home, and saw a man in the field she asked Eliezer who it was. "And ant said, It is my master." With modesty she took a veil and covered But she would probably never forget impression which Isaac had made upon e do not know how much of real godli- e was in her father's house ; evidently s some fear of God. Abraham had left g of God behind him in his own coun- e he came out of it, for when Abra- ervant came to Laban, Rebekah's ne said to him, "Come in, thou blessed rd" (Gen. 24 : 31). It may be that in any of a man who lived so much in Eliezer, Rebekah's impressions were on the journey, and she would feel a nfidence in being united to one who n of prayer.

are some, even among believers, who ly into marriage ; some who take this lterable in God's sight, from the most onsiderations, for the gratification of an earthly affection, for the sake of possessing a home of their own, to better their earthly position, etc., without making their first consideration, Is it to the glory of God? Some, in spite of 2 Cor. 6 : 14, do not even discover whether those whom they are about to marry are, or are not, God's children. Marriage settlements are made as regards money, but no marriage settlements as to how God is to be honored in their future home. A converted girl will marry a man who has never so much as prayed with her. A converted man will unite himself for life with a girl of whom he has never so much as asked, "How does it stand between your soul and God?"

In Isaac's family and household it is very evident that prayer was the ruling feature. When his wife was barren he carried the matter to the Lord, not to the physicians, and "the Lord was entreated of him." And when Rebekah herself was in perplexity, she did not go to her neighbors, or even to her husband, but she "went to inquire of the Lord." And it was not in vain. He explained to her that He would give her two sons, which should be two nations, "and the one people shall be stronger than the other, and the elder shall serve the younger" (Gen. 25 : 21–23). Why is it not the habit in all Christian families to carry all circumstances, general and particular, to the Lord in prayer?

There was one stain upon Isaac, one which recalls to us the immense importance of the example of parents. Abraham had twice prevaricated, once in Egypt and once in Gerar, and had spoken of Sarah as his sister. Isaac also did the same. We read in the commencement of our chapter that there was a famine in the land, and "Isaac went unto Abimelech, king of the Philistines, unto Gerar. And the Lord appeared unto him and said, Go not down into Egypt ; dwell in the land which I shall tell thee of. Sojourn in this land, and I will be with thee, and will bless thee ; for unto thee, and unto thy seed, I will give all these countries ; and I will perform the oath which I sware unto Abraham thy father. And I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven, and will give unto thy seed all these countries ; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blest; because that Abraham obeyed My voice, and kept My charge, My commandments, My statutes, and My laws." It was the first direct confirmation to Isaac of God's promise to his father concerning him, and it was made just in the time of trial, when the famine was desolating, and he was among strangers, and needed the strengthening of his faith.

It was just after this that Isaac fell into the sin of denying his wife, and for the very same cause as Abraham, fear for his own life. Was not, then, the promise of God sufficient? Had he forgotten how, when his father Abraham had lifted up the knife to slay him in obedience to God's command, the angel of the Lord called out of heaven to interpose and to deliver him? and should he now tell a lie to save his life from a danger which was only a possible danger after all? God mercifully watched over Rebekah, and Isaac had the humiliation of confessing both his untruth and his cowardice before the unbelieving Philistines. Oh, why did he not trust God fully? Could his God be capable of sending him to dwell among the Philistines without insuring his safety among them?

"Then Isaac sowed in that land, and received in the same year (the year of famine) an hundredfold." We are reminded of the good ground on which the seed of the Word of God is sown, and which brings forth fruit, "some an hundredfold, some sixtyfold, some thirtyfold" (Matt. 13 : 8). It was not that Isaac was a better farmer than were the Philistines, nor yet that their land was better than the rest of the land of Canaan, but God had said, "I will be with thee, and will bless thee," and the same Word which brought into being light and life and vegetation in the time of the creation, was also in action in the time of Isaac's prosperity. "And the Lord blessed him, and the man waxed great, and went forward, and grew until he became very great, for he had possession of flocks and possession of herds, and great store of servants" (or husbandry, see margin).

No man is really blest of God, either in temporal or in spiritual things, without provoking the envy of those who know not God, and Isaac was no exception. "The Philistines envied him," and their envy took a practical turn, for they first stopped with earth all the wells which Abraham's servants had digged, so as to kill Isaac's cattle with drought, and then Abimelech said unto him, "Go from us, for thou art much mightier than we." Isaac did not contend the point, but went to the valley of Gerar, and patiently undid, with the help of his servants, the evil which the Philistines had done him ; he digged again the wells which the Philistines had stopped.

But the strife between his men and theirs was not yet at an end. Twice his servants dug a well, and each time the herdmen of Gerar laid claim to it. The first well he named Esek, i.e., contention, because they strove with him ; he did not strive with them, the strife was on their part. The second well he named Sitnah, i.e., hatred, for he saw that he was hated, and so must it ever be with God's children. They who are of the world will always grudge the children of God all they have. "And he removed from thence, and digged another well ; and for that they strove not, and he called the name of it Rehoboth ; and he said, For now the Lord hath made room for us, and we shall be fruitful in the land." When men of God commit their way unto the Lord, He will surely bring it to pass (Ps. 37 : 5) ; He knows how to make room for His own. Let us never be discouraged because things look dark ; when we are in the clear line of God's will all must be well, and He can conquer all opposition in a way which would be impossible to us.

"And Isaac went up from thence to Beersheba. And the Lord appeared unto him the same night, and said, I am the God of Abraham thy father ; fear not; for I am with thee, and will bless thee, and multiply thy seed for My servant Abraham's sake. And he builded an altar there, and called upon the name of the Lord, and pitched his tent there : and there Isaac's servants digged a well." Isaac's was a life of few trials, but whenever trial did come, the Lord appeared unto him. So long as we live on the faithfulness of the promises of God, it will be thus with us ; the blessing of the Lord which maketh rich, and to which He addeth no sorrow, will be ours. He utilizes sorrow which He permits to come from another quarter, to manifest Himself in a nearer and dearer manner than if all had gone smoothly, so that the trial itself is blessing.

When Isaac had left the land of the Philistines, "Abimelech went to him from Gerar, and Ahuzzath, one of his friends, and Phichol, the chief captain of his army." Isaac asked them a very natural question, "Wherefore come ye to me, seeing ye hate me, and have sent me away from you? And they said, "We saw certainly that the Lord was with thee : and we said, Let there be now an oath betwixt us, even betwixt us and thee, and let us make a covenant with thee ; that thou wilt do us no hurt, as we have not touched thee, and as we have done unto thee nothing but good, and have sent thee away in peace : thou art now the blessed of the Lord." "When a man's ways please the Lord, He maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him" (Prov. 16 : 7). Abimelech, although a Canaanitish king, learned to know the name of Isaac's God, and to know that the Lord was with him. It was now Isaac's turn to befriend Abimelech ; he made him a feast, and then "they rose up betimes in the morning, and sware one to another, and Isaac sent them away . . in peace." Thus God put him in a position to requite the petty annoyances of Abimelech's servants by a dignified friendship shown to their master at his own request.

FOREIGN TOPICS

Labor Troubles in England.—The London Times says: "A meeting of cotton operatives has been held at Accrington, at which it was decided to strike for an increase of wages; it was the largest meeting ever known there. The operatives are willing to take an increase of five per cent instead of ten per cent as previously demanded, or to submit their case to arbitration, but the masters do not yet see their way to accede to either alternative. Notices have already been given of 700 intended strikes." The Wages Committee of the Lancashire weavers have issued a manifesto declaring that the wages now paid the weavers are twenty-five per cent less than they were in 1853.

The British Government was Induced by Mr. Plimsoll to institute an inquiry into the shipping disasters of the past seven years, and the report has just been issued. The facts are simply appalling, and have convinced the British public that Mr. Plimsoll had only too serious ground for his indictment of unscrupulous shipowners. It appears, that between January 1st, 1873, and May 16th, 1880, 1965 vessels were reported lost or missing, and that the number of lives known to be lost by those wrecks was 10,827. The most serious part of the Government report is that relating to the causes of wrecks among which the principal are the careless lading and unseaworthy character of the ships. Such a report will doubtless so affect public opinion as to insure legislative enactments being passed to check this terrible waste of life.

The Condition of Asia Minor has been Investigated by Colonel Valentine Baker, the English officer whom the Sultan of Turkey has made a Pacha. He has presented his report to the Sultan. It exhibits a most melancholy condition of affairs. According to Baker Pacha the people of Asia Minor are the most sober, the most patient, the most long-suffering in the world. Had it been otherwise, the rule of the Sultan must long since have been renounced. Colonel Baker scarcely found one competent governor or military authority in all the broad region he traversed. The so-called courts of justice are universally and notoriously venal. The Kurds plundered the grain boats destined for relief of famine in his very presence. Deep-settled despair prevails among the inhabitants of every section, who have no hope of relief from any quarter.

Amid the widespread gloom, however, Colonel Baker reports one favorable symptom, and that is the disinterested activity of American missionaries, chiefly in the Armenian districts. He speaks with genuine admiration of the efficacy of their schools and the generous rivalry to which they stimulate Catholics and Moslems. It is to be hoped that England will consider the responsibilities she has accepted in her protectorate of Asia Minor, and not regard it as a dead letter.

The Sultan of Turkey has been Denounced to his face. A Constantinople dispatch received by the way of Syra, Greece, says: "A policy of reaction must be expected here. Fanaticism is rapidly increasing. Last week the Imaum of the Mosque, in the presence of the Sultan, denounced him as an unworthy successor of the Khalifs, upbraided him for listening to those who wish to make Christians and Mussulmans equal, and told him that the Christians must be protected and cherished as children are by their parents, but must be kept in subjection and not treated as equals." The Sultan is thus placed between two dangers. Europe insists on concessions and reforms, and if he refuse them he may lose his empire. On the other hand, if he complies, the fanaticism of his people fostered by the priests may cause him to lose his life.

Rocks Ahead is the Warning Cry of a London newspaper taking a survey of the national situation in Great Britain. It says: "When the Queen ceases to reign, the Prince of Wales will succeed her; but who will succeed King Edward? The Radical wave threatens to engulf everything. With a democratic House of Commons, a ministry countenancing the Atheist Bradlaugh, threats of Fenian risings in Ireland, and meetings to abolish the House of Lords—who can help seeing trouble in the future? Earnest attention must be paid to these signs of the times, and it will not be very long ere we shall be forced to consider them. It is not surprising to hear that the Conservative leaders are gloomy, convinced as they are that the advent of Radicalism to power betokens ill to the state. At the recent meeting of Conservatives at Lord Beauchamp's the address of Lord Beaconsfield began by pointing out the gravity of the political situation, more especially as concerns the House of Lords and its future. He said that the present House of Commons is the most dangerous one that the country has ever seen—a house bent on dealing a blow at the country gentlemen. In his opinion all landowners must be prepared for a serious attack next year on their rights and privileges."

The Baptism of the Infant Princess Recently born to the King and Queen of Spain took place on September 14th. The Patriarch of the Indies, Cardinal Benavides, baptized her with water brought from the river Jordan in Palestine for this special purpose in June last. At the christening the Cardinal Archbishop of Toledo represented the Pope. The font used for this occasion is the same that served centuries ago for Santo Domingo, and was brought down from a celebrated convent in Austria. The name of the infant is Mercedes Teresa, and her godmother is Queen Isabella.

The Jesuits Expelled from France are Intrenching themselves in English and Spanish soil. They have established nine colleges throughout Spain. Large buildings to be used for a similar purpose have been purchased on their behalf in Wales, and others near Canterbury and other places in Great Britain. These foes of freedom and true religion appear to have no lack of pecuniary resources.

An Attack by Irishmen was Made Two weeks ago on the Rev. Neville Sherbrooke, an earnest evangelical clergyman, the son-in-law of Earl Cairns, lately Lord High Chancellor of England. He was returning from a visit to the Island of Orney, accompanied by the Rev. Canon Corey, who has long been closely identified with the Irish Church Missions to Roman Catholics. A few stones were at first thrown by children, but as the party proceeded numbers of men and women left their work and joined in the attack, and the travellers were compelled to run the gauntlet at the risk of their lives for a distance of two miles amid a shower of stones, many of which passed so close to their heads that it was wonderful that they escaped unhurt. A large body of their assailants ran over the hill to endeavor to intercept them, but did not succeed in overtaking them. None of the party did anything whatever to provoke such a cowardly assault, except that they dared to travel on the public road and to pay a visit to a Protestant licensed school-house in the district. Yet these are the men who are continually accusing England in American ears of oppression, cruelty, and intolerance.

Cruelty in a Convent.—The Secrecy Surrounding convents, it has frequently been suspected, was made the cloak under which wickedness was practised which would not bear the light of day. A disclosure recently made in Italy shows that there are good grounds for the suspicion. An abbess and two nuns of a Carmelite convent at Pontremoli have just been arrested and are to be tried for the following barbarity. A female lay servant, being detected stealing bread, was tried and sentenced by them "to undergo the torments of purgatory." Having conveyed their victim to a cell, in which an iron stove stood out from the wall, they caused the stove to be heated in her presence, and then, tying her hands tightly together, behind her back, notwithstanding her struggles and cries for mercy, held her face down for several minutes close to the surface of the glowing metal, until her scorched eyes had lost their sight forever, and her whole face was converted into huge blister. They were, however, dencu by several members of the community to local authorities, who, after instituting a sea ing inquiry into the circumstances of the have consigned the abbess and her confed tormentors to prison. The courts are so rupt in Italy that it is doubtful if they w punished as they deserve.

The Persian Famine is Still Causing deaths. The Shah of Persia has given a tion of 300 tomans ($600) to the Protestant sionaries for distribution among the suffere famine in Oroomiah. This is a gratifying dence of the Shah's confidence in the mis aries' integrity. Through there is a prosp better times coming, the suffering and de tion of the people is still great, and the mor is appalling.

A Saved Soul in a Damp Cellar in Lon The War Cry of the British Salvation Arm tains the following incident: "We were se on Sunday afternoon to see a poor woman had been spoken to about neglecting this salvation. It appears that the word had home to her heart, and was used by the Ghost to convince her of her terrible con and she got on her knees at home, and before God that she would give up the (for, as she has since told us, she had n sober one whole day for four years), bu brought her no peace of conscience, f would not give up all her sins, and flir helpless, guilty soul on the boundless me the World's Redeemer, until the Lord la on a bed of affliction, when she just yield self to Jesus, and now is blessedly saved was in a damp cellar, with only a woode stead and one chair, and the atmosphere bad that it was difficult to breathe, but sl comed us, and at once told us she was knowing for a certainty her sins, whicl many, were all forgiven. She is praying be restored to health, and to be made int Salvation Soldier."

How an English Vicar's Hat was A as an answer to prayer, is thus related Literary Churchman. The vicar was one day on the cliffs near Morwenstow, i wall, when a gust of wind took off his carried it over the cliff. Within a week a Methodist preacher at Truro was disc on prayer, and in his sermon he said, " not have you, dear brethren, confine yo plications to spiritual blessings, but a for temporal favors. I will illustrate m ing by relating an incident that happene self ten days ago. I was on the shore o near Morwenstow, and about to pro Bude. I had on my head at the time worn hat, and I somewhat blushed to entering that harbor town and watering ill adorned. Then I lifted up a prayer fo ing more suited to my head. At that m raised my eyes and saw in the air a bla It approached and fell at my feet. I brand-new hat by a celebrated London I cast my battered beaver to the wa walked into Bude with a new hat on my

The Debt on Dr. Talmage's Church received from J. H. Patten, Fielding, Ill.

The Prophetic News and Israel's W (London) for September may be obtained at of The Christian Herald. Price six cen

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Works ar at the office of The Christian Herald, at low as to bring them within the reach of e Twelve Sermons on various subjects, with p of Mr Spurgeon, price 35 cents. John P Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, a volu sermons, $2.50. The Treasury of David, a cal exposition of the book of Psalms, five v as Psa. 118, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth This popular gift-book contains a suitabl selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for in the year, with a blank space opposite graphs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. appear at their respective birthdays. Th elegantly bound, and the price is 75 cent tances should accompany orders.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, Rev. W. M. HAY AITKEN, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1880. 14th Year. No. 40—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF DR. BENSON, Lord Bishop of Truro, England, and Picture of the New Cathedral of Truro.

MORMONISM. A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

ROCHESTER TOWER. A New Serial Story by Miss M. A. Paull (Continued).

THE THREE FROG SPIRITS. By Rev. M. Baxter.

NINE NEW THINGS. A New Sermon by Rev. D. L. Moody.

CURRENT EVENTS: The Democracy in New York—Secretary Sherman on Resumption—Thrilling Narrative of the Arctic Expedition—The New English Colony in Tennessee—A Remarkable Coincidence—Ghastly Discovery at Sea—A Dissipated Judge, etc.

PROPHETIC PERIODS TERMINATING IN 1890.

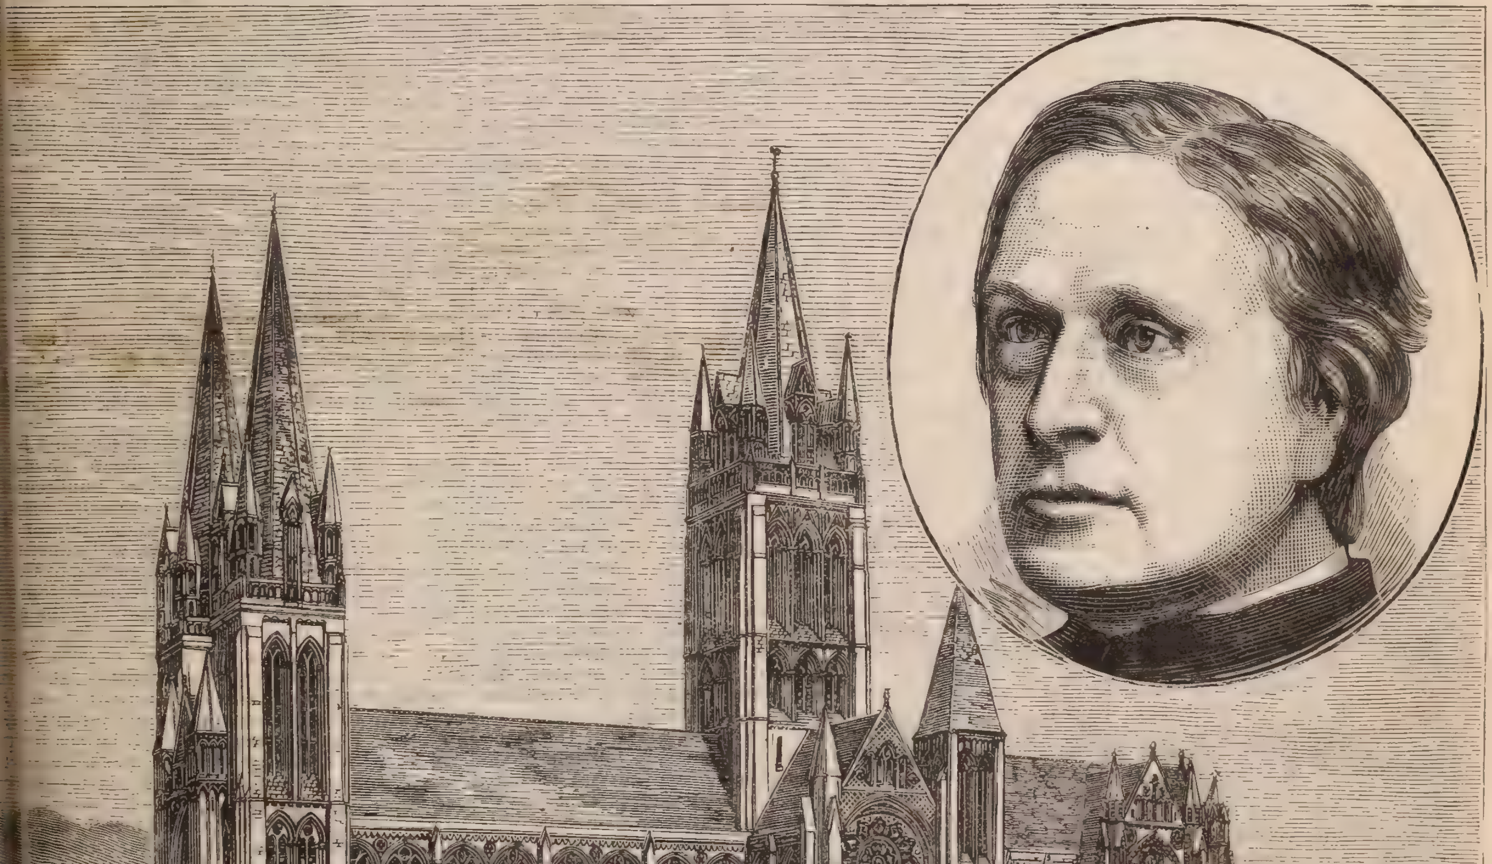
THE WATERPOTS AT CANA. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

NOT HALF A MAN. A Temperance Story.

A CHOICE VINDICATED. (Continued.)

Jacob and Esau. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.

FOREIGN TOPICS: Trouble in the East—A General War Apprehended—The Crisis in France—A Lottery for Life—A Strange Death from a Wasp's Sting, etc.



DR. BENSON, the Bishop of Truro, Cornwall, England.—The New Cathedral of the Diocese.

THE BISHOP OF TRURO, ENGLAND.

His Educational Course at Birmingham—Success at Cambridge—Experience as a Tutor—Becomes Preacher to the University, and Chaplain to the Bishop of Lincoln—Is Appointed to the Bishopric of Truro—Authorship.

The Rev. Edward White Benson, D.D., Lord Bishop of Truro, England, is the eldest son of E. W. Benson, Esq., and was born at Birmingham in the year 1829.

His early education was received at King Edward's School, Birmingham, a popular institution in the British Midland Metropolis. When young Benson studied there, the principal of the school was the Rev. James Prince Lee, who was afterward appointed Bishop of Manchester. He was an able teacher, and under his watchful care several boys, who have since attained eminence acquired the rudiments of education. Among those who were contemporary with Benson were Professor Westcott, one of the Company for the Revision of the New Testament, and among the foremost biblical scholars of the century, and the Rev. Dr. Lightfoot, the present Bishop of Durham.

Having honorably terminated the prescribed course at King Edward's School, he proceeded thence to Trinity College, Cambridge, where his career was rapid and successful, and of which he was successively Scholar and Fellow. In 1852 he graduated Bachelor of Arts, securing at the same time a First Class in classical honors, and winning also the enviable distinction of Senior Chancellor's Classical Medallist.

In 1855 he graduated Master of Arts, in 1862 he was made Bachelor of Divinity, and obtained the diploma of Doctor of Divinity in 1867. He was for some years an assistant-master in Rugby School, and discharged the onerous function of the head mastership of Wellington College from its initiation in 1858 down to the year 1872, when he was selected as Canon Residentiary and Chancellor of Lincoln Cathedral, having held the prebend of Heydour with Walton in the same cathedral for three years previously.

As a well-deserved tribute, which was paid to his eminent qualifications, he was appointed select preacher to the University of Cambridge in 1864, and again in 1871, receiving a similar proof of the high estimate in which he was held from the University of Oxford, and occupying the same position in this ancient school of learning in 1875-76. For several years he acted as Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Lincoln, and not only proved that he was actuated by sentiments of a purely evangelical character, but manifested also his earnest sympathy with all who, by means of missionary operations, were seeking to spread the truths of the Gospel in the neglected parts of the diocese.

But higher and more responsible honors awaited him. His ripe scholarship and many peculiar and pre-eminent qualifications secured his nomination by the Crown in 1876, on the recommendation of the late Premier, the Earl of Beaconsfield, to the newly-founded Bishopric of Truro, Cornwall, and he received the prescribed episcopal consecration in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, on Wednesday, April 25th, 1877. The ceremony was performed by His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by a large number of bishops. The diocese over which Dr. Benson exercises pastoral and episcopal sway has been for many years included in the See of Exeter, but it is virtually a restoration of the ancient British diocese of Cornwall, consisting of the county of Cornwall, the Isles of Scilly, and five parishes of Devonshire, constituting the Archdeaconry of Cornwall, with the Church of St. Mary, Truro, as a cathedral. The enthronization took place on May-day, 1877.

His lordship has published several volumes of considerable intrinsic merit, among them being his "Wellington College Chapel Sermons"; a memorial discourse upon the decease of Bishop Lee, of Manchester; "Cambridge University Sermons"; a valuable and entertaining treatise on "Boy-Life, its Trial, Strength, and Fulness," being reminiscences of the days of his Mastership of Wellington College; besides numerous single sermons preached on special occasions. He is also one of the contributors to "The Speaker's Commentary on the Bible."

Dr. Benson married, in 1859, Mary, daughter of the late Rev. William Sidgwick, of Skipton, Yorkshire.

TRURO AND ITS NEW CATHEDRAL.

Position and Name of Truro—Eminent Men who were Born there—The Prince of Wales's Visit to Lay the Foundation-stone of a New Cathedral—The Origin and History of Cathedral Churches—Cromwell's Vandalism—Particulars of the New Truro Cathedral—Physical Features of the County of Cornwall—Its Ancient Legends and Religious History.

The town of Truro grew up under the shadow of the Earls of Cornwall's fortress, and about the year 1130 assumed such proportions that its lord, the celebrated Richard de Lacy, Chief Justiciary of England, granted it a charter of incorporation. Queen Elizabeth also gave it a new charter in 1589, and constituted it a municipal borough, under a mayor, four aldermen, and twenty chief burgesses, to whom she conceded the privilege of returning two members to Parliament.

Old Leland's description of Truro may still be quoted as a faithful one: "The creke of Truro afore the very town is divided into two parts, and eche of them has a brook cumming down, and a bridge, and this towne of Truro betwixt them both." It assumes, therefore, something of a triangular shape, washed on the east by the river Allen, and on the west by the Kenwyn. Between the streams lies Truro proper. The creek or inlet—a branch of Falmouth Harbor—expands at high water into a noble lake, two miles in length, and of sufficient depth for vessels of a hundred tons burden to load or unload at the quays."

"There is not a towne in the west part of the shire," wrote Norden in 1574, "more commendable for neatness of buyldinges, nor more discommendable for the pride of the people." The first clause of his pithy description may still be repeated and affirmed; the second might now be justly considered a libel.

Truro is in an eminent degree a busy, prosperous, and well-to-do town; its principal streets, which radiate from the market-place, and are mostly enlivened by a pleasant water-course, are well kept, and lined with good houses and thriving shops; its public buildings, too, are of more than ordinary pretensions. So with its churches—they are capacious, handsome in architectural design, and decorously preserved. The trade of Truro is, indeed, considerable; it exports copper ore to Swansea, bar tin to the Mediterranean, and ingots to the East Indies. It has 12,000 inhabitants.

The inhabitants are justly proud of the many men of eminence who claim Truro for their birthplace, among them being the brothers Richard and John Lander, the adventurous explorers of the Niger; Henry Martyn, one of the most earnest and self-denying of missionaries, the son of a common miner; Dr. Thomas Harries, one of the founders of the London Missionary Society; and Richard Polwhele, the historian.

The new cathedral at Truro is to form the central seat and sanctuary of the bishopric revived three years ago, when Dr. Benson was enthroned at St. Mary's Church, a substantial building, erected in the year 1518. The foundation-stone of the new cathedral was laid on May 20th of this year by the Prince of Wales.

It is centuries since any new cathedral was founded in England. The stately and beautiful edifices which enrich the episcopal capitals of Great Britain were, with hardly an exception, built by the piety and munificence of founders who lived prior to the Reformation and before the middle of the sixteenth century. Some of them, as is well known, are of a venerable antiquity; there are stones at Rochester which were laid by Gundulph, the Bishop of William the Conqueror, more than eight hundred years since. Canterbury contains shrines and carvings of the time of Rufus, and the Abbey of Westminster ascends by its origin to Edward the Confessor, in the eleventh century.

Later reigns saw the erection of fresh cathedral churches, or the completion and beautifying of the old ones, and the Reformed Church of England inherited from its ancestors the noble and splendid temples with which is associated so much of her dignity. Building cathedrals, however, was always costly work, demanding not only the intense artistic feeling which so many of them exhibit, and the earnest faith of which their massive plans are monuments, but vast sums of money besides. The spoils of war, the treasures of princes, the gains of merchandise, the profits of trade, silver and gold ornaments, jewels and silks and velvets, the rose-nobles of rich men, and the groats of poor votaries, were all poured together into the hands of those who reared these stately fanes. They were built to stand for ages, and they have survived many changes of faith and government.

The simple Liturgy of Protestantism has replaced the Mass and the ornate ritualism of Rome. Sentiment is shocked to think how Cromwell's troopers stabled their horses in their lofty nave, and shattered their beautiful stained windows, whence the light falls, golden and purple, upon tombs of ancient magnates. But it is sentiment only that is shocked. Sense reminds us that the danger which in Cromwell's time menaced true religion in England was very imminent. Those who worshipped God in spirit and in truth had to do so in secret, and the ornate cathedral worship, with its Romanizing ceremonies and tendencies, was encouraged by the king and court. A strong deliverer was needed, who had small respect for ecclesiasticism to recall the country from formalism and superstition. God raised up Cromwell to do that and other necessary work, and he did it with a rough hand, but he did it well and thoroughly. England owes in no small degree the civil and religious liberty she enjoys at this day to Cromwell's fight, but she repaid him by digging his bones from their grave and heaping indignitie upon them.

Since that day the cathedrals of England hav become centres of gentle and solemn influence which all classes respect; but for hundreds o years England has seen no new cathedral reared

The diocesan church, the foundation-stone o which the Prince of Wales laid, will constitut the ecclesiastical heart of the new See of Cornwall, and furnish a means of comparison between both the artistic inspiration and the public liberality of the old and the new times. It structure will display the Early English style with thirteenth century characteristics, and is t contain all the established features of choir an nave, transepts, baptistery, crypt, central tower and two western towers. It will be 300 feet i length, with a width of 76 feet and a height o 70 feet, the central tower rising 224 feet abov the floor. Ninety thousand pounds are require to complete what may be called merely the she of the edifice, for this only is at present con templated, the internal ornamentation and th erection of the towers being left to the futur The old historical fanes thus imitated were bui in the same gradual manner, beginning wit "little things." The generosity of Lady Roll herself the daughter of a Cornish rector, has s on foot the endowment of the new See with th munificent donation of forty thousand pounds.

Separated by history, by geography, by cl mate, race, natural features, and local industri from the rest of England, the county of Corn wall is almost like another country. If it wer only more difficult to reach, it would become favorite a place for tourists as Switzerland o Brittany. But the accessible never attracts, an thousands of English travellers go abroad wh have never visited, and never will visit, this wor derful corner of their own kingdom.

The coast-line of the county alone is we worth a visit. From the beautiful Sound Plymouth to the land-locked waters of F nouth, and still westward to the Lizard and the and's End, no more magnificent seashore can e found throughout Europe. A hundred clefts nd inlets, unknown to ordinary maps, break he green rampart of the hills with little hidden ays, where the blue and silver sea sleeps under he shadow of dark cliffs. In the tract around he Lizard, where the serpentine rock abounds, he country is like fairy-land with that richly ariegated stone; the very pebbles in the road re so many rough jewels; the banks, crowned ith Mediterranean heath, shine with blue and arlet nodules, and at Kynance Cove is one of e most extraordinary and fantastic scenes to e found upon the surface of the globe.

On the north coast, below Tintagel and the thundering shores of Bude and Boss," are nds and sweeping bays, and in the interior ose bare rolling moorlands, where lurk the ins of copper and lead, tin and ironstone, hich, from the date of the Phœnicians until to y, have made the fame, and sometimes the rtune, of the county. Time was, no doubt, en the mainland of Cornwall ran on unbroken the Scilly Islands, and ancient legends tell of ore than one hundred churches submerged by e encroaching sea between Mount's Bay and ose ancient Cassiterides.

The Prince of Wales is also Duke of Cornwall, itle which he inherits from the Black Prince. us in a special sense the Heir Apparent and consort the Duchess of Cornwall belong rsonally to the Cornishmen, and have been eived and entertained by them with the loyy for which "Tre, Pol, and Pen" have ever n famous.

n journeying well-nigh down to the Land's d to aid in re-establishing the lapsed See of ich Corentin, Bedwini, and St. Petrock were first bishops, the Prince does not head any pagandist movement. Churches and chapels find plenty of room together between the seas of Cornwall, and no such mission is l on Dr. Benson as that confided to Eadulf, hop of Crediton, when he was posted on the nar, "that from thence he might every year t the Cornish race to extirpate their errors, hey had resisted the truth, and not obeyed apostolic decrees."

OPHETIC PERIODS TERMINATING IN 1890.

(Continued from page 621.)

1260 Years—The Primary Commencement—he Fall of the Pope's Temporal Power—Ex-act from the Life of Napoleon—Another Comencement — The 360 Years — The General gns of the End.

HE 1260 years is mentioned twice in Daniel five times in Revelation as 1260 days, 42 ths, or 3½ times (i.e. 3½ years) (Dan. 5; 12 : 7; Rev. 11 : 2, 3; 12 : 6, 14; 13 : 5). its year-day fulfilment as 1260 years it sures the principal exercise of the persecutpower of the Papal Antichrist in the West, of the Mohammedan Antichrist in the East, of which thus typify and prefigure the final onal Infidel Antichrist, whose persecuting incipally to be exercised during the final days. And similarly the seven seals, pets and vials—and, in fact, the main part evelation 5 to 16, have a double fulfilment— by way of rehearsal during about 1860 years ghout this Dispensation in connection the Papal and Mohammedan 1260 years; dly, more literally during about 1800 days closing crisis of this Dispensation, in conon with the 1260 literal days of the Per- Infidel Antichrist. This view of the le fulfilment, both year-day and literal day, arge part of Daniel and Revelaton, is iningly held by the best expositors.

e primary commencement of the 1260 years Papal Antichrist was at the era of the ror Justinian's Code of Laws, A.D. 533– system of universal jurisprudence, which, g other provisions, gave temporal power to the Pope. This epoch is fixed upon by numerous prophetic expositors as an initial commencement of the 1260 years. Another com mcement is considered by some expositors to have been at the Emperor Phocas's decree in 607, when the Pope's power was more fully confirmed over all the dioceses.

The initiated fall of the Pope's temporal power took place in 1793–1815, the epoch of the great French Revolution, just 1260 years from the initial commencement of its rise in 533–55. In France the Roman Catholic religion was abolished by national decree in 1793, but in 1802 the fall of the Papacy was staved off for a time, and it was restored to a portion of its former power by Napoleon Bonaparte's Concordat with the Pope for restoring and renationalizing the Roman Catholic religion in France, which is thus described in Sir Walter Scott's history of Bonaparte:

"When the ratifications of this Concordat or treaty were published it was singular to behold how submissively the once proud See of Rome lay prostrate before the power of Bonaparte, and how absolutely he must have dictated all the terms of the treaty. Every article in it innovated on some of those rights and claims which the Church of Rome had for ages asserted. By this compact Pius VII. surrendered to Bonaparte—a soldier whose name was five or six years before unheard of—those claims to supremacy which his predecessors had maintained for so many ages against the whole of the potentates of Europe. A Puritan might now have said of the Power seated on the Seven Hills, 'Babylon is fallen—it is fallen, that great city.' The more rigid Catholics were of the same opinion. This Concordat, they alleged, showed the debasement of the Roman hierarchy. It was inaugurated at Notre Dame (April, 1802) with the utmost magnificence. Bonaparte took care to make his full advantage of the Concordat by introducing his own name as much as possible into the Catechism of the Church. To honor Napoleon, the Catechism taught, was the same as to honor and serve God Himself; to oppose his will was to incur the penalty of eternal damnation."

In the year 1809, however, Napoleon Bonaparte, being displeased with the Pope, arrested him in Rome as a prisoner, and had him conveyed to France, where he died. From this profound humiliation the Papacy recovered to some extent after Bonaparte's overthrow in 1815. The close of the 1260 years of the Pope's temporal power, which commenced with Justinian's universal Code of Laws in 533–55, was strikingly marked by the promulgation by Napoleon Bonaparte of a new universal Code of Laws, which, like Justinian's, has since been adopted by half Europe—thus marking the introduction of a new era. And there is an interval of 75 years—the excess of the 1335 years beyond the 1260 years—from this first shock and blow to the Papacy in 1793–1815 until its final death-blow at the consummating epoch in 1868–1890; the present recovery of the Pope's temporal power from its unparalleled abasement in 1793–1815 is only short-lived, and precursory to its utter and irrevocable overthrow at the distance of 75 years from that premonitory abasement.

Another commencement of the 1260 years of the Papal Antichrist's temporal power has been held by many expositors to be at the Emperor Phocas's decree in 606–8, granting increased supremacy to the Pope, and constituting him universal Bishop over all the dioceses, even that of Constantinople, for in 588 the Patriarch of Constantinople had resisted and denied the authority of the Bishop of Rome. Boniface IV. was at that time Pope, 607 to 614, and this may be regarded as a fuller establishment of the Pope's temporal power. Bower, in his "Standard History of the Popes," strenuously maintains that Phocas's decree in 607 is thus regarded by historians, and by Roman Catholic authorities themselves. The dedication of the Pantheon in Rome to Popish worship took place in 608.

This era of 607–14 was also the date of the manifestation of the Mohammedan Antichrist in the Eastern Roman Empire, as well as of the Papal Antichrist in the Western Roman Empire. Mohammed's earliest public preaching of the doctrine of Mohammedanism was during the years, 608–14, and in 614 the Persians captured Jerusalem, which paved the way for its becoming a Mohammedan possession.

The 1260 years evidently has one very distinct fulfilment, measuring the duration of the Mohammedan Antichrist from A.D. 622, the commencement of the Mohammedan Calendar, to 1882, after which the seven years of the covenant between the Napoleonic Antichrist and the Jews will probably run their course until 1890; and the latter half of those seven years, from 1886 to 1890, may be the three and a half years of the slaying of Protestant witnesses throughout Christendom, as foretold by many writers, such as Scott the commentator, Dr. Gill, Dr. Macleod, Dr. Hales, Dr. Berg, Hollis Read, E. Nangle, etc., to occur at the close of this Christian dispensation in the year-day fulfilment of Revelation 11 : 7-12.

The 360 years (Rev. 10 : 6) point to about A.D 1890 as the end of this age. It is generally admitted that Rev. 10 describes the Reformation from 1517 to 1530, from which period, therefore, we must date the Angel's statement that "there shall be a (Gr.) time no longer before the mystery is finished," which means that 360 years (a time or year of 360 natural days) will not elapse from 1530 before the end of this dispensation, which must therefore occur by 1890. Bickersteth, Birks, and others have thus interpreted it, and the Rev. J. Fletcher, in his letter to Wesley, wrote in about 1750:

"As to the various prophetic numbers in the Bible, let me only beg of you to observe the following: 'And the Angel swore by Him that liveth for ever and ever, that there will not be a time more' (kronos ouk estai), Rev. 10 : 6—which word 'time' in St. John and Daniel signifies a year, and a prophetic year—namely, 360 years. If it be true that the Reformation of the seven Protestant countries is here signified, it will follow that from the Reformation there will not be a whole time, or 360 years, till 'the mystery of God should be finished' (Rev. 10 : 7), which He told for our comfort to His servants and the prophets."

In addition to the evidence from these dates, as thus interpreted by numerous expositors, we have, as general signs of the times, the wide preaching of the Gospel, the return of the Jews, which began in 1844, the many running to and fro, the decay of the Pope's temporal power and of the Turkish Empire, and the extensive revivals of religion, also the fact that we are approaching the seventh Seal, the seventh Trumpet, the seventh Vial, in their year-day fulfilment.

It is a most serious error to suppose that we can neglect to discern the signs of the times, and yet be prepared to meet Christ at His Advent. The remark is often heard by ignorant persons who "despise prophesyings," that "death is the end of the world to us, and as it may come at any time, it is well to be ready." Such persons require to be reminded that readiness for death is not necessarily readiness for Christ's Advent. Those who are once truly converted are sure to be saved, and are always prepared for death, but not necessarily prepared for the Second Advent, unless they are really expecting it to happen at the very time when it actually does occur, and not to happen at any other time, and openly confessing their belief.

Various passages in the Word of Prophecy intimate that there will be only 144,000 watchful Christians or wise virgins (Rev. 14) caught up to meet Christ in the First Translation or Ascension at His coming in the air—although there are probably about five million truly converted persons now upon the earth, nearly all of whom, however, will be foolish virgins, left behind to be chastised in the three and a half years' Great Tribulation, and (if still living) then caught up afterward at the Second Translation.

MORMONISM.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, September 26th, 1880.

"Then the Lord rained upon Sodom brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven."—Genesis 19 : 24.

Sodom and Utah Synonymous—The Mountain Meadow Massacre—Large and Increasing Growth of Mormon Immigration—Mormonism a most Stupendous Swindle—The Danites—A Great Blasphemy—A Disloyalty to the U. S. Government—An Organized Filth—An Instance of Depravity—Miseries of the Aged Mormon Women—Mormonism Growing in Influence—Its Influence in Congress—What is Best to be Done?—Only to be Extirpated by U. S. Guns—National Police Duty—Anti-Mormonism a better Political Cry than Negro Slavery—What Shall the Sentence be?—The Execution and Epitaph—An Eloquent Appeal on Behalf of Mormon Womanhood.

Sodom and Salt Lake City are synonymous. You can hardly think of the one without thinking of the other. Both in fertile valleys—valley of Siddim, valley of Utah. Both near a salt, offensive, fishless dead sea; for Doctor Robinson says there must have been a lake near by while yet ancient Sodom stood. Both the famous capitals of most accursed impurity. Both doomed.

In 1857 a company of emigrants started from Arkansas and Missouri for California. They were good, respectable, well-to-do people; but they had an idea that they might have larger comforts for their families on the other side the mountains; so they undertook what always seems to me a terrible thing: travelling in the wagon emigrant train. They suffered everything on the way. By night the fires kept off the wolves, and by day there was fatigue, and hunger, and heat, and gentle womanhood fainting with the long journey, and children crying for rest.

There were one hundred and seventy in that company. They must needs cross Utah Territory, and in Utah nearly all the emigrant trains were accustomed to take in new supplies of provisions; but Brigham Young heard that this emigrant train was coming, and he forbade, under pain of death, any Mormon in Utah giving any clothing, or food, or medicine, or kindness of any sort to these emigrants. It was a revenge for the fact that a man in Arkansas had slain Elder Pratt, of the Mormon Church, because he (Elder Pratt) had stolen the wife of the man in Arkansas and taken her to Utah and into Mormonism.

On and on went this emigrant train, suffering all indignity, until they came to a plain called

MOUNTAIN MEADOW.

The Indians dashed down upon the emigrants, but the emigrants threw up a barricade, and in this temporary fortress drove back the red men most successfully. Then the Mormon militia dashed down upon these emigrants; but you know how men will fight when they fight for their wives and children, and so the Mormon militia were driven back. Still, it was only with great peril that any one could leave the temporary fortress even to get water from the spring near by.

There was great suffering from thirst, so one day they dispatched two little girls clad in white to bring water from the spring. They said, "Most certainly the Mormon militia will not disturb them;" but no sooner had they appeared outside the barricade than they were shot dead by the stream. Petitions for relief were signed by all the emigrants, and by Odd Fellows and Freemasons who made appeals to members of their particular order. Three brave men volunteered to carry that petition for relief to California. An aged Methodist minister of the group in prayer commended these three men to God, and the emigrants all knelt in supplication; but hardly had these three brave men started on their journey than they were butchered.

Time passed on, and one day wagons were seen coming. "Now," thought the poor emigrants, "we shall have relief;" and they could not restrain their glee at the thought of liberation. The wagons came up, and from them came a flag of truce, saying, "If you emigrants will surrender and put down your arms, you may walk out into perfect liberty, and you shall not be harmed." Thinking the proposition a fair proposition, it was accepted, and they put down their arms according to the arrangement, and then the men marched out first, then came the women, then came the children.

After they were outside the barricade, the Mormon militia, with guns and knives and daggers, massacred all save a few little children, whom they thought to be too young to tell the story. Aged and young, husbands and wives, parents and children left dead on the plain. Women belonging to the emigrant train who were sick and unable to walk, were then taken out by the Mormons into the presence of their murdered families, stripped of their clothing, shot dead, and hurled upon the heap of corpses. The wagons, the stock of the train, the dresses of the women and their jewelry, amounting in all to a property of $300,000, taken possession of by the Mormon government. Years after, a Mormon woman showing a silk dress that had been captured from the train—showing one of these silk dresses in Salt Lake City—one of the little girls that had been saved from the massacre recognized it. She said, "O, that's my mother's. Where's mamma? Why don't mamma come? Mamma used to wear that!" and she burst into tears.

John D. Lee, the Mormon Bishop, was the presiding spirit in person of that massacre, and when, fifteen or eighteen years after, in the court-room, he gave testimony, he said he had orders to do that from headquarters; and it appeared on the evidence that Brigham Young had given orders as to the disposition of the property of these murdered people, and had told the witnesses to hush up, and all Christendom to-day holds that man responsible for the tragedy. No wonder when, years after he visited the scene and found that the bones of the emigrants had been decently buried by the officers of the United States Government, and General Carlton had put up a head-board by the grave, with the epitaph, the inscription, "Vengeance is mine: I will repay, saith the Lord"—no wonder that Brigham Young, seeing that inscription, ordered it torn down.

It is the presiding spirit of the Mountain Meadow massacre that I arraign to-day for trial before you, the jury of Americans. It still lives. It has its throne in Salt Lake City, and its foot on the heart of dishonored woman, and its breath is the pestilence of the nation. Gory, ghastly, hideous, infernal Mormonism, stand up, and look into the faces of the American jury that is to try you!

This summer, as well as on a previous occasion, I had the opportunity of

INSPECTING THIS INIQUITY,

and of asking many questions, and having them answered by Mormons and anti-Mormons. Many of the prominent Gentiles of Salt Lake City called on me and asked me that when I got home I should present the case before the people on this coast. I solemnly promised them, and this morning I fulfil my promise.

In regard to the alleged subsidence of Mormonism, I have to tell you that 750 Mormons had arrived in Salt Lake City, or in Utah, just before we went to Utah, and that there was another company still larger approaching the city, and that there were 10,000 added last year, and that there will be more than that added this year. Three hundred missionaries sent out to gather up victims all over this land, and in Sweden and Norway, and Russia and Germany, and England and Ireland and Scotland. Many Scotch Presbyterians recently brought there.

These missionaries compelled to go out, although their families may suffer the greatest penury; for this whole system is cruel and Herodic. These missionaries go to those who are in the struggle of life, and they hide all the hideous deformities of Mormonism, and tell these people, "Now, if you will cross the ocean and go to Utah, you will have your expenses pai and where you will have gardens and farms your own, and your hardships will be ended fo ever." No wonder some of these incautio people accept the invitation, and they fly fro poverty to get into

A MOST STUPENDOUS SWINDLE.

Oh, you ought to see the poor creatures carr ing the tenth of their small income and the ten of the small product of their farm or garden the tithing-house of this insatiate institutio They are taxed until the blood comes. N escape but the grave. The co-operative societi and the co-operative stores of Utah are so ma mills to grind out more money from the po people to support a depraved priesthood. charge Mormonism with being one great a prolonged cruelty.

Nobody denies the work of the destroyi angels called Danites, whose chief business it w to hunt up antagonism to the Mormon Gove ment and put it to death. It was for years t land of assassination and the field of bloc No one doubts the Hickman butcheries und Brigham Young. I saw a cellar where a mot and two sons had been put to death; the mot slain in the presence of the two sons, and t two sons butchered, because they had reveal the secrets of the Mormon government.

The whole world has heard the story of t destruction of the Aiken party. And th Mormons have a delicious vernacular by whi they describe this putting to death. They s all these things with a smile and a jeer. "C they were put out of the way;" or, "they m with a bad accident;" or, "they were used up or, "they were cut off just under their ears Why have these atrocities stopped? Becaus regiment of United States soldiers are on t hill overlooking the city, and with iron rake destruction may rake that city if it attempts repeat such atrocity. It is not because Morm ism is more merciful, but because it has not t courage.

I charge Mormonism with being a great bl phemy. Brigham Young, in one of his sermo declared that Christ Himself was a practi polygamist, that Mary and Martha were plural wives, that Mary Magdalene was anoth and he said in the same sermon that the bri feast in Cana of Galilee, where Christ tur water into wine, was the occasion of one of own marriages! The whole tendency of the s tem toward blasphemy. I was told over and o again that Brigham Young, with slight prov tion, would swear like a fishwoman at Billin gate!

I charge upon Mormonism that it is a dis alty to the United States Government. Th is an oath taken in the Endowment House Salt Lake City which subverts all other oa Perjury is no crime when enacted in behal Mormonism. Mormonism hates the Gov ment of the United States with a perfect hat Fourth of July occasions and all patriotic dem strations are utter abhorrence to the Morm and the Gentile celebrators of the Fourth July suffer every indignity. Mormonism wo like to have the United States Government ish to-day.

I charge upon Mormonism that it is an org ized filth, built on polygamy. There is a ma Salt Lake City who has three wives, and t are the mother, the grandmother, and the gr daughter. I observed that there were additi built on the houses, and it was explained to that when a new wife is taken, then the hou enlarged, forgetting the fact that no house ever large enough to hold two women mar to the same man!

Think of a system which applauds a man such things. Think of a system which tea that the more wives a man lives with at the s time on earth, the higher his honor in hea Think of a system which commends a man living in marriage at the same time with t sisters. Think of a system which wrecks happiness of every woman that touches it; f do not care what they say, God never m woman who can cheerfully divide her husband's ove with another. Every honest woman knows, very honest wife knows she has a right to the ntire throne of her husband's affection. They nay smile to keep up appearances, but they ave an agony of death; and the most pitiable hing in all the earth is an aged woman in Mor onism.

The aged woman in other parts of the land e bow before: we take off our hat to her, we do er reverence. The softest chair in the house is randmother's chair. She is the queen on hristmas and Thanksgiving Day. The older e gets, and the more wrinkles on her face, and e more stooped her shoulder, the more we ink of her; and when God takes her away to e eternal rest, it seems as if three fourths of e house were torn down. But a woman get ng aged in Mormonism, she is shoved back, d is paid less and less attention, and is of ss and less account. Why? Another has ken the throne, and after a while she will be throned, and another will come up, and other.

I tell you, Mormonism is one great surge of entiousness; it is

THE SERAGLIO OF THE REPUBLIC;

is the concentred corruption of this land; is the brothel of the nation; it is hell enthron . This miserable corpse of Mormonism has en rotting in the sun, and rotting and rotting d rotting for forty years, and the United ates Government has not had the courage to ry it.

oreover, it is all the time gaining in influ e. Mormonism once meant Utah; now to a tain extent it means Idaho, Arizona, Nevada, oming, New Mexico. Wider and wider and ler, and greater and greater and greater. It oing forth to debauch this nation. You have idea of the influence it is having in Ameri politics, or what it has already done at shington. Mormonism receives one million lars every year through the tithing system, has plenty of money with which to affect onal legislation.

he subject was brought before Congress, and matter was referred to a committee, and of the members of the committee said in de on, "What do you make all this fuss about ygamy for? Those Mormons out there make eligion of having four or five wives, while e of us members of Congress practice the in ty without any religion." A stout effort is g made to introduce Utah as a State of the on, and if it be accomplished, the United es Government puts its broad seal of appro on upon this stupendous indecency.

Now," you say,

"WHAT IS BEST TO BE DONE?"

cute the law against polygamy. What right the law to punish a man for bigamy, if one this side of Utah he have two wives, when foot the other side the law lets him have ty? What right has the law to smite lib ism in other parts of this country, when e it licenses it?

What!" say you, "would you interfere with n's religion?" Oh, no! If these Mormons to believe that Joseph Smith was God; or Brigham Young is the second person of the ity, the law has no right to interfere with ; but Mormonism not only antagonizes stianity, it antagonizes good morals, and nfidel and the Christian stand side by side nouncing Mormonism as a foe to free insti ns. Then, I say, away with it! Moral asion first, if possible; but moral per on, I tell you, will not accomplish it. They declared over and over again they will eir city go down under the bombshell be they will surrender polygamy; and I tell hat Mormonism will never be destroyed until destroyed by the guns of the United States rnment.

would not be war. I hate war. It would tional police duty executing the law against amy. Why did they not let General John 1857, with his 2500 troops sent out under the order of President Buchanan, march right on until they did their work? President Buchanan never was charged with excessive courage, but he sent out Governor Powell, of Kentucky, and Major McCullough, of Tennessee, to offer pardon to all the Mormons who would put down their arms, and there has not been a President of the United States with enough moral courage since to clean out that national stable.

We all go to look at it. President Grant went to look at it. Schurz, the Secretary, went to look at it. Secretary Thompson went to look at it. President Hayes went to look at it. Everybody goes to look at it. We cross the continent, and it is one of the arts of Mormonism to be very gracious to public men. The Mormons struggle as to who shall have the privilege of entertainment. I never addressed a more genial audience in my life than last August, in the Mormon Opera House, a great many Mormons present. They bow you into the city and they bow you out of the city, and none of us dare touch them. We all want to be Congressmen, or President of the United States, or Minister to England, and if we oppose Mormonism it will oppose our political interests. And so, if I were an aspirant for any political office, this sermon might, perhaps, be very impolitic.

If there be any truth in transmigration of souls, I hope that the soul of Andrew Jackson will get into the body of some of our Presidents, and make proclamation that within thirty days all these Mormons must decide upon one wife or go to jail, or quit the country.

Arbitration, by all means, but if that will not do, then peaceful proclamation. If that will not do, then howitzer and bombshell and bullets and cannon-ball. If a gang of thieves should squat on a territory and make thievery a religion, how long would the United States Government stand that? Yet a community founded on theft would not be so bad as a community founded on the grave of desolated, destroyed, embruited womanhood.

I call the attention of the American Congress to this evil. The hour has come. Let some Senator of the United States at the next meeting of Congress, or some member of the House of Representatives, with eloquent tongue and persistent purpose, and good morals of his own, lift and then unroll the tragedy and outrages of that appalling system before the Government and before the people, and that man will gather around him all the sympathies of all the families and all the churches, and all the reformers and all the high-toned men and women of America.

THE ANTI-MORMON STANDARD,

Come, now, instead of exhuming the wrapped-up and entombed mummy of negro slavery, and tossing it about in these Presidential elections, have one live question—Mormonism, the white slavery of to-day—and have it decided at the ballot-box whether that institution shall go forth with its pestiferous influence, or whether under the law of our civilization and the stroke of the law it shall perish.

Now, as I have empanelled you as a jury to sit in trial of this giant of lust and disloyalty, and the evidence has been presented before you, are you ready for the verdict before you leave the jury-box? Guilty, or not guilty? "Guilty," says one. "Guilty," say all. Then

WHAT SHALL THE SENTENCE BE?

It must not be a small incarceration, it must not be a slight censure. While we have only pity for the victims of this abomination, and we pray God He will speedily deliver them, for this institution of Mormonism, as such, only extinction and death. But where shall the execution and when shall the execution take place? What scaffolding will be strong enough to hold such a monster of iniquity. One end of the scaffolding must be planted on the Rocky Mountains, and the other on the Sierra Nevadas.

But what Friday of what gloomy week, of what gloomy month of what gloomy year would be gloomy enough for the execution of this beastly outlaw? What grave deep enough for this stout, thousand-armed, thousand-footed, thousand-headed, thousand-horned, thousand-fanged corpse? What epitaph for that grave, unless it be this: "Here lies Mormonism, the outlaw, the libertine, and the murderer, the hero of Mountain Meadow massacre. Born February 22d, 1827, died 1882 at the hand of the law and under the indignation of the Almighty"? "Then the Lord rained upon Sodom brimstone and fire from the Lord of heaven."

Oh, good people of the United States, whether I address you face to face, or through the printing-press which every Monday morning in most of our cities gives me an audience—for which I am very thankful—whatever way I reach your ear or your eye, I have to tell you that unless we destroy Mormonism, Mormonism will destroy us. If God be good and pure and just, He will not let this nation go unwhipped much longer if we allow that iniquity to go unchallenged.

Every day as a nation we consent to Mormonism we are defying the hail and the lightning and the tempest, and the drought and the mildew, and the epidemic and the plague, and the hurricane, and the earthquake of an incensed God. My plea this morning is in behalf of fifteen thousand Gentiles who in Utah are suffering persecution for their principle, or speechless because they do not want their commercial interests sacrificed. I plead for thousands of foreigners who, deceived and betrayed from their own country, have been introduced into Mormonism, and thousands of miles away from their native country can make no resistance, but must live and die in dumb despair.

I PLEAD FOR WOMANHOOD IN UTAH

—womanhood under foot, womanhood in the sewer, womanhood crushed until it cannot weep, womanhood looking out of the barred windows of a perdition of anguish toward what seems an unpitiying heaven, crying, "O Lord, how long, O Lord!" womanhood in the pandemonium of a polygamous home; womanhood with garlands of hope and affection and honor torn with the swine's snout of incestuous abomination; womanhood that, if it had a chance, or had a chance in the past, would have been as pure and good as that which presides at your table to-day, or which long ago bent in benediction over your peaceful cradle, before you began the struggle with the world.

O men with wives, and daughters, and mothers! O brothers with sisters! do not your ears tingle, and does not your blood run cold at this story of Mormonism? And are you not determined, at the ballot-box, and with pen and tongue, and in every possible way, to war against it? O you wives, who will to-night kneel before God, thanking Him for the home in which you are the undisputed queen! O mothers with daughters coming up honored and defended, no rough hand to touch them from cradle to grave, will you not in your prayers to-day sympathize with your sisters who are dying the slow death of Mormonism?

O ye aged couples! who have been in each other's company for thirty or forty or fifty years, climbing the hill of life together, and now going down on the other side the hill in the light of the setting sun, but all the way up and all the way down supreme in each other's affection—united in holy marriage so long ago that all the witnesses but God are dead; your sympathies strengthened by the birth hour, when one life was spared and another added, and by the grave over which both your hearts broke at once; her face, with all the wrinkles, more attractive now to you than when rosy with youth, because it is written all over with precious memories; side by side so long, so long, so long, that when God takes one of you He will soon take the other—O ye aged couple! remember this day in prayer before God those to whom old age brings neglect and dethronement of affection. And may the God who setteth the solitary in families, bless all our homes. The best cornerstone for the Republic is the hearthstone. May God keep it inviolate! "Amen!"

ROCHESTER TOWER.

By Miss M. A. Paull.

(Continued from page 615.)

A Startling Announcement—"A Forsaken Wife"—Warning Words—A Clandestine Marriage—A Welcome Waiting the Wanderer—Shall the Secret be Told?

"Cecil Anerley," Salome said at last, in a low, troubled voice, "you must choose. Shall I tell you? Shall I make you hate me? Shall I burden you with a knowledge of the sins of others? Shall I put you into the difficult position of being my councillor? Can you, can any man, bear to have his love refused and yet still generously give his friendship?"

"But why refuse my love?" he asked.

She paused, pulled something from under her cloak, drew off her left glove, and slipped a plain gold shining circlet on the third finger of her left hand.

"Cecil Anerley," she said, and her voice grew harder and colder, "I am entitled to wear this. Can you ever forgive me for my deception?"

"But—but—" stammered the young man, aghast, "but surely, Salome—I don't understand—I can't—are you a widow?"

"No, worse; a neglected and forsaken wife. Neglected, forsaken for drink and the gayeties of this terrible city."

"But why—" began Cecil, and paused, fearful to hurt her feelings, and conscious of such a stunning blow upon his own future that, morally and spiritually, he had not yet risen from the ground on which it had laid him, stunned, bruised, bleeding, blind.

"You hate me—you condemn me!" said Salome sadly.

"I think you have acted very wrongly," he said, remembering at that moment only his own bitter disappointment. "You ought to have known that you would make a fool of some one or other."

"I don't want to contradict you, Cecil," she said, "but until I began to be afraid you cared for me, I really never contemplated anything of the kind. At first when this fear entered I said to myself, 'If I treat him frankly as a sister he will soon cease to care for me.' When I found it was not so I grew alarmed. I dared not listen to the outpouring of your love without telling you; I dared not tell you. Oh, do forgive me, Cecil Anerley!"

"Then you are not called Stanley?" said Cecil.

"Yes, he is my cousin. It made it easier in many ways for me that my name had not been changed."

"Where is he?"

"I expect in London; but I have no idea certainly."

"Does he hold no communication whatever with you?"

"None. I suppose he is too gay, too happy in his own mad way to remember me."

"And do you love him, Salome?"

She answered him by another question. "Do you think I would have married without love?"

"Still, such conduct as his, such horrid neglect of you, must make a difference. You can't love him as if he had really loved you."

"Perhaps not; but I have blamed myself in this thing, for indeed I deserved it. My father was very much of a recluse after the death of my dear brother. I think you have heard this from Mr. Ferguson."

"Yes; and that he shut you up without society. Poor Salome!" said Cecil, "it was no wonder you made a mistake."

"I was sadly disobedient," she answered; "please do not blame my father for my sins. When cousin Orlando came to us on a visit, I was pleased with his admiration of me and his frank easy ways, so different to all that I had known before. He made the house quite another place as long as he remained in it. Yet almost every night my father warned me that he was wild and dissipated, and too busily engaged sowing his wild oats to have any real regard for a quiet, retiring girl like myself. 'Don't believe him, Salome, if he says anything to you about loving you or anything of that sort,' my father would say. 'I dare say he has told just the same story to a number of others by this time. I would not trust my child's happiness to such a man for the world.'

"I thought my father cruel and harsh, and even confessed to my cousin that he had been somewhat strange since my brother's death, and miserly in his habits, as he had never been before. Orlando Stanley gained by degrees almost unbounded influence over me. When my father grew suspicious of this he declared he came to me for the sake of my fortune, and positively forbid him to enter the house again. I was very, very unhappy, and used to rise early, almost in the night, for stolen interviews with my cousin.

"One day, not many months before my father died, he persuaded me to go with him early in the morning to a church to be married. I told him I could not wear a wedding-ring in my father's presence. He said he would both put it on and take it off again until happier times—alas! happier times have never come. He said I must wear it round my neck and hide it in my bosom until he would claim me, and be proud for me to wear it before all the world for his sake. You see it was not easy for me to put it on when he had taken it off, and never came to fulfil his promise," said Salome sadly.

"But when your father died why did he not do as he had said?" asked Cecil indignantly.

Salome shook her head.

"He must be dead," suggested Cecil, with a glad throb of joy at his young heart when it caught at this hope.

"No," she replied; "I might have thought so, but I have seen his name a year or two since in the police court news."

Cecil groaned.

"But your money, Salome," he said presently. "How remarkable that he has never come to you for means if he is so dissipated."

"I think my fortune was not so great as he imagined, and it is also very carefully locked up in the hands of trustees, who are clever, shrewd, business men, under whose control it remains for their lives. I believe they think it was part of my father's eccentricity to tie it up so firmly, but I understand his motives, and have learned to thank him."

"Has the fellow any means of learning where you are?"

"He knows—at least I conclude he knows—the contents of my father's will, and that at any time he could ascertain from my trustees where I live."

"Do not your trustees know of your marriage?"

"Oh, no. There being no change of name I could truthfully sign myself Salome Stanley, and they never guessed it."

"It is a dreary story," said Cecil. "And what do you think will be the end of it?"

She burst into tears, and Cecil, who had been hardening his heart against her as much as possible, and whose straightforward nature made him feel really somewhat ashamed of her by her confessions of deception, now found all his harshness melt away at once like snow in sunshine. He pressed the little hand on his arm, and said, generously and kindly, "You know I am to be your brother, Salome."

"Oh, Cecil!" she said presently, as soon as her sobs would let her speak. "Good, generous friend; if you will counsel me as a brother, if you will shield me as a brother, I shall never be able to thank you enough. Sometimes," she added softly, "I think the wanderer will come back to be forgiven. There is always forgiveness waiting for him in my heart, Cecil."

There was a long pause.

"And what must I do?" she asked then humbly. "Would you rather I left Eglinton Terrace?"

"Certainly not," came the answer decidedly; "you are safest there, Salome."

"And you will keep my secret, Cecil?"

"Do you think it had better be a secret still?"

"Indeed I do. I cannot tell it to any on else."

"I do not think that right, Salome."

"It may be cowardly, but I cannot, oh, I car not tell any one else."

"Will you let me tell them for you? Yo would feel happier if you were true to yoursel and assumed your real title and put on your wec ding-ring."

She shrank from him. "I cannot, Cecil."

"Surely, Salome, you are less brave than thought you if you cannot," he said. "It r quires less courage to tell my mother and th girls and Mr. Ferguson your real history than t bear the burden you have borne alone for year I can't tell how you have endured that."

"But if your mother knows it will put her an awkward and painful position respecting n with all our friends."

Cecil could not help admitting that h mother's position with her friends would l compromised, as Salome suggested. A hundr difficulties arose to his mind that he had n thought of before; yet he felt that he had a vised Salome rightly. Truth was better th the most innocent deception.

"I will not press you, Salome," he said, kin ly and gently, "but I shall be glad when y yourself see it to be your duty not to sail und false colors."

The entrance of Cecil and Salome together w considered ominous by both Mrs. Anerley a Emmie. Salome Stanley, however, went to h rooms at once without entering the parlor, a Cecil came slowly into it.

"Salome won't have tea with us to-nig mother," he said; "she has a bad headache, a I shall be glad if Emmie will be so good as take her a cup of tea, and then she will go bed."

Something in his tone surprised Mrs. Anerl There was a firm determination in it har natural to the young man, and certainly the v furthest removed from the triumphant, joy voice of a newly-accepted lover.

When Emmie left the room with the cup tea, Mrs. Anerley said in an aggrieved tone her son, "When I heard you come in, Ce with Salome to-night I thought you would ha given me a new daughter." She looked up him and noticed how exceedingly pale looked. "Has she refused you?"

"Yes."

"What a heartless creature!" began M Anerley indignantly; "I wouldn't have lieved it of Salome Stanley." Poor Mrs. An ley found it as impossible as every other fo mother does to forgive the lady who has refu her son. "It must be an act of malice p pense."

"She could do no other, mother; her hear engaged."

"Then why did she not say so? How stra never to tell us any thing of the kind! Ther something about her I never liked. I alw said there was too much mystery a great deal a young woman; and I am sorry, my son, w might have had almost any other young won he liked, should have been so foolish as to th himself away upon her."

"But," thought Cecil, rather bitterly to h self, "your son did not like any other you woman, so what was he to do?"

"Mother, I can't hear you talk in this wa he said aloud gravely. "Salome Stanley i noble-hearted woman, whom I am proud to h loved. She has never given me the smallest couragement to suppose she loved me, and there is any blame I alone am to blame. I m beg that you do not talk to her on the subje nothing would annoy me more."

"Well, of course I shan't be much temp She will, no doubt, be enough of a lady change her residence; if not, I shall give notice."

"Mother, I have begged her to remain. retain each other's friendship, and you will l much if you give it up."

"Cecil, you are beside yourself!" cried Mrs. Anerley.

Cecil Anerley took no notice of this remark, ave that he came nearer his mother's chair and ut one hand upon the back of it as he stooped ver her and said, "Her history is a very sad ne, mother, and while she likes to stay with us shall be well pleased for her to do so. If you urn her out, it will be with neither my wish nor onsent."

Cecil spoke with a gravity and authority his ather had occasionally used, and which Mrs. nerley had never called in question.

"It is a very strange thing in you, Cecil," she aid, "but I suppose I must humor you."

(To be continued.)

THE THREE FROG SPIRITS.

2. Socialism; and 3. Popish and Mohammedan Fanaticism.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

(Continued from page 615.)

he Outbreak in France—The Coup d'Etat in 1851—Alison on the Revolution—The Spirit in Other Lands.—The Third Spirit—The Two-horned Wild Beast—The Romish Church in Prophecy—Her Predicted Alliance with Mohammedanism—Roman Catholic Support of Napoleon—The Future Ultramontane Crusade.

We have already treated the action of the RST SPIRIT of Anti-Christian Infidelity and iritualism since 1848.

THE SECOND SPIRIT

Revolutionary Socialism from the ten-horned ld beast, or political Roman Empire, likewise nt forth with clamorous croaking and fresh ergy among the nations in 1848, that unparal- ed epoch of political revolutions. France, er enjoying many years of quietude, as a mon- hy under King Louis Philippe, suddenly oke out into revolution, proclaiming liberty, uality, and fraternity, and became a Republic. uis Philippe fled to England. A revolution o broke out in Prussia and Austria, and was prehended even in London, so 170,000 special nstables were sworn in, and the military were pt under arms, in the eventful month of April, 8, when Feargus O'Connor headed a great artist procession to the House of Commons. ace, however, was providentially preserved in gland.

n that year the Napoleon Dynasty, which is seventh headship of the seven-headed wild st, or Roman Empire, began to revive from "deadly wound by the sword" received at terloo in 1815, for Louis Napoleon, who had n an exile in England, returned to France, was elected, on June 8th, 1848, a deputy in French National Assembly, and on Decem- 30th President of the French Republic for ee years. He dissolved the National Assem- in 1851, and on December 4th accomplished up d'etat, and on December 24th he obtained en million votes (partly by the help of the holic priests), electing him President for ten rs. Then, on December 2d, 1852, he was ted Emperor of France; and thus the Napo- Dynasty began to be healed of its Waterloo nds, although it has not yet regained all the ninion possessed by Napoleon I.*

lison, the historian, says of the revolutions 848:

Paris, as in every age, was the centre of im- sion to the whole civilized world; and dis- ous beyond all precedent, or what even could e been conceived, were the effects of this revolution in Paris on the whole Continent; a very long period must elapse before they obviated. The spectacle of the French ernment, esteemed one of the strongest in Europe, and a dynasty which promised to be of lasting duration, overturned almost without resistance by an urban tumult, roused the revolutionary party everywhere to a perfect pitch of frenzy. A universal liberation from government, and restraint of any kind, was expected, and for a time obtained, by the people in the principal Continental States, when a Republic was again proclaimed in France; and the people, strong in their newly-acquired rights of universal suffrage, were seen electing a National Assembly, to whom the destinies of the country were to be intrusted. The effect was instantaneous and universal; the shock of the moral earthquake was felt in every part of Europe."

The same revolutionary spirit has been actively at work ever since 1848, and has produced the long-continued rebellion in China, the Sepoy Mutiny in India in 1857, the Druse massacres in Syria, the Garibaldian uprisings in Italy in 1858, and the tremendous Civil War of 1861 4 in the United States, as well as the political convulsions in Mexico and South America. Its energetic development is especially manifest in Communism in France, Socialism in Germany, Nihilism in Russia, Fenianism in Ireland, and European Internationalism—a sort of Red Republican association of working men. The frequently recurring strikes among workmen are also often a manifestation of the same spirit.

THE THIRD SPIRIT

of Popish and Mohammedan crusading propagandist fanatical superstition proceeds from the False Prophet, which, according to Rev. 13: 11-17; 19:20, is evidently a synonym for the two-horned wild beasts, representing the ecclesiastical power of the Roman Empire, just as its political power is denoted by the ten-horned wild beast. These two wild beasts, in Revelation 13, are not yet completely developed, although the component parts of the corporate body of each of them already exist.

The ten-horned wild beast will be a political confederacy of ten federally united kingdoms, into which the whole extent of Cæsar's Roman Empire, now existing in the form of nearly twenty separate kingdoms or states, will then be organized. The two-horned wild beast will be an ecclesiastical confederacy of the two spiritual kingdoms of the Papacy and Mahommedanism, which will be eventually united under one supreme pontiff, without losing their individual distinctness, just as the ten kingdoms under ten kings will preserve their distinct individuality, although federally united under one supreme emperor.

As the ten horns will be the ten political kingdoms of Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, and Bulgaria, so the two horns will be the two eccleiastical kingdoms of the Papacy and Mohammedanism, which, on the whole, are the prevailing religions in these countries.* The State Church of England, as well as the Greek Church in Greece, were originally incorporated with the Church of Rome, and will be so again at the final crisis of 3½ years.

The scarlet woman, in Revelation 17: 9, sitting upon the seven hills, admittedly signifies the Church of Rome, and is there depicted at the future period of her final judgment (verse 1) as the "mother of harlots and abominations (i.e. false religions) of the earth," for she will then have received into her bosom, and amalgamated with herself, Mohammedanism, the GreekChurch Buddhism, Spiritualism, etc. It is only thus that she can be described as seated upon "peoples and multitudes and nations and tongues," language which certainly denotes universal dominion far beyond what the Church of Rome possesses at present.

She is likewise depicted as then sitting triumphantly as its ecclesiastical mistress upon the ten-horned wild beast—that is to say, upon the ten confederated nations which we have just enumerated, and, in the intoxication of her marvellous success, waving deliriously a cup, exclaiming, "I sit a queen" (Revelation 18: 7). Hence it is clear that, as the Church of Rome will then be seated as ecclesiastical mistress and State Church over the Mahommedan countries of Egypt, Syria, and Turkey, as well as over the rest of the ten kingdoms, she must therefore have formed between herself and Mohammedanism. And this is fully confirmed by the emblem of the two-horned wild beast, representing this Papal-Mohammedan hierarchy at a later stage, after the scarlet woman shall have been dismounted and despoiled by the ten kings, and stripped of her wealth and temporalities (Revelation 17: 16).

AN ECCLESIASTICAL CONFEDERACY

Hence a strife-producing evil spirit going forth from the False Prophet, or two-horned wild beast, denotes a spirit of crusading fanaticism and propagandism from the Papacy and Mohammedanism. Now it is singular that the year 1848 was the marked epoch of the outburst, not only of the first and second spirits of Spiritualism and Revolutionary Democracy, but also of this third spirit of Jesuitical crusading intrigue and conspiracy, for the Jesuit Ultramontanes were openly asserted to have fomented the revolution in France in 1848, which so suddenly overthrew Louis Philippe's monarchy.

The Roman Catholic Weekly Register says: "During Louis Philippe's reign the Catholic Church in France was in absolute bondage. The bishops were constantly snubbed, the cathedrals and churches were suffered to go to decay, and the utmost indulgence was given and the warmest friendship shown to the violent literary revilers of the church and enemies of religion. Louis Philippe invaded the Pontifical States and seized Ancona, in order to oppose the Austrians, who had entered Italy at the Pope's desire to suppress a Carbonaro insurrection."

The Jesuits perceived that King Louis Philippe would never promote their interests, and so they encouraged the revolutionary movement of 1848, which overthrew him, and then they are asserted to have powerfully aided in securing the election of Prince Louis Napoleon as Republican President of France in December, 1848, in return for his promise to further their ends and aims. The Catholic priests led their flocks like sheep to the poll to vote for Louis Napoleon. The result of this was seen in Louis Napoleon sending French troops in 1849 to suppress the Republican revolution in Rome, which had caused the Pope's flight from that city, and ever afterward upholding and protecting the Pope in Rome by French bayonets.

One great manifestation of the Ultramontane crusading spirit we may look for in the future in the predestined war of France against Protestant Prussia, by which France must regain the Rhine frontier of ancient Gaul, and therefore must conquer and annex to its territory Luxembourg, part of Holland, Belgium, Rhenish Prussia, Switzerland, and also Baden, Wurtembourg, and part of Bavaria, unless the three latter are added to Austria. Reverses and defeats in any quarter will only intensify the desperate energy of Ultramontanism, and make it ally itself with Communists, Socialists, or any party that will promote its ambitious schemes.

As regards the spirit of Mohammedan crusading fanaticism, it went forth powerfully in India in 1857, stirring up the formidable Sepoy Mutiny, and assuredly it will go forth again in bringing to pass the predicted legislative separation of India from England; and during the expiring throes of the Turco-Mohammedan Empire the Sherif of Mecca will doubtless proclaim a jehad, or so-called holy war, against Giaour heretics, just as Ultramontanism will proclaim a holy war against Protestants.

Prince Jerome Napoleon, who was pointed out in 354, by the Rev. R. A. Purdon, as likely to be- e the final Napoleonic Antichrist, and who will e 70 years old until 1893, has now become head of Napoleon Dynasty. Strong probabilities attach m, for he has formerly been accounted a reviled, vile person," and he is of fierce countenance, an infidel and great democrat (Daniel 8: 23; 11: 7; Revelation 17: 3).

* Moreover, in the year-day fulfilment of Daniel, the two little horns in chapters 7 and 8 undoubtedly represent, respectively, the Papacy in the Western Roman Empire, and Mohammedanism in the Eastern Roman Empire, and in Revelations 13 we find those two little horns combined on the two-horned wild beast. In the future literal day fulfilment those two little horns represent the final Napoleanic Antichrist in his career, respectively, in the Western and Eastern Roman Empire.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter.

The aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to The Manager, Christian Herald, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

SINGLE COPIES can most conveniently be obtained through newsdealers. Any complaint that the Christian Herald cannot be obtained from a particular newsdealer is promptly attended to if we are given the name and street address of the dealer who does not keep it for sale.

NOTICE.

To give our readers an opportunity of introducing the Christian Herald to their friends, we will send the paper post free to any address from 1st October, to 31st December, 1880, on receipt of 25 cents.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Imposing Demonstration of the Democratic party of New York took place September 23d. Many thousands of citizens, with deputations from other cities of the State, marched in procession through the streets of the city. The procession was over five miles in length, and the glare of the torches, the brilliance of the calcium lights, and the display of bunting and transparencies, combined to render the display one of the most notable the city has seen for over twenty years. Ten stands were erected at different points on the route, from which prominent speakers of the Democratic party addressed enthusiastic crowds, and there were also meetings in Tammany and Irving Halls, which were filled to overflowing.

The ordinary enthusiasm attending a Presidential contest was no doubt increased by the intelligence circulated earlier in the day that the prospects of harmony in the party were brighter than they had been. Late events have demonstrated that a Democratic victory in New York is only possible when the party is united, but though victory was earnestly desired, the opinion was general that the chasm between Tammany Hall and the regular Democracy was too wide to be spanned. The rank and file on both sides were disposed to mutual concessions, but considerable apprehension was felt lest the jealousy of the leaders might thwart the wish of their followers. To the relief of the latter, however, it was announced on Thursday that a basis of agreement had been settled, and that Tammany Hall would have equal representation at the forthcoming convention at Saratoga.

The Most Important Speeches at the Demonstration on Thursday were those of Senator Bayard of Delaware, and Congressman B. McLane of Maryland. In both cases an indignant protest was made against the sectional issue raised by the Republican party, and Mr. McLane said, with considerable warmth, that the phrase "the solid South," so often used in the campaign, conveyed a false impression, and he assured his hearers that the South was not solid in antagonism either to the North or to the Union or to the Constitution. Senator Bayard dealt principally with the financial question, and was apparently anxious to allay the apprehensions aroused among business men by the alliance between Democrats and Greenbackers in Maine. On the question of revenue and taxation Mr. McLane advanced the claims of his party on public confidence. He said: "Whatever differences of opinion may appear among individuals of the Democratic party, the party itself is bent on revenue and fiscal reform—reform in the revenue which, while it maintains the public credit and constitutional money, will reduce expenditures to a standard that must insure relief from taxation, and which will, while it secures prosperity to our general industries, restore to American shipping, through a modification of the navigation laws, the great carrying trade of the country."

The Hon. John Sherman, the Secretary of the Treasury, made an energetic defence of the financial record of the Administration on September 25th, at a Republican meeting at Hyattsville, Md. Mr. Sherman sketched the history of the resumption movement from its first initiation down to the present time. Making special reference to the speech of Senator Bayard, he contended that the policy of resumption was the work of the Republican party, and that at every step of its progress toward realization it had met with persistent and determined opposition from the Democratic party, an opposition which, but for the resolute attitude of General Grant and the Republicans on the question, might have postponed specie payments for some years. He claimed that the present prosperous condition of the country was largely due to the successful financial administration of the Republican party.

Prayer for Sunday-school.—The International Sunday School Executive Committee, with other committees at home and abroad, have united in recommending that Sunday and Monday, October 17th and 18th, be observed as days of earnest prayer for Sunday-schools.

The executive committee makes the following recommendations: That on Lord's Day morning, October 17th, from seven to eight o'clock, private intercessory prayer be offered on behalf of Sunday-schools. That the opening engagements of the morning school be preceded by a meeting of the teachers for prayer. That ministers be asked to preach, morning or evening, or both, on topics connected with Sunday-school work. That in the afternoon a devotional service be held, to which the parents of the scholars be invited, and at the close of the evening service, the teachers, in union with other Christians, meet for thanksgiving and prayer. That on Monday morning, October 18th, teachers again bring their scholars, one by one, in private prayer before God. That in the evening each church or congregation be invited to hold a meeting, at which the interests of the Sunday-school should form the theme of the prayers and addresses.

The American Expedition, led by Lieutenant Schwatka, which sailed from New York for the Arctic seas on June 19th, 1878, to search for relics of the lost explorer, Sir John Franklin and his party, has returned. The expedition was prompted by rumors that travellers in the north had found a silver spoon marked with Franklin's initials, and other articles which had belonged to the brave explorers who more than thirty-five years ago set sail on the voyage of discovery from which they never came back. It was also reported that books and papers were still in existence which might throw light on the fate of the party and contain records of the discoveries they might have made, and the expedition it was hoped would discover these.

The thrilling narrative of a long sleigh-ride over the ice, furnished by the newspaper correspondent who accompanied the expedition, is full of melancholy interest. It leads to the sad conclusion that the fate of the Franklin party was inexpressibly painful. Natives were discovered who had seen the little company of white men, and remembered it distinctly. One of them said that he only once before saw whit men alive. That was when he was a little bo There were ten men. The next white man h saw was dead in a bunk of a big ship which wa frozen in the ice near an island. They had t walk out about three miles on smooth ice t reach the ship. When his people saw the ship s long without any one around, they used to go o board and steal pieces of wood and iron. Th did not know how to get inside by the doors an cut a hole in the side of the ship on a level wi the ice, so that when the ice broke up during th following summer the ship filled and sun They found plenty of knives, forks, spoons, pan cups, and plates on board, and afterward four a few such things on shore after the vessel ha gone down. They also saw books on board, an left them there.

Another native remembered seeing the whi men dragging a sledge across the ice. She sai "Some of the white men were very thin, a their mouths were dry and hard and black. Th had no fur clothing on. The following sprin when there was little snow on the ground, s saw a tent standing on the shore at the head Terror Bay. There were dead bodies in the te and outside were some covered over with san There was no flesh on them—nothing but t bones and clothes."

Subsequently the expedition discovered opened grave in which were the bones of Li tenant Irving, of the Franklin party. Th were identified by a prize medal of the Briti Naval College bearing his name. No books records were discovered, and the accounts of t natives show that they are lost.

The First Anniversary of the Commenceme of the Salvation Army's work in America will held on October 6th and 7th at Philadelph Pa. The proceedings will commence with open-air demonstration, a tea-meeting and g eral rally on the 6th, to be followed by watch-night service from 10:30 P.M. to 12:30 A for prayer and praise. On the 7th there will a march from the first open-air stand used "the old Factory," and thence to the pres hall of the First Pennsylvania, where thanksg ing services will be held. Mr. Railton has issu a pressing invitation to Christians of all deno inations to attend and "see the work going and judge for themselves." He adds, "O the extreme want of funds now prevents our ing able to go forward with great rapidity."

The New English Colony in Tennessee, which its founder, Mr. Thomas Hughes, given the name of Rugby, is being rapidly r dered fit for the residence of the class for wh it is designed. A writer in the Nashv American, describing the land selected, sa "The gardener and forester for the compa late in the spring of this year, had assigned him a small old-field that had furnished years long past a scanty subsistence to so hardy mountaineer. After making a thoro survey of the garden, which covers some acres or more, I do not hesitate to say that i in every particular the equal of any garde have seen in the State." Mr. Hughes asked Bishop Jaggar to dedicate the chu which is to be one of the first public build erected by the colony.

A Ghastly Discovery was Made at Sea September 18th by the pilot who brought Scythia into port. While cruising about on lookout for the Cunarder, he saw a large obj floating on the water. In approaching it found it was a wrecked schooner turned bott upward. The decomposed body of a man found entangled in the rigging. It is belie that the dead bodies of the crew were in cabin, for in trying to break a hole in the ve to sink her out of the way of passing ships powerfully offensive odor was emitted, so ov powering that the men employed were ma sick, and the attempt was abandoned. T floating charnel-house was a type of what world would have been had not God in h mercy discovered and perfected a way of sal tion for fallen man (Romans 5 : 12).

Dr. Talmage on Marriage.—The following nnouncement was made last Sunday by Dr. Talmage: "Next Sabbath I will speak of the mariage institution as God established it, and as is now assailed, not only by Mormonism but y other systems. I will show what God inended to accomplish through it, and how much s welfare has to do with the welfare of society."

The Money Found in the Pocketbook of the hristian young man whose melancholy death a tunnel was mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN ERALD of August 5th has been sent to the oreign Mission Board of the Presbyterian hurch by his father, the Rev. J. K. Wight. It nounted to twelve dollars, and Mr. Wight, who as formerly a missionary to China, in forwardg it to the Board, wrote: "He had just bein to earn something for himself, and this was l he had. We do not feel like using it for any cular purpose, but to pour it out as an offering the Lord."

A Dissipated Judge Converted in Answer to ayer.—A letter sent last week to the Fulton reet Prayer Meeting by a Christian gentleman a Western city says: "I desire to acknowlge the wonderful goodness of God in this. out one year ago I sent a request to your yer meeting, that a confirmed drunkard of s city, a man of talent, and occupying a high licial position, might be reformed and reimed. I am happy to announce that God in s goodness sent sickness upon the judge (soon er my request to you), which brought him to t verge of the grave; but he was also brought t repentance, and he recovered his health, and is now an active, faithful, praying member of a hristian church."

he American Board of Commissioners for eign Missions will this year hold its annual etings at Lowell, Mass. They will commence o Tuesday, October 5th. Among the import subjects to be considered is the new enterpe in Central Africa which is about to be ted. The bequest of a million dollars the rd received two years ago it is proposed to d ote mainly to this work.

Singular Coincidence Occurred Recently at Bdford, Pa., in the deaths of two little girls. T y were aged respectively six and eight years, a had been very fond of each other. They h been both fatally injured by the explosion of kerosene can, and lay each on her death-bed s ounded by her sorrowing relatives. The y nger of them, as death approached, raised h head slightly from the pillow and called to h ittle friend, "Carrie, Carrie, come with me," a then passed away. Carrie, too was dying in h home several blocks away, and as the last mom t came, her mother, who was watching the lit sufferer, heard her say, "Wait for me, Jessie I am coming." It was found afterward that th call of the one child and the reply of the ot r were uttered within a few minutes of each ot r. This is one of the striking coincidences, of hich many are recorded. in which, in the mo ent when the physical powers fail, there ap ars to be a quickening of the mental or sp tual powers, and it furnishes a confirmation, if e were needed, of the Scriptural doctrine th the dissolution of the body does not impair th ife of the soul.

Touching Appeal from an Inebriate Mother to judge was read in court on September 17th. Th judge had six weeks previously committed the oman to the Island as an habitual drunkard. In her note to the judge she pleaded for a dis arge. "My little girl," she wrote, "is ver sick at home, and I would be very thankful if y would let me go to her." Inclosed in the san envelope was the following letter, which the oman had received from her son, a lad of thi een years: "Dear Mother: We are sorry fo have you away from us, and we have no one o look after us now. If my father was ali mother, you would not drink; but now we are eft alone, without father or mother. But, mo er, I never thought you would drink. Mo er, Mary has been sick ever since you went away. Mrs. McWire washes her and combs her every day, and puts her to bed again, as she is too sick to stay up. The people say that if you would write to the Judge, he might pardon you, as he is a good man. You have been gone six weeks now, and they say he is a good Judge, and that he would let you out on half time. Mother, I hope you will never go back again, and I hope it is the last drop of drink you will ever touch. Now I am out of ink, so good-by, dear mother. Your loving son, Eddy Moran." Such a pathetic picture of the miseries produced by drink is only one out of many revealed daily.

Saved from the Gallows.—A Man Named Nimley was arrested for the murder of one James Millis, who suddenly disappeared under mysterious circumstances some time ago. Suspicion pointed strongly to Nimley, and the circumstantial evidence was so strong that he was found guilty at his trial and condemned to death. As he lay in jail at Somerset, Ind., awaiting execution, news was brought that Millis, who was supposed to have been murdered, had been discovered alive and well in a village in Western Kentucky. As soon as Millis can be brought to Somerset to testify, Nimley will be released. The feeling of thankfulness experienced by the man unjustly condemned may be imagined. But the saved sinner has more abundant cause for thankfulness even than he, for he is saved from eternal death, a punishment he justly deserved (Rom. 6 : 23).

A Thrilling Moment was that, a Party of Excursionists experienced in California recently. They were driving along Clear Creek canyon when they saw a huge boulder weighing several tons commence rolling down the side of the mountain directly toward them. It was impossible to tell what irregularity in its course might alter the direction the rough avalanche might take, but the driver thought it safer to urge on his horses to try to pass ahead of it. But at that critical moment, when the lives of the party seemed to hang on the speed of the horses, the animals saw the danger and backed on their haunches, snorting with terror. So near were the party to death that when the rock reached the path it struck the horses, sweeping them off the road, and twisting the carriage round into the bushes which bordered the path. None were seriously injured, but both horses were killed. The agony of suspense endured in that terrible moment will never be forgotten by any who were there. It reminds us of that awful day when the impenitent will feel such unspeakable terror that even the death these excursionists providentially escaped, will be desired rather than the doom before them (Luke 23: 30).

A Blasphemer's Barn was Destroyed Recently in a remarkable manner. Chaplain McCabe related at the Detroit Methodist Conference a singular incident in connection with an open defiance of the Almighty. He said: "In a Dakota town a follower of Colonel Ingersoll said he would build a barn that 'God Almighty couldn't blow down.' So he erected a solid structure entirely of stone, but the first cyclone that came along doubled that barn about as a giant would a baby, not leaving one stone on another."

The Desperation and Recklessness to which passion is capable of driving men who have not sought and received the help of God to control their temper, is shown in the account of a fatal quarrel which occurred at Chicago on September 11th. Two men were engaged in unloading a wagon at the Union Dock, when they became involved in a dispute about their work. Angry words were followed by blows, and after fighting for a few minutes they were separated, when each man seized a lighted kerosene lamp and flung at the other. Instantly both men were wrapped in flame, which was extinguished with difficulty. One man died on the spot, and the other was so badly burned that his recovery was hopeless. Thus both have suffered through the wrath which, as Solomon tells us, is cruel, and the anger that is outrageous (Prov. 27 : 4).

THE WATERPOTS AT CANA.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Jesus saith unto them, Fill the waterpots with water. And they filled them up to the brim."—JOHN 2 : 7.

The Kind of Wine Jesus Made—"I Abstain from Alcoholic Drink"—The Gospel Dispensation Commenced with a Miracle of Liberality—The Miracle Simple and Unostentatious—I. The Principles Involved in our Lord's Mode of Procedure—1. When about to Bestow a Blessing He gives a Command—2. His Commands not to be Questioned but Obeyed—3. To be Carried out Zealously—4. Obedience Consistent with Dependence—5. Our Action alone not Sufficient—6. Yet it has its Place—II. How to Carry out the Divine Command—Use the Abilities you have—Learning like Water—Use the Appointed Means—Use them Heartily—Trust in your Lord to do the Work—A Sermon bringing Fruit after Twenty-five Years.

YOU know the narrative. Jesus was at a wedding feast, and when the wine ran short he provided for it right bountifully. I do not think that I should do any good if I were to enter upon the discussion as to what sort of wine our Lord Jesus made on this occasion. It was wine, and I am quite sure it was very good wine, for He would produce nothing but the best. Was it wine such as men understand by that word now? It was wine; but there are very few people in this country who ever see, much less drink, any of that beverage. That which goes under the name of wine is not true wine, but a fiery, brandied concoction of which I feel sure that Jesus would not have tasted a drop.

Had our great Exemplar lived under our present circumstances, surrounded by a sea of deadly drink, which is ruining tens of thousands, I know how He would have acted. I am sure He would not have contributed by word or deed to the rivers of poisonous beverages in which bodies and souls are now being destroyed wholesale. The kind of wine which He made was such that. if there had been no stronger drink in the world, nobody might have thought it necessary to enter any protest against drinking it. It would have done nobody any hurt, or else Jesus our loving Saviour would not have made it.

Some have raised a question about the great quantity of wine, for I suppose there must have been no less than one hundred and twenty gallons, and probably more. "They did not want all that," says one, "and even of the weakest kind of wine it would be a deal too much." But you are thinking of an ordinary wedding here, are you not, when there are ten or a dozen, or a score or two, met together in a parlor? An Oriental wedding is quite another affair. Even if it be only a village, like Cana of Galilee, everybody comes to eat and drink, and the feast lasts on for a week or a fortnight. Hundreds of people must be fed, for often open house is kept. Nobody is refused, and consequently a great quantity of provision is required.

Besides, they may not have consumed all the wine at once. At any rate, that is not my subject, and I do not intend getting into hot water over the question of cold water. I abstain myself from alcoholic drink in every form, and I think others would be wise to do the same; but of this each one must be a guide unto himself.

Jesus Christ commenced the Gospel dispensation, not with a miracle of vengeance, like that of Moses, who turned water into blood, but with turning water into wine. He does not only supply necessaries, but gives luxuries, and this is highly significant of the kingdom of His grace. Here He not only gives sinners enough to save them, but He gives abundantly, grace upon grace.

A MIRACLE OF LIBERALITY,

And He gives like a king, who gives lavishly, without counting the cups and bottles. As to one hundred and twenty gallons, how little is that in comparison with the rivers of love and mercy which He is pleased to bestow freely out of His bountiful heart upon the most needy souls. You may forget all about the wine question, and all about wine, bad, good, or indifferent. The less we have to do with it the better, I am quite sure. And now let us think about our Lord's mercy, and let the wine stand as a type of His grace, and the abundance of it as the type of the abundance of His grace which He doth so liberally bestow.

Now, concerning this miracle, it may well be remarked how simple and unostentatious it was. One might have expected that when the great Lord of all came here in human form He would commence His miraculous career by summoning the scribes and Pharisees at least, if not the kings and princes of the earth, to see the marks of His calling and the guarantees and warrants of His commission ; gathering them all together to work some miracle before them, as Moses and Aaron did before Pharaoh, that they might be convinced of His Messiahship. He does nothing of the kind. He goes to a simple wedding among poor people, and there in the simplest and most natural way He displays His glory.

When the water is to be turned into wine, when He selects that as the first miracle, He does not call for the master of the feast even, or for the bridegroom himself, or for any of the guests, and begin to say, " You clearly perceive that your wine is all gone. Now, I am about to show you a great marvel, to turn water into wine." No, He does it quietly with the servants : He tells them to fill the waterpots : He uses the baths : He does not ask for any new vessels, but uses what were there, making no fuss or parade. He uses water, too, of which they had abundance, and works the miracle, if I may so speak, in the most commonplace and natural style ; and that is just the style of Jesus Christ.

Now, whenever you try to serve Jesus Christ do not make a fuss about it, because He never made any fuss in what He did, even when He was working amazing miracles. If you want to do a good thing, go and do it as naturally as ever you can. Be simple-hearted and simple-minded. Be yourself. Do not be affected in your piety, as if you were going to walk to heaven on stilts : walk on your own feet, and bring religion to your own door and to your own fireside.

Let all these remarks stand as a kind of preface ; for now I want to draw out the principles which are hidden in my text ; and then, secondly, when I have displayed those principles, I want to show how they should be carried out.

I. " Jesus saith unto them, Fill the waterpots with water." What are in our Lord's mode of procedure ?

THE PRINCIPLES INVOLVED

1. First, that, as a rule, when Christ is about to bestow a blessing He gives a command. This is a fact which your memories will help you to establish in a moment. It is not always so ; but, as a general rule, a word of command goes before a word of power, or else with it. He is about to give wine, and the process does not consist in saying, " Let wine be," but it begins by a command addressed to men—" Fill the waterpots with water."

Here is a blind man. Christ is about to give him sight. He puts clay on his eyes, and then says, " Go to the pool of Siloam and wash." There is a man with his arm swinging at his side, useless to him. Christ is going to restore it, and He says, " Stretch forth thine hand." Ay, and the principle goes so far that it holds good in cases where it would seem to be quite inapplicable, for if it be a child that is dead He says, " Maid, arise;" or if it be Lazarus, who by this time stinks, being four days buried, yet He cries, " Lazarus, come forth." And thus He bestows a benefit by a command. Gospel benefits come with a Gospel precept.

Do you wonder that this principle which is seen in the miracles is seen in the wonders of His divine grace ? Here is a sinner to be saved. What does Christ say to that sinner ? " Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Can he believe of himself ? Is he not dead in sin ? Brethren, raise no such questions, but learn that Jesus Christ has bidden men believe, and has commissioned His disciples to cry, " Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." " The times of this ignorance God winked at ; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent." And He bids us go and preach this word—" Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

But why command them ? It is His will to do so, and that should be enough for you who call yourself His disciple. It was so even in the olden times, when the Lord set forth in vision His way of dealing with a dead nation. There lay the dry bones of the valley, exceeding many, and exceeding dry, and Ezekiel was sent to prophesy to them. What said the prophet ? " O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord." Is that His way of making them alive ? Yes, by a command to hear ; a thing which dry bones cannot do. He issues His command to the dead, the dry, the helpless, and by its power life comes. I pray you, be not disobedient to the Gospel, for faith is a duty, or we should not read of " the obedience of faith." Jesus Christ, when He is about to bless, challenges men's obedience by issuing His royal orders.

2. Secondly, Christ's commands are not to be questioned, but to be obeyed. The people want wine, and Christ says, " Fill the waterpots with water." Well, now, if these servants had been of the mind of the captious critics of modern times, they would have looked at our Lord a long while, and objected boldly : " We do not want any water ; it is not the feast of purifications ; it is a wedding feast. We do not require water at a wedding. We shall want water when we are going up to the synagogue, or to the temple, that we may purify our hands according to our custom ; but we do not want water just now : the hour, the occasion, and the fitness of things call for wine." But to them was sound—" Whatsoever He saith to you, do it." Thus, too, let us neither question nor cavil, but do His bidding straight-away.

MARY'S ADVICE

It may sometimes seem that Christ's command is not pertinent to the point in hand. The sinner, for instance, says, " Lord, save me : conquer in me my sin." Our Lord cries, " Believe," and the sinner cannot see how believing in Jesus will enable him to get the mastery over a besetting sin. There does not at first sight appear to be any connection between the simple trusting of the Saviour and the conquest of a bad temper, or the getting rid of a bad habit, such as intemperance, passion, covetousness, or falsehood.

There is such a connection, but recollect, whether you can see the connection or not, it is yours " not to reason why, but yours to do what Jesus bids you do ; for it is in the way of the command that the miracle of mercy will be wrought. " Fill the waterpots with water, though what you want is wine. Christ sees a connection between the water and the wine, though you do not.

I know, brethren, that sometimes the path of duty seems as if it could not lead to the desired result. We want to be doing something more ; that something more might be wrong, but it looks as if we could thereby compass our design more easily and directly, and so we hanker after this uncommanded and perhaps forbidden course. And I know that many a troubled conscience thinks that simply to believe in Jesus is too little a thing.

The deceitful heart suggests a course which looks to be more effectual. " Do some penance : feel some bitterness ; weep a certain amount of tears. Goad your mind, or break your heart." So cries carnal self. Jesus simply commands, " Believe." It does appear to be too little a thing to be done, as if it could not be that eternal life should be given upon putting your trust in Jesus Christ : but this is the principle we want to teach you—that when Jesus Christ is about to give a blessing He issues a command which is not to be questioned, but to be at once obeyed. If ye will not believe, neither shall ye be established ; but if ye be willing and obed ent, ye shall eat the good of the land. " Wha soever He saith unto you, do it."

3. The third principle is this—that whenev we get a command from Christ it is always wi dom to carry it out zealously. He said, " Fill t waterpots with water," and they filled them up the brim. You know there is a way of filling waterpot, and there is another way of filling It is full, and you cannot heap it up ; but st you can fill it up till it begins almost to r over : the liquid trembles as if it must sure fall in a crystal cascade. It is a filling fulnes

In fulfilling Christ's commands, my de brethren and sisters, let us go to their wid extent : let us fill them up to the brim. If it "Believe," oh ! believe Him with all your migh trust Him with your whole heart. If it " Preach the Gospel," preach it in season a out of season ; and preach the Gospel—t whole of it. Fill it up to the brim. Do not g the people a half Gospel. Give them a bri ming-over Gospel. Fill the vessels up to t very brim.

4. The fourth principle is that our carn action in obedience to Christ is not contrary to dependence upon Him, but it is necessary to dependence upon Him. I will show you that a moment. There are some brethren I kn who say, " Hem ! you hold what you call vival services, and you try to arouse men earnest appeals and exciting addresses. Do not see that God will do His own work ? Th efforts are just your trying to take the work of God's hands. The proper way is to trus Him, and do nothing. All right, brother. have your word for it—that you trust in Him do nothing.

I take the liberty not to be so very cert that you do trust Him, for if I remember you are, and I think I have been to your ho you are about the most miserable, despond unbelieving person that I know. You do even know whether you are saved yourself times out of ten. Well now, I think you sh hardly come and cry yourself up for your fa If you had such a wonderfully great faith, t is no doubt whatever that according to y faith it would be unto you. How many been added to your church through your d nothing this year—that blessed church of yo where you exercise this blessed

FAITH WITHOUT WORKS?

How many have been brought in ? " W we do not have very many additions." No, I think you are not likely to have. If yo about the extension of the Redeemer's king by inaction I do not think that you go the to work which Jesus Christ approves of.

But we venture to say to you that we wh in for working for Christ with all our heart soul, using any means within our reach to men in to hear the Gospel, feel as much as you do that we cannot do any thing at all matter apart from the Holy Spirit, and we in God, I think, almost as much as you do cause our faith has produced rather more re than yours has done. I should not wonde turns out that your faith without works is being alone, and that our faith having with it has been living faith after all.

Those seem to me to be the believing ser who obey the command, not understandin but expecting that, somehow or other, Christ knows the way to work His own mi By our earnest exertions we are not interf with Him, dear friends ; far from it. W proving our faith in Him if we work for H He bids us work, and trust in Him alone undivided faith.

5. The next principle I must lay equal upon is this : our action alone is not suffi That we know, but let me remind you of again. There are these waterpots, troughs, these baths : they are full, and not be fuller. What a spilling of water is ! You see that in their trying to fill the water runs over here and there. Well, all six great baths are full of water. Is ther ore wine for all that? Not a drop. It is ater that they brought, nothing but water, and remains water still.

Even so, after all that sinners can do, and all at saints can do, there is nothing in any hu- an effort which can avail for the saving of a ul till Christ speaks the word of power. When ul has planted and Apollos watered there is increase till God gives it. Preach the Gos- l, labor with souls, persuade, entreat, exhort; t there is no power in any thing that you do til Jesus Christ displays His divine might. s presence is our power. Blessed be His me, He will come; and if we fill the water- ts with water, He will turn it into wine. He ne can do it, and those servants who show e most alacrity in filling up the waterpots are ong the first to confess that it is He alone o can perform the deed.

5. And now the last principle here is that al- ugh human action in itself falls short of the ired end, yet it has its place, and God has de it necessary by His appointment. Why did r Lord have these waterpots filled with water? I do not say that it was necessary that it ould have been done. It was not absolutely essary in itself; but in order that the mir- e might be all open and above board, it was essary; for suppose He had said, "Go to se waterpots and draw out wine," those who ched Him might have said that there was ne there before, and that no miracle was ought. When our Lord had them filled up h water, there remained no room for any wine be hidden away.

oreover, it was necessary, because it was so structive to the servants. Did you notice when I as reading it that the master of the feast, en he tasted the good wine, did not know ere it came from. He could not make it out, he uttered an expression which showed his prise, mingled with his ignorance. But it is tten, ow when souls are converted in a church it pens much in the same way with certain of members, who are good people, but they do know much about the conversion of sinners. y do not feel much joy in revivals; in fact, the elder brother, they are rather suspi- s of these wild characters being brought in: consider themselves to be very respectable, they would rather not have the lowest of ple sitting in the pew with them: they feel ward in coming so near them. They know e about what is going on. "But the ser- ts which drew the water knew:" that is to the earnest believers who do the work, and to fill the waterpots, know all about it. s bade them fill the vessels with water on ose that the men who drew the water might w that it was a miracle.

"THE SERVANTS ch drew the water knew."

warrant you, if you bring souls to Christ will know His power. It will make you for joy to hear the cry of the penitent, and k the bright flash of delight that passes the new-born believer's face when his sins washed away, and he feels himself renewed. ou want to know Jesus Christ's miraculous er you must go and—not work miracles, but draw the water and fill the waterpots. Do ordinary duties of Christian men and women ings in which there is no power of them- es, but which Jesus Christ makes to be con- ed with His divine working, and it shall be our instruction, and your comfort, that you such work to do. "The servants which the water knew."

. You must have patience with me while I to apply these principles to practical pur- s. Let us see ll the waterpots with water."

HOW TO CARRY OUT THIS COMMAND.

rst, use in the service of Christ such abilities u have. There stood the waterpots, six of n, and Jesus used what He found ready to hand. There was water in the well; our d used that also. Our Lord is accustomed to employ His own people, and such abilities as they have, rather than angels or a novel class of beings created fresh for the purpose. Now, dear brothers and sisters, if you have no golden chalices, fill your earthen vessels. If you cannot consider yourselves to be goblets of rarest workmanship in silver, or if you could not liken yourselves to Sèvres ware, it does not matter;

FILL THE VESSELS WHICH YOU HAVE.

Thus, you see, they improved what they had; for the waterpots were empty, but they filled them. There are a good many brethren here from the College, and they are trying to improve their gifts and their abilities. I think you do right, my brethren. But I have heard some people say, "The Lord Jesus does not want your learning." No, it is very likely that He does not, any more than He needed the water: but then He certainly does not want your stupidity and your ignorance, and He does not want your rough, uncultivated ways of speaking.

He did not seek for empty pitchers on this occasion; He would have them full, and the servants did well to fill them. Our Lord to-day does not want empty heads in His ministers, nor empty hearts; so, my brethren, fill your waterpots with water. Work away, and study away, and learn all you can, and fill the waterpots with water. "Oh, somebody will say, "but how are such studies to lead to the conversion of men? Conversion is like wine, and all that these young fellows will learn will be like water."

You are right; but still I bid these students fill the waterpots with water, and expect the Lord Jesus to turn the water into wine. He can sanctify human knowledge so that it shall be useful to the setting forth of the knowledge of Jesus Christ. I hope that the day has gone by when it is so much as dreamed that ignorance and coarseness are helpful to the kingdom of Christ. The great Teacher would have His people know all that they can know, and especially know Himself, and the Scriptures, that they may set Him forth, and proclaim His Gospel. "Fill the waterpots with water.'"

Next, to apply this principle, let us all use such means of blessing as God appoints. What are they? First, there is the reading of the Scriptures. "Search the Scriptures." Search them all you can. Try to understand them. "But if I know the Bible, shall I be therefore saved." No, you must know Christ Himself by the Spirit. Still, "fill the waterpots with water." While you are studying the Scriptures you may expect the Saviour will bless His own Word, and turn the water into wine.

Then there is attendance upon the means of grace, and hearing a Gospel ministry. Mind you fill that waterpot with water. "But I may hear thousands of sermons and not be saved." I know it is so, but your business is to fill this waterpot with water, and while you are listening to the Gospel God will bless it, for "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God." Take care to use the means which God appoints. Since our Lord has appointed to save men by the preaching of the Word, I pray that He will raise up those who will preach without ceasing, in season and out of season, indoors and in the streets.

Remember the prayer-meeting. What a blessed means of grace it is, for it brings down power for all the works of the church: fill that waterpot with water. I have not to complain of your attendance at prayer-meetings; but, oh! keep it up, dear brethren! You can pray. Blessed be His name, you have the spirit of prayer. Pray on! "Fill the waterpots with water," and in answer to prayer Jesus will turn it into wine.

Sunday-school teachers, do not neglect your blessed means of usefulness. "Fill the waterpots with water." Work the Sunday-school system with all your might. "But it will not save the children merely to get them together and teach them of Jesus. We cannot give them new hearts." Who said that you could? "Fill the waterpots with water." Jesus Christ knows how to turn it into wine, and He does not fail to do it when we are obedient to His commands. Use all the means, but take care that you use those means right heartily. I come back to that part of the text—"And they filled them up to the brim." When you teach the young ones in the Sunday-school, teach them well. Fill them to the brim. When you preach, dear sir, do not preach as if you were only half awake; stir yourself up; fill your ministry to the brim. When you are trying to evangelize the community, do not attempt it in a half-hearted way, as if you did not care whether their souls were saved or not; fill them to the brim; preach the Gospel with all your might, and beg for power from on high. Fill every vessel to the brim.

Whatever is worth doing is worth doing well. Nobody ever yet served Christ too well. I have heard that in some services there may be too much zeal, but in the service of Christ you may have as much zeal as ever you will and yet not exceed, if prudence be joined therewith. "Fill the waterpots with water," and fill them to the brim. Go in for doing good with all your heart and soul and strength.

And this leads me to the last application of the principle, which is—

TRUST IN YOUR LORD TO DO THE WORK.

You see, there are two ways of filling waterpots. Suppose these people had never been commanded to fill the waterpots, and their doing it had had no reference to Christ whatever; suppose that it had been a freak of their own imagination, and they had said, "These people have no wine, but they shall have a bath if they like, and so we will fill the six waterpots with water." Nothing would have come of such a proceeding. There would have stood the water.

The Eton schoolboy said, "The conscious water saw its God and blushed," a truly poetic expression; but the conscious water would have seen the servants, and would not have blushed. It would have reflected their faces upon its shining surface, but nothing more would have happened. Jesus Christ himself must come, and in present power must work the miracle.

For my part, I do not believe that a good word for Christ is ever spoken in vain. I am sure that no sermon with Christ in it is ever preached without result. Something will come of it, if not to-night, nor to-morrow; something will come of it. When I have printed a sermon, and seen it fairly in the volume, I have before long been delighted to hear of souls saved by its means. And when I have not printed, but only preached a discourse, I have still thought something will come of it. I preached Christ. I put His saving truth into that sermon, and that seed cannot die. If it shall lie in the volume for years, like the grains of wheat in the mummy's hand it will live and grow and bear fruit. Consequently, I have heard but lately of a soul brought to Christ by a sermon that I preached twenty-five years ago. I hear almost every week of souls having been brought to Christ by sermons preached at Park Street, and Exeter Hall, and the Surrey Gardens; and therefore I feel that God will not let a single faithful testimony fall to the ground. Go on, brethren. Go on filling the waterpots with water. The increase is surely given by God where the planting and sowing are rightly done. The servants fill the water-pots: the Master turns the water into wine.

The Lord grant us grace to be obedient to his command, especially to that command, "Believe and live!" and may we meet Him in the marriage-feast above to drink of the new wine with Him forever and ever. Amen and amen.

[Portions of Scripture read before Sermon—
John 1: 29–51; John 2: 1–11].

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 185,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

NOT HALF A MAN.

A Temperance Story.

(Continued from page 620.)

Joe Trimmell finds Sunday a Dull Day—Fellow-workmen Studying the Bible—A Predicament—Joe gives his Heart to Christ—Mark Rayton Dying—His Conversion.

Joe Trimmell left Crawton next morning for a month's work at Clayton. Being an utter stranger to the men in his new sphere of work he was naturally left pretty much to himself, and this to a sociable man was a somewhat trying experience. But it was on the Sunday that he felt it most. Avoiding churches and chapels, and altogether thrown on his own resources, he was heartily glad when it was over. It was the dreariest day in the whole week to him.

When the second Sunday came, to kill time, Joe determined to take his dog and stroll into the country. It was his practice on such expeditions to cut across the country, clearing gates, hedges, and ditches in his way. He liked the excitement of it, especially as it gave his little dog something to do in the way of hunting. On this particular Sunday, after he had proceeded some way, and was jumping a hedge, he alighted upon a knot of working men. He was not altogether displeased when he discovered them to be men on the same works as himself, and still more pleased was he when they one and all invited him to form one of their circle.

His pleasure, however, was considerably diminished when he discovered their occupation. He had seen books in their hands, but he had never dreamed that they were Bibles. Had he known them a little better he would not have scrupled to rise up, and, whistling to his dog, declined such an employment. But he kept quiet and made the best of it. Having seated himself he could scarcely refuse the Bible which was handed him, though he had not held a Bible in his hand since he was a boy at the Sunday-school. Altogether Joe was like a fish out of water, as uncomfortable as he could well be.

"I hope the Crawton fellows will never hear of this," he thought. "I should never hear the last of it, I'm afraid. Dear me, what a fool I was to come this way, to be sure!"

But now Joe discovered to his horror that the men were reading round, and that he would be expected to read too. "It's getting worse and worse," thought Joe; "they'll be asking me to pray next." Joe never felt so hot in his life. He wondered whether he could even now frame an excuse and go; but, for the life of him, he could not find one, although he tried very hard. It was no good; he was caught like a rat in a trap, and must remain whether he liked it or no.

Though he had not to pray aloud, he had to read two or three times, and, moreover, had to look interested like the rest, which, at first, was a terribly hard task. I say at first, because, after a time, Joe did get a little interested; for, say what men might about religion, Joe could see they had got something worth having. It made them happier than Joe had ever thought it possible to be. Moreover, being most of them first-rate workmen, and thoroughly manly, Joe began to respect religion a good deal, quite divesting himself of his old notion that it was only for women and children. In fact, Joe Trimmell was sufficiently interested to promise to form one of the party at the same place the Sunday after.

All that week a great part of what was said in the field came back to him—sin, and the death due to it; Christ, and the salvation He purchased; heaven and hell. Joe was ever thinking of these now, and to no one's greater surprise than his own; until at last he actually found himself counting the hours before the little band should meet again; and when the time had come round, Joe was the first man there.

That afternoon the whole matter was settled between Joe and his God. One of his mates had joined him going back, and put to him the plain question, "Are you a saved man?" Joe had been honest and told him all; and, more than that, had told the Lord all too, and came to Jesus and gave Him his heart.

At their next meeting he could enter into every thing. With his own Bible open before him he sat now among brethren in the Lord Jesus, and, when his turn came to pray, heartily did he bless God for ever turning his feet in that direction that first Sunday afternoon.

But still another step did Joe Trimmell take before he returned to his own village. Finding that the whole of that Christian band were, to a man, teetotallers, he at once joined them, being fully convinced by the arguments they brought forward that it would not only be a help to himself, but to others likewise.

* * * * * *

The first thing which met Joe Trimmell's eye when he returned to Crawton was a large crowd in a tremendous state of excitement. Rapidly making his way toward it, he asked what was the matter. Judge his surprise when he was told "Mark Rayton's just been killed."

"How did it happen?" he quickly asked.

"Oh! tipsy again, as usual, and didn't get out of the way fast enough when the fuse was lighted for blasting."

Joe's heart had given a great bound at the answer to the first question, but at the answer to his second question he thought his heart must almost shatter itself, so fearfully did it throb. The blood flew from his face, and left it as ashy as the face of a corpse. His legs trembled beneath him, so that he could scarcely stand, and was obliged to sit down on a stone by the roadside.

After a time he recovered somewhat, made his way to Mark Rayton's cottage, and entered it. As he crossed its threshold he felt as though his were the hand that had brought ruin and death there. Mark lay upon the bed with a doctor beside him. It seemed that he was not dead, only unconscious. His injuries, moreover, were so serious that there was but little hope of his recovery. He might live for some days, but the doctor did not give much hope of even that."

"And I did it; and I did it!" was ever his self-accusing cry. "Would that I lay in Mark's place there. I deserve all this misery; I know I do. O help me to do something, be it ever so little, and let mine be the hand to do it. Could I be of any help?" he asked the doctor.

"Yes, you can watch beside his bed, and give him this medicine as soon as he regains consciousness. Do you mind watching beside him? His wife is quite broken down."

The earnest, grateful look in Joe's eyes sufficiently answered the question. Taking his seat beside Mark's bed, he watched. Hour after hour he watched; no fear of his falling asleep; his thoughts and self-accusations were too busy for that. And as he watched he prayed; prayed for himself; prayed for Mark, and for Mark's wife and children.

All through the night Mark's wife was coming in and looking on the white face. Joe would then draw back into the shade; and many a quiet tear did he drop as poor Bess stooped down and kissed the half-closed mouth. She would have stayed altogether had not Joe firmly and tenderly led her away.

At last Mark opened his eyes. He saw Joe at once, and held out his hand to grasp his. Joe had not quite expected that. He thought to have seen him turn away his head and refuse to speak to him. It broke him down to receive such treatment as this.

Mark groaned as he said, "Oh! it s so hard to go just yet. And what'll my poor wife and children do?" Covering his face, he wept bitterly; then, looking up into Joe's face, he said, "Besides, Joe, I ain't ready to die."

Now was Joe's long-prayed-for opportunity. Telling Mark all the story of his own conversion, he said,

"Mark, the Lord Jesus'll forgive and save you too, if you want Him to."

The next day he quite saw the way of salvation, and then he did not mind dying.

For some time Mark's mind was harassed b thoughts of his wife's future. "Whatever' poor Bess do?" And many a prayer did he off up that she and the children might be kept fro want. But as soon as he uttered his thought aloud his mind was immediately set at res Joe would see to that. Joe had no family, an Mark Rayton's wife should never want so lor as he lived. Joe was only too glad to have chance of undoing in ever so small a way tl terrible mischief he had been the means working.

We need not dwell on Mark's death, except say that, although painful, it was a very hap one. But one thing must be said about h funeral, and that is, Joe publicly confessed tl part he had played in Mark's fall and death, a while declaring his own repentance and Mark happy departure, earnestly exhorted his fello workmen who crowded round the grave to sh strong drink themselves, and specially to t think themselves before they ever tempted ar one else to the public-house.

NINE NEW THINGS.

A Sermon by Rev. D. L. Moody.

I. The New Birth—Not an Outward Work II. The New Creation—A New Man in (Clothes—III. The New Nature—Not a Chan of Heart—The Old Nature Remains.

Our subject this afternoon is nine new thin The first is

THE NEW BIRTH.

That is the beginning of a new life, and th is no growth until that takes place, no spirit life, no spiritual power.

This new birth is the work of God in the hea It is not an outward work. Man always beg on the outside if he wants to accomplish thing, but God always begins in a man. He gins at the heart. If you have a tree that bri forth bad fruit, you may pick off the bad fr but you can not make the tree any better. will keep constantly bringing forth bad fruit.

But God's method is to cut the tree right and graft something else in, and then you have good fruit. You may cut off all the t of the trees, but if you do not graft in so thing it will grow again and it will have bad fr And these men who are trying all the whil patch up their life and make it better are m ing a miserable failure of it.

No earthly change, no amount of educat nor any amount of good works, will make life good. It must be a new creation. It is what we can do, but it is what God does in That is the new birth. He is the Autho Life, and if we have new life it must come f Him.

It is not a new uniform. A man may put the uniform of the soldier, but that don't m him a soldier, and a man may put on a pr sion of religion, but that don't make him ligious. The new birth is a mystery, and th fore a great many people stumble.

The leper may cover up his leprosy, bu will be a leper still. He may cover himsel but it will make him no less a leper. A be may have some good clothes, but that d make him any thing but a beggar after all. may dress up and represent himself as so thing better, but he is still a beggar. If he only got a few new clothes, that won't help out of his condition of poverty. A man ma driven from outward sin by public sentin yet secretly live in sin, and in the sight of he is not one whit better. God looks at heart of a man. He reads men's hearts. world reads men's actions.

II. The next new thing is

THE NEW CREATION.

When a child is born it is born into a creation, and you will find in the 5th chapt 2d Corinthians and the 17th verse: "There if any man be in Christ, he is a new creatu I quoted that verse wrong until lately. S one said to me, "You are mistaken in that don't say it as you put it."

I used to say, "Therefore, if any man be in rist let him be a new creature." "Why," is friend says, "you will find by looking at it at it is stronger than that. It is therefore, if y man be in Christ, he is a new creature. d things have passed away, and behold all ngs have become new." He is born into a w creation.

Again in Galatians, 6th chapter, 15th verse: For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision aileth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new eature." If a man has been born again he l be a new creature. He will be altogether ferent from what he was before—he was born the Spirit, because there is a great difference ween the flesh and the spirit, and this new h brings us into a new creation. Like the tch lassie, who said when she was converted t either the world was changed or she was nged, for every thing seemed different. And t is. When the new life dawns upon us we born into a new creation.

ow when a man is born into the new crea- n the power of sin is broken in him. I will n say that the old desire for sin will not come k upon him: but the power, the reigning er of sin, is broken in him, when he is born God and born into this new creation. Old gs have passed away.

here was a man converted in one of our tings, and he was about as hard a looking racter, I believe, as I have ever seen. He got down very low, and his clothes were shabby, and when he was converted—I d him say a few hours after his conversion he didn't know himself. He said he was a man in old clothes. That is just what he and he has been a different man ever since. I. There are two new things—the new birth the new creation. Now the next thing that et at the new birth is ant to say right here a great many young ples stumble over this, and that is one ob- I had in taking this up—to help those that just commencing a new life. I used to ch that except a man would have a change eart he could not see God. I found, after ying my Bible a little more closely, that was not Scripture; that it is not anywhere ded in the New Testament that a man shall a change of heart, but it is a new heart, it ew nature.

THE NEW NATURE.

hen God gives a man a new nature, He take away the old nature. As long as in the flesh the flesh must have a nature. when a man is born of God, then the war- egins. I had a very good opinion of my- ntil I was born of God. I didn't have any le with myself. I got on very well with lf. I was at peace with myself; but when ew nature came, then came the conflict. e spirit lusteth against the flesh, and the against the spirit, and then the warfare be- and it has been going on for these twenty years; and if I live twenty years longer, I t that it will go on, and that it will go on I go to my grave.

will be a conflict between the flesh and the . They are distinct and separate. "That is born of the flesh is flesh, and that that rn of the spirit is spirit"—two distinct s. Now will you just read in 2d Peter, 1st er and 4th verse:

Whereby are given unto us exceeding great recious promises; that by these ye might rtakers of the divine nature, having escaped rruption that is in the world through lust." 'artakers of the divine nature." Now the e with a great many men who are not tians, who are trying to serve God and poor work of it, and who think He is a master, and that it is a hard thing to be a tian—the mistake they make is, they are; to serve God with the old carnal heart, ith the old Adam nature. That is impos- "It is not subject to the law of God, er, indeed, can be."

ould just as soon tell a man to go out and jump over the sun as to attempt to serve God until he is born of God, until he becomes a partaker of the divine nature. But when God's nature is planted in me, and when I have laid hold of that divine nature, and God's nature is in me, then I have got a new nature, and with that I serve God. I have got a new life, and I serve God. Then "the yoke is easy and the burden is light." It is not a hard thing then. It becomes second nature to serve God. With that higher and pure nature, with God's nature in me, with that I serve God, and that lifts me above myself and out of myself, and it takes me up to God.

The child of God will have two natures. The child of God is the most remarkable animal on the face of the earth. Now the cow has its nature and the dog has its nature. All the animal creation has its nature. But when a man or woman becomes a child of God they have an earthly nature and a heavenly, a higher and lower nature—call them what you please—but they have two distinct natures, and one is contrary to the other.

Now if you will just turn over here into the seventh chapter of Romans I think we will get a little light upon this subject, and I think we will understand something about what Paul was writing about in the seventh and eighth chapters of Romans; in fact, I might say the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth chapters ought to be read together.

"For that which I do, I allow not; for what I would, that do I not; but what I hate, that do I." You see there is the new life protesting against the old—protesting against the flesh—the flesh rising up sometimes and bringing us into captivity and into bondage.

And that is just where I want to warn you young converts, because if the flesh comes up in some unguarded moment, and you should say, "Well, I thought I was converted, but I think I am not, because I feel my old desires coming up again"—it is no sign you are not converted. It is no sign at all. When the flesh comes up you are to and ask Him to put it down, and ask Him to keep it in its place of death. You are to keep your body under; but if in an unguarded moment the flesh gets uppermost, don't get discouraged. It is no sign you are not a Christian, because right here Paul said he protested against these things. He didn't give his consent.

GO RIGHT AWAY TO CHRIST

"If then I do that which I would not, I consent unto the law that it is good.

"Now then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me."

Paul says it is "sin dwelling in me." I protested against it. There was the new life going right against sin, and that is the difference between the old man and the new man. The old nature goes right along with the current of the world, gets on very well with the world; but the new nature goes right against the current of the world.

As an old divine said, you can tell the difference between a dead fish and a live one because the dead fish always goes with the current and the living one goes right against the current. A man dead in trespasses and sins, he will go with the world. He will get on being well with the world. But when a man gets this new nature, this heavenly nature, he goes right against the current of the world. That is a sign he has the new life.

"Now it is no more I that do it, but Christ, who dwelleth in me." "For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing; for to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not. For the good that I would, I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do. Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. I find then a law that, when I would do good, evil is present with me."

Now isn't that your experience? Isn't that the experience of every child of God in this house, that when he would do good evil is present with you? You have to be on your guard all the while, and you have to watch. "Resist the devil and he will flee from you." Resist the flesh, as some one says, and it clings to you.

I think I have had

MORE TROUBLE WITH MOODY

of the old creation than with any man who ever crossed my path. I have had more battles with D. L. Moody than with any other man who ever crossed my path. I have had a great many mean things said against me by other people, but I know a good many meaner things about myself than they know about me. I have got a mean nature, but God gives me grace to keep it under, and if I don't keep it under it is my own fault, because God has given me grace to do it. This is what it is for—it is to keep the old Adam under and in the place of death. I am to put off the old man constantly, and whenever I find him coming to life and coming up, I am to go to God to get more grace to keep him down. "I find there the law that when I would do good, evil is present with me." "For I delight in the law of God after the inward man." After the new nature. You see that is the inward man—"I delight in the law of God."

I have got a new nature that makes me love God and serve Him. There was a time that I hated Him. There was a time I hated that Bible more than any other book in the world. I hated the sound of the church bell more than any other sound in this world. Now I delight in it, after the inner man, but I find I have got two natures.

I AM TWO MEN.

"But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members." "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?"

Now he comes out and he says, "I have got deliverance." Paul knew where to find deliverance. "Why," says he, "I can do all things through Him that strengtheneth me. I can keep the old man down. I can reckon myself dead and keep him in the place of death. I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin."

There are the two natures. The law of the flesh—you see when temptation comes and presents itself to the flesh, if God don't keep me up I yield. If Christ don't give me victory I fall. But don't get discouraged, young disciples, if you are overtaken in some fault.

And I want to say right here, to the older Christians, we sometimes help the devil do his work. When a young convert has slipped and fallen the older Christians say, "Ah, a pretty Christian, isn't he? It was only a few months ago that he made a profession of Christianity; now see what he has done." That is just doing the devil's work.

"If a brother be overtaken in a fault," it says, "you who are spiritual restore him in the spirit of meekness, considering yourself, lest you also be tempted and fall. Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." Now mark you, "if a brother be overtaken." You see there is the old nature and Satan coming after him, but he is running away. He has been overtaken and fallen, but it is no sign that he is not a Christian.

If he would rather live in sin and stay in the world and stay with enemies than to come back to God, it is a good sign he hasn't got the new nature, because the new nature cannot live in this world. The new nature must live in a different atmosphere. They must be heavenly-minded if they have the new nature. And yet there is a conflict between the higher and the lower nature. Now a fish cannot live out of water. Why? Because it is not its nature. And you and I cannot live in water. Why? Because it is not our nature. And a child of God cannot live in the world. They are in it, but not of it. We have got into a different atmosphere, a different creation entirely.

(To be concluded next week.)

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

(Continued from page 622.)

Change of Scene.

"I think you know already, Miss Richards," I said, "the reason I would not marry Claude."

"Is it because Claude is not truly a Christian, dear ; is that your reason?"

"Yes, that is it," I said ; "I dare not have said 'yes' to Claude, Miss Richards, in the face of God's clear command. I felt I could expect no happiness or blessing if I were so disobedient."

"You were quite right, dear May," said Miss Richards, with tears in her eyes ; "I should have done just the same. Indeed once, May (you will not mention it to any one, I know), I did exactly the same myself. It was very hard at the time," said the good little woman, as the recollection of that sorrow, now so far behind her in her past life, came as fresh as if it had only taken place yesterday ; "it was very hard at the time, for I loved him very much, but I can see it was all right now. I should have been a miserable, unhappy wife if I had married him, and I can thank God that I gave him up."

"Then you can understand how I felt, dear Miss Richards," I said.

"Yes, indeed," she said earnestly ; "and as soon as that thought occurred to me, as soon as ever it came into my mind, that that was your reason for refusing Claude, I felt, dear, that you were right and I was wrong. You were right, perfectly right in obeying God's command ; and I was wrong, very wrong, May, in wishing you to marry one who is not, I know, a real Christian."

Miss Richards kissed me very lovingly, as she said this, and I went home with a light and thankful heart.

Poor Miss Richards! I had never dreamt that there was a touching little love story hidden away somewhere in her past history. I had never dreamt that that was the reason why she had never married, but had lived that quiet, unselfish life in her brother's house– living for all around her. And I was very thankful that she thought I had acted rightly, and would no longer blame me, but would be able and ready to sympathize with me in my trial.

The busy time of packing and leave-taking was at length over, and Maggie and I left our first and hitherto our only home.

It is a merciful ordering that at such times we are far too busy and full of thought and care about the present moment to realize what would otherwise overwhelm us with sorrowful feeling. As we drove off from our old home we had to turn back for a forgotten key, and then, almost directly afterward, we arrived at the station, and I had to take the tickets, look after the luggage, and select a carriage. My mind was consequently so full of business that not until the train had started did I realize that Maggie and I had left our dear happy home, never to return to it again.

We were going that day to the old Manor House at Branston, where Maggie's aunts lived. They had kindly expressed a wish to see me, and had invited me to spend a week with them before going to Alliston Hall. Maggie was of course delighted at this arrangement, and I was not sorry to have a week's rest, after the whirl of the last month, before entering upon my new duties.

This was my first visit to the old Manor House, but Maggie had spent a very pleasant month there two years before, and was much looking forward to seeing her aunts again.

We had a long journey, and it was late in the evening when we arrived at Branston.

"I should think John will be here," said Maggie, as we got out at the very quiet country station.

John was there, awaiting our arrival. John was a fat, comfortable-looking old coachman, who had been in the family for more than fifty years, and looked as if, in the whole course of them, he had never had one single day's hard work.

John was driving two horses equally fat, equally comfortable-looking, and equally, by their appearance, denying the bare idea of their ever having had any hard work to do.

John touched his hat, and bade the ladies welcome, and hoped "Missy" was quite well. He was evidently quite at his ease, and accustomed to be regarded as a family friend.

We thanked John, and answered his inquiries, and then took our seats in the carriage. It was very old, like John, and quite out of date, of unwieldy proportions, and made a great noise in the world.

We drove for about a mile and a half, through rather an uninteresting country ; at least, so it seemed to me, after the wooded hills and pretty valleys which had surrounded our dear old home. We went very slowly indeed, and when there was the slightest rising in the ground, the horses walked solemnly and cautiously up it, and I was more than ever convinced that the opinion I had formed about the easy life that those two comfortable-looking horses had always led was perfectly correct.

At last we went through a large iron gate, and entered a pretty old-fashioned garden, surrounded by a high wall. At one end of this garden stood the Manor House, a quaint old place, built of red brick, and partly covered with ivy.

As we drove past the window, Maggie's three aunts looked out, and nodded and smiled at us ; they did not come out to meet us, for, as I afterward discovered, they were very much afraid of taking cold, and never ventured into the hall when the front door was open.

We were met on the steps by an elderly, old-fashioned servant, in a clean white apron, and a large cap, plaited round her face. She took us into the drawing-room, which was full of quaint and antiquated furniture, and abounded in sofas and arm-chairs, covered with very old-fashioned chintz.

In this room the three aunts were anxiously awaiting our arrival. They almost overwhelmed us with kindness, and insisted on our lying down to rest for half an hour on the comfortable sofas till tea was quite ready.

The room was very hot, there was a large fire, and huge screens stood before the doors, and sand-bags and curtains excluded every possible draught from the windows. I felt very tired and worn out in mind and body, so I was not sorry to obey my kind hostesses and remain quiet for half an hour. It gave me time to think over the events of the past day, and also to look at Maggie's three aunts, who did not leave the room, but went on with their work and their talk while we were resting.

The eldest sister, Miss Jane, was evidently the ruling spirit in the house. Her word was law, and her quiet, firm decision settled every disputed question. There was plenty of firmness, plenty of good sense, plenty of real kindliness in her face, as she bent over the stocking which she was knitting in the most energetic manner, sitting in one of the large arm-chairs near the fire.

The second sister seemed to me to be a weak reflection of the eldest one, and, I soon found out, was quite ruled by her in every thing, for she had not strength of character to settle any thing on her own responsibility. If Miss Jane's word was law to her household, it was more especially law to Miss Hannah.

"What do you think, sister?" was the question repeated by her many times in the day, in answer to which Miss Jane would give her opinion calmly and decidedly, and that opinion was always conclusive.

The youngest sister, Miss Louisa, was considered an invalid. The best of every thing was always given to her—the most comfortable chair and the warmest corner, the best seat in the carriage, and at all hours of the day little tempting dishes were brought up to induce Miss Louisa to eat. Miss Jane and Miss Hannah were never tired of waiting on her, and treated her almost like a spoiled child.

They were very kind to me, these three sisters, during my stay in the old Manor House. They even said how much they wished I would make my home with them ; but, of course, I could never dream of being a burden to them it was very kind of them to take Maggie, I must make my own way in the world.

Every thing in the Manor House was in the most beautiful order. The carpets looked as i in the whole course of their existence they had never known what it was to have a speck of dus or piece of cotton left on them ; the furnitur was so bright that you could see yourself reflected in every part of it ; the drugget on the stair was spotlessly white, as clean as if it was washe every morning regularly ; in fact, the most perfect neatness and order and cleanliness reigne everywhere throughout the old Manor House.

There were no little children to make dirt foot-marks on the clean floors, or to soil th clean coverings of the chairs and sofas. An the regularity and punctuality in the house qui equalled its neatness and order. At exactly th same moment every morning Miss Jane cam downstairs to make the tea. At exactly th same instant, day by day, the old servants cam into the room for prayers. Meals were never moment late—as the clock struck we all took o seats, and grace was immediately said. At e actly the same hour, every day, the sisters too their morning drive or their afternoon nap.

The whole place seemed like some huge clo which had been wound up years ago, long befo any one could remember, and which had be going on and on and on ever since, without on needing to be wound up, or set going, or look after again.

This regular, unbroken, undisturbed life the old Manor House was very pleasant for little time. It was just what I needed, after I had gone through lately. But I fancied tha should soon grow rather tired of it. I fanc that I should long for the door-bell to ring, a an interruption to come in my clock-work ex ence. I should long for a little of the stir a bustle and motion of the world outside, to cr into the monotony and unchangeableness of life within.

I was a little troubled as I looked forward a pictured to myself the kind of training wh Maggie would have in such a home. I afraid it would be rather relaxing to her m and energies, so that if she came out of it i the coldness and roughness of the outside w she would feel the difference very strongly, would not be hardy enough to stand it.

I was not afraid that Maggie would be here, for she was a quiet child, and fond of p ing alone, and making her own amusements pleasures ; and there was a small farm close kept by old John and his wife, which Maggie's constant resort, and here, among chickens and ducks and lambs and calves pigeons, she found plenty to interest her, plenty of recreation and amusement. The a were exceedingly kind to her, and I felt they would train and teach her to the bes their ability.

But what I was afraid of was, that Mag mind would get a little cramped by the sm ness of the sphere in which she was living, that she would thus become somewhat se and self-indulgent. Yet all these fears I ca one by one to my Lord, as they arose ; and unspeakable comfort and relief in placing little sister under His Almighty care.

Miss Jane was my favorite among the ters. There was something in her face w made me trust her at once, and her good mon-sense and real heartfelt sympathy always be relied upon. I found myself, al before I was aware, giving her a history of happy home-life, and telling her many o anxieties and troubles, as I thought of th ture. She made me promise that whenever a holiday given me I would come to the M House, and that I would remember that it w never be any thing but a very great pleasu them all to have me there.

(To be continued.)

JACOB AND ESAU.

S. Lesson for October 10th Gen. 27 : 22–40.
olden Text, Prov. 4 : 27. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

GOD'S Word is always faithful in its portraite of the heart of man. In the Old Testament od uncovers in His biographies of patriarchs, ngs, and prophets, the mistakes and sins of His n people, and then in the New He reveals to the perfect and glorious provision which He s made for the overcoming of sin and the ing in newness of life. Thus we must never ake the sins of such as lived under the old venant an excuse for our sinning in like anner. Christ is "the Mediator of a better venant, which was established upon better omises" (Heb. 8 : 6). The first "could not ake him that did the service perfect" (Heb. 9), would not "take away sins" (Heb. 10 : 4.) t Christ, by his death, has made "a new and ing way" (Heb. 10 : 20), by which we may valk in newness of life" and "not serve sin" Neither law, example, nor warning can do the rk which Christ has done. Abraham's exience with Ishmael did not hinder Isaac from king to bring God's peculiar blessing upon u, although God had distinctly declared to bekah regarding her sons, "The elder shall ve the younger" (Gen. 25 : 23). Sarah's uncessful device of giving Hagar to her husd to wife did not hinder Rebekah from seek means to help God in the fulfilment of what knew to be His purpose for her son Jacob, so to defeat her husand by her planning ind of leaving God to do His will in His own e and way.

sau had already shown himself to be a man r the flesh, first in acting as a "profane per . . . who for one morsel of meat sold his hright" (Heb. 12 : 16; Gen. 25 : 29–34), and in taking to wife daughters of Canaan, "hich were a grief of mind unto Isaac and to Rebekah." Abraham had said to the eldest ant of his house, "I will make thee swear by the Lord, the God of heaven and the God of the h, that thou shalt not take a wife unto my of the daughters of the Canaanites, among m I dwell." But Esau had not his grander's holy respect for the will of God, nor did egard the opinion of his own parents; and in avation of this self-seeking; he married not only, but two of the daughters of Canaan. lf-seeking must bring trouble into a family brings trouble into a soul, and trouble, most l, into the Church of Christ. "Isaac loved Esau because he did eat of his venison" (Gen. 28). And thus for selfish ends a converted er encouraged an unconverted son in his ly life. In the beginning of our chapter saw how Isaac called his eldest son Esau, sent him to take some venison, "that," said he 'my soul may bless thee before I die." It a painful picture which followed in that ly which was the elect family of the faithful earth at that time. The mother determined rustrate the purpose of the father, the ner to supplant the brother. Rebekah, havoverheard her husband speaking thus to , did not go openly and honestly to remind of God's Word to her, nor did she even go e Lord who had spoken to her; but she de unrighteous means to attain her object out respect to the fearful responsibility she ncurring in leading her son into an act of lief in God, and of deception as regards his father.

is the privilege of a mother who lives the f Christ to utilize every circumstance in ing her children to stand and walk on the ground of God's own faithful Word. When a mother resorts to plans and projects in mergency of health, business, or any other which arises, instead of trustfully confidvery thing to Him who "maketh all things together for good to them that love Him," is fostering unbelief in her children. kah demanded obedience of her son (ver. 8), t is strange that Jacob's objection did not : her and open her eyes to her sin and folly. "Behold," he said (ver. 11, 12), "Esau, my brother, is a hairy man, and I am a smooth man; my father, peradventure, will feel me, and I shall seem to him as a deceiver; and I shall bring a curse upon me, and not a blessing." I shall seem to him as a deceiver, and I shall bring a curse upon me. In Jacob's words we perceive no fear of committing the sin itself; he had regard only to his own interests.

Rebekah, having entered on a course of deception, was at no loss for expedients to meet every difficulty as it arose—the father of lies is fertile in his resources—and she clothed her son in Esau's raiment and put the skins of the kids upon Jacob's hands and upon the smooth of his neck, and then "she gave the savory meat and the bread which she had prepared into the hands of her son Jacob. And he came unto his father." And when the question of blindness was asked him by his helpless father, so bent was Jacob upon securing his own ends that there was in him no sense of shame when he said, "I am Esau thy firstborn; I have done according as thou badest me; arise, I pray thee, sit, and eat of my venison, that thy soul may bless me."

Isaac appeared to have some misgiving when he said, "How is it that thou hast found it so quickly, my son?" And how terrible was the hypocrisy of Jacob's reply, "Because the Lord thy God brought it to me!" While Jacob could not say my God, but only thy God, he dared to speak as though God were party to the transaction. He said "Come near, I pray thee, that I may feel thee, my son, whether thou be my very son Esau or not." And then he said! "The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau. And he discerned him not, because his hands were hairy, as his brother Esau's hands." Yet again, as though he could not give him implicit confidence, he said, "Art thou my very son Esau?" And he said, "I am."

How different was it in the case of Peter (Acts 5) when God told him of the sin of Ananias and Sapphira! A man filled with the Holy Ghost as Peter was needed not to put questions in order to discover deceit. The presence of his God with him brought so pure an atmosphere that such a taint was easily perceptible. To be able to detect and deal with sin in others, we must be pure ourselves. Isaac was following his own will with regard to his eldest son; hence his impotence to discover the truth. But God in His infinite wisdom wrought out His purposes through the unfaithfulness of His children. Jacob obtained the blessing, but he had to go through a discipline in his after life which might have been spared had he acted in faith toward God and in uprightness toward his father.

But all Jacob's planning was for an object worthy of him; he sought heavenly things, not honor among men, but to be in the direct line of descent in which all nations of the earth were to be blest through the promised seed (Gal. 3 : 16). Esau, eager for a passing satisfaction, had sworn away his birthright to Jacob who was anxiously desirous to obtain it. Jacob manifested his meanness and selfishness in withholding his ready-prepared food from his hungry brother and stipulating for the birthright as a condition; but wrong and dishonorable as he was, he was not "profane" like Esau, and he would use any means to obtain the blessing of his God.

In every-day life we see antitypes of Esau and Jacob. There are such as are attractive, open, generous, noble, among the unconverted, who follow their own will truly, but never assume to do any thing else, and often they are apt to esteem themselves as intrinsically better, because they are better in their own eyes, and better in the eyes of the world, than many professing but inconsistent believers. Again, we have among us such whose life is totally different, many whose faces are turned Zionward, whose minds and hearts are occupied with the promises of God; but instead of obtaining them in a straightforward way and through direct intercourse with God, they have recourse to means which reflect no honor upon their God or upon themselves; they seek after God's blessing for themselves more than for Him, and often are regardless of the well-being, the comfort or the good of others while they are occupied with the progress or the joy of their own souls.

There are some who will never sacrifice an hour of prayer, although others in the house may be put to the greatest inconvenience. There are such as have set their hearts on getting good at a conference, and who are ready to make others suffer from fatigue in doing work which ought to devolve on them. God will probably give them blessing, but it may be accompanied with much trial. "He gave them their request, but sent leanness into their soul" (Ps. 106 : 15). The history of Jacob is a wonderful illustration of the fact that it is not enough to make heavenly things our aim, but we must also seek them in God's way and not in ours.

Esau desired to have the blessing when he saw his father was desirous to give it to him, and he evidently counted fully upon it when he went out to hunt for venison, and then returned and made savory meat with his own hand, and came with it into his father's presence; but he did not take into account the God who had recorded many years before how he had despised his birthright, and who held him to his word, "What profit shall this birthright do to me?" (Chap. 25 : 32). His father said unto him, "Who art thou?" And he said, "I am thy son, thy firstborn Esau." And Isaac trembled very exceedingly, and said, "Who? where is he that hath taken venison and brought it me, and I have eaten of all before thou camest, and I have blessed him? Yea, and he shall be blessed, for God's blessing is irrevocable by man." This was the moment of anguish for Esau; now his eyes were opened to see that he could not trifle with his birthright; "he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears" (Heb. 12 : 13).

"He cried with a great and exceeding bitter cry . . . Bless me, even me also, O my father!" And he—only now awake to the duplicity of Jacob—said, "Thy brother came with subtelty, and hath taken away thy blessing." Esau, naturally generous, was nevertheless embittered with the sense of wrong; and he was unjust, too, in his rejoinder, for he saw no fault in himself. He said, "Is he not rightly named Jacob [a supplanter]? for he hath supplanted me these two times; he took away my birthright, and, behold, now he hath taken away my blessing. And he said, Hast thou not reserved a blessing for me?" It was only now, when all hope of blessing seemed to be slipping away from him, that Esau was intent upon it. How like many who seek mercy on a dying bed! When his father repeated to him the blessing which he had bestowed upon Jacob, and said, "What shall I do now unto thee, my son," he answered, "Hast thou but one blessing, my father, bless me, even me also, O my father."

And Isaac blessed him, but the blessing was not in the name of his God as in the case of Jacob. He could not say, "God give thee of the dew of heaven . . . cursed be every one that curseth thee, and blessed be every one that blesseth thee." God's grace is not at the command of man's caprice. Esau did not humble himself; he yielded to revenge; "hated Jacob because of the blessing wherewith his father blessed him. And he said in his heart, The days of mourning for my father are at hand, then will I slay my brother Jacob. And these words of Esau, her eldest son, were told to Rebekah." Who told them her? Esau spoke in his heart. It may be that Rebekah had become aware of her sin through this its consequence, and had spoken to the Lord, and that He it was who told her of what was passing in Esau's heart. And she, who loved Jacob so fondly, was obliged to send him away from her, and thus she learned the bitterness of taking into her unskilful hands the fulfilment of the promises of God. Let us who learn the lessons withhold our hands from touching His work as though it were our own.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Public Attention in Europe is still Occupied with the Eastern Question. What shall be done with Turkey and the different peoples she misgoverns is a problem which, in spite of congresses and conferences and diplomatic negotiations, is still unsolved. The last international congress framed a programme which satisfied Europe generally, and it was hoped that its provisions would be accepted by the Sultan of Turkey. They were naturally unpalatable to him, because they involved the loss of territory, but it was believed that he would display wisdom in submitting, lest a worse thing happened to him. But as yet the decisions of the congress have not been carried into effect.

The particular point in the programme on which Europe is now agitated is the cession of Dulcigno to the Montenegrins. Dulcigno is a small seaport town in Albania, and the congress decided that it should be handed over to Montenegro. The Turkish Sultan dealt craftily with Europe on the subject. He made a display of acquiescence, and sent a small force to carry out the will of the congress, but he secretly sent emissaries at the same time to stir up an opposition to the cession among the Albanians, and after a feeble show of resistance the Turks left the town in possession of the Albanians, and professed themselves unable to carry out the cession to Montenegro. The European Powers insist upon the decision of the congress being obeyed, and have sent a combined fleet, under the command of the British Admiral, to see that it is done. The Albanians now hold the town, and Europe watches intently the strange spectacle of 8000 men in a little obscure town defying the Great Powers.

Grave Apprehensions are Felt in every European capital that a general European war may be caused by the events now transpiring around Dulcigno. The Sultan in stirring up the Albanians has evoked a religious fanaticism which transforms Mohammedans into desperate maniacs, and which he is powerless to control. Already covert hints are thrown out of a massacre of Christians throughout the Turkish Empire, and the cry for "a holy war" is making itself heard. The spectacle of anarchy and massacre would speedily bring down the forces of the Great Powers, and the Turkish Empire would be dissolved amid a struggle for prey such as the world has never yet seen. While these war-clouds hang heavily on the horizon, and men's hearts are failing them for fear, the Christian sees in them only the fulfilment of prophecy. He remembers that his Lord foretold that these things should immediately precede the end, and as he sees the predictions fulfilling he knows that it is nigh, "even at the doors" (Mark 13 : 29).

A Political Crisis has Arisen in France out of the religious question. The ultra-radicals, who are opposed to religion in any and every form, were anxious that the laws under which the Jesuits were expelled, might be put in force against the other religious bodies not authorized by law. M. de Freycinet, the Premier, was reluctant to institute proceedings, and he therefore, in a recent speech, indicated a path by which the various religious bodies not authorized by Government might obtain a kind of sanction which would bar legal proceedings against them. This act exasperated the Radicals, who would have preferred that if there were a way of escape, it should not be pointed out. Accordingly, M. de Freycinet found himself extremely unpopular with the extreme Radicals, who loudly clamored for him to submit or resign, and as Gambetta deemed it prudent to withhold his support he resigned. M. Jules Ferry, who is supposed to be a mere puppet of Gambetta's, succeeds him. The course adopted by M. de Freycinet receives the approval of moderate Republicans, and his resignation is generally regarded as a misfortune. The Radicals, however, rejoice in his fall, and the enemies of the Republic also are glad, for they expect now that the Red Republicans will have their way, and anarchy will follow, from which the country will call on the Royalists or Imperialists to deliver it. Prince Napoleon is fully alive to the situation, and as he is skilfully placing himself in the Radical van, may succeed in grasping the reins of power. Such a scheme shows his craft, and confirms the impression long held by prophetic students, that Prince Napoleon will be the Antichrist described in the Bible.

A British Peer Murdered in Ireland.—News has been received by cable that Lord Mountmorres was murdered on Saturday night, September 25th, at Rusheen, County Galway. The Viscount attended a meeting of magistrates on Saturday afternoon at the Court House of Clonbur, and was seen to leave the town about eight o'clock. Half an hour afterward his horse and carriage arrived at his residence, a mile distant, without him. This aroused suspicion among his family. Search having been made, he was found lying on the side of the road, in a pool of blood, lifeless. Lord Mountmorres appears to have received one bullet in his head, penetrating the skull; three in the neck, and two in the body, any one of the six wounds being sufficient to cause his death. He was little known except in his own neighborhood. He had fifteen tenants, with whom he had most unhappy relations. Quite recently he obtained ejectment decrees against two of them. As a magistrate he was unpopular, and at the meeting of justices, which he had been attending, a resolution was passed calling upon the Government to adopt coercive measures. Agrarian crimes of this order are not only sins in themselves, but they are unpatriotic blunders. They alienate sympathy from Ireland, and they retard the legislative concessions of the British Government.

A Lottery for Life.—The Captain and Eight of the crew of the iron ship Gartconnel were landed at Liverpool on September 3d, and stated that their ship foundered on August 19th, while sailing from Java for Queenstown, having been in collision with the German bark Christel. Both crews drifted about on the latter vessel for four days when the bark Ogmore, of Swansea, was signalled. As her captain, however, said he could only receive a limited number of the Gartconnel's crew on board, lots were drawn by them to decide who should be taken off the wreck, and the winners in the lottery were received on the Ogmore, and ultimately reached Liverpool. The fate of the other men is not known. The Gospel-ship has, however, room for all who are in danger of eternal shipwreck, and the Great Pilot has announced his determination to save all, "even to the uttermost," who trust in Him. "Whosoever will let him come," and step into the lifeboat of salvation in Christ.

A Strange Death from a Wasp's Sting Occurred on the estate of a wealthy German landowner at Goldberg, recently. One of the farm servants, while harvesting in the fields, sat down to eat his midday meal, consisting of bread, cheese, and milk, which had been sent out to him from his master's kitchen. With his first draught of milk he took a wasp into his mouth, and although he promptly spat it out, the angry creature found time to plant its sting in the back of his throat before he could get rid of it. The interior of the unfortunate man's larynx swelled rapidly, and he died of suffocation, after enduring terrible agonies in the vain endeavor to breathe and to force open the air-passages in his throat. The deceased was an old soldier attached to the reserve of the King's Grenadier Regiment, and he had passed unhurt through two hard campaigns, dying at last from the sting of a wasp.

The Famine in Persia.—The Rev. Thomas Boyajian, from Diarbekir, on the Tigris, recently addressed a meeting in the Free Assembly Hall, Edinburgh, in reference to the famine in Armenia. Mr. Boyajian said that last winter, in December and January, the thermometer fell 22 degs. below freezing point, and snow fell so heavily as to close up all the roads, so that no grain could be brought in from the surrounding states. He mentioned one town in which ther were at one time about 5,000 people begging fo bread, and who had neither shelter, food, nc houses. They were scattered throughout th streets, and with his own eyes he had see hundreds of them lying in the mud and snov Describing the state of things in the south, l said they were still worse there, and mothe had been obliged to sell their children for shilling or two.

The Attempt to hold Sunday Concerts i Canada has been again before the law courts c appeal. The manager of the concerts contend that the law under which he had been restrain from holding his concerts was an English la which did not apply to Canada, but the judg have dismissed his appeal and upheld the de sion by which he was prohibited from desecrati the Lord's day.

Dr. Wenger, the Eminent Baptist Missiona to India, died in Calcutta on August 20th. He h translated the historical and prophetical books the Old Testament and the Gospels and Acts ir Sanscrit, putting the poetical parts of the C Testament into Sanscrit verse. In Bengali executed one or two revisions of the translati of the Bible, and parts of it he translat afresh. His version is used by all denomi tions of Christians in Bengal. Dr. Wenger v a Swiss by birth. He went out to India in 18 and, with the exception of about three ye spent in two visits to Europe, he passed whole of the intervening period in India.

Prayer Requested for Ireland.—A Letter v read last week at a public meeting in New Yc containing the following request: "The pray of the Lord's people are earnestly invited t much blessing may rest upon the approach Annual Christian Convention, to be held Dublin October 11th and three following d The exceedingly critical position of affairs in land is surely a strong argument why all love Divine Truth should be specially impo nate that the Lord might lift up 'the light of countenance,' on these gatherings of His dren held in this 'cloudy and dark day.'"

A Romish Missionary.—The Rev. Gri John, writing on Popish influence in China, s "On my last journey I had an illustratio the Romish mode of work in China. I with a Roman Catholic native evang whose main occupation consists in going a the country baptizing dying children. He pears among the heathen as a native do offers his pills and powders gratis, and a himself of the opportunity to sprinkle the with a few drops of holy water in the sa name, and thus rescues the soul of the child the 'Infants' Hell.' When asked if he seri believed that a few drops of water could such a momentous difference between one and another, his reply was that such are teachings of his Church, and that it is for simply to believe and obey. We offered h copy of the New Testament, but he declin accept it."

Persian Famine Fund.—We have Rec ten dollars from Miss Jane E. Huntingto Springfield, Ohio, in aid of this fund.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watcl (London) for September may be obtained at the of The Christian Herald. Price six cents.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Works are o at the office of The Christian Herald, at pri low as to bring them within the reach of ever Twelve Sermons on various subjects, with phot of Mr. Spurgeon, price 35 cents. John Ploug Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, 60 The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, a volume sermons, $2.50. The Treasury of David, a ho cal exposition of the book of Psalms, five vols., as Psa. 118, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth-Da This popular gift-book contains a suitable p selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for eve in the year, with a blank space opposite for graphs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. Sp appear at their respective birthdays. The b elegantly bound, and the price is 75 cents. tances should accompany orders.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

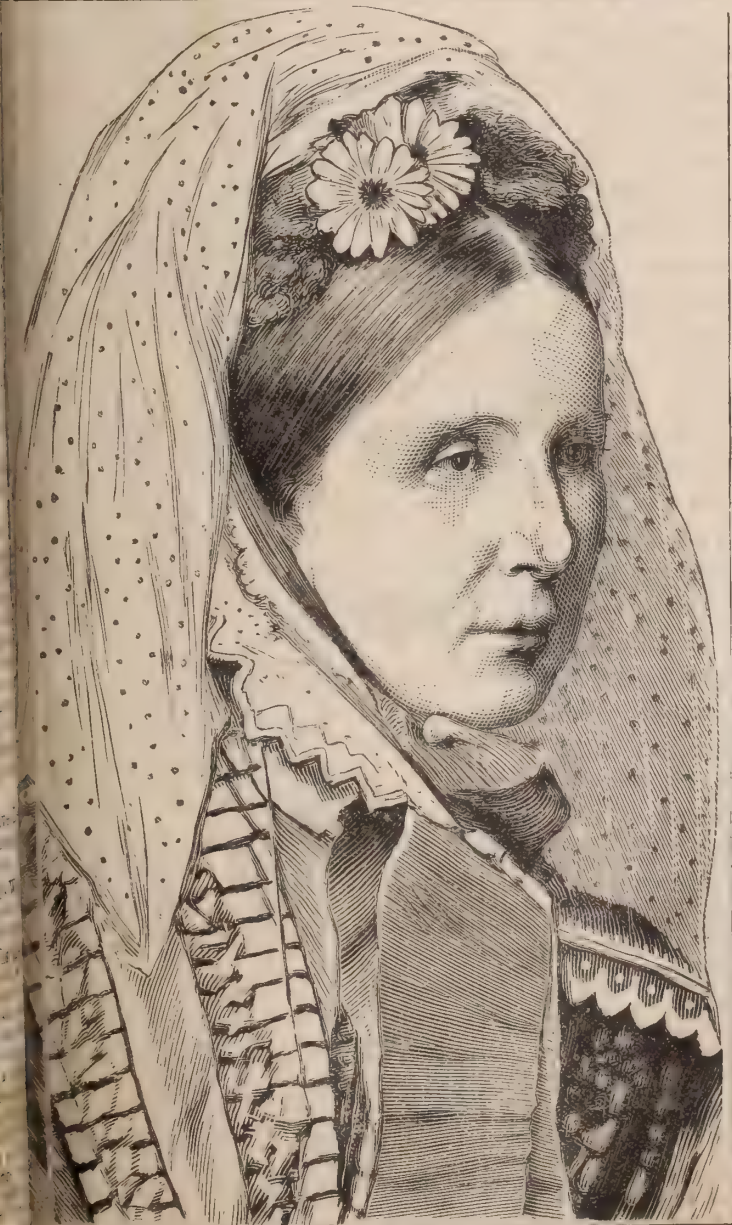
Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, Rev. W. M. HAY AITKEN, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

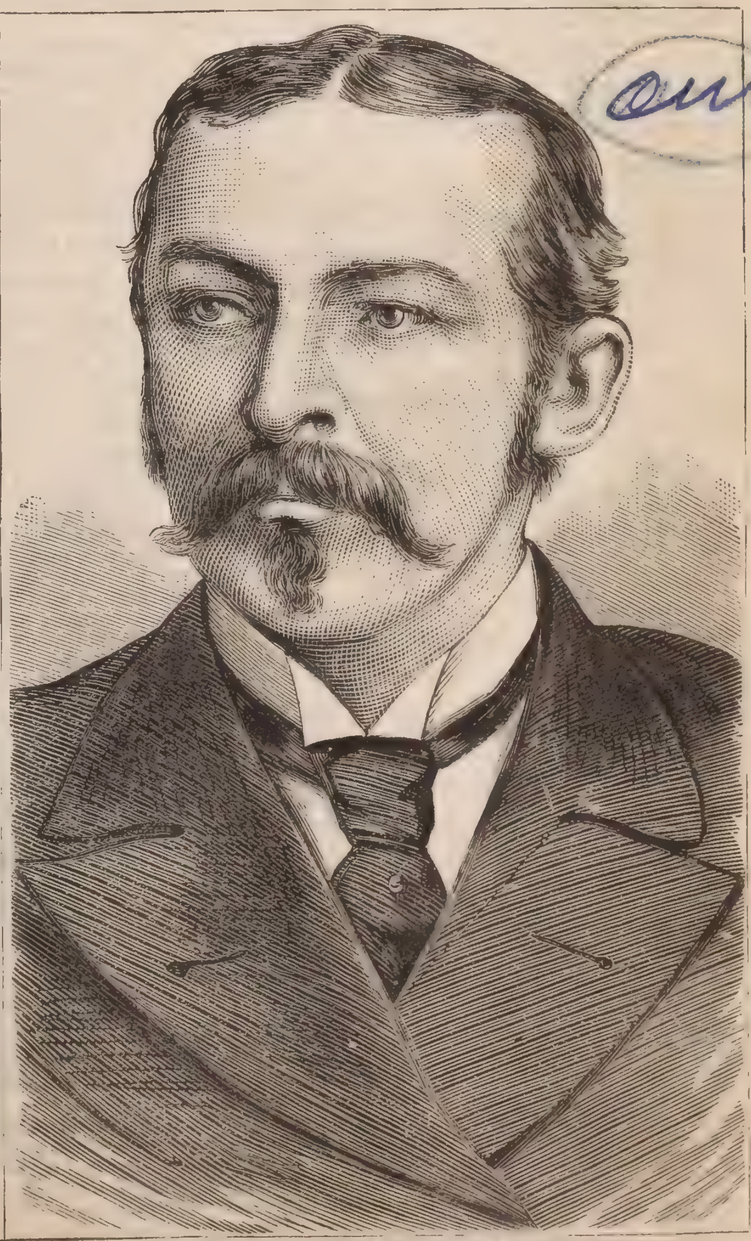
Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1880. 14th Year. No. 41—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAITS OF THE BARONESS BURDETT-COUTTS AND MR. WILLIAM ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, with Sketches of their Lives.
MARRIAGE. A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
An Infidel Smitten by an Unseen Hand.
ROCHESTER TOWER. A New Serial Story by Miss M. A. Paull (Continued).
PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF THE LATE REV. PREBENDARY AURIOL.
CURRENT EVENTS: The Saratoga Convention—Prayer in the National Crisis—Tired of Life—Thirty-six Hours' Waiting at a Box-Office—Frightened to Death by a Dream—A Fatal Golden Weight, etc.
NINE NEW THINGS. A New Sermon by Rev. D. L. Moody (Concluded).
WALKING HUMBLY WITH GOD. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
THE SUDDEN THIEF-LIKE ADVENT OF CHRIST.
A CHOICE VINDICATED. (Continued.)
Jacob at Bethel. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The Turkish Imbroglio—Panic in Ireland—The New French Ministry—An Italian Hero—The Value of a Boy's Corpse, etc.



THE BARONESS BURDETT-COUTTS,



out

MR. W. L. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT,

THE BARONESS BURDETT-COUTTS.

Birth and Family—Becomes Heiress of the Duchess of St. Albans' Fortune in 1837—Her Munificence to the Church of England—Accepts a Peerage in 1871—Interest in the Holy Land—Her Sympathetic Enterprises for the Female Poor—And for Destitute Artisans—Transforms a Pandemonium into a Paradise—Erects Four Drinking Fountains—Her Interest in Emigration—Makes Gardens of Churchyards—Her Help in 1877 to the Peasantry of Turkey and Bulgaria—Her Rumored Betrothal—Immense Wealth.

ONE of the best-known philanthropists of the present day in England is the Baroness Burdett-Coutts. Her munificence toward British public institutions and toward the sick and suffering of all nations has for many years been a matter of public admiration. Her immense wealth and her personal character have attracted many suitors for her hand, both clerical and lay, peers and commoners. But she declined all offers, and society had concluded that she would never marry, when, to the surprise of all, it was suddenly announced that she was about to marry a young man more than thirty years her junior. As her name has been thus forced into public prominence, the following details of her life will be of interest:

Angela Georgina, the Right Hon. Baroness Burdett-Coutts, was born in 1814, and is therefore sixty-six years of age. She is the youngest daughter of the late Sir Francis Burdett, Bart. Her mother was one of the three daughters of Mr. Thomas Coutts, a wealthy London banker, whose eccentric marriages startled society in his day.

He chose as his wife a domestic servant in his establishment, to whom he appears to have been sincerely attached. She was an uneducated girl, but Mr. Coutts thought that defect could be remedied, and in order to enable her to occupy creditably the place in society to which her position as his wife would entitle her, he placed her under the care of distinguished professors, by whom she was carefully and thoroughly educated.

On the completion of the educational process, the marriage was duly solemnized, and appears to have been a very happy one. Mr. Coutts was eighty years of age when his wife died, leaving three daughters, who were respectively married to Sir Thomas Burdett, the Earl of Guildford, and the late Marquis of Bute. The aged widower did not consider himself too far advanced in life to entertain matrimonial projects, and on this occasion selected his partner from the stage. Only seven days after his wife's death he married Miss Harriett Melton, a young actress, who was engaged at Drury Lane Theatre. This lady, after the death of Mr. Coutts, was married to the Duke of St. Albans, and left her immense fortune to Miss Burdett-Coutts (the present Baroness) at her own death, in 1837. Up to that period the heiress had been called Miss Burdett, but after the Duchess's death she affixed the name of her grandfather to her own.

The acquisition of so large a sum of money as that left her by her step-mother prompted Miss Burdett-Coutts to undertake extensive schemes for the public good. A consistent, liberal member of the Episcopal Church, both in purse and opinions, her munificence to the Establishment is famous. Besides contributing large sums toward building new churches and new schools in various poor districts throuhgout Great Britain, she erected and endowed, at her sole, unaided cost, the handsome church of St. Stephen's, in London, with its three schools and parsonage, and, more recently, another church at Carlisle. She endowed, also, at an outlay of $250,000, the three colonial bishoprics of Adelaide, Cape Town, and British Columbia, besides founding an establishment in South Australia for the improvement of the aborigines.

Up to June, 1871, she was known as Miss Burdett-Coutts, but in that year the British Prime Minister (Mr. Gladstone) offered her, by the wish of the Queen,

A PEERAGE.

The honor was accepted, with the title by which its worthy recipient is now universally known and respected. On this auspicious occasion congratulatory addresses were presented to her ladyship at her residence, and in reply to numerous eulogistic expressions which were spoken by various clergymen and friends, the Baroness said:

"I will do what I have not done before—namely, allude to the circumstances under which my new dignity has been conferred upon me. I cannot sufficiently express my sense of the kind way in which Mr. Gladstone has conveyed to me her Majesty's wishes; nor, while gratefully acknowledging her Majesty's favor, can I altogether regard the conferring of the dignity as a personal compliment to myself. I rather consider it as a mark of the Royal favor to a class, of which I happily, in my person, am the representative. By one of my names I am connected with the ancient gentry of the country; and my father was content with, and sought nothing beyond, his ancestral honors. By the other I am allied with the important and influential interests which, in a great commercial country, must always have weight. To this union in my person—to those advantages—rather than any personal merit, I attribute the favor shown me by the Queen, the fountain of all honor in this country."

SCHEMES OF BENEVOLENCE.

The generous-hearted Baroness supplied the funds for Sir Henry James's Topographical Survey of Jerusalem, and offered to supply the ancient city with a full supply of water from the Judean hills, and restore the ancient aqueducts of King Solomon; but though the Turkish Government promised to carry out this useful work, the selfish interests of the Turco-Mohammedan officials in Judea combined to thwart its execution.

In no direction have the Baroness's sympathies found fuller play than in schemes to favor and elevate the poor and unfortunate of her own sex. The course of lessons taught at the national schools, and sanctioned by the British Privy Council, included many literary accomplishments which a young woman of humble grade may not require on leaving school; but the more familiar and indispensable arts essential to her after household career were entirely overlooked. By her ladyship's exertions the teaching of common things, such as sewing, etc., was introduced into the curriculum authorized by the Privy Council.

In order, too, that the public grants for educational purposes might reach small schools in remote rural as well as in neglected urban parishes, the Baroness projected a plan for bringing them under Government inspection by means of travelling or ambulatory inspecting schoolmasters, and it was cordially adopted by the authorities.

In the direction of furnishing opportunities for the reform of fallen young women, she provided a shelter and a means of reform, in a "Home" near London. The gratifying result is recorded, that nearly one half of the number of unfortunate cases which passed through this humane establishment in seven years were won back to virtue, and resulted in new and prosperous lives in the colonies. At a time, also, when through the failure of the demand for silk-weaving which formerly existed, Spitalfields became a groaning mass of helpless destitution, the Baroness, with characteristic sagacity and assiduity, initiated a sewing-school in the heart of that locality for adult women, not only to be taught, but to be fed and provided with work, for which object large Government contracts are undertaken and successfully executed to this day.

From this unobtrusive and unpretending charity, nurses are daily sent among the sick, who are gratuitously provided with medical comforts and skill, and all that their exigencies require; while suitable outfits are distributed to poor servants, and clothing to deserving women. From the same populous and impecunious neighborhood, in 1859, hundreds of destitute boys were fitted out fo the Royal Navy, or placed in various industria homes, to qualify them for lives of after usefulness in the different handicrafts and mechanica trades. As a preliminary test of their fitnes and character, she had the lads first tried in shoe-black brigade, which she established for th purpose. Those who showed least mental ability for higher vocations were drafted into th army, and others found employment as porter at good railway stations.

The year 1861 culminated in a winter of terr ble severity, and in no district of London wer its arctic rigors more keenly felt than in Bermondsey, to whose frozen-out and starving tanners the Baroness administered most substanti aid, continued until the return of spring an trade activity. She suggested, at the same tim the advisability of forming a Weavers' Aid Association for East London, which was at onc done, and by its timely assistance many of th sufferers from a declining demand for the sil articles which they manufactured were able t remove with their families to Queensland, man of whom are now doing well in that distant co ony.

Baroness Burdett-Coutts has ever been opinion that the best possible way of doing thing is "to do it one's self," and in accordanc with this maxim, one of the blackest moral

PLAGUE-SPOTS IN LONDON,

a very den of the most repulsive and aggressi infamy and crime, known to and dreaded by th police as Nova Scotia Gardens, was bought her ladyship, and upon that area of squalor ar refuse, over which angels, on their ministerin errands might well pause to weep, she erected th magnificent model buildings now known as C lumbia Square, consisting of separate tenement let at from two to five shillings per week, ar which provide decent and comfortable accor modation for about two hundred families. T buildings are in three distinct blocks, each considerable length and five stories in heigh fitted with baths, wash-houses, club and rea ing-rooms. Close to Columbia Square is C lumbia Market, one of the handsomest archit tural ornaments in that part of the metropolis

In 1862 the Baroness erected grand drinkin fountains in various parts of London at cons erable expense. The fountain in Victoria Pa cost £5000. A similar work of art and util for the refreshment of both man and be adorns the entrance to the Zoological Gardens Regent's Park; and a third stands in the vic ity of Columbia Market itself. These, with fourth presented to the City of Manchester, a at the opening of which the citizens gave ladyship a most enthusiastic reception, are gifts to the public from the same munificent nor.

Her sympathy is great, but her

GIFTS AND MONEY

are not lavished indiscriminately, but upon w may be termed a generously utilitarian pri ple. And in consistency with this commenda determining motive she has always taken gr interest in judicious emigration. When a sh cry of distress arose some twenty years ag the town of Girvan, Scotland, she advanc very large sum of money to enable the starv families to seek better fortune in Australia Canada, supplying them with stores of food clothing for their immediate wants.

Again, when the same heavy calamity fell the people of Cape Clear, Sharkin, near Sl bereen, in Ireland, and when they were dyin starvation, they were relieved by the same c itable hand, by emigration, and by the establ ment of a store of food and clothing; also large supply of efficient tackle, and by a ve to keep them in their chief means of livelih —fishing. Shoals of letters from all descrip of needy persons constantly reach the Baron She, of course, has not time to read them but she employs persons to peruse them.

Baroness Burdett-Coutts has æsthetic proc ties as well as strongly defined practical p lections. Taking a warm interest in the urned Mr. Westcott; "the little pet said irectly, 'But, papa, you said the other day to ıamma, that if you did not take any drink, you 'ould be the safest example to all of us. Don't ou think Jesus would want to give the safest xample to everybody?'

"'Well, my dear,' I answered, taking refuge, s we parents often must, in the youth of their hildren, 'you are a very little girl, and I cannot xplain things to you quite as much as you ould wish; but some day you will understand ore, and then we will talk about it.'

"'Yes papa,' she assented, agreeing willingly my suggestion; 'but I need never drink the d wine, even in chapel, need I?

"'Perhaps by the time you wish to take it, elly, they will have another kind.'

"'Yes, papa, I hope they will. I shouldn't ant to be made drunk, you know, in chapel; at would be worst of all.'

"I caught her in my arms; my soul abhorred e bare possibility.

"'Nelly,' I said, 'people are never made unk in chapel with communion wine.'

"'Aren't they, papa? I am very glad. But a poor drunkard came when he was a good an again, don't you think, papa, if he had only little, it might make him want more?'

"I told her such a thing was not likely; but ly last week I heard of such a case as Nelly ggested to me."

(To be continued.)

HE SUDDEN, THIEF-LIKE ADVENT OF CHRIST.

y Rev. J. C. Boyce, M.A., of Oxford, England.

rist's Advent in its First Stage predicted to be like that of a Thief, and at a time of Comparative Peace and Prosperity, as in Noah's Day, and for the Purpose of Translating to Heaven Watchful Christians — Terrible Condition of those who shall be Left Behind on the Earth to pass through the Period of Great Tribulation.

AT the first stage of His Second Advent, bere the period of final Great Tribulation, the rd will come secretly and in an utterly unexcted manner. No thief, at all skilled in his il calling, would knowingly have the moment his breaking into a house suspected in the least gree. He will wait till the household is abrbed in one part of the house, or asleep, and en seize upon his opportunity for plunder.

And our Blessed Lord warns us thus: "Beld, I come as a thief" (Revelations 16:15); Know this, that if the good man of the house d known in what watch the thief would me, he would have watched, and would not ve suffered his house to be broken up. Theree, be ye also ready: for, in such an hour as think not, the Son of Man cometh" (St. atthew 24:43-44); and two of His apostles al- warn—the one (1 Thessalonians 5:2), "Yourves know perfectly that the day of the Lord cometh as a thief in the night," and the other precisely similar language (2 Peter 3:10).

No thoughtful student of such warnings could l to see in these passages the very strongest idence that there will be upon the earth, when at day arrives, a very general want of preparness for it, both in nations and in individuals. d how very strongly is this expectation deeped and confirmed by the language in St. Luke. the dark winter's night the modern burglar en seizes the hour when the family are at dinr for his nefarious work. And the words rered to are: "Take heed to yourselves, lest at y time your hearts be overcharged with surting and drunkenness, and the cares of this life, d so that day come upon you unawares. For all it come on all them that dwell on the e of the whole earth;" and by the solemn rning of the Great Bishop of Souls to the urch at Sardis: "If therefore thou shalt not tch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou alt not know what hour I will come upon ee" (Revelations 3:3).

AS A SNARE

These passages seem conclusively to indicate at in the very moment preceding the Advent the whole world will be circumstanced much as it is now. There is, so far, a distinct intimation that a second coming of the Lord will take place, when, though there will be much national and individual perplexity and trouble on the earth at the time, very few indeed will have the least idea that so tremendous an event is about to happen. When Noah was about to enter the ark, our antediluvian forefathers "eat and drank, and bought, and sold, and planted, and builded." They virtually said to each other, "Peace and safety;" and yet "sudden destruction came upon them unawares, as travail upon a woman with child, and they escaped not."

"And as the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be." If we interpret Holy Scripture aright, it would appear that, during the comparative lull before the outbreak of the great final tempest of this troubled dispensation, the Lord will come in this thief-like aspect. We cannot suppose that men would be likely to whisper to each other, "Peace and safety," during the time that God is shaking terribly the earth; and every land, as the consequence of His doing this, is more or less internally convulsed. And we are, further, to note that this first phase of the Lord's second coming will take place some time during the gradual drying up of the great River Euphrates, not in judgment, but in mercy, not to destroy the nations, but to translate to Heaven the band of watching Christians.

Such intention is plainly intimated in the words (Revelations 3:10): "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth." "Then shall two be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left; two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left." These passages clearly represent the Lord's return as taking place

IN A TIME OF COMPARATIVE PEACE.

The occupations of husbandry, of grinding corn, of buying and selling, of planting and building, are common enough in times of general peace, but not so when great crushing wars are taking place; and, therefore, these peaceful occupations, indicative of the prevalence of at least some peace and prosperity in the land, would surely not be brought prominently forward in the Volume of Inspiration, to mark the Advent, taken as a whole, as occurring during a period of unprecedented trouble and carnage. If one is to judge by the European Bourses, those sensitive political barometers, so soon influenced by international communications of a warlike character, men do not habitually select times of universal disturbance for monetary speculations. It is not when Christian laws and institutions, those moral girders that hold society together, are loosened and trodden down, that men give themselves up to the calm pursuits of peace.

Other passages in Holy Scripture distinctly sketch out for us other phases of His coming. After having taken to Himself His bride the Church, in the persons of His dead and living saints, and having apportioned to each one his share in the New Kingdom (Daniel 12:13; St. Matthew 25:1-10), we gather from them that an interval is likely to take place. The glory in the sky caused by the first phase of the Advent of the Son of Man will leave it again, but Christians everywhere will be likely to miss out of their societies many who had been living in continual expectation of their Lord's return. During that momentous interval, what terrible calamities would, naturally, befall the earth? We know from history and experience what men are when reduced to despair.

And from those stores of history and experience we may furnish at least a sketch, so as to show what the feelings and actions of those would be likely to be who had regarded themselves more or less confidently as Christ's people, but had yet been left behind by Him to undergo the scorching fires of the great tribulation. It is a matter of fact that, in seasons of universally prevalent calamity, the moral forces that prevent society from degenerating, and flowing away into one vast mass of moral corruption, become utterly disorganized. And who would wonder if, with one phase of the Second Advent over, the earth should seem, to those left behind, sunless and terrible? The sudden coming of the Lord Jesus, and, possibly, His as sudden departure, the consciousness that nothing else could remain for them but the prospect of society degenerating into complete lawlessness—who could paint their despair, and its effects upon themselves and those around them?

A VAST PRISON,

There would doubtless be some of those left behind who, after the first stunning blow of such a disappointment had fallen upon them, would recover themselves, and turn to the Lord with far greater fervor than they had ever exhibited in His service before. But there would be others, too, upon the earth—we know too well, already, what is in man's heart, to doubt it—and a much larger multitude of them in the aggregate, who had lived only for themselves, or had allowed other foolish but fondly cherished theories to displace from its proper place in their hearts and minds the Gospel of Christ.

And, again, there would be others morally, religiously, and politically the scum of society, once held in check by the strong arm of law, but, at such a time as that, too likely to find themselves altogether released from its control. Is it difficult for us to feel that when sovereigns and judges and statesmen are full of gloom and fear, because of the great event that will have taken place, they would be likely to relax in their efforts to keep society in a healthy and orderly condition, brought face to face as they would be with the peril of their own eternal punishment? Judges, magistrates, soldiers, police are but men; and it is the nature of all men to study their own self-interest first, and, afterward, the well-being of the community at large. Private ambition, socialistic proclivities, radical and anarchical notions, hatred of men richer and more exalted on the earth than themselves, idleness, dissoluteness, utter irreligion, these are not long to be held in check when king and lawgiver and judge and all lower officials are paralyzed with terror and dismay, reeling back from the effects of the discovery, just made, that God had indeed, to all appearance, forsaken them. From such no longer healthily restrained forces revolution takes its birth.

Then will ensue the Great Tribulation and career of the last personal Antichrist, after which Christ will descend at the battle of Armageddon and inaugurate the Millennium.

A Prodigal Overcome by his Father's Love.—Henry Moorhouse, the evangelist, relates the following anecdote: "When I was a boy, in Manchester, our family consisted of two brothers and two sisters. The boy next to me was a bad boy, a prodigal, and they could not get him to work in the mill. One of my sisters said to her father, 'Father, I tell thee what thee ought to do with our John—turn him into the street' 'Why?' asked the father. 'Why,' she said, 'see how good we all are, and how bad he is; he is a disgrace to us. Turn him away.'

"Christmas Day came, and the family was together, and the old man read a chapter and prayed, and the prodigal was present. The father, turning round to the daughter, said, 'Well, what are we to do with thy brother now?' Her reply was, 'Put him in the street.' He put the question to the brother, and he said, 'Put him in the street.' Another person who was present also thought it would do him good to turn him out a little. The old man left his chair and said, 'John, thy sister and thy brother and friend say I should turn thee out, but I am thy poor old father, and I will never put thee in the street, my boy.' The prodigal was overcome by the father's love. It was the means of leading his heart to the Lord, and he is now a preacher of the Gospel."

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter.

The aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to The Manager, Christian Herald, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

SINGLE COPIES

can most conveniently be obtained through newsdealers. Any complaint that the Christian Herald cannot be obtained from a particular newsdealer is promptly attended to if we are given the name and street address of the dealer who does not keep it for sale.

NOTICE.

To give our readers an opportunity of introducing the Christian Herald to their friends, we will send the paper post free to any address from 1st October, to 31st December, 1880, on receipt of 25 cents.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The New York State Democratic Convention assembled at Saratoga September 28th. The meeting is described as more than usually respectable and intelligent. A spectator remarked that he had never seen a Democratic State Convention more free from objectionable elements. The leaders of the respective sections displayed considerable skill in controlling their supporters, and the proceedings were harmonious throughout. Judge Rapallo received a majority of votes in the first ballot, and his nomination for the post of Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals was afterward made unanimous. As Judge Rapallo and Judge Folger are already in the Court of Appeals, the election of either to preside over that Court will not alter its constitution. The Convention passed enthusiastic resolutions on the Presidential question, pledging the thirty-five electoral votes of the State to Hancock and English. The cordial welcome Mr. Kelly received on entering the Convention indicates that during the critical period of the next few weeks there is a prospect of united and harmonious action in the Democratic party of the State of New York.

The Speech of Mr. Secretary Evarts at Cooper Union, New York, places the issue in the Presidential question on higher ground than some of the addresses of other Republican leaders have done. Mr. Evarts based his appeal for renewal of power on the beneficial results of the present administration. He argued that under President Hayes the country had enjoyed a period of rest, of peace, and of prosperity; that the administration had been singularly pure and honest, and that the party deserved the confidence of the people. He contended that a comparison of the respective tickets did not afford a just basis for deciding the question, inasmuch as "General Hancock is better than his party," and that it was not safe to form an estimate of what a Democratic administration would effect in the country from the character of the distinguished soldier the party had nominated. To President Hayes Mr. Evarts paid the following eloquent tribute. He said: "He has been charactized by love of country, an upright nature, a sincerity in the homely virtues of American common life that will long be remembered in the affections of the men and women of the United States."

Mr. Evarts, in effect, said you have seen the character and results of Republican government; if you approve them, show it by your votes. This mode of putting the question will commend itself to the people as far preferable to that of stirring up sectional animosities which true patriots endeavor to allay.

A Manifesto Issued by General Weaver, the Presidential candidate of the Greenback Party, will call public attention to the attitude of the Democratic Party on the financial question. It is addressed to "the Greenback-Labor men throughout the States," and contains an urgent request that copies of Senator Bayard's speech in New York be distributed by the thousand. Not that General Weaver approves the speech, but there has been a tendency on the part of Greenbackers in Maine and elsewhere to unite with the Democratic party, and General Weaver desires to correct that tendency. He wishes his followers to know that Mr. Bayard distinctly stated "that the Democratic candidates for President and Vice-President and the Democratic party are in favor of his bill to destroy the greenbacks, and that they will carry out that policy." He wants the speech published so that the people may know just what it is that the Democratic party and its candidates are pledged to carry out. This is only fair to all parties, but there are places where it may operate to prevent a fusion which in Maine issued in a result General Weaver regards with gratification.

Prayer in the Present National Crisis.—At a meeting of the pastors of the Evangelical churches of the District of Columbia a general feeling was prevalent that in view of the momentous national issues involved in the forthcoming elections, it was the duty of all Christian patriots to unite in earnest prayer to God that the issue may be for His glory and the benefit of the people. The following appeal, signed by the ministers present, and by the President of the Young Men's Christian Association, has accordingly been issued:

To Christians of all Denominations.

Dear Brethren in the Lord: We are upon the eve of a critical national election. Two well-defined historic parties are before the people for their suffrages. The men nominated represent these parties. The decision of next November will probably determine the policy of this Government for many years to come. The institutions of the country are undergoing a severe strain. Will you not, therefore, humbly unite in prayer with us, and will you not ask all praying men and women to unite in prayer with you that God will forgive our great national sins; that the foundations laid by our fathers and cemented by the blood of our brothers may remain unshaken; that the people may withstand temptation to wrong-doing on the day of election, and that the candidates preferred by the majority of the actual citizens of the Republic, the candidates who will be true to the genius of our institutions, to the best interests of the nation and our common humanity, and helpful to the cause of temperance, purity, and true religion, may be elected, and that that political party may prevail whose success will most conduce to the financial, civil, and moral prosperity at home, to peace and respect abroad, and to the favor of the God of our fathers.

God save the United States of America!

The Saloon Keepers of Chicago are Alarmed at the progress temperance principles are making in that city, and last week they summoned a meeting of the trade to organize a union to protect their interests against the attacks of the women's associations and "the saints." The saloon keepers were in session six hours, and during that time the Women's Association was holding a prayer-meeting in Farwell Hall, where prayers were offered that God would still continue to own and bless their efforts in the cause of Christian temperance.

The Liquor Traffic in New York.—A Paper was read on September 29th at the Pan-Presbyterian Council in Philadelphia, by the Hon. Wm. E. Dodge, in which he gave startling details of the extent of the liquor traffic. He said that there are in New York City 10,000 places for the sale of intoxicating drinks, and seven eighths of these places are kept by foreigners. Interior Department returns, he asserted, show that there are in the United States 5652 distilleries, 2830 breweries, and 175,266 places where intoxicating drinks are sold, involving annually a direct outlay and waste of not less than $700,000,000, and an indirect loss, in the cost of crime and pauperism, of $700,000,000 more, while to the financial loss must be added the destruction of not less than one hundred thousand lives. The Christian Church, he said, had the remedy in its hands. "The past has proved beyond a doubt," said Mr. Dodge, "that the remedy of total abstinence and prohibition is the only thing under God which can stay the pestilence. Wherever it has been faithfully tried it has been successful, and there is a growing feeling that the law should prohibit the sale in every State and locality where the majority shall decide by popular vote that no license shall be given."

Some Interesting Reminiscences of Dr. Adams, whose life and portrait appeared in The Christian Herald of September 16th, are published by his intimate friend Dr. S. J. Prime. The following, among other incidents, shows how ready the eminent minister was to undertake any work that appeared to him to be his duty.

Dr. Prime says: "When the appeal came to Christians in America to send a deputation to the Emperor of Russia to ask liberty of worship for dissenters in the Baltic provinces of his empire, we held a meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, and it was easily resolved that such a deputation was to be desired; but as the men must go at their own charges, over the ocean and the continent, where were the men to be found? In the silence that ensued Dr. Adams came across the room and whispered in my ear, 'I will go.' I presume it was the only time he ever nominated himself. But the service was not one to be sought, and volunteers were not to be found. He was appointed at once; others followed; the deputation was filled; it went on its mission, and God gave it great success."

Bible and Prayer Union.—Reference was recently made in these columns to the Bible and Prayer Union established in Great Britain on January 10, 1876, which now numbers over ninety-three thousand members, and to the formation of a similar union on this side the Atlantic. The testimonies received from all quarters to the good derived from this system of simultaneous Bible reading and prayer attest the wisdom of its formation. Christians of all denominations find the advantage of uniting in spirit with other Christians who, though widely separated by distance, give their attention on the same day, to the same passage of Scripture, and present their prayers for similar blessings. The Christian Herald has now large numbers of readers in every state of the Union, and in every province of Canada, whom we invite to unite in this general Christian union.

The rules of the Union of Great Britain, which have also been adopted by the American Union, are:

I. Each member to read one and the same chapter daily, asking God's blessing upon the Word read.

II. Each member to pray every Sunday morning for all the members.

The passages of Scripture selected for the ensuing week by the American Union are;

Thursday,	October,	7	Psalm 66.
Friday,	"	8	" 67.
Saturday,	"	9	" 68.
Sunday,	"	10	" 69.
Monday,	"	11	" 70.
Tuesday,	"	12	" 71.
Wednesday,	"	13	" 72.
Thursday,	"	14	" 73.

Should any of our readers have especial cause to desire other Christians to unite with them during the following week in prayer or praise for specific blessings, we will publish the request, omitting names, if received not later than Saturday, October 9th.

Some Misconceptions about the South which enator Conkling's recent speech is liable to coney are corrected by Mr. William H. Osborne, e President of the Chicago, St. Louis & New rleans Railroad. Mr. Osborne's views are of nsiderable weight, not only on account of his tensive knowledge of that part of the country, t because he is not a politician, and the opinns he has formed have not been colored by rty bias. One of the most tangible questions ised, relates to the trade of the South, which r. Conkling somewhat depreciated. On this bject Mr. Osborne says: "During the past onth of August there were shipped from New eans 1,289,845 bushels of wheat and 158,946 bhels of corn. The increase in shipments fm that port for the eight months up to Stember 1st has been 3,352,776 bushels of eat and 3,598,832 bushels of corn." Altogher it appears from Mr. Osborne's figures t four fifths of our exports come from the Sthern States. Dr. Talmage's Sermon on the Sth, published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of il 22, 1880, was an eloquent vindication of South from other charges.

he Government Inquiry into the Circumces attending the loss of the Narragansett une 11th, has been forwarded to Washing- The inspectors recommend the revoking he license of Capt. Young of the Narragan- That of Capt. Nye of the Stonington, h has expired, will not be renewed. Capt. ng is also fined $100 for violation of law in g to make a complete list of passengers on ight of the disaster. The Stonington Com- is fined $1,000 for not having a sufficient ber of watchmen on the state-room deck of Narragansett, and $500 for not having the sed number of officers.

enty-three Years of Daily Prayer.—The ty-third anniversary of the Fulton Street er-meeting was celebrated September 23d. oe, in the course of his address on the occa- remarked on the proof the records of the ng afforded, not only of the existence of but of His omniscience and omnipotence. id the prayers offered by Christians for un- n persons and things, and the subsequent rs thereto, which were observed facts, nstrated this.

"red of Life" was the Expression Recorded diary of a man who committed suicide in York on September 22d. He was twenty- years of age, in good circumstances, hav- considerable balance to his credit at his 's, and was not of dissipated habits. Yet prime of his life he wrote as his final entry diary the words, "Tired of life," and then ut and shot himself. It is remarkable that eariness of life is frequently endured by ho have the means of enjoying life according the world's idea of enjoyment. It shows ere earthly pleasures can never give the nd happiness which the Christian, how- or, is privileged to enjoy (Isaiah 26 : 3).

e Temperance Congress Recently Held ira, N. Y., a resolution was passed unani- pledging the members to labor as they portunity, to influence public opinion on ject of the growing evils of the liquor with the view of procuring the passage of utional amendment abolishing the manu- and traffic in intoxicating liquors.

narkable Answer to Prayer is Reported ter in a contemporary as having occurred in his own experience. "I was much in- in the case of a man who had a family ort, and who was out of employment. put forth a great deal of effort to obtain on, but had signally failed. I asked him d made his trouble a special matter of and urged him to do so. I suggested, a request for prayer should be sent to on Street prayer-meeting. He did not xious to have this done as I felt, but est was written and forwarded. I came rayer-meeting on the day that I knew would be read. After the meeting, the leader, who was a personal friend of mine, and I had some conversation, in the course of which he said to me, 'By the way, you often have friends for whom you desire to find employment; do you know of a man who would fill such and such a position in my employ?' There was the answer to prayer. I expected it, but did not suppose it was coming so soon. My friend is to-day filling that position, and it is one of trust, and a very desirable one."

Thirty-six Hours Waiting for Tickets was the occupation of a long line of men last week in front of Booth's Theatre, New York. The manager had announced that he would commence the sale of tickets on Friday morning, October 1st, for the performances to be given in this city by Mlle Bernhardt, the notorious French actress. The price of admission for the twenty-four performances was to be $60, and in anticipation of an eager demand, the men took up their stations on Wednesday evening, and waited until the office opened on Friday morning. Some of them carried blankets to wrap themselves in, during the chilly hours of the night. In order to secure the privilege of witnessing a short dramatic representation, these men were willing not only to pay money, but to endure the weary, tedious watch of thirty-six hours, yet to the Gospel feast, to the supreme felicity of everlasting joy, it is necessary that the servants of the Master go out into the highways and compel them to come in.

Frightened to Death by a Dream.—A Girl living at West Chester, Pa., recently came to her death in a remarkable manner. She had been suffering from a severe attack of typhoid fever, and was in the weak condition which usually succeeds the crisis of that disease. She fell into a light slumber from which she soon awoke in extraordinary terror, saying she had had a frightful dream. Her physician and friends endeavored to soothe her but without avail; her distress continued, and in a short time she died. Her death, the physician certified was the result of the violent action of the heart brought on by her fright, and which in her debilitated condition had a fatal effect.

A Fatal Golden Weight was Carried by an immigrant last week. He was an Irishman who had sailed from Queenstown, in the steamship Germanic. On arriving at New York a tug was engaged to convey the passengers to Castle Garden, and the Irishman in stepping from the steamer to the tug missed his footing and fell into the water. Life preservers were immediately thrown to him, but he sank with unusual rapidity. Some surprise was expressed at his unaccountable disappearance, but a friend of his explained that the man had a considerable sum of money in gold, which he carried fastened in a belt he wore around his body. It is believed that had he not been thus weighted he might have kept afloat long enough to be rescued, but as it was, his gold sank him and he was drowned. Unhappy as was this man's end, it was not so unhappy as that of men who lose their souls through their great possessions (Matt. 19 : 22).

Five Hundred Dollars Reward is Offered for the recovery of an old family Bible, which is supposed to contain evidence on the fly-leaf which would enable the heirs of a certain woman to establish their claim to an English estate of $100,000,000. If the record contains evidence competent and necessary to make out the case, the heirs could afford to pay $50,000,000 for it. But that same Bible, or any other, is a testament in itself, and can make those who establish claims under it, heirs "to an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away." It is said that this family Bible is "probably hidden away in some old attic in Eastern Connecticut." The contents of many a Bible, on the shelf or on the parlor table, are as effectually hidden as if the book were in the dingiest closet. Yet the owner would be greatly excited if he thought that in the family Bible evidence could be found that he is heir to even $10,000!

WALKING HUMBLY WITH GOD.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" —Micah 6 : 8.

True Religion not a New Design—It is a Distinct Revelation—True Worship not Will Worship—Not Outward Ceremonies—The Character of the Man who is Acceptable to God—The Humble Walk with God—I. It is Excellent in Itself—1. It Signifies a Perception of God's Being and Presence—2. Appropriation of God as our God—3. Consciousness of His Continual Presence—4. Humility—5. Acting Toward Others in a Humble Spirit—II. It is a Test of Salvation—Christ Must have His Proper Place—Salvation Must be Seen to be Wholly of Grace—Humble as to the Intellect—III. A Symptom of Spiritual Health—IV. It is a Cause for Great Anxiety—Dyspepsia not to be Mistaken for Humility—V. The Source of Pleasure.

WE shall chiefly dwell upon the last line: "To walk humbly with thy God."

Man asks, "Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God?" and, as if he must set himself to answer his own question he further inquires, "Shall I come before Him with burnt offerings, with calves of a year old? Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil?" Sacrifice of some sort is his idea, but he supposes that he must supply the sacrifice himself, and would fain know what it shall be. The answer which is given him chides him for the supposition that he is to answer his own question, for it begins thus: "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee."

If we had been attentive to God's voice we should not now be asking, "Wherewith shall I come?" for He has already showed us the way. The worship of God is the subject of revelation, not of invention. True religion is not a new design displaying each man's taste, but a copy from a plan framed and fixed by the Lord Himself. We are to follow a path well defined, and not to map out a course for ourselves. We are not like children crying in the dark after an unknown Father, whom we seek by ways of our own, but we are as babes who follow whither the warm hand of love gently draws them.

To us it is not night, for the true light has risen, and is shining round about us; the Father has revealed Himself, and we have an unction from the Holy One, so that all things needful for this life and godliness are lifted out of the region of the unknown, and placed among the matters concerning which the prophet saith, "He hath showed thee, O man."

The true worship of God is not left to be a matter of conjecture, to be worked out by a man's thought from within; but it is a matter of distinct revelation, to be received by faith from above. Do we all know this? Are there not some among us, or at least around us, who desire a religion of their own? Is not this one of the special follies of the period? Let us escape from this snare.

TRUE WORSHIP cannot, therefore, be will worship, and will worship cannot be true worship. We are to bring to God that which God requires of us, we are to act toward God as He commands us, and to accept from God that which He presents to us. Our approaches to the Most High are no longer to be a matter of our own taste and cleverness, but to be obedient movements of reverent faith, bowing before the solemn word of the great King. "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good."

It is clear from the text before us that God has once forever settled the way by which He is to be honored among men; and He has declared that it is not by outward rites and ceremonies. Upon these in many Scriptures He poureth contempt when He regards them by themselves. In our text He says not a single word as to burnt offerings and calves of a year old. The question has been asked, but in His answer He makes no allusion to the rams and to the rivers of oil of which the questioner thought so much, but He says "What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

Every man who is a true Christians does justly. If faith does not make a man honest, it is not an honest faith; if our conversion has not made us upright, may the Lord convert us again. When a man's heart is right with God, he longs to deal rightly with his fellow-men, and shrinks from the idea of taking undue advantage. He who has been washed in the blood of Jesus Christ will not knowingly and wilfully defile himself with unjust gain. To his servants, his customers, his emloyers, he aims to do justly.

Nor is this all, for he loves mercy. He tries to love his neighbor as himself. If there be an act of kindness to be done, he delights to do it; if there be misery to be helped, need to be succored, good to be bestowed, he says, "Let me have a hand in it: for it is good to me to do good." The man who is loved by the All-merciful is one who loves mercy.

Another point remains; it is the third thing, and it is put third because it is of the highest importance—"to walk humbly with thy God." This is an inward thing, but little observed; observable enough in its consequences, but not in itself, and hence very apt to be overlooked. "To walk humbly with thy God" is as needful as to do justly and to love mercy, but few there be that find it; and hence at this time I would earnestly insist upon this essential point.

I. First, brethren, we may say of the humble walk which God demandeth and accepteth that

IT IS EXCELLENT IN ITSELF.

This is one of the things which is good, good morally, good in present effect, good in eternal results. Nothing is better for thee, O man, than to walk humbly with thy God. Notice every single word of our text, for under this head I will explain humble walking, that you may see its excellence.

1. Humble walking with God signifies, first, a perception of God's being and presence. In order to our acceptance with God we must know that He is, and that He is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him. We must recognize distinctly that there is a God, and that He is near us; that He is real and true, and that we are living in actual nearness to Him. We are to walk with Him, and this cannot be unless we know that He is near—men do not walk with myths, or ideas, or remote existences. To have a real God is the backbone of character, and to keep company with Him day by day is the right arm of godliness.

How many live as if God were a nonentity, a dream, a theological fable, a respectable fancy, and no more! But the acceptable character is made and formed mainly by the fact that God is, and that God surrounds us. It is only in the sunlight of God's own countenance, consciously experienced, that true holiness can be produced and ripened. The godly man is moved to action, helped in endurance, nerved with courage, fired with zeal, elevated with devotion, and purified in life by the presence of God. "Thou God seest me," is a great sanctifier.

2. In addition, there must be an appropriating and accepting of this ever-present God as our God. The text saith, "Walk humbly with thy God." Observe that. He must be our God. We must feel that if no other beings will worship Jehovah, we will do so with our whole hearts. "This God is our God for ever and ever." This firm allegiance is good, and works toward all that is good. When a man feels that he can call God his God, and that he can take hold upon his covenant, then is he strong for honor and virtue, and all things that are pleasing unto God.

3. This is not all. The text sets forth the accepted man as acting ever as in the presence of his God. "To walk" with God denotes an active habit, a communion in the common movements of the day. Some bow humbly before God in the hour of prayer, others sit humbly in His presence at the time of meditation, and others string themselves up to draw near to God in seasons of religious excitement, but all this falls short of walking with God. Walking is a very common pace, an ordinary rate of progress, and it does not seem to require great effort; but then it is a practical working pace, a rate at which a man can continue on and on, and make a day's journey by the time the sun is down.

So walking with God means being with God always, being with God in common things, being with Him on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, as well as on the Sabbath; being with Him in the shop, with Him in the kitchen, with Him in the field, feeling His presence in buying and selling, in weighing and measuring, in ploughing and reaping—doing as unto the Lord the commonest acts of life. This it is which is acceptable with the Most High, and this is the man who has gotten into a right condition before his Maker—the man who "walks" with his God.

4. Then comes in the qualifying word of "humbly," about which we have to speak most at this time. It was needful to remind you of the other matters first. God must be recognized as ever present, appropriated as our God, and felt to be a power in all our life, or else there can be no humble walking with Him. You must have the verb or there is no sense in the adverb; you must walk before there is any sense in the exhortation to walk humbly.

We are not bidden slavishly to crouch, but humbly to walk. How lowly and penitently we are to walk let gracious men remind us. If we are favored to walk with God as Abraham did, in all the sweet familiarity of friend with friend, yet must we remember, as He did, that we are but dust and ashes. Our closest communion must take the form of worship; when we see our Lord best, we must fall at His feet with awe. When our walk with God is closest and clearest, we must be overwhelmed with adoring wonder at the condescension which permits us to think of speaking with the Eternal One.

To this reverence must be added

A CONSTANT SENSE OF DEPENDENCE,

in the sense of daily drawing all supplies from Him, and gratefully admitting that it is so. We are never to indulge a thought of independence of God, as if we were anything, or could do anything apart from Him. Walking humbly with God involves a profound deference to His will, and a glad submission to it; yielding both active obedience and passive acquiescence.

5. The practical result of all this inward humbling will be an acting toward others and a moving in all matters as under the influence of a humble spirit. If a man once really comes to live and act as in the sight of God, his life must be one of eminent holiness; and if, under a sense of God's glory, he abides in deep humility of spirit, we may expect to see about him all that is tender and quiet. Like his Lord, he will be meek and lowly in heart. He will not domineer over his fellow-men; he will not be hard, cruel, unkind; he cannot be.

I cannot tell you all that my text means, nor, if you know it yourself, can you make others understand it; still they will know that it is something very admirable which makes you to be a good neighbor and a considerate friend, the comfort of the sorrowful, the helper of all. They may not understand whence the quiet spirit derives its gentle dew, but they will perceive its freshness, its sparkling purity, and its goodness, and wonder at its cause.

Thus I have tried to show, while explaining what was meant by walking humbly with our God, that it is a thing most excellent in itself. Oh, Holy Spirit, work it in us, for the lowly Saviour's sake!

II. Secondly, this walking humbly with God is very important, for

IT IS A TEST OF SALVATION.

The man that walks humbly with God is a saved man; the man who does not walk humbly with God should question his condition before God, for in proportion as he fails here he fails altogether. We will put a few questions concerning this matter.

Friend, if you are walking humbly with God you have taken your right place as a sinner condemned by the law; for certainly you have broken the law, and that law requires absolutely perfect obedience, which you have not rendered, and never will render. God's law, then, has condemned you—have you condemned yourself? Have you taken your place as a condemned one, and pleaded guilty before God? If you have not done so, your view of yourself differs from God's view of you. Your view of yourself is a proud one, you are not walking humbly with God, and you are not saved. He that never felt himself lost never felt himself saved; he who never confessed himself guilty has never been forgiven: he who has never accepted the sentence which dooms him has never received the pardon which absolves him. Mark this!

Again, if you are walking humbly with God you have given Jesus Christ His right place What is that? He came into the world to b the Saviour of sinners, and the only place H will deign to occupy toward you is that H shall save you, and save you completely. Som say, "Yes, oh yes. Jesus shall be my Saviour and do somewhat toward my salvation." Bu he replies, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end." Christ will save us from th beginning to the end, or He will have nothin to do with our salvation. He will have all th glory of the work, and the work itself must b all His own, from the foundation to the to stone, or else He will leave the ruin upon it own heap.

Jesus will never consent to be a make-weig for our deficiencies. He will not come at o beck and call, to be our lackey, to patch up o old rags, and mend our clouted shoes. No; t Lord Jesus Christ must be everything and w must be nothing, or we shall never agree. Ha you given Christ His due place, dear friend? you have not done so, your view of Christ a God's view of Christ are very different, a yours is a proud view, for you are putting yo self into the Saviour's place in some degree, a you are not walking humbly with God.

One other question is a very important one is salvation seen by you to be wholly of grac Do you, my friend, judge salvation to be par by your own works and merits? Do you thi that you must at least contribute an our weight in the scale, that you must add at leas fraction to the Saviour's lump sum? Ay; th it is a question whether you know anythi about salvation. I do not want to make d trinal opinions a test, but it does seem to that there is which looks for salvation anywhere but to free favor of God.

SOMETHING WRONG IN THE HEART

This suggests to me another thought: I kn several persons, who seem to be seeking pe with God and mercy in Christ, who never ge because, as it seems to me, they are not walk humbly with God as to their intellect. The thing that some men will do is ever to bow t understanding to the teaching of God. T are always carping and raising quibbles with G instead of believing Him. They need to silenced, as Job before the manifested glor God, or they will die asking questions. Th mysterious truths which relate to the Most such creatures as we are can never expect to derstand. In the region of the infinite the ample space for faith, but reason loses her tr Faith is our privilege, let us exercise it freely ward the Lord.

In God's great family is the comprehensio the Father's mind to be a sine qua non of affection for Him? Am I never to believe my Father tells me till I understand it? all Thy gold, great God, be tried in my cru before I will accept it at Thy hand? Art T a liar except my brain prove Thee true? after all to be lord over my own thoughts, art Thou to have no supremacy in the king of my mind? Does any man fancy that his ever be right while this is his theory? How the heart stand in an even place and be at ce, while it refuses to own the sway of God? must yield our intellect to the superior in- ct, permitting the drop to be borne along by th river. The infallible speech of Him who ot err must satisfy the obedient mind.

I. I must pass on very briefly, to say, in the d place, of walking humbly with God, that it s can tell, dear friend, not only whether are saved, but afterward whether your new s in a growing state, by examining whether are walking humbly with God. Let me l upon that matter for a minute. We are hy in soul if we have lowly views in refer- to ourselves upon matters of divine grace. e, now, what do you think of yourself this ing? Are you a fine fellow, a disciple in- , an example to others? But have a care you are at! It is very easy to feel great. is by no means an eminently difficult thing exalted; I have reached that point myself out great effort, and I take no credit, but shame, for it. A sense of rising to be body is not a sign of health, it is a token e reverse sometimes, and may be the fore- r of most solemn catastrophes. Puffing up mean bloating and swelling with deadly hu- ; therefore beware of it. Signs of health lie ite another line.

A SYMPTOM OF SPIRITUAL HEALTH.

u are thought by others to be something great and respectable, but what are the of the case as God sees them? You are a h of the true vine—yes; how much fruit u bear? Compare yourself with those hes that bring forth much fruit to God, thin and lean is your vintage! You are ed down by the responsibilities which your on thrusts upon you, but are you bearing worthily? Are you doing for God what would do if they had your opportunities? ou doing for Christ what once you thought ould do if you ever had the means? Are ow living according to your own notion of Christian should live—are you anywhere t? Oh, my brother, when you think of you are now, there is more to make you than to make you boast; more to make ver your face than to cause you to lift up ead. At least, such is my case.

g you to think of what you would be with- ry short time if you were left by divine We sometimes condemn men for their nd are right in condemning them, and yet ad been in their position we might have much worse. "Oh," saith one, "what a it is I have been kept these thirty years, ave never dishonored my profession!" rother, it is a mercy, a great mercy, a mercy than you dream. You do not to have a vixen of a wife, or a trouble- amily, or a provoking neighbor, or you have lost your character long ago. tic comfort may more deserve praise than odness on your part.

a mercy for you that the evil person who have such influence over you was taken or else I do not know where you would een; many an evil character has been the of vicious influence. A great deal of ap- virtue may be due to our not happening mpted at the time when we are in a cer- ndition, or else if our tinder and the sparks had met, who knows but what the us might have been ablaze by now?

ow much we owe to preventing grace! debtors both to the providence and the f God, which have kept us out of harm's When sometimes we have been compelled emn sin in a brother, and to speak very y, as we are bound to do, we have re- ed ourselves lest we also should be , and we have remembered that grace as kept us out of sin. "Such a one was says one, "after making a profession ion." We do not exonerate him for a , it was a shameful crime, but oh, my friend, had you been precisely in his condition, had you been once a victim to that degrading vice, met by the same company, and in other respects surrounded as he was, you might have been intoxicated long before he became so—who knows? Walk humbly with your God, at any rate, my friend. The true way to live is to give God all glory and take to ourselves all shame.

When God gives us great temporal enjoyments, then let us think, "Why do I have these comforts while many of His servants are without them? Is it possible that He is giving me my portion in this life!" That will lay a cool hand on your hot forehead and forbid all pride in wealth. If God makes you rich, instead of doting on your riches, say to yourself, "How can I best use my substance for His glory?" The working out of

THAT PRACTICAL QUESTION

should be quite sufficient to keep you from self-esteem.

He who truly serves the Lord will walk humbly with Him. Have you more talent than other people? You will be a great fool if you begin to rejoice in it, for serious responsibilities come with special ability. Remember you have to do more for God than other people, and that thought should by God's grace be as ballast for your wide-spread sail. Great talent might be a sun to smite you, if a sense of responsibility did not come in like a cloud to shield you.

Are you honored among men? Then say to yourself, "Ah, they do not know me, or they might judge me otherwise. If I deserve their esteem for some things, yet there are many things which make me hang my head." If we deserve all the gratitude of our fellows yet we should be deeply anxious not to take a grain of praise to ourselves, lest God should be angry with us for robbing Him of His revenue of glory. What have we that we have not received?

We must always have lowly views of ourselves before God in regard to matters of grace; and it should be the same in reference to His providence. For instance, if one of you shall have been much tried in business, and have lost much money—suppose you are angry with God and quarrel with Him about it, is that walking humbly with Him? When we repine at the loss of children or friends, is not that the pride of our heart?

To walk humbly with God would lead you to say, "It is the Lord, let Him do what seemeth Him good!" but a proud heart virtually cries, "God shall do as I like, or else He shall have no obedience from me. He shall always use His right hand, and pour into my lap all that I desire, or else we will part company." It is the hypocrite who will not always call upon God; a little trial cools his love. Ah, friend, this will not do. Repining and rebelling are not walking humbly with God. Humbly walking with God yields itself up entirely to the divine will, and saith, "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

It is a part of my humbly walking with God to accept providences of which I cannot see the object or design, and to be grateful for them. When God sends, as it seems to us, the wrong providence, when He does to us that which seemeth unwise and unkind, we are still to say, "He must be good to Israel, and all His dealings must be wise and kind. I am but as a wild ass's colt, and know nothing, and can judge nothing; God knoweth all things, and let His will be done." This is to walk humbly with Him.

IV. And now, fourthly, we may say of this humble walking that it is

A CAUSE FOR GREAT ANXIETY.

We must walk humbly, my brothers and sisters, but this is more easily said than done. This is no child's play. Humility of spirit is a virtue which is likely to be overlooked; we pay some attention to doing justly and loving mercy, but walking humbly with God is so inward, so ethereal, and so spiritual that we are apt to overlook it; yet it is the main thing, and all our thoughts should go to the securing of it.

Humble walking is so difficult to come at that thousands sit down content with that which looks like it, but is by no means the same thing. It is so easy to think yourself humble. To feign humility is of all things most shocking, and yet to be truly humble is of all things most difficult. Have you never noticed how, when you fancied you were lowly before God, it was only that you were unbelieving or out of health? Do not mistake dyspepsia for humility. When you said to yourself, "Now I am on familiar terms with God, and living near Him in communion," it turned out to be rather presumption than faith; and supposed humility has in like manner full often condensed into despair.

Are you now saying, "I think I am humble?" Is there ever a time when a man is so proud as when he judges that he is humble? "Ah," say you, "but I cannot exalt myself, I am in such a condition of heart I must walk humbly with God." My beloved, I beseech you be more on your guard now than ever against pride, for a haughty spirit lurks in an assurance of humility, like a lion in its den. The leaven of self is brought into our meal in the measure of a supposed necessity of humbleness. To be really lowly, really nothing before God, really to yield yourselves up to Him, this is such a work and such a difficulty, that I commend you to attempt it in order that you may see how impossible it is to you apart from the power of the Holy Ghost, who alone can help us to walk humbly with God.

V. With this I close, when I have said in the fifth place, in praise of walking humbly with God, that

IT IS THE SOURCE OF THE DEEPEST CONCEIVABLE PLEASURE.

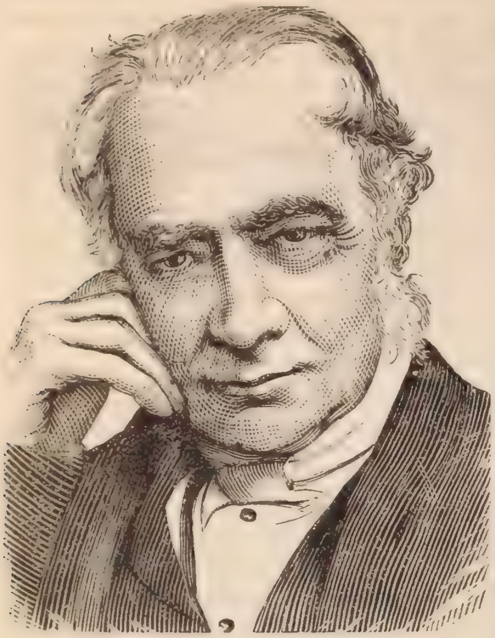
If you walk humbly with God you will feel safe. What can harm the man who sits at the feet of the great Lord? Ah! now you feel that, happen what may, nothing can harm you, for you are ready to bow before it, and let the Lord alone reign. What peace it gives when you feel that if there be anything about you which grieves your God, you will gladly let it go, you have already surrendered it, you would not retain it for an hour. The tempest rolls overhead but all is calm below when the heart has learned full surrender, and is even as a weaned child.

Into this quietness and rest there comes enjoyment, for the man that leaves everything to God finds joy in everything. Mercies which to others are commonplace are sweet to him; he wonders at the love which God displays in them all. As mercies come to him he receives them with songs of thankfulness: he is grateful to think that he has bread to eat and raiment to put on, for he knows how unworthy he is; and when great mercies are showered on him, he sits down before God and cries, "Whence is this to me? What am I, and what is my father's house?"

He is the man who joins Mary in her Magnificat, singing, "My soul doth magnify the Lord." He sings with the psalmist, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless His holy name." He sits at heaven's gate waiting to enter, and he shall not long be detained outside, for as joy and peace and a heavenly mind have come to him so shall they soon bring him to their own home. He who has learned to walk humbly with God shall soon see the face of God in His glory. God teach us all this sacred art, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

[PORTIONS OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—
Psalm 73; Micah 6: 1–9].

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 185,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]



THE LATE REV. PREBENDARY AURIOL.

Birth in 1805—Graduated at Oxford in 1828—Preferred to the Rectory of St. Dunstan's in 1841—Appointed as Prebend of St. Paul's Cathedral in 1865—His Last Sermon—A Believer in the Speedy Second Coming of Christ.

MR. EDWARD AURIOL, the well-known Evangelical clergyman of the English Church, was born in 1805, and was therefore seventy-five years of age at the time of his death, which took place at his residence in London, on Tuesday, August 10th. He was a student of Christ Church, Oxford, where he took his B.A. degree in 1828, and proceeded M.A. in due course. In the year 1841 he was preferred by the Simeon Trustees to the rectory of St. Dunstan's, Fleet Street, London, and here for the long period of thirty-eight years he faithfully preached the Word of Life. In 1865 Bishop Tait appointed him to a prebendal stall in St. Paul's Cathedral ; and he has held the post of commissary in England for the Bishop of Nelson, New Zealand, since 1866.

The figure of Edward Auriol in Fleet Street was as familiar as that of any journalist passing to his office, or man of business to his store. Emphatically, it might have been said, his was the "good gray head which all men knew," for at all hours he might be seen intent upon the Father's business. At an age when he might have been reasonably excused, as some might have thought, from efforts and activity better suited to the energies of younger men, he might be seen, though stooping, moving over the ground at a rapid rate, or pausing to greet friends with a hearty cordiality of spirit that could not age, or conversing with friends who had new plans of usefulness in hand, and giving them the promise of his highly valued co-operation. His work was a pleasure to him, and perhaps his hardest trial as an aged minister was to find the spirit willing and the flesh weak.

It was only in January last, on the first Sunday of the year, that, although he had for some time ceased to do duty as rector of St. Dunstan's, he felt he must preach once more to his beloved flock. With at least a remnant of the energy with which he had proclaimed the Gospel of redeeming love nearly forty years ago, he took the same text as that with which he had commenced his ministry—"This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." His old friends will certainly never forget that sermon, for it proved to be the last they were ever to hear from him, and it was the dying testimony of a faithful minister to the truth which it had been the joy of his life to make known.

There is little in the way of exciting history, as some would term it, in such a career as that of Edward Auriol, although certainly he lived through and manfully bore his part in a period of Church history as trying and exciting as the world has seen for many years.

He felt called upon to preach, not himself, but the message of the Divine Lord whose servant he was. "One of the old school," he might be termed, and he gloried in such a designation, so far as the "old school" was also the school of Christ. From the days of his early ministry, until, as an old man, he laid his head on his pillow to die, he knew no other gospel and was never ashamed of it. His deep and hallowed devotion of heart and mind was perhaps the first and chief characteristic which impressed ousiders. They could not help feeling, here is a man whose walk is close with God, who has the hidden life, and whose true citizenship is on high.

So habitual was the devotional spirit in him that at times listeners to his discourses would not be surprised at his breaking off from his line of argument to talk with God rather than to the congregation he was addressing. Perhaps the most affecting thing in the great Prophetic Conference upon the Second Advent of Christ which was held under Prebendary Auriol's presidency at Mildmay Park, about two years ago, was this combination of prayer and exhortation in the address he delivered on this occasion. All who knew him will remember with what holy delight he LOOKED FOR CHRIST'S SECOND ADVENT.

He held that the Word of God did not set forth this truth as a mere doctrine, but as the earnest desire, and summing up the affection of Christian men. "It is a personal coming, and it is a pre-millennial coming," he would reiterate, and he would, in his most persuasive tones, urge upon believers to look for this. He maintained that the prominent position this subject occupies in the New Testament, from our Lord's own discourses, throughout all the Epistles, and down to the Book of Revelation, clearly showed that it is one on which the Church ought to be much exercised, and also one in which all the hope and desire of the true Christian, in deed and in truth, ought to centre.

HIS DYING WORDS.

Those who knew him best are those who now can remember best perhaps the simplicity and fervor of his Christian faith. On the day of his death—in the middle of the day—the Rev. Prebendary Cadman, who was his intimate friend, paid him a visit ; and in a conversation which had reference to his religious hopes and joys, quietly remarked : "I think it seems to be the will of God to call me. I feel my strength failing." Having been reminded by Mr. Cadman of the words, "Wait on the Lord and He shall strengthen thy heart ; wait, I say, on the Lord," he replied : "Wait, but it must be in the true scriptural sense of the term. Waiting not idly, but as a true servant on his master." Taking Mr. Cadman's hand, finally, when that gentleman was leaving him, he said, with uplifted eyes : "What we must seek for is more power in the consciousness of Christ's redeeming love, more simple dependence upon His merits for the pardon of all our sins, more conformity to Him, that we may be dead with Him, that we may be risen with Him, that we may sit with Him in heavenly places, that we may be with Him when He comes again in His glory."

We have in these words the expression of the cherished aim of his long ministry and life. He died in an hour, or less, from this time.

The Will of the Late Mr. Marshall O. Roberts bequeaths to the Ladies' Christian Union, $5000 ; to the American Bible Society, $2,000 ; to the Young Women's Christian Association, $1000 ; to the Sheltering Arms, $2000 ; to the American Tract Society, $2,000 ; and to Calvary Church, $2,000, with a request that it be applied especially to the support and maintenance of the chapel attached to the church.

NINE NEW THINGS.

A New Sermon by Rev. D. L. Moody.

(Concluded from page 637.)

IV. The New Man—The Growth of the N Nature—V. The New Name—Nominal Chr tians are Frauds—VI. The New Way—VII.
New Tongue—VIII. New Food—The Boy w caught most Pigeons—IX. New Friends.

IV. THE NEW MAN.

"And that ye put on the new man, which af God is created in righteousness and true h ness" (Eph. 4 : 24).

Now the old man always takes sides agai
God : that is what the old nature does ; the n man always takes sides with God, and you always tell after getting acquainted with a m whose side he is on ; there will be a crisis in life ; the time will come when he has to t sides, and if a man takes sides against God can see at once that he has not been born of G

If he has got the new nature, and knows God of grace and has been born of the spi
when the crisis comes, when the trying ti comes, he will take his stand on God's si That is the difference. Now we can tell whet we have these two natures or not. We do need any one to tell us that. If you have a c flict with yourself, if you are battling with yo self, that is a sign the new life has begun, because you don't get the victory every ti you must not become discouraged and dishea ened.

I think one of the greatest mistakes the Chu makes at the present time is, they expect you converts to leap right into full-grown Christi all at once ; they expect them to become rou ed out in a whole and complete Christian ch acter all at once, while they are just babes Christ.

This new nature has to grow ; we are to gr in Christ, and in the knowledge of God, and become more and more like Him every d and it is a great mistake, I think, for the Chu to expect all these young disciples to be rou
ed out in their Christian characters all at c

I hope the old Christians here will sympat with young disciples ; that they will pray them and help them all they can ; and if have children who profess to be Christians they don't always act like Christians, don't gin to twit them and say," You are a pr Christian." I don't know of any thing that discourage young disciples more than that.

Suppose people were to talk that way to s of these older Christians every time they something that was not Christ-like, or e time they saw them doing something wro suppose they should twit them and say, " are a pretty Christian ;" how discouraging disheartening it would be ! What we want do is to help one another, to sustain another, to pray for one another, to sympat with one another, and to help one another al through this world.

When I was converted I thought the things had passed away and that all things become new. I thought my old temper had g and that every thing that was mean and c temptible about me was gone. But I s found out my old temper was there, and th have it yet ; but God, I hope, has given grace to keep it under, and to keep it in pl where it belongs.

In fact, a man isn't good for any thing hasn't got a temper. What is steel good without temper ? But what we want is to c trol it, to keep it in place where it belongs ; that is what grace will do for you ; and if find that you have got no other life, that have the old nature, don't think that you not a child of God for a moment ; but if have the new nature, that which rejoices in and walks heavenward, that is a sign you h been born of God.

V. But I must pass on to the next new th —the new name. When we are born into kingdom of God we have

A NEW NAME.

We are going to have, it says in Revelati name that no one knows; and in the 62d chapter of the Prophecy of Isaiah and 2d verse it says: "And the Gentiles shall see Thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory; and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the Lord shall name."

Now you will find that the Gentiles were not called Christians, and were not known as Christians until they were first named as Christians at Antioch; and the first thing when a child is born into a family—almost the first thing—is to name it. Sometimes, if it is a beautiful babe, it will be a long time before it will get a name; they will talk of this name and that name, and finally they will name it. But now God names all His children when they are brought into the kingdom; they become saints of the Most High God; when we are adopted into the family of God, then we take His name.

Now I want to say right here I never could understand how men who are living in sin who are unwilling to take the Lord Jesus Christ as their Lord and Master; not willing to take Jesus Christ and to follow the Son of God, how they can call themselves Christians. I think such men and women are sailing under false colors; they are misrepresenting themselves; that they are living a lie.

For me to profess to be a child of God, for me to profess to be a Christian when I have not Christ's spirit, when I have not any desire to have His spirit, when I haven't any desire to follow Him, when I haven't any desire to do His will, when I haven't any desire to surrender my will to Him, I say it is a false position, and I don't see what right any one has to take that name under such circumstances.

If I should call myself a disciple of Mohammed and didn't believe in Mohammed, you would say I was a fraud, wouldn't you? And a man that professes to be a Christian and yet does not possess the Christ-like spirit is just in that position because He says, "If any man hath not the Spirit of Christ he is none of His." You may belong to this church or any other church, but if you have not the Spirit of Christ you are none of His.

And now have we a right to take that name under any other circumstances? I have talked with a number of people, and when I have asked them if they are Christians they have said, "Well, I am not a Hottentot; I am not a Jew." They think because they are born in this Christian country that they are Christians. How much mischief has been done in foreign ports and heathen countries when men from England and America have gone there as the representatives of a Christian country! The impression among heathen nations is that we are Christians: this is called a Christian country; and when they see men from this country reeling through the streets, and hear them cursing and blaspheming, and see them thus conducting themselves in those heathen countries, they revile at our Christianity, and they have made light of Jesus Christ. It is because those men have been sailing under false colors and have been professing to be what they are not.

Then let us be careful to see that we are truly God's children before we call ourselves Christians. If we are Christians, then are we kings and priests unto God; then we have the new name and are no longer children of wrath, but children of light.

VI. The next new thing is

THE NEW WAY.

Now the first thing a man wants to do when he is converted is to get out of the old way. Christ just takes us out of the broad way, and places our feet in the narrow way. Now, the impression among ungodly men is that the narrow way is a hard and rugged way; they think the easiest way is the best way; and men say, "If we take the broad way, we have not got to put ourselves under restraint; we have not got to deny ourselves." What a delusion; what madness!

If you want to know what true liberty and freedom are, you want to take Christ's way, because if you take His way you will give up your way. The way may seem narrow at first, but as you go on His yoke will grow lighter and lighter, and by and by you will not know that you have a yoke; you will not know there is a cross, because it will become so light.

But how is it in that broad way? it grows darker and darker as you journey on; it grows harder and harder; it grows blacker and blacker. "The way of the transgressor is hard, but my yoke is easy and my burden is light." I have served both masters; and I stand here to-day to testify to you that the new way is the best way; that the narrow way is far better than the old way, and the best thing to do is to give up the old way and take God's way.

God never makes mistakes. If He had not a better way, He wouldn't ask you to leave the old way; if He had not something better than you have, He wouldn't ask you to give up what you have got. God loves us too well for that; He loves us far better than we do ourselves, and so He wants us to come into that new and living way. "I am the way," says Christ. And now if you want to get in the right way, take Christ. He is the way Himself.

VII. The next new thing is

A NEW TONGUE.

It says in the 16th chapter of Mark and the 17th verse, "And these signs shall follow them that believe; in my name shall they cast out devils, and they shall speak with new tongues." How many times I have heard men cursing to-day and praying to-morrow. I have heard men blaspheming God to-day and praising God to-morrow. What caused the difference? They found a new tongue.

A man once said to me, "I would rather be shot dead than to speak for Jesus Christ, I have said so many things against Him." And yet in twenty-four hours that man was testifying with the eloquence of heaven for Christ. He had found the new tongue, and it wasn't hard then for him to testify. When the heart is right it is not hard to talk for Jesus Christ; then men will delight to do it; then it will be a pleasure for us to testify for Him; to testify for Him in our places of business, or wherever our lot may be cast.

A revived church will be a singing church. "He hath put a new song into my mouth," says the Psalmist; and the first thing, I believe, that a true child of God will want to do will be to praise Him. I don't know of any better way than to sing, although I can't sing a note; I don't suppose I could to save my life; I couldn't start one of those old hymns that I have heard for fifteen years, either "Rock of Ages," or "Jesus, Lover of My Soul." I couldn't sing them with my lips, but I can sing them with my heart, and I like to hear those sweet songs of Zion.

Do you know the first song that is recorded in Scripture? It is the song of redemption. When the children of Israel got through the Red Sea they began to sing; and do you know the last song in Scripture, in Revelation, is the song of redemption? They sang hallelujah; they had been redeemed; they had got home, yes, deliverance had come; and by and by, when these feet of ours shall strike the golden strand, then our hands will strike the golden harps, and then we will all sing. Then I expect to sing as well as any one when I get to heaven.

Ah! my friends, we ought to praise God more. "Yet all the people lift up their voices and praise God." Why shouldn't we do it? No man can praise God for me. I must praise Him for myself. No quartette choir can do it for me. That is all right in its place, but let the people sing, too, and let us have a compromise in the matter. But when a church gets cold, if you notice it, they don't want to sing. When a heart gets earthly-minded, and we get to thinking about the things of this life, then it is that we need a new song.

I am told by the English people that the English larks always sing the sweetest when they get the highest; when they are out of sight; and so it is with God's children; when we forget ourselves and get to thinking of Him, then we will praise Him the loudest and the sweetest.

VIII. The next new thing is we must have

NEW FOOD.

If I have a new nature, I have to feed it; and there is not anything in the world that will feed that new nature but that book; nothing else but that, or something that tells me about that book. You can't feed this new nature on the husks of this world. There isn't anything to feed that new nature but that book; and we have to have the sincere milk of the word. And if we look for this new food we shall find it. If we make up our minds to feed on this word, it will give us strength and power to serve God, and we shall grow every day, and every truth we get will lift us nearer and nearer to God; will lift us more and more out of ourselves, and make us stronger and stronger all the time. As we get some new truth, as we get some new promise, it will give us greater strength to go on in this wilderness journey.

We have a long wilderness journey; we have a long road; when we look from time, as we are leaving the shores of time, it may be ten, or twenty, or forty years of journeying before us, and there will be trials and temptations and afflictions and sorrow during our journey; but we must feed upon the Lamb if we expect to get strength to overcome these trials. We must have new food, and bear in mind that the soul must be fed as well as the body.

There was once a boy who caught all the pigeons in his neighborhood, and no one else could catch a pigeon. He had them; and some one said, "How do you catch your pigeons and keep them?" "Well," says he, "if you will not tell the boys around the neighborhood, I will tell you. You see I feed them pretty well." And why is it that some ministers have great crowds? It is because they feed the people, while others do not; they don't feed them with the right food—that is the difference. Now the new nature has to be fed; the new nature has to have food; you can't live on your experience all the while; and what we want is to feed on the Word. That tells about Christ.

IX. The next and last new thing is

NEW FRIENDS.

When I see a young disciple that professes to be a young disciple, and he has not any desire to leave his old associates and can't bring them with him, and is still living with unbelievers and associating with unbelievers, I know it is only a question of time before that man will go back to the world. The work is superficial. It is not deep and thorough.

The first thing for a young disciple to do when he is born of God, is to get among God's people. He will want new friends. Some people have said, "Do you think it necessary to join the church after you are converted? Do you think it is our duty to do it?" Why, I think it is just as natural for a man to want to get among God's people after he is converted as for water to run down a hill; and if he is born of God, where is the institution under heaven like the church where he will be fed and looked after and loved and sympathized with, unless it is the Church of God? And if he is not in the Church of God, he will want to be there.

It is not duty, but your privilege to be there. I believe it is the dearest institution under heaven to Jesus Christ; that there is nothing so dear to the heart of the Son of God as the Church. It may have its failings and its faults; but then you and I are to blame for that as much as any one. Let us go in and do all that we can to make it a pure and living fountain; and so my advice to all young disciples is to find your way to a church; not to go into it to go to sleep, but to go to work; try to help others; let us each do all that we can to help one another in this wilderness journey.

But my time is up. I have spoken of nine new things. Those nine new things will make this life beautiful and glorious, and may God give them to each one of us.

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

(Continued from page 638.)

Claude's love proves fickle.

On Sunday we all went to the village church together. A new clergyman had just been appointed, and the sisters were hardly in a frame of mind to enjoy the services, for they had not ceased mourning over the late rector, who had been there for forty years, and who had been obliged to resign on account of ill-health. But as I had no recollections of the previous minister, and therefore no painful feelings on seeing the new minister enter Mr. Baker's pulpit, preach from Mr. Baker's Bible, and take possession of Mr. Baker's congregation, the service was a real delight to me.

The young clergyman was plain in appearance, but he had a broad, high, thoughtful forehead, and he was evidently thoroughly in earnest.

The sermon went to my heart; it was on this text: "To be spiritually minded is life and peace." I came out of church, feeling that the sermon I had just heard was one which I could not discuss or remark upon, but was one which I should never forget. It was a searching, practical sermon, and it had probed my heart to its very depths. What did I know of this spiritual-mindedness of which Mr. Claremont spoke? What did I know of the life and peace which always spring from it?

I felt that my thoughts, my motives, and my desires were far too much of the earth, earthly, far too little raised above the earth to things divine. And hence the want of life in my religion, hence the want of that deep and abiding peace which is the portion of all true believers in Jesus. I determined to pray more than ever before for this heavenly-mindedness, and to let my thoughts dwell less on earth, more in heaven.

The next day Mr. Claremont called at the Manor House, and was received by the sisters with all respect and dignity. I was practising on the drawing-room piano when he came in, and was alone with him for a few minutes, while Miss Jane, Miss Hannah, and Miss Louisa were arraying themselves in their best caps.

He spoke to me very pleasantly, and I took the opportunity of mentioning Maggie to him; and he kindly promised to see her sometimes, and try to influence her aright.

On the day before I left the old Manor House while I was packing my box in my bedroom, and thinking it would be rather hard to leave the kind sisterhood, and my little Maggie, and turn out into the world alone, the door opened and Maggie came in with an open letter in her hand.

"Oh! May," she said, "what do you think? Claude Ellis is going to be married!"

My heart beat so loudly that I was afraid Maggie would hear it, and I trembled so much that I was obliged to sit down on a chair by the bed.

"May, dear," said Maggie, "what is the matter? You look so pale and ill. Shall I get you any thing? I am afraid I startled you, coming in like that."

"Oh! no," I said, trying to smile, "I am all right. Read me your letter, Maggie—from whom is it?"

"It is from Fanny, May." (Fanny was Maggie's bosom friend and confidante.) "Shall I read it all, or only the part about Claude?"

"Read the part about Claude first, dear," I said, "and I will lie down on my bed while you read; I feel a little tired with packing, and I mean to take half an hour's rest before dinner." So I lay on my bed and turned my face to the wall while Maggie read as follows: "'And now I must tell you the news. Who do you think is engaged? You will never guess if you guess all night. It is Claude Ellis! I will tell you how I heard about it.

"'Yesterday afternoon I went for a walk with Dash to the Endle Farm. As we were coming home, down that hilly part of the road where you and I played hide-and-seek among the furze bushes, I saw two people sitting on a stile at the bottom of the hill. One was Claude Ellis and the other was a young lady. They did not see me until I was very near to them, and then Claude pretended not to see me and got up, and they both walked down the lane, and I followed them only a little way behind, so that I could see the young lady very well.

"'She was prettily dressed, and was tall and very good looking. She had the loveliest hair I ever saw, done in a number of most wonderful plaits. I am sure she could not have done it herself. Claude was bending over her and talking to her; and he looked very happy, and so did she. They turned in at the Parsonage gate, and I went home wondering very much who she was. But I had not to wait very long, for that evening papa came in with the news that Claude was engaged, and that the young lady was staying at the Parsonage. Mr. Ellis had told him, so there could be no mistake about it.

"'She is the sister of one of Claude's Oxford friends; and he has been staying with them in Scotland the last few weeks. Her name is Alice Fitzgerald, and she is very rich indeed. Papa says she is quite a prize for Claude, and that he will be a very rich man now, with her money and his own money put together. And papa says that is a very good thing, for he has heard that Claude spent a great many hundred pounds at Oxford, and that poor Mr. Ellis would have been almost ruined if Claude's uncle had not died just then and left him the money. Papa thinks Claude is very extravagant, and he says he rather pities his wife. But I am sure Claude is very fond of her, and he looked so happy to-day I could not help feeling glad for him. He seemed so miserable the last time he came home.

"'Do you remember when we met him in Bush Lane, how cross he was, and how he contradicted every thing we said, and looked as if he had just heard all his relations were dead? Well, it's getting late, and I must end my letter.' That's all about Claude, May," said Maggie, as she stopped reading; "wouldn't you like to see Miss Alice Fitzgerald?"

When Maggie had gone downstairs, taking her new writing-case with her, that she might begin at once to answer her little friend's letter, I got up and locked my door, and then sat down to think over what I had heard.

The news of Claude's engagement had come upon me like a thunder-clap. I tried to reason with myself that I ought to be very glad that Claude was engaged, and that as I could not be his wife he had found some one else to make him happy. And yet it was so soon, so very soon, for Claude to forget his love for me. I had thought that he cared for me more than that. I had thought that he held my love too dear so quickly and so easily to exchange it for another's.

I suppose it was my pride that was wounded, and that the tears which came, in spite of myself, and rolled down my cheeks, were tears of mortification. I felt very vexed with myself that it should be so. I called myself all sorts of hard names, and wiped my eyes, and tried to think how nice it was that all was so comfortably settled for me; how delightful it was that I could feel that I had done the right thing, and yet that I had not brought a gloom over the whole of Claude's life!

And yet, at the bottom of my heart, I detected a secret hope, which had been hidden there the last few weeks, that, some day or other, Claude might give up his infidel notions and become a real Christian, and that then we might meet again and become to each other what he had so earnestly wished us to be. I had even thought that perhaps this trouble might be the means of making Claude look into the reality of religion, and believe in that Saviour who is the only true source of comfort, and that thus the great obstacle to our union might be taken away. Not that Claude was by any means my beau-ideal of all that a man and a husband should be. But then he was, after all, the nicest man I had ever met, and it might be that my ideal was a thing of imagination, never met with in real life.

And on this particular day I was feeling lonely and desolate. I was about to turn into the world alone—alone among strangers was going to a great and fashionable househ where, no doubt, I should be looked down up and despised as poor, and a dependent.

I had no one to take care of me, or to sh me from the rough places which I should be to come across. There was no one in the w that really belonged to me except my si Maggie, and she was but a child. I felt unprotected, desolate, and forsaken. I took my Bible and turned wearily over the pages perchance, my eyes might fall upon some w of comfort. And the words which caught attention were these, in the thirteenth cha of St. John's Gospel: "Having loved His which were in the world, He loved them the end."

"Unto the end," an unchanging, an unv ing, an untiring love. I had chosen that in preference to Claude's. Had I made a exchange? I had given up a love which proved itself, at the best, but fickle and sha and I had chosen Christ's love, the love of of whom it was written, that having loved own which were in the world, He loved unto the end.

"His own." Did that indeed mean me? c it only apply to the few disciples gathered r Him in these last hours of His life on ea Was it only these whom He loved unto the Or could I take up the words, and make the star of comfort? Could I make them app myself now, as they applied to the apostles

Was it true now that I was His—His Was it true that I was in the world—in the desolate world, alone, just as these apostles so soon to be, and was it true that He love me in spite of all my failings and a sins, and that He would love me unto the Could it be true?

Another text came into my mind: " Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for These words surely gave me the right to the other words and make them mine. Jesus was then, in the yesterday of the pa He is now, to-day; what He was to the apo so He is to me, and so He ever will be same in love, the same in sympathy, the sa constancy.

But I am so cold to Him, I thought, s grateful, so sinful. My love is so chan and fluctuating. Surely He will not, H not, in spite of all this, go on loving me— me unchangeably. And yet, I knew that C love for us, if it exists at all, must exist qu dependently of anything in us, for what c see in the very best of men to win His lov

And I remembered that these very apos whom this was written, were very faulty a perfect in their love to Him. Only the ver day one of them, the one who had profess most love for Him, denied Him with oat curses, saying, again and again, "I kno the man;" and every one of them, even t ciple whom Jesus loved, forsook Him hour of need and fled.

And yet of these very men, with all the ings and imperfections, it was written, ing loved His own which were in the wor loved them unto the end."

My heart grew light again, and I went stairs quite comforted and happy, and wi single wish in my heart to change place Miss Alice Fitzgerald.

The next morning I left the Manor soon after breakfast. I was followed to t by Miss Jane bidding me, in her calm, way, to be sure to choose a carriage with two elderly ladies in it, "because, my de reads of such awful robberies and murd ing place in railway carriages!"—follow by Miss Hannah, entreating me to re what Miss Jane had said, and also to b sure that the guard had fastened the do before the train started—followed even Louisa, suggesting the advisability of having both windows closed, and both v rs securely fastened, lest any draught should nter the carriage—followed, not only to the loor but as far as the garden gate, by my little Maggie, sobbing as if her heart would break, and efusing to be comforted.

It was very hard to leave them all, and especially to leave my little sister, and to go forth lone into the world ; but the words which had een my comfort yesterday were my strength ow, and the language of my heart was, "I will ar no evil, for Thou art with me."

How much I wondered, as I was travelling at day, what Miss Evelyn Trafford would be ke, and of what my duties, as companion, ould consist. But it was of no use wonderg ; that evening I should know.

I had a long, tiring journey, having to change y train no less than four times, and to wait at old, cheerless junctions for several hours.

(To be continued.)

JACOB AT BETHEL.

S. Lesson for October 17th, Gen. 28 : 1–22 ; Golden Text, ver. 15. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WE read in the end of chapter 27 that Rebeh, having made up her mind to part with cob on account of the danger in which he was aced by his brother's anger, found a sufficient use to induce Isaac to send him away to her her's house. There was a grievous want of aightforwardness in Rebekah, and it is no nder that her son, who was constantly in her mpany, imbibed the same despicable, degrading spirit. A child learns more from the little tails than from the great things of life, and a ild who hears his mother give an evasive swer will soon justify himself in telling a lie.

Rebekah said to Isaac, "I am weary of my life cause of the daughters of Heth : if Jacob take wife of the daughters of Heth, such as these ich are of the daughters of the land, what od shall my life do me?" She knew that in at she said she would have the sympathy of husband ; while she would imply how much s undeserving was Jacob than Esau, and so in ay balance the bad impression which his de- had left on his father's mind. It is possible t she then suggested that he should visit her ily with the object of seeking a wife, for "saac called Jacob and blessed him, and charged h, and said unto him, Thou shalt not take a e of the daughters of Canaan. Arise, go to lan-aram to the house of Bethuel, thy mothe father ; and take thee a wife from thence of daughters of Laban thy mother's brother. d God Almighty bless thee, and make thee tful, and multiply thee, that thou mayest be a titude of people ; and give thee the blessing Abraham, to thee, and to thy seed with thee ; thou mayest inherit the land wherein thou a stranger, which God gave unto Abraham."

ere we notice how Isaac confirmed again and n the blessing which he had unconsciously n to his younger son. He had seen that it useless to withstand God, and so he came to His view of things. And as Jacob was to he progenitor of the Messiah, his marriage t not be with a daughter of Canaan : there t be no union after the flesh. How often, in command and in type, is this truth of set forth, "Be ye not unequally yoked toer with unbelievers" (2 Cor. 6 : 14). So Isaac Jacob away from Beersheba, where he was dwelling, and he who was a "plain man, lling in tents" (Gen. 25 : 27), probably a e lover, had to go out from home and leave nd all he loved.

ere we have a little episode concerning Esau. every other natural man, he was fertile in promise. Jacob was already taking the betlace in the esteem of his parents. He had s yet sought any marriage union, and when parents suggested that he should go to n-aram to seek a wife, he was ready to go. he went, accompanied by his father's blessthe blessing of Abraham which should come his seed. So Esau, who had already martwo wives to please himself, sought a third, ghter of Ishmael, to please, as he thought, his parents. Poor Esau ! the third wife could not undo his union with the other two.

There are many unconverted people who think that although they do indulge in personal gratification, sometimes in wilful sin as well as selfishness, yet if they deny themselves in some other way, a kind of balance is arrived at. How often we find young girls who will deny themselves sleep after an evening's dissipation at a ball, in order to attend early communion ; others who will read a novel in bed for hours at night and then make up for it, as they think, by attending a prayer-meeting. A man of business will unscrupulously do a dishonest thing, "because," he says, "everybody does it, and it is understood in the world ;" but his conscience pricks him, and he gives, perhaps, a twentieth of that which he thus unrighteously gains to some Christian work. Again, another will embark in a business which pays well, but which so ministers to the lusts of the flesh that thousands are ruined by it, and to balance the evil he does, he will give in a princely way to the most spiritual work which is done for God. Who give subscriptions like the large brewers, whose names are over so many of the public-houses in the worst parts of London?

We return to Jacob as he was on his journey toward Haran. Night was drawing in ; the sun was set. It was perhaps his first night away from home, although he was by no means a young man, but all his love, his thoughts, his associations were centred in the home which he had left. He was undoubtedly himself unconverted at the time, and we may picture the utter loneliness of that first night. No prayer from his father's lips to raise his soul heavenward, he was left to his own resources : how could he, the liar, the deceiver, stand before God? It may be that for the first time this question was placed by the Spirit of God before his mind.

We cannot tell what were the workings of his heart ; the inspired Word tells us only that "he lighted upon a certain place, and tarried there all night, because the sun was set ; and he took of the stones of that place, and put them for his pillows, and lay down in that place to sleep. And he dreamed . . ." Before the Word of God was written, it was by dreams or visions of the night that He frequently communicated His will to man (Job 33 : 15). Jacob was cut off from his family and from his God, by his sin of deceit and lying. If through the working of the Spirit of God he was conscious of his distance from Him, then his dream was a marvellous answer of grace. He may have thought, "The blessing of God through my father has come upon me ; but how can I, a sinner, draw near to God?"

"And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven ; and, behold, the angels of God ascending and descending on it." Then there was a way of communication open between him and God? "And, behold, the Lord stood above it ;" and who lay at its feet? The sinful, desolate Jacob. Blessed be God, we know Who is the ladder. "Hereafter" said the Lord Himself (John 1 : 51), "ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man." There is but one ladder, one way of access, "one Mediator between God and man, the Christ Jesus." A reconciled God is bound to lost rebellious man by means of His outpoured blood. How far Jacob understood this is not revealed to us ; but oh, let us grasp the facts that the only possible and yet sure ground of communion between God and man is this, that the righteousness of God has been vindicated with regard to man in the person of the Lord Jesus. And thus in every approach to God we come as members of that crucified body which hung upon the cross, all our personality included and hidden in His personality crucified and risen. It was only on the ground of the ladder that God could speak to Jacob ; He said, "I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac ; the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed ; and thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth, and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south : and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Thus we see that the true and faithful God in revealing Himself in a personal manner to Jacob did not in the first place reproach him with his sin ; later on He would use circumstances to do that ; but He came to the lonely outcast and said, "I am thy father's God, and thy grandfather's God ; I stand to the promise which I have made to them, and which thou hast inherited."

It must have been a wondrous revelation of God's grace to Jacob, just when he was suffering the consequences of his sin, that it should be said, "In thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." How could he be a blessing who had been a curse? The next words give the answer : "Behold, I am with thee." Jacob alone could only deceive, supplant, lie ; Jacob with God could be a channel of blessing to all the families of the earth. The Lord with Joseph made him able to endure his wrongs in Potiphar's house and in the prison ; God with Moses enabled him to stand before Pharaoh ; God with Joshua led the people into the promised land ; God with Gideon overcame the Midianites. "I am with thee" was to be Jacob's safeguard ; and the Lord said, moreover, "I will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land ; for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of."

There was enough in these words for Jacob to have banished from his heart all fear for the future. God had guaranteed to keep him in all places whither he should go, and yet we find him later on fearing Laban, fearing his brother Esau, fearing the people of the land. Why was this? Because deep in Jacob's heart the seed of unbelief germinated. Perhaps, like his mother, he believed in God's promises, but, because he could not see how they were to be executed, he gave way to distrust, and to that scheming and planning which so dishonors a God who has pledged Himself to do as He has said.

"And Jacob awaked out of his sleep, and he said, Surely the Lord is in this place ; and I knew it not. And he was afraid." Although every word which God had spoken to him was so strengthening and comforting, yet Jacob, instead of taking comfort, feared. It may be he looked at himself, a poor, miserable, sinful man, in the presence of God, and thought more of himself and his contrast to the All-Holy than of the life-giving words which God had uttered. He said, "How dreadful is this place! This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." David said, "In Thy presence is the fulness of joy ;" but Jacob found it dreadful. Why? David took God to be all He said He was, while Jacob doubted.

He "rose up early in the morning, and took the stone that he had put for his pillow, and set it up for a pillar, and poured oil upon the top of it." He named the place Beth-el, i.e., the house of God. "And Jacob vowed a vow, saying, If God will be with me, and will keep me in the way, that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father's house in peace ; then shall the Lord be my God : and this stone, which I have set for a pillar, shall be God's house : and of all that Thou shalt give me, I will surely give the tenth unto Thee." "If" the Lord had said, "I am with thee ;" did he think God could break His Word, or that He was more likely to fulfil it, if Jacob made Him a little present of tithes? Alas! how little man knows of the kingly heart of our God ; how man judges Him after his own littleness instead of seeing Him through His holy written Word! And thus it comes to pass that the infallible God is treated with more distrust and disrespect than any fallible human creature, and men, even converted men, to whom God has in a measure revealed Himself, go to the fearful length of suspecting God of treachery and insinuating an "If Thou will," where He has said, "I will."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Situation in South-eastern Europe is regarded with serious apprehension by the statesmen who control the foreign policy of their respective countries. It appears probable that without the application of force the Turkish Sultan will not obey the decisions of the Berlin Conference. The cession of Dulcigno, to which we alluded last week, is considered a test case in the programme. At first the Sultan promised that the town should be ceded to Montenegro at the wish of the European Powers. Then he declared that he was unable to carry out the cession, and suffered his forces to be expelled from the town by the Albanians. But when the Prince of Montenegro was preparing to seize the town by force, the Sultan threatened him with war if he did not desist, thus clearly showing that the Sultan was insincere in his professed readiness to cede the town. The next step was a peremptory demand from the great Powers requiring the Sultan to obey the will of Europe in the matter. He was not definitely threatened with unpleasant consequences if he disobeyed, but as the combined fleets of the Powers were cruising in his neighborhood, he had good grounds for apprehension if he decided on that course. With characteristic craft he asked for a few days' delay for consideration, which have been granted him.

It is reported that a difference of opinion exists among the Powers as to the proper course to be taken in the event of the Sultan continuing refractory. England and Russia are said to recommend coercion by force of arms, while Austria, Germany, and France are opposed to warlike measures. If the question were merely one of coercing Turkey, it would be a simple one; but every statesman is aware that mutual jealousies prevail in Europe, which might be quickly fanned into open hostility if the sword be once drawn. "The beginning of strife," Solomon tells us, "is as when one letteth out water." And in this case the commencement of war might end in deluging the European Continent with blood. There is therefore a general reluctance to resort to extreme measures, and the Sultan of Turkey is aware of this; but he does not know how far that reluctance may be safely strained.

A Panic in Ireland has Resulted from the murder of Lord Montmorres. The correspondent of the London Times at Dublin says: "Party differences are for the time discarded in the presence of a common and imminent danger. It is said on all sides, with equal despondency and bitterness, that there is no longer any security for life and property, and that nobody can feel safe who ventures to assert rights or discharge duties connected with the possession, occupation, or management of land if his acts conflict with the interests or prejudices of those with whom he has to deal. The country is fast drifting to anarchy. The arm of authority seems paralyzed, and the Executive utterly helpless." A reward of $5000 has been offered for the discovery of the murderers of Lord Montmorres, but no measures have been taken by the government for the protection of other landowners. The agitators who travel from town to town delivering exciting speeches are the most dangerous class; and now that the coercion acts have not been renewed by Parliament, such orators are not easily silenced or punished for seditious language.

A Deplorable Picture of the Habits of some ladies belonging to the upper classes of English society appeared in a recent number of Truth, a London society paper, edited by Mr. Labouchere, now a member of Parliament. It describes a scene which took place at a pretty villa near London. The occasion was a garden party, and the guests were, like the host and hostess, members of the British aristocracy. When the party arrived, the host was absent, and the hostess appeared among her guests so intoxicated that she could not maintain a steady gait, and her flushed face and thick utterance indicated her condition. As soon as her husband arrived, he observed the lady's degradation, and with a look of misery on his face so deep that it drew pity even from heartless persons who had been laughing at the spectacle, he led her to her room.

The editor adds, "This is no exaggeration of facts. It is, unfortunately, a scene from real life, and, I fear, not an uncommon one. The love of strong drink appears to be increasing among the educated women of our day. During the season just past instances of this were so frequent as to lead to the conjecture that a kind of epidemic of drink was pervading those classes of society in which culture, position, and the possession of every comfort of life would appear to be a sufficient guaranty against so degrading a vice."

The New French Ministry has Commenced its work with an assurance which should allay the fears expressed throughout Europe—that its policy would be one of aggression. M. Barthelemy St. Hillaire, the minister of foreign affairs, has forwarded a circular to the representatives of France at foreign courts, in which occurs the following passage: "My first duty is to request you to assure the goverments to which you are accredited that the new cabinet will make no change in the foreign policy of its predecessor. France has never attached greater value than now to the maintenance of peace so fruitful of advantage for her prosperity and honor."

An Italian Hero is Reported to be Languishing in prison through his filial devotion to his father. It appears that a man named Luigi, a station-keeper at Jesi, shot and killed in self-defence a desperado who had quarrelled with him. He fled to his home, but during the night the officers entered to arrest him. Through some error they took Luigi's son Francesco instead of Luigi. As the young man kept silence and would not betray his aged father, he was tried, convicted, and sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment. When he had served two years, Luigi could bear it no longer, and gave himself up to the authorities. He confessed the crime, but the justices refused to believe his confession, and retained the son in prison. This noble young man's conduct in sacrificing the best years of his life is a rare instance of devotion, and is a type of the greater sacrifice Jesus paid in dying for a world of sinners.

Jewish Immigration to Palestine.—The Jewish Messenger of New York says that a hundred well-to-do heads of Jewish families in Roumania have petitioned the "Alliance Israelite" to purchase land for them in Palestine, where they may found an agricultural colony; they offer to contribute 400 francs each, and to pay the balance in annual instalments.

A Wealthy English Baronet's Heir Drowned.—Sir Watkin Wynn has just lost his nephew and heir, Mr. Wynn, lieutenant in the Scots Guards. He was very popular, full of energy and spirit, and an expert swimmer. He was bent on going over Master's Weir in a canoe, and, expecting a ducking, had taken off his watch and prepared for a swim. Mr. Lionel Damer was in a punt with a waterman, ready to assist in case of mishap. They saw Mr. Wynn in the water, and then, to their horror, he disappeared, sucked under by the eddy. Once they caught a glimpse of his hair, and once again of his hand, thrown up, and then all trace of him was gone. The deepest sympathy its felt for his mother, who was made a widow, after seven years' marriage, by an equally sad and sudden accident. The young man had brilliant expectations, and a happy and useful career might have been predicted for him, but he has lost all by his death. The Christian's lot is widely different. His death inducts him into the full possession of inexhaustible riches of which in his life he had only a foretaste (1 Cor. 2 : 9).

Mrs. M. Baxter Writes from a Village in the Grand Duchy of Baden: "God allowed us to see fruit of our former visit to Freiburg, and added blessing this time to our labors. But the prejudice against any lay work is extremely strong—almost more so among Protestants than Catholics, and there is a sad want of direct evangelizing effort in a way which can be brough to bear upon the people. Oh, that God woul stir up Germans to pray for their country!"

The heat at Freiburg was so intense that slee at night was difficult. Large meetings wer afterward held at Matterdingen, a German village where the only accommodation that coul be obtained was at an inn where thick dust la on the furniture in the rooms, and there wer fleas and mosquitoes, causing an inflamed swel ing of the face from some twenty bites, so a almost to close one eye. Sleep could only b obtained by putting the head in a sort of cag made of a net. Matterdingen is a primitive vi lage. At the village post-office one may go t buy stamps several times in the day and find th postmaster out in the fields, and when one ask when one can get stamps, etc., they say, "Whe he comes home," giving no specified time wha ever; so the best plan is to waylay the post whe it comes once a day at 8.30 in the morning, an then the postmaster must be there.

Value of a Boy's Corpse.—An Inquest w held recently in London on a boy who had falle into the Regent's Canal and was drowned. H would have been saved, but just as a man w diving to recover the lad a barge came alon and the bargeman declined to stop, though in plored to do so. Several other barges followe and all insisted on keeping their course. Aft they had passed the lad was found firmly in bedded in mud, having been pressed down death by the slowly-passing barges. There w much method in this otherwise strange condu of the bargemen. It transpired in evidence th some of them had boldly said it was no go making a fuss about a drowning boy, who, saved, brought them nothing, whereas, if fish up in the form of a corpse, he would be wor five shillings, or, as one of them put it, "At lea three gallons of beer." Such inhuman actio show how degraded is the class for whose im provement Mr. George Smith is making su strenuous efforts as described in a recent nu ber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A Fearful Predicament was Witnessed Beachy Head, England, on August 16th A you man descended a grassy slope, presuming th the foothold was similar all the way down to t sands. He soon, however, found to his dism that he had reached the edge of the cliff itse and that the slope by which he had descend was too steep to enable him to return.. For t hours and a half he remained in this situati calling for help, but his cries were unhea Ultimately he was rescued by four coastguar men with the aid of crowbars and ropes. T rescue is said to have been witnessed by num ous spectators, to whom it afforded the great excitement. Such a descent many souls daily making, trusting that the path will always easy and pleasant. Happy they who d cover their mistake in time, and trusting not the help of man. Rely on Him who saves the uttermost all who come unto God by H (Hebrews 7 : 25).

The Second Volume of The Christian Hera comprising Nos. 37 to 62 (July to Dec., 1879), may procured, elegantly bound in cloth, at this off Price $1.75.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchm (London) for September may be obtained at the of of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Price six cents.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Works are on s at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at price low as to bring them within the reach of every c Twelve Sermons on various subjects, with photogr of Mr. Spurgeon, price 35 cents. John Ploughm Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, 60 ce The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, a volume of sermons, $2.50. The Treasury of David, a homi cal exposition of the book of Psalms, five vols., as as Psa. 118, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth-Day B This popular gift-book contains a suitable pass selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for every in the year, with a blank space opposite for a graphs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. Spurg appear at their respective birthdays. The book elegantly bound, and the price is 75 cents. Re tances should accompany orders.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, Rev. W. M. HAY AITKEN, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

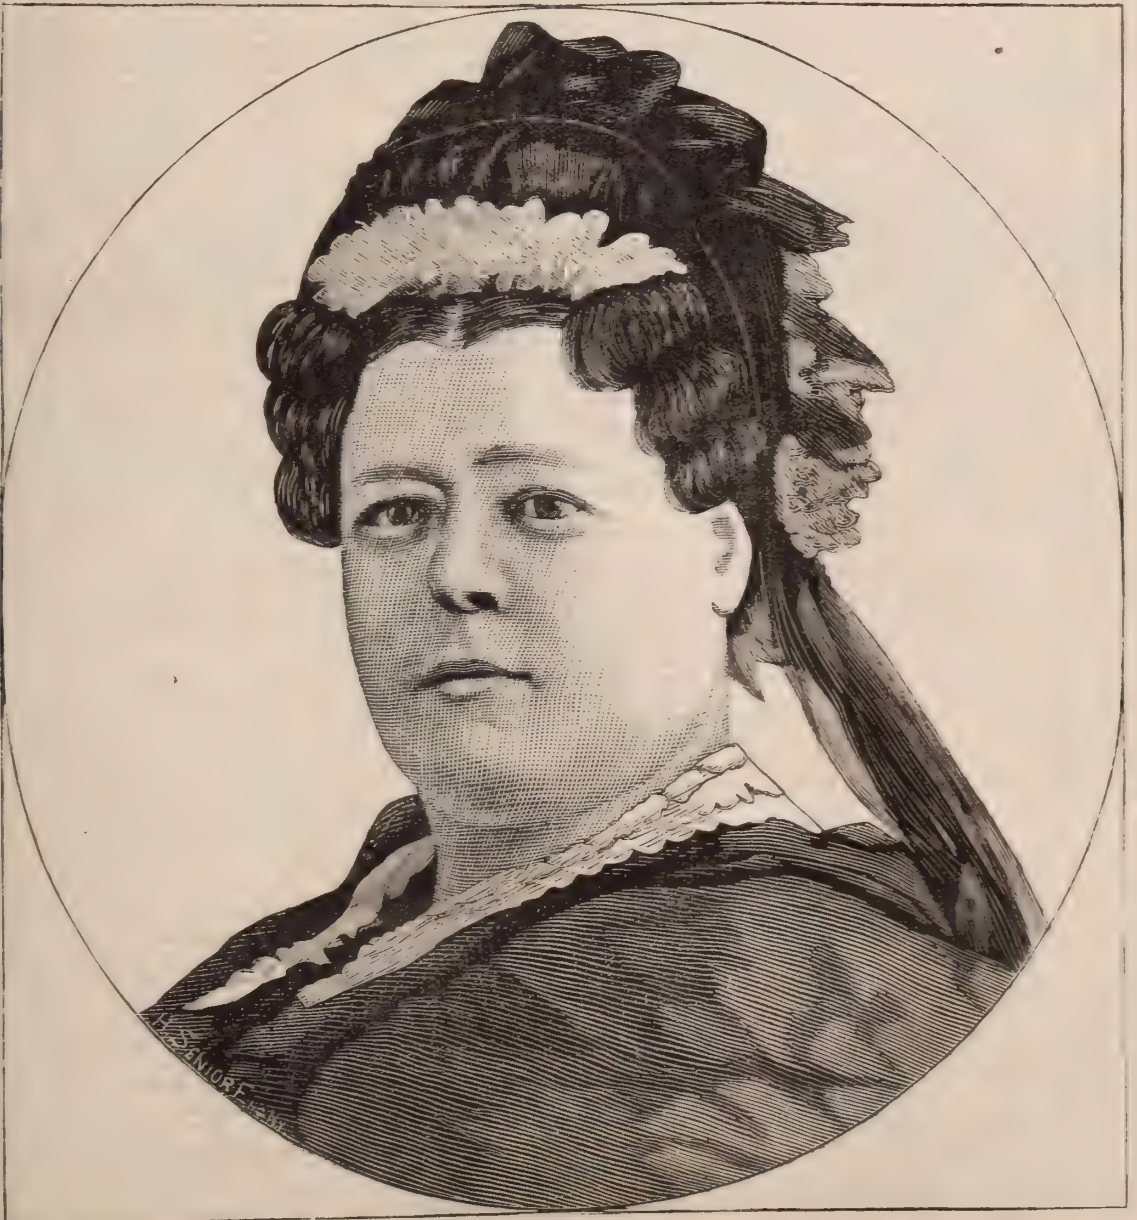
Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1880. 14th Year. No. 42—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF MRS. M. N. VAN COTT, the Celebrated Revivalist Preacher.
DOMESTIC LIFE. A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
ROCHESTER TOWER. A New Serial Story by Miss M. A. Paull (Continued).
THE LABORER WHO BECAME A RAILROAD CONTRACTOR.
AN ANECDOTAL DISCOURSE, by Major Whittle.
CURRENT EVENTS: Gen. Grant Interviewed—Gov. Seymour's Speech—A Valuable Institution—A French Lawyer at the Presbyterian Council—A Minister Shot by a Hen—Two Promises Broken—A Dog's Touching Fidelity—Fifty Miles for a Testament—Remarkable Faith Cures, etc.
PROPHETIC ASPECT OF THE FRENCH CRISIS.
RARE FRUIT. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H Spurgeon.
A CHOICE VINDICATED. (Continued.)
Jacob's Prevailing Prayer. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter—The Story of Joseph Bottomley.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The Sultan's Reply to the Powers—An Ominous Alliance in Ireland—A Despairing Soldier—The Return of a Prodigal, etc.



MRS. M. N. VAN COTT, the First Lady Licensed to Preach by the M. E. Church in America.

MRS. MAGGIE NEWTON VAN COTT.

Birth and Early Life—Marriage—Domestic Trials—Her Business Enterprise—Conversion—Mission Work—A Sailor's Bible Thrown Overboard—One of the Smart Boys—First Sermon—Six Weeks' Services—Two Ladies Reconciled—Other Invitations—Business Relinquished—Licensed to Preach—Eight Years' Record—Conclusion.

IN all ages of the Church and in all denominations of Christians, the idea of a lady ascending the pulpit and preaching to a mixed congregation has met with energetic opposition. Good men, enthusiastic in their Master's cause, ready to sacrifice themselves and all they have in His service—devoted men whose one aim in life, whose chief and all-absorbing desire it is that His kingdom may come and souls be won for Him—have raised their voices in condemnation when a woman has assumed the office and functions of a Christian preacher.

Nor has this ministerial opposition sprung from unworthy motives. In other professions the entrance of a lady has been barred by the jealousy, or fear, or exclusiveness of the male practitioners. But in the ministry the men who would close the door of the pulpit against their sisters have been men whose character furnished conclusive refutation of such a charge. With them, the sacrifice of self, the subordination of their own predilections and preferences to the will of Him whom they served, have been distinguishing characteristics. Their objections have been conscientious objections, which would have perished in a moment if they thought the voice of their Master had called His handmaid to the service.

This is not the place to deal with a question on which weighty arguments have been advanced on both sides. It is sufficient for our purpose to recognize the position of objectors, and to acknowledge that they have occupied that position on conscientious grounds, which even their opponents admit find prima facie support in the Bible. There still remains, however, the fact, established beyond disputation, that souls have been won through the instrumentality of a woman's preaching, and however they may have been brought out of darkness into light, the fact, that they have been brought there, is one over which every Christian rejoices. When there is joy among the angels of Heaven over one sinner's repentance, who are we that we should cavil about the means God has used to melt the heart of stone?

Of the ladies famous as preachers whom this country has produced, the subject of our sketch is a fitting representative. The extent of her labors, her indefatigable energy, her earnest and devoted zeal, and her brilliant success, single her out as a leader in this work; and the fact that she was the first lady to whom a preacher's license was granted by the Methodist Episcopal Church, will render the leading incidents of her life interesting to our readers, even to those who would prefer seeing her labors confined to a sphere which does not include pulpit ministration.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

In the year 1830 there lived in the city of New York an honest, worthy couple who were highly respected and honored by the class of society among whom they moved. The husband, William K. Newton, was of English descent, though born in this city. He was an intelligent capable man, frank and manly in deportment, and of a happy disposition. He occupied the position of manager of real estate, having under his control at different periods the estates of Peter Lorillard, Isaac Greenwood, and the enormous real property of John Jacob Astor. He was also prominent in other affairs, for he belonged to the military organization of the National Grays, and attained the rank of commander of that corps; and so well did he fulfil the functions of his office that a costly sword was presented to him as a mark of esteem by the gentlemen in his command.

Mrs. Newton was descended from a Scottish family, but was, like her husband, a native of New York. She was a woman of strong mind, firm and inflexible of purpose, and a strict disciplinarian in family matters. She with her husband attended the services of the Episcopal Church, and held in profound veneration the doctrines and ritual of that denomination. Mrs. Newton's father was a Methodist, but she had conceived an antipathy to the Methodist body which she never overcame.

The home of this worthy couple was brightened, on March 25th, 1830, by the birth of a daughter who was named Maggie, and who has now become famous as Mrs. Maggie Newton Van Cott. The little girl was the object of the almost idolatrous affection of her father and maternal grandfather, and the precocity she developed won for her general admiration. Her health was delicate, and her early education was more than once suspended by sickness.

DOMESTIC TRIALS.

When Maggie was little over seventeen years of age a young lady named Van Cott, who had been a friend of the Newton family for some time, called one evening with her brother, who had not previously been acquainted with Maggie or her parents. The young man was struck by the beauty and intelligence of his sister's friend. He cultivated the acquaintance so formed, and found that beauty was not her only attraction. Admiration grew into love, and he became the accepted suitor for Maggie Newton's hand. His parents warmly approved the young man's choice, and the young bride received a hearty welcome to the Van Cott family.

The next four years of her life passed happily away. She assisted her husband in his business, and in her domestic duties she found a source of delightful pleasure. A daughter was born to add to the happiness of the young pair, and so far as mere wordly prosperity can give happiness, their cup of joy was full. But a time of trouble was at hand—trouble in which no consolation the world can afford availed to comfort or to cheer. The little daughter on whom the affection of the parents was centred, was carried off by an attack of scarlet fever, and the grief over that loss was increased by anxiety about the health of Mr. Van Cott. He had contracted a severe cold from which he had been unable to obtain relief. It settled upon his lungs, and for some time his life was in imminent danger.

During this period of anxiety another child was born, and the mother had scarcely risen from her sick bed before she found herself face to face with serious difficulties. The expenses of Mr. Van Cott's illness and of the home had swept away the little stock of savings the young people had accumulated. No money had been earned for some time, and the burden of debt had grown to formidable proportions. It was a sorrowful time for the young wife and mother, then little over twenty-one years of age. God was teaching her the frailty of earth's joys and hopes, the vanity of all human happiness which has not Him for its foundation; but that lesson she was not then ready to learn. Her thoughts were centred in her position, and that position was just then very critical. Her husband sick almost unto death, her infant needing a mother's care and attention, and all the time debts accumulating which there was no apparent means of discharging.

Then it was that the hitherto unknown resources of Mrs. Van Cott's nature were discovered to herself and her family. To continue in this state of embarrassment, or to become a burden on the generosity of her husband's family, were courses against which her nature revolted, and she quietly appropriated to herself the task of providing for the wants of the home. It was a hard task for the gentle, shrinking wife, hitherto cherished and shielded from rough contact with the world; but after looking around on all hands she determined to undertake it, and braced herself up to the work.

As Washington Irving has so well said on this subject, "Nothing can be more touching than to behold a soft and tender female, who has been all weakness and dependence, and alive to every trivial roughness, while treading the prosperous paths of life, suddenly rising in mental force to be the comforter and supporter of her husband under misfortune, and abiding with unshrinking firmness the bitterest blasts of adversity." It was touching, and the only line Mrs. Van Cott found open to her was calculated to try her modest and retiring nature to the utmost.

Mr. Van Cott had been engaged in collecting orders for wholesale druggists, and had been a successful representative of several high-class firms. This fact gave the clue to his wife's project. She decided on taking up the work her suffering husband was unable to perform. In secret she arranged all the details of her scheme, and when they were perfected she communicated them to her husband. Naturally his objections to the enterprise were very strong. He thought of his loved wife encountering the annoyances he knew so well, and which would be doubly painful to a lady, and begged her not to make the attempt. Entreaties and warnings were, however, powerless to turn the resolute wife, from her purpose, for she had been steeled to it by the strongest powers of her nature—love for her husband and love for her child.

The morning when she had arranged to start on her enterprise was bitterly cold; frost and snow kept every one within doors who could stay there, and it seemed doubly hard to face the cold world in such pitiless weather. But the resolution of the wife was not to be thwarted by weather, and bidding a hasty adieu to husband and child, she sallied forth on her self-appointed mission. Her husband was broken down by the agonizing thought of what lay before her, and watched her departure from the window of his room with moistened eyes. But she waved him a caress with a merry face, and was soon out of sight. Then her exuberant spirits, called up for his comfort, gave way, and she buried her face in her hands and gave vent to a flood of tears.

The first day's expedition was a complete success. Her position, her energy, and her grave, modest demeanor won the hearts of the ordinarily imperturbable business men, and she returned in the evening elated by her triumph. From that day and for some years Mrs. Van Cott was a successful business woman. When changes in the commercial world rendered one line of operations unprofitable, she promptly adopted another, and her energy and business sagacity were productive of substantial results. Prosperity once more reigned in the home, and the wolf was far away from the door.

CONVERSION.

The replenishing of the family exchequer was however, only one of the anxieties that lay heavily on Mrs. Van Cott's mind. Her husband's health had fluctuated with the variableness characteristic of his disease. At one time it encouraged hopes of recovery, and at another it cast down the hearts of those who watched him with loving tenderness. Those who saw him less frequently were, however, convinced of a fact of which his wife at length, became painfully conscious. She saw that although his condition varied day by day, he was tending perceptibly toward the grave.

Thoughts of this approaching separation from one she loved so dearly filled her mind, and turned her attention to matters of spiritua concern. She had been acquainted with Gospe truth from her childhood, but her heart had never been given to the Saviour. Now she bent at the footstool of God and cried, "I Thou wilt save my darling, I will truly serve Thee." But there is no bargaining with the Most High, and this the loving wife had to learn It was a bitter trial, but at last she was able to kneel at her husband's bedside and say, "Father into Thy hands I commit my treasure. I give my all to Thee; let Thy righteous will be done." The work was done; she had surrendered what to her was more precious than life henceforth Christ had the supreme place in affections.

CHRISTIAN WORK.

fter this, when not occupied with her busi- duties, or in watching at the sufferer's side, sought opportunities of usefulness. Owing Mr. Van Cott's enfeebled condition, the ily had discontinued attendance at the Episl Church, and had become connected with Duane Street Methodist community. Here success as a Sunday-school teacher was very ifest, as several of those who attended her were brought to God under her teaching. death of her beloved husband prostrated hysical powers and withdrew her for a time this work, but she was soon seen in her stomed place.

he day in May, 1866, she attended, by invita- a mission meeting in the Five Points, then very worst locality in the city. The sight e miserable depraved creatures who formed audience in the mission-room weighed ly on her heart, and she felt herself irresist- mpelled to make some exertions for their nation. She suggested a week evening ng to the pastor, but he doubted its prac- lity. It was, however, ultimately arranged e condition that Mrs. Van Cott herself charge of it. She felt some nervousness epidation in doing this, but, after conside- and prayer, consented. Only eight adults ded this Bible class at its commencement, he numbers rapidly grew until the room lways full. Then a Sunday night Bible vas opened, and that became so large that handed over to the care of the pastor for r service.

success which followed Mrs. Van Cott's t Five Points brought her an earnest re- to assist in the "hard" neighborhood of rd and Baxter Streets, which she accepted. he found a gathering of eighteen persons ad been found loitering in the usual aim- ay at the corner and brought in. They ed to belong to the lowest and most de- class of society, and not one of them read or had any knowledge of religious Mrs. Van Cott talked to them as she lked to her class at the Sunday-school. was no attempt at preaching, but it was st that an impression had been made. xt meeting was so crowded that the room small, and a lady who owned a sailor's ng house, and who had herself been con- under the teaching of Mrs. Van Cott, the use of a larger room in her house. fer was accepted, and that upper room erward the scene of many a soul's en- on the way of life.

LOCK OF HAIR IN A SAILOR'S BIBLE.

f the most remarkable of these cases was a stalwart sailor in the prime of life Mrs. Van Cott noticed while she was g, listening with marked attention. ly she saw tears roll down his cheeks, and lose of the meeting she addressed a few words to him. Then she learned his He was the reprobate son of a pious g since dead. On her death-bed she had r Bible to her boy, and between its leaves ed a lock of her hair. He ran away to became a ringleader in all kinds of ess. But his mother's Bible in his chest nstant reproach to him. He never saw ched it in turning over his clothing, but ow degraded he had become.

ight after a disgraceful scene he went obtain some article from his chest. e was turned over, and the lock of his hair curled around his finger. It seemed im, and in a frenzy he threw the Bible air into the sea. He thought no more il the day when he strayed into Mrs. 's meeting; but now the thought of ife was terrible to him, and he seemed the lost gift of his mother the loss of Mrs. Van Cott spent some time with unsel and prayer, and he promised to in on his return from the voyage on which he was about to start. Nothing more was heard of him for six months, but many prayers were offered on his behalf. At the end of that time he appeared at the meeting with several shipmates. He had to tell of his own conversion, and of the joyful fact that God had made him instrumental in the conversion of the men by his side.

A BOY'S SMARTNESS.

The number of neglected children playing in the streets near the mission was a sad sight which made a deep impression on Mrs. Cott's mind, and she determined to start a Sunday-school. With considerable difficulty a few boys were induced to come in, but they formed a very small proportion of the crowd in the street. It was thought that the boys would be the best recruiting sergeants, so a premium of five cents was offered to each boy who would bring another boy next Sunday. This offer led to an amusing instance of that characteristic known as smartness, which among adults has so frequently manifested itself in defalcations and forgeries.

Among the boys who the following Sunday brought a recruit and received the five cents was one who soon afterward slipped unobserved from the room. The boy he had brought then asked if he might earn five cents by bringing a boy in. He was answered in the affirmative, and going out brought in the boy by whom he had been introduced. This attempt to cheat was obviously a preconcerted arrangement between them, and showed that even the boys had contracted an unscrupulous disposition, and were devoid of the first principles of morality. This was only one of the many difficulties with which the enterprise had to contend. There was soon, however, no need to offer premiums; the room was well filled, and the work was blessed by God in the conversion of many of the children.

FIRST APPEARANCE IN THE PULPIT.

For a long time Mrs. Van Cott continued this arduous life. All day she was at her post managing an increasing business which required all her thoughts and involved no slight strain on her physical powers. On Sundays and on several evenings of the week she conducted services at the missions either in Baxter Street or at the Five Points. Her health began to show the effects of this continuous exertion, and she found a short interval of rest absolutely necessary.

About this time she received an invitation to visit a pious family at Durham, Greene County, N. Y., which she accepted. Accounts of her success at the missions had preceded her, and on the first evening of her visit she was invited to preach. Her efforts had never been dignified by that title before, and it somewhat alarmed her. She insisted that she did not preach; she "only talked for Jesus." By considerable persuasion she was at length induced to conduct a service.

The school-room was crowded, and the service was very impressive, the speaker forgetting her nervousness as she became absorbed in her theme. Several souls were gathered into the fold that night, and she was urged to hold a service on the following Sunday night in the Hervey Street Baptist Church, a more commodious building. She consented, and a large congregation assembled. But a difficulty occurred at the outset. The candles on the wall were so placed as to give plenty of light on the pulpit, but on the stand below, where Mrs. Van Cott had taken her position, she could not see a letter of print.

The candles could not be removed, and the pastor and his friends pressed her to go into the pulpit. She had never entered a pulpit, and she shrank from that step, but a few moments consideration convinced her that she would act wisely in complying with the request, and bowing her head in prayer for a blessing, she ascended the stairs and for the first time in her life spoke from a pulpit. Eight persons that night came forward to ask for prayers, and before they left the building were rejoicing in Jesus as their Saviour.

She intended to return to business the next morning, but was induced to stay for another service at night, when "the anxious seat" was again filled and many souls found peace. While so joyful a work was going forward all thought of returning was banished, and forgetting the loss her absence from her business involved, she remained in Greene County six weeks, and no less than seventy-five persons who attended the closing service attributed their conversion, to the blessing of God on her efforts.

Returning to New York, Mrs. Van Cott gave her attention to her business for a few weeks, but a pressing invitation from another part of the State, where revival services were being held was sent to her, and she started at the call of duty to the new field. Here remarkable success attended her preaching, and some interesting cases of conversion resulted. Among these was one which deserves mention as bearing on a difficulty many evangelists have experienced.

A RECONCILIATION.

A young lady had asked for the prayers of the congregation on the first evening of the services, and appeared to be under deep conviction. For many days she made no progress. She assented to the truth as explained to her; she admitted Christ's willingness to save, and her own intense desire for salvation, but still she could not find peace. The case occasioned Mrs. Van Cott much anxiety, and having presented it in prayer privately with great earnestness, she questioned the young inquirer as to her position. Then it was disclosed that her sister-in-law, living in the same house with her, had done her a serious injury which she could not forgive. Here was the secret obstacle, and it was not until she promised to ask for reconcilation with her relative that the way opened. She returned to her home and humbled herself to her sister-in-law and was greeted with open arms. She found to her surprise that her sister-in-law was also under conviction, and had been held back by the same obstacle. They were reconciled, and both were soon afterward received into the church.

After these services concluded, Macedonian calls for assistance flowed in on the successful evangelist, and believing the voice of God had called her to give her life to the work, she decided on giving up business and spending her time exclusively in Christ's service. This self-denying act was performed, and Mrs. Van Cott from that time has been continually engaged in preaching the Gospel through the country. On September 6, 1868, she received from Windham Centre, N. Y., Conference an exhorter's license, and on March 6, 1869, a local preacher's license from the Conference of Stone Ridge, in the Ellensville district.

Since then, not only in New York State but in New England and in the West, Mrs. Van Cott has labored with signal success; and though figures give but a vague idea of work of this character, it is interesting to learn that in the years from 1872 to 1880 she has travelled 128,080 miles, preached 3195 sermons, conducted over 8000 meetings, and no less than twenty thousand persons have professed saving faith in Christ as the result of the blessing of God on her labors.

Mrs. Van Cott humbly acknowledges that in this remarkable record there is no cause for self-praise. She attributes the joyful result to the grace and power of God exercised through her, and while deeply thankful that He called her to the honorable work, and led her on step by step, widening the field before her and directing her path, she cries with all self-forgetfulness, "Not unto me, but unto Thy name be all the glory."

Miss S. A. Sewell, the Prison Philanthropist and Evangelist, is now on a visit to England, and has been addressing vast crowds at Mile End, London. Mr. G. Hamilton, Superintendent of the East London Mission, writing to her on July 19th, 1880, says, "I have listened with intense delight to your earnest appeals. I have seen the effects, not only in the greatly-increased numbers at our meetings, but what is far more important in the numbers who have sought, and found the Saviour. Surely God has a great work for you to do for Him."

DOMESTIC LIFE.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Preached on Sunday Morning, October 10 , 1880.

"Return to thine own house, and shew how great things God hath done unto thee."—Luke 8 : 39.

A Terrifying Sight—Demoniacal Submission—"Go to Thine Own Home"—What Makes a Happy Home?—Your Father's House—Greek and Biblical Definitions of a Happy Home—I. We Want Religion in our Domestic Duties—In the Discipline of Children—In Setting a Good Example—A Canadian Convict's Plea for Her Babe—A Young Mechanic's Remorse—II. We Want Religion in Home Sorrows—In Financial Misfortune—In Bereavement—Offerings of the Three Sons of a Dead Queen—The Grandest Tribute to Our Ancestors—A Consecrated Life.

After a fierce and shipwrecking night, Christ and His disciples are climbing up the slaty shelving of the beach. How pleasant it is to stand on solid ground after having been tossed so long on the billows! While the disciples are congratulating each other on their marine escape, out from a dark, deep cavern on the Gadarene hills there is something swiftly and terribly advancing. Is it an apparition? Is it a man? Is it a wild beast? It is a maniac who has broken away from his keepers, perhaps a few rags on his person, and fragments of stout shackles which he has wrenched off in terrific paroxysm. With wild yell, and bleeding wounds of his own laceration, he flies down the hill.

Back to the boats, ye fishermen, and put out to sea, and escape assassination. But Christ stands His ground; so do the disciples; and as this flying fury, with gnashing teeth and uplifted fists, dashes at Christ, Christ says, "Hands off! Down at my feet, thou poor sufferer," and the demoniac drops harmless, exhausted, worshipful. "Away, ye devils!" commanded Christ, and the two thousand fiends which had been tormenting the poor man are transferred to the two thousand swine which go to sea with their accursed cargo.

The restored demoniac sits down at Christ's feet and wants to stay there. Christ says to him practically, "Don't stop; you have a mission to execute; wash off the filth and the wounds in the sea; smooth your disheveled locks; put on decent apparel and go straight to your desolated home, and tell your wife and children that you will no more affright them, and no more do them harm; that you are restored to reason, and that I, the Omnipotent Son of God, am entitled hereafter to the worship of your entire household. 'Return to thine own house, and shew how great things God hath done unto thee.'"

Yes, the house, the home is the first place where our religious gratitude ought to be demonstrated. In the outside world we may seem to have religion when we have it not; but the home tests whether our religion is genuine or a sham.

WHAT MAKES A HOME HAPPY?

Well, one would say a house with great, wide halls, and antlered deer-heads, and parlors with sculpture and bric-a-brac, and dining-hall with easy chair and plenty of light and engravings of game on the wall, and sleeping apartments commodious and adorned. No. In such a place as that gigantic wretchedness has sometimes dwelt, while some of you look back to your father's house, where they read their Bible by the light of a tallow candle. There were no carpets on the floor save those made from the rags which your mother cut night by night, you helping wind them into a ball, and then sent to the weaver who brought them to shape under his slow shuttle. Not a luxury in all the house. But you cannot think of it this morning without tearful and grateful emotion. You and I have found out that it is not rich tapestry, or gorgeous architecture, or rare art that makes a happy home.

The six wise men of Greece gave prescriptions for a happy home. Solon says a happy home is a place where a man's estate was gotten without injustice, kept without disquietude, and spent without repentance. Chilo says that a happy home is the place where a man rules as a monarch a kingdom. Bias says that a happy home is a place where a man does voluntarily what by law he is compelled to do abroad. But you and I, under a grander light, give a better prescription: a happy home is a place where the kindness of the gospel of the Son of God has full swing.

While I speak this morning there is knocking at your front door, if He be not already admitted, One whose locks are wet with the dews of the night, who would take your children into His arms, and would throw upon your nursery, and your sleeping apartments, and your drawing-room, and your entire house a blessing, that will make you rich while you live, and be an inheritance to your children after you have done the last day's work for their support, and made for them the last prayer. It is the illustrious One who said to the man of my text, "Return to thine own house, and shew how great things God hath done unto thee."

I. Now, in the first place, we want

RELIGION IN OUR DOMESTIC DUTIES.

Every housekeeper needs great grace. If Martha had had more religion she would not have rushed with such bad temper to scold Mary in the presence of Christ. It is no small thing to keep order, and secure cleanliness, and mend breakages, and achieve economy, and control all the affairs of the household advantageously. Expenses will run up, store bills will come in twice as large as you think they ought to be, furniture will wear out, carpets will unravel, and the martyrs of the fire are very few in comparison with the martyrs of housekeeping. Yet there are hundreds of people in this church this morning who in their homes are managing all these affairs with a composure, an adroitness, an ingenuity, and a faithfulness which they never could have reached but for the grace of our practical Christianity. The exasperations which wear out others have been to you spiritual development and sanctification. Employments which seemed to relate only to an hour have on them all the grandeurs of eternal history.

You need the religion of Christ in the DISCIPLINE OF YOUR CHILDREN.

The rod which in other homes may be the first means used, in yours will be the last. There will be no harsh epithets—"you knave, you villain, you scoundrel, I'll thresh the life out of you, you are the worst child I ever knew." All that kind of chastisement makes thieves, pickpockets, murderers, and the outlaws of society. That parent who in anger strikes his child across the head deserves the penitentiary. And yet this work of discipline must be attended to. God's grace can direct us. Alas for those who come to the work with fierce passion and recklessness of consequences. Between severity and laxativeness there is no choice. Both ruinous and both destructive. But there is a healthful medium which the grace of God will show to us.

Then we need the religion of Christ to help us in setting a good example. Cowper said of the oak: "Time was when settled on thy leaf a fly could shake thee to the root. Time has been when tempest could not." In other words, your children are very impressible just now. They are alert; they are gathering impressions you have no idea of. Have you not been surprised sometimes, months or years after some conversation, which you supposed was too profound or intricate for them to understand—some question of the child demonstrated the fact that he knew all about it?

Your children are apt to think that what you do is right. They have no ideal of truth or righteousness but yourself. Things which you do knowing at the time to be wrong, they take to be right. They reason this way: "Father always does right. Father did this. Therefore this is right." That is good logic but bad premises. No one ever gets over having had a bad example set him. Your conduct more than your teaching makes impression. Your laugh, your frown, your dress, your walk, your greetings, your good-bys, your comings, your goings habits at the table, the tones of your voi making an impression which will last a m years after you are dead, and the sun will tinguished, and the mountains will crumbl the world will die, and eternity will roll perpetual cycles, but there will be no di tion of the force of your conduct upo young eyes that saw it, or the young ear heard it.

Now I would not have by this the idea to you that you must be in cold reserve presence of your children. You are not em you are companion with them. As far can, you must walk with them, skate with fly kite with them, play ball with them, that you are interested in all that interests Spensippus, the nephew and successor of P the academy, had pictures of joy and gl hung all around the school-room. You not give your children the impression tha they come to you they are playful ripples ing against a rock. You must have them stand that you were a boy once yoursel you know a boy's hilarities, a boy's tempt a boy's ambition—yea, that you are a b
You may deceive them and try to give th idea that you are some distant super effulgence, and you may show them off rigorous behavior, but the time will com they will find out the deception, and th have for you utter contempt.

Aristotle said that a boy should begin t at seventeen years of age; before that should be given to recreation. I canno that theory. But this suggests a truth right direction. Childhood is too brief, have not enough sympathy with its sport
We want divine grace to help us in the ment of all these matters.

Besides that, how are your children become Christians if you yourself are Christian? I have noticed that worldly and sinful parents may be, th their children good. When young peo presented themselves for admission i membership, I have said to them, "A father and mother willing you shall com they have said, "Oh! yes; they are d to have us come; they have not been i for ten or fifteen years, but they will next Sabbath to see me baptized." I have that parents, however worldly, want th dren good.

So it was demonstrated in

A POLICE COURT IN CANADA,

Where a mother sat, her little chil arms—sat by a table on which her own lay, and the little babe took up the and played with them, and had great gl knew not the sorrow of the hour, when the mother was sent to the p mother cried out, "Oh! God, let not go into the jail. Is there not some mo who will take this child? It is good en heaven. It is pure. I am bad. I an Is there not here some one who will child? I cannot have it tainted prison." Then a brazen creature rush said, "Yes, I'll take the child."
said the mother, "not you, not you.
not some good mother here who will child?" And then when the officer of mercy and pity took the child to car to find a home for it, the mother lovingly good-by, and said, "Goo darling; it is better you should nev again."

However worldly and sinful people want their children good. How are to have them good? Buy them a books? Teach them a few excellent c Bring them to church? That is all ve of little final result unless you do i grace of God in your heart. Do you that your children are started for eter they on the right road? Those little are now so bright and beautiful, when scattered in the dust there will be ar t living on in a mighty theatre of action, your faithfulness or your neglect now is ling that destiny.

ere is contention already among ministering ts of salvation and fallen angels as to who have the mastery of that immortal spirit.
children are soon going out in the world.
temptations of life will rush upon them.
most rigid resolution will bend in the of evil. What will be the result? It equire all the restraints of the Gospel, all trength of a father's prayer, all the influ-of a Christian mother's example, to keep u say it is too early to bring them. Too to bring them to God? Do you know how children were taken to the ancient Pass-The rule was, just as soon as they could old of the father's hand and walk up Mount h they should be taken to the Passover.

children are not too young to come to God.
you sit here and think of them perhaps forms now so bright and beautiful vanish you, and their disembodied spirit rises, and e it after the life of virtue or crime is past e judgment is gone and eternity is here.

hristian minister said that in the first year pastorate he tried to persuade a young nic the importance of family worship.
time passed, and the mechanic came to stor's study and said, "Do you remember irl? That was my own child; she died orning very suddenly; she has gone to have no doubt, but if so, she has told what I tell you now: that child never a prayer in her father's house—never a prayer from her father's lips. Oh! if I ad her back again one day to do my
' It will be a tremendous thing at the last some one shall say of us, "I never heard er pray; I never heard my mother pray."
Again I remark, we want

LIGION IN ALL OUR HOME SORROWS.

are ten thousand questions that come he best regulated household that must be . Perhaps the father has one favorite in nily, the mother another favorite in the and there are many questions that need treatment.

nny and arbitrary decision have no place usehold. If the parents love God there a spirit of self-sacrifice, and a spirit of ness, and a kindness which will throw its over the entire household. Christ will to that household, and will say, "Huslove your wives and be not bitter against wives, see that you reverence your huschildren, obey your parents in the Lord; s, be obedient to your masters," and the will be like a garden on a summer morn-e grass-plot, and the flowers, and the nd the arch of honeysuckle standing in light glittering with dew.

hen there will be sorrows that will come ousehold. There are but few families ape the stroke of financial misfortune.
al misfortune comes to a house where no religion. They kick against divine nts, they curse God for the incoming , they withdraw from the world because not hold as high a position in society as e did, and they fret, and they scowl, and row, and they die. During the past few ere have been tens of thousands of men d by their financial distresses.

isfortune comes to the Christian house-f religion has full sway in that home oop gracefully. They say, "This is The father says, "Perhaps money was to be my idol. Perhaps God is going to e a better Christian by putting me the furnace of tribulation. Besides hy should I fret anyhow? He who the cattle on a thousand hills, and out hand all the fowls of heaven peck their my Father. He clotheth the lilies of
; He will clothe me. If He takes care ven and the hawk and the vulture, most
He will take care of me, His child."

Sorer troubles come—sickness and death. Loved ones sleep the last sleep. A child is buried out of sight. You say, "Alas! for this bitter day. God has dealt very sorrily with me. I can never look up. O God, I cannot bear it." Christ comes in and He says, "Hush! O troubled soul; it is well with the child. I will strengthen thee in all thy troubles. My grace is sufficient. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with the."

"When through the deep waters I call thee to go,
The rivers of sorrow shall not overflow;
For I will be with thee thy troubles to bless,
And sanctify to thee thy deepest distress."

But there are hundreds of families represented here this morning where religion has been a great comfort. There are in your homes the pictures of your departed, and things that have no wonderful value of themselves; but you keep them preciously and carefully because hands now still once touched them. A father has gone out of this household, a mother has gone out of this, a daughter just after her graduation day, a son just as he was entering on the duties of life.

And to other homes trouble will come. I say it not that you may be foreboding, not that you may do the unwise thing of taking trouble by the forelock, but that you may be ready. We must go one by one. There will be partings in all our households. We must say farewell. We must die. And yet there are triumphant strains that drown these tremulous accents, there are anthems that whelm the dirge. Heaven is full of the shout of delivered captives, and to the great wide field of human sorrow there come now the reaper angels with keen sickles to harvest the sheaves of heaven.

"Saints will to the end endure; Safely will the Shepherd keep Those He purchased for His sheep."

Go home this day and ask the blessing on your noonday meal. To-night

SET UP THE FAMILY ALTAR.

Do not wait until you become a Christian yourself. This day unite Christ to your household, for the Bible distinctly says that God will pour out His fury upon the families that call not upon His name. Open the Bible and read a chapter that will make you strong. Kneel down and offer the first prayer in your household. It may be a broken petition, it may be only "God be merciful to me, a sinner;" but God will stoop, and spirits will listen, and angels will chant, "Behold! he prays."

Do not retire from the house this morning until you have resolved upon this matter. You will be gone, I will be gone, many years will pass, and perhaps your younger children may forget almost everything about you; but forty years from now, in some Sabbath twilight, your daughter will be sitting with the family Bible on her lap reading to her children, when she will stop, and peculiar solemnity will come to her face, and a tear will start, and the children will say, "Mother, what makes you cry?" and she will say, "Nothing, only I was thinking that this is the very Bible out of which my father and mother used to read at morning and evening prayer."

All other things about you they may forget; but train them up for God and heaven; they will not forget that.

When a queen died her three sons brought an offering to the grave. One son brought gold, another brought silver, but the third son came and stood over the grave and opened one of his veins and let the blood drop upon his mother's tomb, and all who saw it said it was the greatest demonstration of affection.

My friends, what is the grandest gift we can bring to the sepulchres of a Christian ancestry? It is a life all consecrated to the God who made us and the Christ who redeemed us. I cannot but believe that there are hundreds of parents in this house who have resolved to do their whole duty, and that at this moment they are passing into a better life; and having seen the grace of the Gospel in this place to-day, you are now fully ready to return to your own house, and show what great things God hath done unto thee.

"Though parents may in covenant be,
And have their Heaven in view;
They are not happy till they see
Their children happy too."

May the Lord God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, the God of our fathers be our God and the God of our children forever!

THE STORY OF JOSEPH BOTTOMLEY.

IN preaching at a Sunday-school anniversary lately, Mr. Taylor, of Manchester, England, related the following interesting anecdote:

I will relate one little circumstance that took place some twenty years ago in Manchester. There was a Sunday scholar, a very clever, but naughty boy, whose mother was a member of the church. He would not attend Sunday-school. He would go and pick up his cap, get it under his coat, and run away, and sometimes give the teacher a good run for it, and as he was a tall boy he could outrun his teacher. This went on for two years. We didn't know what to do with him. God took him in hand. Little did we know that the mystery of iniquity was being taught him.

On one occasion he went to a place where he spent many a Lord's Day, and there he was playing with a number of other boys with whom he had formed relationship. He heard something pass him like a gust of wind as he was cutting his name in the bark of a tree in a little jungle. Some words flashed upon his heart, "I will bring you to judgment." The poor boy left the place in terror, and ran, saying to himself, "I shall be in hell before I get out of this wood." He got out of it all breathless, wondering what would be the end of it.

From that time the arrow was struck. God had smitten him. He was convicted of sin and lived for two years after that. The work of grace went on in his heart, and the poor lad was in a dismal state. He painted himself as in a large black valley and all the devils in hell after him, and he had no way of escape. The justice of God was pursuing him. Death was at the other end of the black valley. What to do he could not tell.

I saw him again and again. He said, "O Mr. Taylor, stop with me, show me a token for good. I want that; I am lost. I'm a lost sinner." I said, "Joseph, you used to have many a comfortable instruction in the Sunday-school laid before you." "I hated it all then," he said. "Now I remember everything as though I had been but taught the other day. All my sins are before me. God is just in condemning me. The Saviour hides His face from me, and I can see nothing but eternal wrath. What shall be done?"

The upshot was that poor Joseph was brought into the mystery of iniquity. Through the mystery of iniquity, he was brought into the mystery of godliness, and there the liberty of the Gospel was shed abroad upon his heart. The blood of the Atonement washed away his sins, and it was a glorious time for those who knew him.

He said to me, "Oh, if I could live, but I am dying—I would be baptized in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; but," he added, "I am going to glory instead of joining the church below," and he gave us such testimony of the grace of God in his heart and of the words fastened on his soul at the Sunday-school, and how the Lord worked with him, that we were delighted, and he died in the faith, solemnly declaring that the death of Christ was for him. I never saw such a case. It was as clear as mortal head and heart could understand. He was all satisfied, and poor, dear fellow, he sang at the very last moment that little sweet song in our hymn-book:

"Yes, I shall soon be landed
On yonder shore of bliss,
There with my powers expanded,
Shall dwell where Jesus is.

ROCHESTER TOWER.

By Miss M. A. Paull.

(Continued from page 647.)

A Continued Discussion—A Thrilling Narrative—Mr. Westcott Sympathizes with Nelly's Feeling—Opinions freely Expressed—Mr. Ferguson Speaks Up—The Meeting Adjourned.

In reply to Deacon Westcott's statement that he had heard of a reclaimed drunkard's falling again under the power of his appetite through drinking wine at the Lord's Supper, Mr. Vanstone said with a sneer, "You heard that at a temperance meeting, I suppose."

"If it had been so sir," returned Mr. Westcott, "it would have been perfectly reliable. No speaker at a temperance meeting can tell sadder stories than I am made acquainted with from day to day. This man I speak of—I could take you to the lodging-house where he sleeps, and show him to you at a crossing sweeping, not far from my house, outside Nelson Terrace, if you will take the trouble to go with me—was the son of a clergyman. He was a wild young man, and almost broke his good old father's heart. But when he was over thirty some good Samaritans in the shape of English teetotalers rescued him, and for a long while all went well. He prospered in business as a seed-merchant, and in ten years held a very good position, but without making any profession whatever of religion."

"That's what I blame in ordinary teetotalism," said Mr. Corbould, "and why I cannot join as I otherwise should in temperance work. Christianity is not enough considered—total abstinence is everything."

"To continue," said Mr. Westcott, wisely refraining from entering upon any side argument, "this man had married a very respectable young lady in almost the first year of his reclaimed life. At the end of these ten years of steady industry and much temporal happiness he lost two children, of whom he was devotedly fond. They were twin boys, handsome little fellows, and in them his hopes and pride were centred. God seemed to use this sorrow as a cord of love to draw the wanderer to Himself. His wife and he both found that the love of Christ would solace them as nothing else could. They regularly attended church thenceforth, and after a while wished to receive the communion. Without any thought about the wine, they went together to the Lord's table, and the bread and the cup were passed to them. But I cannot do better than describe what followed in his own emphatic words:

"'The fumes of the wine as it circulated excited me horribly, and when I took the cup in my turn it was as if I held the devil in my hand—"Satan transformed into an angel of light," but retaining all his old power to injure me. Instead of just tasting it and passing it on I emptied the chalice. I apologized for my behavior to the clergyman by some excuse of sudden faintness, but my wife looked at me with a startled expression of pain on every feature, and my neighbors around the table with suspicion or perplexity. I do not know how I continued to sit beside my wife through the remainder of the observance. I was longing to be off, that my feet might carry me to where I could get more, more, more of this elixir of life.

"'Not a thought of consequences was in my soul. Once in the street I sent Fanny home alone, pretending I had to call on a friend with whom I was very intimate, and whom I remembered was not very well. My wife expostulated that, as I was not well myself, she would rather not leave me, and would gladly accompany me. I eyed her suspiciously and rather rudely, I know, and I told her that a brisk walk alone would do me more good than anything.

"'She gave way and left me. Directly I had gone the length of a street or two I looked out for a public house at which I might quench my burning thirst. Had I been looking for a place to get a dinner I might have looked far in that neighborhood, though in London, for a respectable eating house that was open on Sunday; had I wanted a suit of clothes it would have been absolutely impossible for me to satisfy myself; but the drink—aye, the drink, that is what enjoys a Sunday monopoly of sale in this Christian England in decent streets as well as low localities.

"'Closing time, that mock reverence of the publicans to public worship, being over, there was going on all around me a general lifting down of shutters by men with clean white aprons, from the windows of gin palaces and liquor shops of all kinds.'"

"I quite agree with you, brother Westcott, we ought not to have public-houses opened on Sundays—on Sundays," remarked good old Mr. Dixon. "I have no sympathy with that whatever—whatever. I would much rather go without my drink on Sunday than purchase it on Sunday—on Sunday."

"'Outside all these public houses,' said this unfortunate man," continued Mr. Westcott, "'were groups and knots of men waiting for the doors to open. They were the heathen congregations that worshipped Bacchus in these enticing temples, and there was a general appearance among them of anxiety to begin the service that is seldom surpassed by Christian church-goers. Their numbers, however, were swelled by many who had just passed an hour or two in church or chapel, and who now thought themselves at liberty to refresh themselves with legalized intoxicating drinks at the various bars.

"'My one desire, my awful craving, was to get drink; no further thought influenced me. My mouth, my throat, my whole body seemed on fire since that fatal draught of wine.

"'I went in and called for a bottle of port, and when that was drunk, called excitedly for brandy. I was soon helplessly and hopelessly intoxicated.'

"So far I have given you his own words. Since that sad hour I may tell you briefly he has never risen again; his business, of course, dwindled away much more quickly than it had been established; his wife is a poor, broken-spirited, helpless invalid, whom kind friends have succeeded in getting into a home for incurables, and he earns a precarious living by a broom. Most even of those small earnings go to buy drink.

"In the face of such circumstances as these, do you wonder that I feel as my little Nelly feels, that Jesus could not have drunk this bad, evil-producing wine, and that, personally, I shall be very glad indeed if the action of this lady of whom Mr. Ferguson tells us, and my own scruples, which, I confess, grow stronger every day, lead us as a church to sanction the use of a purer emblem of Christ's blood than intoxicating wine?

"If our Band of Hope children, many of whom do not even know the taste of intoxicating liquor, and who are taught the truth that such drinks are poisonous to the human frame, should be persuaded first to take wine at the Lord's supper, and then acquire a liking for it, shall we be free from blame, shall we not cause our little ones to offend?"

There was silence for a few minutes after Mr. Westcott's eloquent tongue had ceased to plead with his brethren, then Mr. Corbould said:

"The sanction of the Christian Church has been given almost universally to the use of intoxicating wine. I have never permitted myself to be so fanatical as to bring my teetotal principles into the church, or to doubt the better knowledge and wise judgment of my forefathers."

"Yet the pure, unfermented juice of the grape is certainly as scriptural a wine as our port can possibly be. I am quite willing to be at the expense of an unfermented wine," said Mr. Westcott, "and will gladly supply it if you will sanction its use."

"You will divide the table, and sow dissension and bitterness among us, sir," said Mr. Vanstone.

"I do not quite see my way to having two sorts—two sorts," repeated old Mr. Dixon pathetically.

"I am quite willing, personally, and inde should be delighted to have only one kind us —the unfermented," said Mr. Westcott, "an hope Mr. Corbould will see fit to support t proposition; at least it will prevent any possi harm to any one."

"You are going too far, brother Westcot exclaimed Mr. Shortland with emphasis. am not going to oppose the introduction of so weak, washy stuff for our weaker brethre and here he laughed heartily, "but I do obj to be put off myself with such wine—wis washy I call it—and I can't make up my mind swallow it. I do like a pleasurable sensation but for a moment, at a privileged and happy dinance, and you must have sympathy for strength if I have tolerance for your we ness."

"I must oppose," said Mr. Vanstone, in most grandiloquent tones, "all hasty decis on this matter. What we have done ever si we were a church, with nothing but profit, so as I ever heard, to all our members, m not be lightly overthrown in order to pam the fancies of a whimsical young woman, to the conceit of some of our number and easy, good-natured compliance of others. such a change had been desirable to advance Saviour's kingdom, certainly our esteer brother Corbould would have suggested it gentleman who is himself a teetotaler, therefore may be supposed to have a pro amount of sympathy with such scruples if t had been of real value. While brother (bould thinks such changes and innovations necessary, I am of his opinion, and I think th altogether unnecessary.

"I shall be very sorry indeed," contin he, "if the extremely minutely and elabora expressed opinion of brother Westcott, who I consider, entered far too much into petty tails and trifling or harrowing narrative allowed to weigh too heavily upon our acti and influence them too largely. I do not dc for one moment brother Westcott's goodnes heart, but I do doubt his wisdom of action clearness of judgment, and I believe he is cisely that kind of man on whom drunkards outcasts love to impose themselves, and whom their trumped-up stories are believed.

Mr. Westcott colored sensitively, but mained silent. Mr. Ferguson spoke:

"My dear sir and brother," he said, addr ing himself to Mr. Vanstone, "you must par me if I tell you you are really mistaken brother Westcott. Why, instead of being soft-headed, tender-hearted fellow you imag among the poor he is a regular detective."

All the other deacons save Mr. Vanstone Mr. Corbould laughed; they only smiled gri

"Beggars, as a rule, never trouble his do and are ready to sink down into the eart shrink sideways round a corner if his bright fasten themselves upon them. If I were a ceptive make-up, the last person I should to come near is Mr. Westcott. Impostors hypocrites of every kind fear the person crucial tests of brother Westcott as they nothing else. Don't believe in his mild, i cent appearance. His has the 'wisdom of serpent' quite as much as the 'harmlessnes the dove.'"

"Hold, brother Ferguson," laughed gentleman alluded to, "you have said q enough about me. I hope very much we not separate, after your able defence of my c acter, without some decided action being t concerning the matter which has called u gether."

"We all remember our deeply-lame brother Anerley," said Mr. Corbould. " need wish to be a better teetotaler, and, a all, a better Christian than he? and yet he n carried his temperance scruples to the divin dinance."

"I hope very much no hasty decision wi arrived at," said Mr. Vanstone; "in fact, I be no party to anything of the kind. S time must be given for reflection and consi tion on so important a matter, if any idea of change is for one moment to be tolerated."

"Quite so," responded old Mr. Dixon; "change is generally very dangerous—dangerous. Nothing must be settled hurriedly—hurriedly."

"I move," said Mr. Corbould, "that this special meeting be adjourned for one calendar month, to give all of us an opportunity of considering the question in all its bearings."

"It might have been settled to-day so far as I am concerned," jerked out Mr. Shortland in his own peculiar manner. "Have both sorts of wine, and so please everybody, or nobody, as the case may be, for some people are never satisfied."

"You have not told us your own views on the subject, brother Ferguson," said Mr. Westcott.

"Until the lady called, and explained her difficulty to me," replied the minister, "I really had no views on the subject at all. I had never given the matter any consideration. I came here to-day a learner, not a teacher, and I have learned much."

"What are your views now, then?" demand-d Mr. Shortland.

"I think we could not do better than to have oth kinds of wine."

"That would divide the table, sir," remarked Ir. Corbould sternly.

"It need not; I could dispense both."

"Suppose you were to make a mistake?" suggested Mr. Shortland, laughing in his hearty way.

"I should trust to both sides to prevent that; either party would desire an exchange."

"Suppose the abstainers did not mind a taste f good port on the sly and by accident?" continued Mr. Shortland, nudging Mr. Westcott, nd looking drolly aside toward Mr. Corbould.

"Brother Shortland," said the gentleman udged, laughing good-temperedly too, "I prer not to be insulted in our vestry meeting."

The adjournment of the meeting being forally agreed to, they closed the assembly by inoking divine guidance and benediction.

(To be continued.)

ANECDOTAL DISCOURSE.

By Major Whittle.

he Lamb of God—A Saloon-keeper's Son—Soldiers' Knapsacks—A Factory Boy—A Wounded Soldier—A French Sceptic and an Arab—A Young Forger and his Unforgiving Father.

ON Sunday, August 29th, Major Whittle, of hicago, the celebrated coadjutor of Mr. oody, commenced meetings at the Tabernacle, otting Hill, London, England, the scene of r. Henry Varley's successful pastorate. The rvice of song was led with sweetness and ower by Mr. and Mrs. McGranahan, whose usical rendering of the Gospel message greatly ded to the interest and usefulness of the meet-gs. Major Whittle selected as his text the ords, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh ay the sin of the world" (John 1 : 29).

"These words," said the preacher, "were oken by St. John, when the people thronged hear him as he baptized in the Jordan. This me Lamb is a singular designation to apply a man. It is still more singular to hear a n called a 'Lamb of God,' and most singular all to hear him called 'the Lamb of God.' To hn, and to those who heard him, the words uld be charged with special meaning. They longed to a nation in the history of which the mb had become the symbol of much that en- ed deeply into all that most vitally concerned eir welfare. Their mothers had told them v, almost at the outset of sacred history, God l respect to Abel because he offered of the tlings of his flock; and the words of John uld be associated in the minds of his hearers h Abel's sacrifice of a lamb. Then, too, y would think of Abraham and Isaac. They uld remember that passge in Genesis 20, when c said, 'Behold the fire and the wood, but re is the lamb for a burnt offering?' In the person of Isaac the whole Jewish nation lay upon that altar. They knew that all this had taken place on Mount Moriah, where the temple was afterward erected, and that, as the lamb took Isaac's place, so Jesus was to take the sinner's place.

"Still further, these hearers of John's knew the story of the Passover, when the destroying angel passed through the land of Egypt, and while death and mourning and woe were in the Egyptian dwellings, peace and gladness and security were in the homes of the Israelites, not because they were better than their neighbors, but because the blood of the Lamb had been shed and sprinkled on the lintel and two side posts of their houses in obedience to the command of God. They knew that they had been delivered from the grinding slavery of Egypt and had become a nation of freemen through the blood of the Passover Lamb.* Perhaps, at the time John spoke, they did not fully know in what a glorious sense Christ was to be to the world all, and infinitely more, than all the Lamb had been to them. But afterwards when the Holy Spirit was given to convince of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment, then they knew how from a bondage ten thousand times worse than that of Egypt they were redeemed by Jesus Christ. Dear friends, the law condemns you. You are utterly undone. But the message to you, as to them, and to all is, 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.'"

"'All the light of sacred story Mantled round that head sublime.'

"Friend, if you are without peace to-night, it is because you don't behold the Lamb and trust in Him. To be saved, you must be satisfied with that which satisfies God. God is infinitely satisfied with the atonement which Jesus has made for the sins of the world. You will have peace when you are satisfied with that all-availing sacrifice too, and not till then.

"IN ST. LOUIS, U.S., THE SON OF A SALOON-KEEPER, or what would be called in this country a public-house-keeper, attended a meeting held by the late Mr. Bliss and myself. The young man was taken ill, and sent for a friend, whom he told how his eyes had been opened to his lost condition, and how he had been saved by looking to Jesus. The youth's father was sent for, and as he stood weeping at the foot of the bed, the youth said to his father, in tones of which no mere words can convey any notion, 'Father, you can be saved; you can be saved. It's the blood that saves, and it can save you.' That youth had got hold of the right thing. Salvaton is provided, but each must accept it for himself.

SOLDIERS AND THEIR KNAPSACKS.

"In our late American war, we were marching in Mississippi State one wet and toilsome day, when the roads were very muddy, and the men fearfully fatigued. To relieve them as much as possible, wagons were sent all down the ranks to take the knapsacks. I remember with what gladness the men flung their knapsacks into the wagons and marched on rejoicing that they had got rid of the load. But if they had neglected to do this, and, through being thus incumbered, had been overcome by the enemy, the whole blame would have fallen on themselves. So with you, my friends. If you will not, at God's bidding, lay down the load of sin, and accept Him who alone can save you, you cannot blame circumstances or God. The fault is entirely your own.

THE EXPIRING FACTORY BOY.

"I saw a factory boy, a while ago, who had just met with a fatal accident. His mother having come into the office of the mill, I asked her if she or the father or any of the kindred of the boy were Christians. She replied, 'No, none of us are Christians.' I then asked her if she had any reason to hope that her boy had gone to heaven. She said she had: for when he was brought home torn and mangled, he kept repeating some words he had learned at school:

"'O, the Lamb, the bleeding Lamb,
The Lamb upon Cavalry;
The Lamb that was slain,
And liveth again,
And intercedes for me.

"Ah! it was a hopeful ground the woman entertained for thinking her son had gone to heaven. See to it that, when you are no more, your friends may have the same consolation. 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world!'

A WOUNDED SOLDIER IN A HOSPITAL.

"I remember the case of a wounded soldier. He was dying in a hospital, and was in trouble for want of spiritual light. One day a letter came from his mother, inclosing a card on which the text was inscribed, 'Him that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out.' In strong and tender terms his mother begged him to accept Christ, adding her own assurance to that of the text on the card that Christ would not cast him out. When the chaplain had read the letter to him, he asked: 'Does mother say so, and does Christ say so?' And realizing that the testimony of his best earthly friend was one with that of Jesus, he rolled his load of sin on the great sin-bearer, and died rejoicing in His pardoning love."

On the following Wednesday Major Whittle preached on "Prepare to meet thy God," Amos 4 : 12, dividing the subject into four heads. First, that there is a God; secondly, that to each one He may be spoken of as thy God; thirdly, that all have to meet God; fourthly, that for this meeting with God, preparation is necessary.

A FRENCH SCEPTIC AND AN ARAB.

Under the first and last heads he related the following two incidents of

A French sceptic, who laughed on one occasion at his Arab attendant, while traversing a desert in the East, for kneeling down to pray to God. "How do you know there is a God?" said the Frenchman. "How did you know yesterday," replied the Arab, "that a camel had passed his way?" "I knew it," said the infidel, "by its footprints in the sand." "Even so," replied the Arab, looking up to the starry sky, "I know there is a God, because I can trace His footsteps and His handiwork there."

A YOUNG FORGER AND HIS UNFORGIVING FATHER.

"A young man in Pennsylvania forged his father's name and ran away. By and by the young man began to be troubled about his conduct, and called to speak with a minister, a friend of his father's, about it. The father had paid the amount for which the paper had been forged, and as the young man seemed truly penitent, the minister took him to his own home. The prodigal became a child of God, and the minister wrote to the father with the news, and added that the young man was dying. No answer being received, a telegram was sent to the father, telling him that if he wished to see his son alive he must come at once. The father simply answered, 'Send his body when he is dead, and I'll pay expenses.' There was repentance on the part of the son, but unwillingness to forgive on the part of the father. But there is no such feeling on the part of God. He is ready to pardon, to bless, to cleanse you, and to give you an inheritance among them that are sanctified. If that father in Pennsylvania had sent a message to the effect that he had not only paid the penalty, but was ready to receive and forgive his son, it would have been making his father a liar for the young man to have said, 'How do I know that I shall be received back? I've only got father's word for it.' But you do infinitely worse than that; you make God a liar when you doubt His testimony concerning His Son as an all-sufficient Saviour. Awake, awake, thou that sleepest! You won't drift into heaven. God arouse every unsaved soul here to-night!"

---

* At this point the speaker referred at some length to the typical sacrifice of the goat in Leviticus 16 and Isaiah 53 7.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter.

The aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to The Manager, Christian Herald, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

SINGLE COPIES

can most conveniently be obtained through newsdealers. Any complaint that the Christian Herald cannot be obtained from a particular newsdealer is promptly attended to if we are given the name and street address of the dealer who does not keep it for sale.

NOTICE.

To give our readers an opportunity of introducing the Christian Herald to their friends, we will send the paper post free to any address from 1st October, to 31st December, 1880, on receipt of 25 cents.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Most Prominent Political Event of the week, in view of the general attention it has attracted, is the publication, in the Cincinnati Gazette, of an interview between General Grant and Rev. C. H. Fowler, D.D., a well known Methodist divine. According to the account, the subject of the conversation was the Presidential contest, and General Grant is reported to have expressed his opinions more freely and copiously than is usual with him. He spoke in unfavorable terms of General Hancock's capacity as an administrator, and charged him with having, some years ago, been the tool of a corrupt gang of speculators in Louisiana. General Grant is also reported to have mentioned the reasons which would have led him to accept the Republican nomination had it been offered him, among which was the one that he believed he "could have induced, from his knowledge of our consulates, the enactment of certain laws touching our commerce that would have given us control of much desirable commerce."

General Hancock wisely decided to make no answer to these charges until he had learned from General Grant himself whether he had been correctly reported. But as some portion of the indictment is capable of being tested by facts, we may expect that an authoritative reply will be issued. We may also hope that the valuable knowledge General Grant has acquired relative to our foreign trade will, whoever may be elected, be communicated to Congress, where it will probably command as much respect as if it were contained in a Presidential message.

Ex-Governor Horatio Seymour was Welcomed, at Chickering Hall, New York, on Friday, October 8th, by one of the most enthusiastic audiences the city has seen for many years. So great was the desire to listen to the distinguished statesmen that in one case twenty-five dollars were offered for two seats. Mr. Seymour's speech was principally devoted to replying to the address delivered by Senator Conkling in the Academy of Music, on September 17th. The questions of State rights and the national finances were dealt with from the Democratic point of view; and the Democratic principles in these matters were forcibly and eloquently enunciated. Mr. Seymour concluded with a warm eulogium of General Hancock, and confidently predicted his election.

There are Several Claimants for the Honor of carrying the State of Maine. General Neal Dow, in a speech delivered in New York, on Sunday, October 3d, made the assertion that the late defeat of the Republicans in Maine was caused by the vote of the temperance men in that State, who were much dissatisfied with the action of the Republican party the past year. The successful candidate in Maine has already received the congratulations of the respective chiefs of the Democratic and Greenback parties, and now the Prohibition chief claims a share in the credit.

Dr. W. A. Hallock, the Efficient Secretary of the American Tract Society, died on Saturday, October 1st. He was born at Plainfield, Mass., in 1794. His father, the Rev. Moses Hallock, was for forty-five years pastor of a church there, and he also superintended the education of a large number of young men. William Cullen Bryant was one of these, and there formed an intimacy with Dr. Hallock which lasted until death separated them. After leaving his father's school, William Hallock entered Andover Theological Seminary, where he graduated in 1822. After spending two years in Boston he came to New York and exerted himself in founding the American Tract Society, in 1825, of which he was the first secretary, and with which his whole subsequent life has been identified. The record of Dr. Hallock's fifty-eight years' labor is astonishing. It comprised the entire correspondence of the publishing and foreign departments of the Society, and the direction of its manufacturing operations. Besides this, he found time to edit four thousand distinct works, of which 881 were volumes. He was the author of several tracts, the aggregate circulation of which was 1,400,000 copies. Of the tract entitled "The Mountain Miller," 260,000 copies were circulated, and of "Mother's Last Prayer," 431,000 copies.

An Interesting Feature of the Presbyterian Council at Philadelphia, was the visit of M. Reveillaud on Friday, October 1st. He is a distinguished French citizen, a lawyer, author, and journalist, and his remarkable conversion a short time ago caused a sensation in France. He delivered an address to the Council in French, which was translated by Mr. Dodds, a young Scottish minister and the able coadjutor of Mr. McAll in the mission work in Paris. After giving an interesting sketch of the condition of Protestantism in France, the speaker added in English, "Brethren, God bless this country and the advancement of His kingdom during the alliance of France and America."

Rugby, the New English Colony in Tennessee, was formally dedicated by an impressive religious ceremony on October 5th. The services were conducted by Bishop Quintard, of Tennessee, and Rev. H. H. Sneed, of Chattanooga. Mr. Thomas Hughes, the founder of the colony, delivered, at the close of the service, an address explanatory of the scheme. He expressed his hope that the effort would develop, as its promoters intended, in the form of a community. His idea of a community was that of men who had something in common — a bond binding all together. As elements of that bond, Mr. Hughes referred to the beautiful scene in which the colony was located in which all had a common interest; the common commissariat, which is to be worked on co-operative principles and takes the place of stores; and the church in course of erection, in which it is hoped all denominations of Christians will be able to worship.

"Our aim and hope," said Mr. Hughes, "are to plant on these highlands a community of gentlemen and ladies; not that artificial class which goes by those grand names, both in Europe and here, the joint product of feudalism and wealth, but a society in which the humblest members, who live by the labor of their own hands, will be of such strain and culture that they shall be able to meet princes in the gate without embarrassment and without self-assertion, should any such strange persons ever present themselves before the gate tower of Rugby in the New World."

It is gratifying to learn that the commissariat will not supply its customers with intoxicating liquors. The general feeling of the new settlers is in favor of total abstinence, and if any one wants intoxicants they will have to import for themselves.

A Bootblacks' Lodging House has been Established in New York, by Miss Catharine L. Wolfe, with the object of providing the friendless boys with a comfortable home, and encouraging steady and provident habits. The house contains a gymnasium, wash-rooms, and a room in which is a novel arrangement by which the wet clothing of the boys can be dried in ten minutes, all in the basement. On the ground floor are the kitchen, dining-room, school-room for little children gathered out of the streets, nursery, etc. On the second floor is a large room where the boys can spend their evenings, the superintendent's room, and a conservatory. The third and fourth stories contain dormitories for one hundred and fifty boys. The boys pay five cents a night for all privileges. A savings bank is connected with the house. Efforts to ameliorate the condition of the poor boys are worthy of all praise, for they belong to the category of preventive measures, and may tend, with the blessing of God, to make, respectable citizens of some who might otherwise become criminals (Luke 11 : 14.)

A Minister Shot by a Hen.—An Extraordinary occurrence took place at Stamford, Ky., last week. The Rev. M. Petrey was holding special services at Rock Castle, and as the evening meeting was not closed until a late hour, he accepted an invitation to spend the night at the house of a friend. He had just seated himself when a hen flew into the room and tried to alight on a rifle that hung on the wall. The weapon tipped over, and, falling on the lock, was discharged, the ball taking effect in the thigh of the preacher, causing lockjaw, from which he died on October 5th.

Tales of the Grog-Shops.—We Have Made arrangements for the publication under the above title of a series of thrilling narratives from the pen of a London clergyman. His parish is situated in a district of the city where the liquor traffic is doing an enormous amount of evil, and he has only too abundant opportunities in the course of his ministerial labor for observing the ruin it works in the home and in the shop. Each narrative will be complete in itself, and will be published in two chapters. The publication will commence in our next number.

The Bible and Prayer Union.--The Following requests for prayer have been received:

From the pastor of a church in Massachusetts. The town and church are overrun by Spiritualism, and opposition to an honest declaration of the Gospel is rife in the city. The pastor asks the prayers of the readers of The Christian Herald that God may deliver in the approaching crisis.

From a lady in Brooklyn suffering from spinal disease, who has on two previous occasions experienced the healing power of faith and prayer, but whose faith is now weakened through manifold temptations. Prayer is asked that her faith may be strengthened.

From a Christian father in Boston, Mass., for the conversion of his son, for whom he has been praying for thirty years. A young man of good abilities, well educated, but not yet a child of God.

The command of God that we pray one for another (James 5 : 16), and the assurance that God will supply all your need (Phil. 4 : 19), will not be forgotten by our readers, who will, we are sure, sympathize with the above requests and unite in prayer with those who make them. The Union reading lessons for the ensuing week are: Friday, October 15th, Psa. 74; Saturday, Psa. 75; Sunday, Psa. 76; Monday, Psa. 77; Tuesday, Psa. 78; Wednesday, Psa. 79, Thursday, Psa. 80.

Degrees of Resignation.—Mrs. Rodgers, a scholar in the Sabbath-school of Salem Chapel, Spring Street, New York, an elderly woman, died many years ago of a painful disease; her sufferings were very great—almost beyond human endurance, and they were continued till she was reduced to a mere skeleton. One day a teacher was visiting her, and she said to him, "If it is the Lord's will to make me better, I can say Amen; if it is His will to take me to Himself, I can also say Amen." "But," said the teacher, "if it be the Lord's will to continue you as you are, how will you feel then?" After a pause she said "Well, I think I could say Amen to that too." David's answer when God gave him a choice of evils was a memorable one (2 Sam. 24 : 14). But greater grace is shown in submitting cheerfully to the will of God when there is no choice, as our Saviour did (Matt. 26 : 39).

Another Notable Character in the same church was John Berry, one of the best men, who, though poor, old, and feeble, was always [illegible] and cheerful. When at last the Lord began to take the frail earthly tabernacle down, it was a great privilege to visit his sick-chamber. In the cheery look and the confident expectation of the heavenly inheritance, one forgot the wretchedness of the room and the poverty of the man, and could only think of him as a prince in disguise, waiting for a kingdom. On one occasion, pointing to his feet, he said, "See how these are swollen; but it is little matter, for I will leave them behind me: they will not be wanted over there." On the last day of his life, a beautiful Sabbath morning, lying on his pallet of straw, as he tried to look through the little window of his attic, the only one in the room, he said to his wife, with the greatest enthusiasm, "Oh, what a beautiful day on which to cross the river!" "So he passed over (as John Bunyan says), and all the trumpets sounded for him on the other side."

Fifty Miles for a Testament.—Mr. J. S. Pierson, the agent of the New York Bible Society, states in the columns of a contemporary a remarkable instance of a desire for scriptural knowledge inciting to extraordinary exertion. He was summoned one day to his office, and there stood a stalwart young German, dripping wet, waiting at his door. While working on a farm at Tarrytown he had seen a German Testament, which had been given to the owner on his voyage to this country; and noting the address of the Society on the label inside, he had taken the first rainy day to come to the city to get one for himself. He had started at four o'clock in the morning, and had walked the twenty-five miles in about seven hours. When Mr. Pierson learned the facts he gladly gave him a Bible instead of a Testament. The delight of the young German was great. He placed the treasure in the dryest spot, and buttoning his jacket over it, prepared to start off on his return journey with a light heart. There is ground for hope that the Word of God so obtained will be a blessing to the young man. One who would walk fifty miles in the wet to get a Bible is likely to study it now he has it.

A Remarkable Instance of Faith-cure was that of a lady from Augusta, who described it at the Old Orchard Convention at which Dr. Cullis presided. She had been a sufferer from two distressing maladies. A sunstroke had affected the brain, and her limbs were racked by rheumatism. So severe had the latter affliction been, that the knuckles of her hands were swollen and distorted to such an extent as to render them almost useless. After attending the Convention of 1879 she determined to commit herself to the Lord entirely. Dr. Cullis prayed with her, and their united supplications were answered. A sudden thrill passed through her body, and she was healed. It is now nearly a year ago, and there has been no return of either trouble.

A still more remarkable instance occurred to the same lady, which she also related. As she was entering her daughter's house recently she stumbled and fell, spraining her foot severely. She declined all medical aid and resorted to prayer. The same result followed; the pain subsided, and in a short time the discoloration and swelling disappeared.

A Dutch Minister from Passaic, N. J., gave testimony at the same meeting of a similar incident in his own experience. He had suffered from a dangerous affection of the lungs brought on by imprudent exposure to the night air during his voyage to America in 1868. Violent coughing shook his frame, his appetite fell off, and he became so weak that even the slight exertion of walking was too great for him. His life was now, according to medical diagnosis, in imminent danger, and his desire for ministerial work seemed hopeless. In this strait he prayed earnestly to Him "who healeth all thy diseases" (Psa. 103 : 3), and recovered. "I got well right off," said the minister; "the Lord cured me."

"Faithful unto Death" would be an Appropriate epitaph for a dog who was killed recently by a train. The engineer saw him barking furiously right on the line of rails as the fast train approached a village, and he blew his whistle to frighten him off. But the dog only crouched down and barked more loudly. The engineer was not disposed to stop for a dog, and passed on, the engine killing him on the spot. But a piece of white muslin was observed clinging to the wheel, and then the train was stopped. On returning to the spot where the dog had crouched, it was found that a child had been lying there who had been killed with the dog. It is supposed that the faithful creature was unable to drag the child out of danger, and had preferred to die rather than desert his post. Such fidelity is very touching and beautiful, and teaches a lesson to Christians. If a dog is capable of attachment stronger than love of life, what should be our fidelity to the Saviour who died for us? Yet slighter things than fear of death often make us unfaithful to Him. Worldy pleasures, or the prospect of worldly gain, are frequently sufficient to produce that deplorable result.

Two Promises were Made but not Kept by a young lady in Philadelphia two weeks ago. She was at one of the meetings of the Salvation Army at Twelfth Avenue, and was much impressed. She was entreated to accept Christ without delay, but she said, "Not to-night, for I have promised a friend to go to a ball on Wednesday night." She said she ought to do it now, but would another night. The other night never came, and she did not go to the ball either, for before the time arrived she fell down at her mother's door suddenly and died, without a hope of heaven. Worldly pleasures were preferred to eternal salvation, with a fearful result. Probably the young lady believed, as many do, that she might eventually have both, but she lost both. How many spend their days in mirth, and in a moment go down to the grave (Job 21 : 13)!

A Spider's Satanic Craft.—Far-sighted Cunning is a well-known characteristic of spiders and a remarkable instance of this trait in their character is described by a thoughtful correspondent who detected in it a type of the devices of the great enemy of souls. He noticed a dish of honey lying uncovered, and presently saw a spider commence spinning over it one of those delicate cobwebs so fatal to his prey. In a short time the operation was complete, and no fly could reach the honey but by passing through the web. Satan's tactics are identical with those of the spider. He too spreads his snare over the sweets of life. Worldly pleasures attract the young, and there Satan sets his trap; he knows that in the rugged path of industry his success will be smaller, and while he tempts those who tread it he catches and ruins a far larger number in the meshes woven at the doors of the theatre and the saloon.

The Second Volume of The Christian Herald, comprising Nos. 37 to 62 (July to Dec., 1879), may be procured, elegantly bound in cloth, at this office. Price $1.75.

RARE FRUIT.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"I create the fruit of the lips; Peace, peace."—ISAIAH 57: 19.

An Unrenewed Tongue worse than an Unregenerate Heart—A Threefold Fruit of the Lips—Thanksgiving, Prayer, and Testimony—Peace a Renowned Topic—I. The Cry of the Awakened—A Variety of Prescriptions—II. The Answer of the Saviour—The Sight of Christ Dying for Sin—Risen from the Dead—Triumphant in Heaven—A Crimean Soldier's Death—A Wounded Methodist Soldier—Benjamin Franklin's Dictum—The War with Bonaparte—What the word "Peace" Implied—III. The Motto of every Believer—In the Church—In the Family—In the World.

"THE fruit of the lips!" The lips are neither trees of the orchard nor herbs of the garden. What fruit can they bear? The scattering of Babel came of human speech when languages were multipled, and the united race split up into fragments. Wars and fightings, and hatred and bloodshed have sprung of talk and bluster; these are deadly fruits, the very mention of which brings pain to the heart—surely it is in vain to look for much that is worth gathering to mouths and tongues. Great talkers are proverbially little doers, and the more talk the less work. We may come for years looking for fruit on this fig-tree and find none. "Nothing but leaves" will be gathered by those who look to the lips for a harvest to fill the barn. This is most true.

If you let the lips alone they produce mischief and trouble, and not much else. An unrenewed tongue is worse almost than an unregenerate heart, because bad as the heart may be there is heart in it; the tongue is often heartless, a mere sounding sham with no reality to support its brazen noise. Too many speak with the lips, and their heart is not in what they say. If the lips become the instruments of hypocrisy, and if the fruit of the lips be only the fruit of the lips, it is comparable to the apples of Sodom. The lips, moreover, cause pain and evil all around, which the heart alone cannot do. The heart is as an oven closed up; the tongue is a fire raging abroad, setting on flame the course of nature when it is itself set on fire of hell. The lips of the wicked are like the upas tree, which drips poison.

We could readily dispense with the fruit of the lips as it comes from uncircumcised and unclean lips. Go out and gather a basketful of the fruit of the lips—gossiping, bickering, fault-finding, murmuring, nonsense, vanity, falsehood, boasting, infidelity. I will not tell you all that I might put into that basket. Certainly if it were to be shred and poured out into the broth of daily life, we should soon have to say, as they did who threw the wild cucumber into the pottage, "O thou man of God, there is death in the pot." The fruit of the lips tendeth to vanity, to poverty, to sorrow, to shame, to death. The fruit of the lips is just what the root of an unrenewed, unregenerate heart causes it to be.

You know Æsop, and how wisely he kept his master's command when he bade him provide for dinner the best things he could, and when they came together he set out tongues—nothing else but tongues. His master was pleased with his wit, though I am afraid the guests did not relish it, and he ordered him the next time to provide for dinner the worst things he possibly could. Tongues again—nothing else but tongues! Truly Æsop was wise there, for the fruit of the lips is sometimes the best thing in the world, and sometimes the worst thing in the world; it is a blessing and a curse, according to the man whose tongue speaketh.

The fruit of the lips may be compared to Jeremiah's figs—the good, very good, but the bad, exceeding bad, exceeding naughty figs, that cannot be eaten. Fruit of the lips, what shall I say about thee? It might seem that the less we said the better, lest in our case also the fruit of the lips should add to the useless heap.

Our text tells us that God creates the fruit of the lips; but this must be understood, of course, with a reservation. He does not create the fruit of the lips as we commonly see it, but the good fruit, the true fruit, the fruit worth gathering, that which should be the fruit of the lips—of this God is the Creator. Because the natural fruit is so evil it needs the Creator again to step in and make us new creatures, and our fruit new also, or else it will remain so bad that the verdict upon it must be, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity."

And what is that fruit which the Creator produces from a source which is naturally so barren? First of all, it is the sacrifice of thanksgiving—"the fruit of our lips giving thanks to His name" (Heb. 13:15). The fruit of the lips which God creates should be, above all things, praise. We ought to delight to praise God; it should be our element, our occupation, our recreation, our very life.

Another fruit of the lips should never be forgotten, and that is prayer. This should be the fruit of renewed manhood at every age; the lips of little children can compass prayer, and the mouth of the aged may not fail to utter it. This is a God-created fruit; he that abounds in it is as a vine which God has blessed. Woe unto the mouth which is silent at the mercy-seat, for it will one day be dumb at the judgment-seat! Those lips are cursed that never pray. Those lips shall blister with unutterable pain that never pray. "Behold, he prayeth," is an absolutely necessary sign of the possession of grace in the heart.

Furthermore, when there is prayer and praise in us, another fruit of the lip is testimony. Do you produce this, dear friends? Has God created it from your lips? It is the bearing witness to others of what God can do, because you have received it in your own experience. God blesses us on purpose that we may tell other poor souls how He can bless the sons of men; and yet there are Christians—at least I hope they are Christians—who appear to have received great mercy from God, but they keep the matter hidden. Oh! be not such, I pray you. If you have good tidings in your heart, bring forth the fruit of the lip and tell it. Thus much about the threefold fruit of the lips.

Now there is one renowned topic upon which the lips ought always to be able to speak, and that blessed subject is summed up in the two words of my text, "Peace, peace." "I create the fruit of the lips; peace, peace." The lips ought to be occupied with the subject of peace; this should be their breath: as Saul breathed out threatenings, so should we breathe out peace, and yet again peace, a double peace from our two lips. From the mouth of truth should come kisses of peace, words of peace, the breath of peace. This is the best lip-salve—"Peace, peace.

I. We shall employ these words in four ways, and we shall commence by using them as

THE CRY OF THE AWAKENED.

When men are awakened by the grace of God into a consciousness of their true condition they find themselves at war with God and at war with their own consciences, and consequently they begin to cry, "Peace, peace," longing eagerly to end the dreadful conflict in which they find themselves engaged. While a man is dead in trespasses and sins, where nature left him, and where the devil keeps him, he has a deadly calm of mind. He is not troubled; he has no bonds in his death, should he die, and none in his life while he is drunken with sin. He is like a brute beast, looking no further than to the pasture in which he feeds; he lives for the present, and as long as his bodily wants are satisfied he is content.

When the Spirit of God arouses in him thoughts about higher things, the whole matter is changed; he thinks of God, and laments that he has forgotten his Maker. He thinks of that Maker's law, and perceives that he has constantly broken it: indeed, he has never regarded it, but treated it as a thing of nought. He thinks of death, and he says, "I must die, but I am unprepared." He thinks of eternity, of that other world, that lasting world beyond time, that world where we must dwell forever, and he cries, "Where shall I dwell, and where will my portion be?"

Very likely a worldling comes along and says, "You are melancholy. Do not give way to such low spirits. I count it one of the wisest things to drive dull care away. Come with me where they make merry." He goes; but, somehow or other, he sees that all the gold is gilt, and all the finery is flimsy, and that there is nothing in the mirth. The sport is tame and dull to him, and he himself is duller than ever. He does not enjoy what once was the delight of his eyes; he comes away, and when they ask him to visit their haunts again he says, "No, no. My heart seems heavier there than when I am alone." "As vinegar upon nitre, so is he that singeth songs to a sad heart." There is no suitability in worldly merrymaking to ease a tortured spirit. The awakened sinner cries, "Peace, peace. Oh, that I had peace!"

Then there visits him one who knowingly whispers, "You need not disturb yourself. These things are not so. Do you not know that these are all bugbears of a past generation? We men of modern thought have made great discoveries, and changed all the fears of our benighted ancestors into

A BRAVE UNBELIEF.

You can live at ease. Do not fret yourself about heaven, or hell, or eternity. Vain are these stale scepticisms; the man is too much in earnest to be drugged with such soporifics. Boastful unbelief has small power over an agonized soul. God himself has convinced this man of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment, and though he tries to disbelieve he cannot. Conviction haunts him, follows him into his chamber, robs him of his rest, and he cries, "I fain would be an unbeliever if I could, but I cannot. Oh, that I had peace! Oh, that I had peace!"

Mr. Worldly Wiseman calls upon him, with his friend Dr. Legality and his assistant-surgeon Mr. Civility, and these try their Balm of Conceit, and Plaister of Natural Goodness. Dr. Legality finds his patient disturbed with the threatenings of the Gospel and the doctrines of Holy Writ, and he says, "These things are quite true, but you need not worry, because you have not been so bad as a great many, and if it goes hard with you it will go very hard with the most of people. You are all right, for you have been honest, obliging, generous, and religious."

Ay, but if God has been dealing with this man, he will say, "But I am not all right. I feel that I deserve the wrath of God, and that goodness is not in me. You may think it is so, but I know myself, and I have looked into my heart, and I find all manner of evil there. Oh, that I had peace! Oh, that I had peace!" Self-righteousness is too short a bed for an awakened sinner to stretch himself thereon, neither can flatterers cajole him into a peace based upon forgetfulness of the divine law.

Then comes the priest, and he exclaims, "Come with us, and undergo ceremonies, and take sacraments, and we will ease you of your burden." Perhaps the poor man tries this, but though he tries it he finds no rest whatever. No, the leprosy lies deep within, and no outward form can cleanse away the deep-seated pollution. The burden presses on his heart, and therefore no manipulation of outward rites can remove the heavy load from him. His cry is, "Peace, peace, peace, peace! Oh, that I could get it! Oh, that I could get it! I would search through earth, and sea, and air, and hell itself, if I might find it, and bless the grave if it would give it me."

Dear heart, I sympathize with you. I remember when I would have gone to the utmost verge of this green earth if I could have found peace. I tell you, racks and tortures I would have boldly endured; prison-houses and dungeons I would have bravely entered, and battle and death I would have gladly encountered, if I could have found peace for my accusing conscience; bu found none. I was like that serpent which said to sting itself to death. "My thought as George Herbert says, "were all a case knives." Every motion of my mind seemed drive a dagger into my heart. A volcano h burst up within my soul, and the burning la of despair flowed over all.

II. Secondly, our theme is much more che ful when we see that this is

THE ANSWER OF THE SAVIOUR.

It is the fruit of the Saviour's lips, whose are as lilies, dropping sweet-smelling myrrh.
is he that comes to the soul and says, "Pe peace." Oh, did you ever see Him as dying sin? If you have never seen Him with the of faith you do not know what peace mea
After this fashion He shows Himself. He lo upon the sinner, troubled and tossed to and and He says, "What aileth thee?" "My si says the sinner, "has utterly condemned m
"Dost thou not know that I bore it eight hundred years ago, and more, in my own b on the tree?" "Yes, Lord, I have heard thou didst something of the kind, but didst t bear it so that I need not bear it?"

Then the Redeemer shows that He bore burden of guilt effectually and carried it a into the land of forgetfulness; and, moreo
He makes clear the truth that if He took our it can never be laid on us, for it is not consis with the Father's justice first to punish the S stitute for sin and then to punish the offe also.

"But," says the heart, "My Lord, I k that thou didst die. I see thy wounds, I m thy open side; but tell me, didst thou die fo in particular?" "Wilt thou trust me, s Wilt thou trust me wholly?" "Ah! that I my Lord." "Then I bore thy sin. I was ished in thy stead. Thy iniquity has cease be. Thy sins I have cast into the depths o sea. Thy transgression shall never be menti against thee any more forever. Go, and si more. Peace, peace!"

What can break a peace like this? Why
I fret about sin which is hurled into obliv
Why should I despair because of my guilt, reckon myself condemned? I am not demned, for Jesus was condemned for me—He in whom my spirit fixes all her trust. He my debts and discharged my liability to jus and therefore my soul is clear.

> "O thou who didst thy glory leave > Apostate sinners to retrieve
> From nature's deadly fall,
> Me thou hast purchased with a price,
> Nor shall my crimes in judgment rise,
> For thou hast borne them all."

But did you ever see Christ as He is risen
the dead? Here is another vision of con tion, another fount of peace. The poor lies prostrate at the Saviour's feet and crie see thee, my Lord; I see how thou has away my sin, and I am at peace; but, al am a poor fool, and shall sin again, and I a wayward, wandering heart that will so away over the mountains leaping into sin a How can I hope to enter heaven?" To the Lord Jesus replies most sweetly, "Dost not know that I am risen from the dead?
He that liveth, though once I died for sin.

Do you know the peace which the res tion of the Lord Jesus brings into the spirit
so, you find rich fruit hanging upon Jesus'
He who knows the virtue of the living Lo once concludes that the future is as safe a past. The slain Saviour has slain our pas and the living Saviour lives to take care eternal life, and to bring us to God's right at the last. See how Jesus says, "Peace, peace! All is well."

Did you ever see Jesus as He sits there phant at the Lord God's right hand? I hop have; because a poor, tried spirit is g comforted by that sight. The downcast o claims, "My Lord, I know thou wilt tak of me here, for I perceive that thou livest t vide for me; but I shall have to die, and shall I then do? My Lord, I am afraid to die. It is grim work—dying. It is a path I never trod before. What shall I do in the swellings of Jordan?"

Jesus answers such fears in His own sweet fashion by saying, " Dost thou not know that I am risen from the dead, and that I have gone into the glory to prepare a place for thee? I will come to thee at the last, and I will take thy spirit away to dwell with me forever. Thou needest not fear to die, for he that liveth and believeth in me shall never die. He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live. I will help thee. Death shall be no death to thee. I will catch thy soul away and thou shalt never know it till thou seest me face to face." Does not this breathe " Peace, peace, peace?"

> " Sure the last end
> Of the good man is peace. How calm his exit!
> Night dews fall not more calmly on the ground,
> Nor weary worn-out winds expire so soft."

If I were to go on picturing our glorious Lord esus Christ in any and all of His relationships o us, we should in each case hear Him say, ' Peace, peace."

A SOLDIER IN THE CRIMEAN WAR, s he lay dying, was visited by a worthy mis-ionary. The young man asked his visitor to ead a chapter to him, and the chapter chosen as John 14. When he came to this verse, Peace I leave with you," the soldier was almost in the article of death, but he said to the eader, " Sir, that is the peace which I enjoy. I ave had it for years." " Peace I leave with ou." " Now," he said, " if I have known this eace—and I have had it for years—I shall not se it now, but shall die triumphantly." And he did.

Can you, my hearer, say to-night that you ave that peace? If you have it now you shall ave it in your dying hour. Could you say what r. Watts said to his host, Sir Thomas Abney? e said, " Sir Thomas, I thank God that for any a month I have been able to say, ' It is a atter of perfect indifference to me when I fall leep at night whether I wake up in this world in another.' "

I well remember reading the old story of a ethodist who was pressed into the army some ty or sixty years ago, who had his leg carried ay in battle, and lay bleeding on the ground. hen they carried him off the field he said, " I as happy as a man can be while out of aven." They said he was mad. O for more such glorious madness! To be able to say en your limb is shot away, and you are bleeding away your life, " I am as happy as a man can out of heaven," why, there is something in t surely! This must be the finger of God. ere else can such triumph over pain and akness be found?

III. Thirdly, I am going to use these words as

THE SONG OF THE TRUE BELIEVER.

Ie who has really seen Christ, and placed his st in Him, can now sing, " Peace, peace, ce." What a thrice accursed thing is war! elieve with Benjamin Franklin that there er was a good war, and that there never was ad peace. War is unmitigated mischief from to end, and peace is a thing to rejoice at, e it in whatever light you will. Killing and ing, devastating and burning, are sport for ds, and for fiends alone. True men, if once ed to battle, are the last persons who would tly enter upon it again. It is an awful and ible thing.

recollect reading that when the last great was over—I mean the great war of all, in h we were so long engaged with the Bona-es—news of the peace came to a certain n. It was only gently whispered that there peace, but it was all over the town in a few utes. Everybody ran through the streets. d had been sent up to an awful price by the and everybody was weary with the taxes, slaughter of soldiers, and the perpetual fear vasion. A man ran down the street shouting, " Peace, peace, peace, peace," and everybody was glad.

Now if peace be so precious as to temporal things, it is equally precious as to eternal things; and if a man has once seen Jesus Christ, it is the joy of his life to sing, " Peace, peace." Here stands the reconciled man, and he looks up to heaven through the pure blue air, past yon stars, endless leagues beyond imagination's utmost stretch; he looks up, and his mind conceives of God, and his heart feels, " I am at peace with Him. Though He be a consuming fire, I am at peace with Him. With the Great Father I am at peace. Though it is very tempestuous round about Him, yet I am at peace with Him. I am at peace with the eternal Son; though He shall break His enemies with a rod of iron, He will never break me; I am at peace with Him. I am at peace with the Holy Ghost, for though to blaspheme Him is death without hope or mercy, yet I am at peace with Him; He will never destroy me."

What a peace is this!—peace with God, the peace of God, perfect peace. Having this peace, every angel is my friend, every cherub is my guardian; and all the hosts in glittering ranks above, of spirits angelic and unfallen, and of spirits human, saved and washed in the blood, are all my friends, for I have peace with the armies of heaven if I have peace with the Lord of hosts. How delightful to look all around you and to feel confident that Providence is on your side! The wheels are stupendous, and the results that come of their revolution are mysterious and terrible; but let the wheels revolve; they cannot hurt a child of God. All things work together for good to them that love God, to them that are the called according to His purpose.

IV. I close by using my text in a fourth way, practically, by saying that this should be

THE MOTTO OF EVERY BELIEVER.

It has been his song for himself—now let it be his motto in dealing with other people. This should be his spirit and desire in the church— " Peace, peace." I thank God that we have enjoyed peace as a church these many years, but I have known certain churches where peace would be a novelty—a novelty which I recommend them to try. Some little churches seem to think that they must have an angry discussion every month, or else they are living beneath their Gospel privileges. This leads to heart-burnings and promotes splits and divisions, and these are as frequent among them as fights at an Irish wake. They want a new minister every now and then, for they consider their want of prosperity to be the minister's fault; and then they want a fresh set of deacons, for the evil is thought to be the deacons' fault. By and by they discover that some leading man, or, what is worse, some leading woman, is at the bottom of the evil, and they must get rid of him or her, and then all will go right; and they practise the process of dismemberment, cutting off one part of the body, and then another, till they think the smaller they become the better they will be.

What a mistake! Do they think to find peace by breaking into pieces? The more Christians are divided the more they can subdivide, and the smaller the sect the more prepared is it for another schism. Brethren, whenever you fall a quarrelling I shall know that the Spirit of God has gone from you. Hitherto we have put up with one another very well, by God's grace, and I hope we shall continue to do so. I do not suppose you ever thought that I was perfect; if you did, you did not know much about me. I knew very well that you were not perfect. I never flattered you from the very beginning, and therefore I am not disappointed in you. We have gone on wonderfully well with each other, considering how imperfect we are; and I trust that the grace of God, which has kept so large a multitude together in love and peace, will continue to do it, to His own glory.

We should labor to carry out the same quiet spirit in the family. When you get home do not change " Peace, peace" into scolding and nagging. " If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men." The apostle says, " If it be possible," because he knew that it would be a very difficult thing always to be peaceable with everybody, for some people are so unreasonable that they are never at peace till they are at war, and never quiet till they are making a disturbance. Be it ours under great provocation still to cry, " Peace, peace."

They will most surely conquer who can most completely submit, for in this world he that would be greatest must be least, and he that can stoop the lowest shall rise the highest. I do not think there is much in a heritage worth fighting for compared with brotherly unity. Family peace and love are worth more than a disputed will can ever yield.

THE GAME OF QUARRELLING

is not worth the candle. When I have had to compose family differences I have usually found that the misunderstanding began about nothing, and went on about nothing; and yet the mischief done is frequently terrible.

When I have to make peace, I like to have some real injury, injustice, or wrong to deal with; something that I can handle, judge, and condemn; but an invisible, misty, indefinable suspicion is hard to overcome. When there is nothing in the squabble, peace-making is difficult work. There is a great tingle-tangle over nothing. You cannot get at it. It is a sort of stinging jelly-fish, which you feel but cannot grasp. Loving bonds are broken, and there is ill-blood between Christian men and Christian women who ought to love one another, and all about—about—nothing! Now, you Christian people, go about with this as your pass-word— " Peace, peace, peace, peace." This will quiet the worst termagant of a wife that ever wearied a man—peace, peace. This will sober the most outrageous husband that ever tried a woman—peace, peace. Cultivate peace in the home garden whatever you do elsewhere.

When peace reigns in your own family, go into the world with the same watchword—" Peace, peace." Do not set dogs by the ears, but tame lions and tigers. Compose differences, and make people friends. If certain persons were dropped into the garden of Eden, they would be the serpent in it; but there are others who, if you were to set them down in a village distracted with strife and contention, they would be lumps of love to sweeten every bitterness. Try and be just such.

What a difference there will be when this is taken up among all Christian sects—when there shall be no more envying and strife between this denomination and that, but each one shall be saying in Christ's name, " We are brethren—peace, peace." How silly it is for one clique of good people to be setting up Mr. So-and-so as " the greatest preacher that ever lived." How idle for others to reply, " No, he is not. So-and-so preaches better." Let all this be silenced while we cry " Peace, peace." None of us who are ministers preach as well as we ought to do, and none of you who are hearers live as you ought to live. When you hear anything like crying up of such poor mortals as we are, cry " Peace, peace" to such nonsense! We are all servants of one Master; and may the Lord make us all better servants!

May the day come when, all the world over, there shall be peace. Let us wish " Peace, peace" to all of woman born. May this blessed word be rung out as a clarion note beneath these heavens till men shall recognize that they make one family, and God is the one great Father. Ye nations, learn war no more! " Peace, peace, peace." Catch the words, ye winds, and waft them—" Peace, peace, peace." Hear the words, ye stars, and shine them out to-night—" Peace, peace." Rise up, O sun, in the morning, and over all rejoicing lands pour forth, with thy light and warmth, peace and quietness! May peace be with you, my brethren, henceforth and forever. Amen and amen.

[PORTIONS OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—
Isaiah 57 : 15-21 ; 58 : 1-12.]

THE LABORER WHO BECAME A RAILROAD CONTRACTOR.

Ryan's Conscientious Conduct Offends his Unprincipled Mates—They Resolve to "Strike" if he is not Dismissed—His Employers Determine to Keep him, and Improve his Position—Becomes a Partner.

It was close upon the hour of twelve, noon. Scattered over a large building in course of erection were a number of workmen—carpenters, masons, and bricklayers—most of whom kept their ears upon the stretch in expectation of the bell ringing to proclaim the dinner-hour. Hard by was the river, where a barge was moored, and laborers bringing planks from it to the building, with the regular step characteristic of all work with method in it.

The laborers numbered about twenty in all, and they were headed by one who filled the post of "runner," that is, a man who regulated the movements of the rest by leading the way to and from the works. The man employed for the office in this case was one Robert Ryan, a steady, earnest, sober man. Ryan was only a laborer, and it was as much as he could do to read good print, and write his name occasionally when it was required; but he was a man with a strong sense of what was right and wrong, and with a decided leaning toward the right. It was this feeling which prompted him to abandon drink and join the temperance society. "I may like beer," he said, "and I may like loafing about in a public-house with my mates; but it is not right for me to do so when my wife and child must be the sufferers." So he gave up drink, fought out, by Divine assistance, the fight with temptation until he conquered, and then settled down, a sober, happy man.

Such a man could not long pass unnoticed, and Ryan was soon selected from the mass of laborers and appointed to the post of "runner," for which he obtained an extra sixpence a day. Mr. Collins, his master, would have done something more for him, but Ryan's education was very defective, and the post of foreman was for the present out of the question.

The laborers were marching from the barge, each with a plank upon his shoulder, when the bell suddenly rang. The man next to Ryan, named Morgan, immediately threw down his plank, but Ryan walked steadily on.

"Hold hard, Ryan," cried the third man; "did you hear the bell?"

"I heard," said Ryan; "but we have only a step or two to go; why pitch the stuff about in the mud in that way?"

The man who had thrown down his plank took it up with a surly air, and fell into the ranks again. Ryan walked to the building, put his burden on the top of the pile, and the rest, more or less sulky, followed his example.

From that time Ryan became a marked man; the men followed him as of old, but they did all they could to annoy him. He was a powerful man, and could easily have beaten any one of his assailants; but he steadily refused to fight, and bade them go home and think, and then return to their work wiser men.

After a time Ryan's patience bore fruit, and many of the men ceased to annoy him; but Morgan, with the rancor of a little mind, only grew more furious as he saw the chance of ruining Ryan slipping away. Day and night, in work and out of work, he kept his tongue going, calling his fellow-laborers "slaves," and was very great on the subject of "division of property," which would enable every man to live in peace and comfort—"without work."

The men often laughed at his extravagant assertions; but some of his ideas took root, and a feeling of discontent gradually became general. Misunderstandings were developed into deliberate assaults upon the liberty and comforts of the men, hasty words magnified into studied insults, and the train was laid for one of those suicidal movements called "a strike."

While this was impending, Ryan was called to account before a committee of the men, who held their meeting in a field close to the works. Morgan attended as an accuser, with the majority of the men employed as audience.

Ryan's answer was as follows: "When a man undertakes to do his work he ought to do it, and if he does sometimes carry a plank half a dozen yards when the bell is ringing, what's the odds? I take my stand on right, and no man is right unless he does his duty."

Ryan's notions were not particularly popular, but his words carried weight with them. More than one listener felt that he only acted as an honest man; but Morgan and his followers were the stronger party, and at a private meeting in the evening it was decided that a round robin should be sent in against the "runner," demanding his dismissal.

Mr. Collins received the message from his men, and said he would consider it. Mr. Collins knew the character of Ryan, and liked him. In his branch he was the best man upon the works, and it was much against his desire to part with him.

"If we give way this time," he said, "we shall soon have another request, one impossible to comply with, perhaps. I have seen the feeling growing among the men; we have too many talkers, and a strike is inevitable; it may as well come now as a month hence."

And so it was decided. The answer was sent to the men, and the answer was "NO."

This brought the storm down. A hurried and angry meeting was held, with Morgan and others for speakers, and they all advocated one thing—"Strike, and bring the masters to their senses." Notice of the strike was given, and on Saturday the works closed.

Ryan, who was still kept on at the works, doing odd jobs, went to and fro without molestation. This did not suit Morgan, who, being a thriftless man, soon began to feel the want of the usual wages, and had a most decided weakness for beer. His rancor increased with his penury, and it was not long before he persuaded himself that all his deprivations were the work of Ryan.

Morgan did not want for men whose thoughts coincided with his own, and a threatening letter—anonymous, of course; your threatening fellows are always cowards—was sent to Ryan, warning him not to go near the works again. Ryan treated it with contempt, and went as usual. Four days later he was struck from behind on the road home, and fell insensible. Mr. Collins himself discovered him there, and had him taken to his own house, and an eminent surgeon was sent for.

As Mr. Collins walked home that night he tried to think of some plan by which he could benefit Ryan without breaking in upon his independence. On the morrow he visited Ryan again, and found him much better. After a few remarks about the injured man's health, Mr. Collins said, "Would you like to be better educated, Ryan?"

"I should like it very much, sir. I have tried to improve myself, but I am very slow."

"Self-teaching is very slow work," returned Mr. Collins; "you want somebody to help you. My son would give you a few lessons with pleasure. What do you say to his coming here for an hour or so every day while the works are closed?"

Ryan was highly pleased with the offer; and so was Mrs. Ryan, and it was settled that the lessons should begin in two days from that time.

Mr. Collins, junior, found that Robert had, to use a homely phrase, "a turn for figures," and his latent talent was now being developed—the foundation of his future fortune was being laid.

So several weeks passed, and then stern necessity took many of the men back. Morgan was the last to go—and then the works of Collins & Co. were opened again.

Ryan went to work, but not as a "runner;" Mr. Collins put him into the office to work out "quantities," that is, to calculate the quantity of materials required for certain work, so as to enable the firm to send in estimates for contracts. He did little things at first, but he proved to be so correct that he was soon intrusted with more important matters.

"Ryan is a wonderfully accurate fellow," said Mr. Collins to his partner, about a year after his first entering the office.

"A very valuable man," replied his partner; "he belongs to the class of men who are sure to make their way in the world. Some even rise to be partners in great firms."

"Hum!" said Mr. Collins thoughtfully; "there is no telling what time will do for such a man."

* * * * * * *

Time has ticked off ten years since the events above recorded, and we beg to introduce our readers to the final scene of this simple story—a room in a well-built substantial villa in a suburb south of London.

The room is well and substantially furnished; all that comfort could command is there, but no useless ornament or attempt at display. By the fire sits a matron dressed in dark gray, and a cap upon her head, made of excellent materials, quiet, neat, and nice. A little girl about twelve sits by sewing; a boy of ten is busy at the table with a slate full of figures; and a younger child, a boy also, is lying upon the hearth-rug, talking to a wooden horse.

Soon a footstep is heard upon the doorstep, and a latch-key rattles in the lock. Then by one impulse they all dash out into the hall, where a hale, hearty man, with just a sprinkling of gray hair to show that he is past his youth, is removing his great-coat.

"Hold off a minute!" he says; "now one at a time."

His coat being off, he kisses them all round, and sits down by the fire. There is an evident anxiety on the part of the mother and children to hear something, and it is equally clear that the man has something to impart; but he is in no hurry about it, and sits there with a quiet smile upon his face.

"Why don't you tell us the news, Robert?" says the matron at last; "yes or no."

"Well, then, it's yes," replies Robert, whose other name was Ryan; "and I'm a member of the firm of Collins & Co. God be thanked for all His past and present mercies."

"Amen," responds his wife, and then there is a minute's silence.

"It's rather odd," continues Robert, "that I should to-night meet the man to whom I owe all this."

"Who is he?" asked his wife, wonderingly.

"Morgan—it was his attempt to ruin me that by God's merciful providence was overruled to bring about this prosperity to us. I met him down the street by the works, standing close to the wall to keep off the wind and snow. He had scarcely a rag to his back, and for all the good the bits of boots upon his feet were he might as well have been without them. He did not know me, but I knew him at once, and hailed him. He could scarcely believe that I was the Ryan he once knew, and when he did credit it, he wanted to sheer off at once, but I stopped him. He was tired, hungry, and penniless, so I took him into a coffee-shop, and while he had some bread-and-butter and coffee, we had a long chat together. I don't want to spin a long yarn about it, but he confessed to me that it was his hand which struck me down ten years ago."

"Will you give him work, Robert?"

"Why not, Polly? I think the man is not too bad to mend. There are the materials of a decent man in him, if he will only give up drinking. At all events, I will give him a chance; I think it is only doing my duty to do so."

Just like Ryan—always thinking of his duty, and acting according to his notions of what is right; and this conscientious mode of life had met with its reward. Prosperous in his business, happy in his domestic life, and, above all, blessed with the peace which passeth all understanding, he is a man whose example men would do well to follow.

[The above story describes an incident in the life of one of the largest English railroad contractors.]

THE PROPHETIC ASPECT OF THE FRENCH CRISIS.

Prophetic Indications of a Franco-German War—The Condition of Germany—Ominous Elements in France—Gambetta's Remarkable Position—Danger of Despotism—Tending to War—The "London Times" on the Situation—The View of the "London News."

STUDENTS of prophecy have been led to believe ever since the collapse of the Napoleonic Empire at Sedan, in 1870, that there would eventually be a renewal of the struggle between France and Germany. They have also believed that that struggle would reverse the results of the former one, and would not only include the recapture of Alsace and Lorraine, of which the earlier struggle despoiled France, but would also issue in Germany losing all the territory between France and the River Rhine.

That belief is based mainly on the indications of prophecy that the nations which formed Cæsar's Roman Empire will, in the days of the world's crisis, be found occupying the same position in relation to each other as they did in Cæsar's day. Now, ancient France (then called Gaul) had then the Rhine for her north-eastern boundary, and in order, accurately, to take the place of Gaul, she must wrest the territory between her present boundary and the Rhine from Germany. It is certain that such an acquisition will never be gained save by a desperate and sanguinary war.

Supposing, then, that a war between France and Germany will precede the days of the end, the state of those two countries is one of those signs of the times which we are commanded to observe (Matt. 16 : 3). Now, within the last few weeks it has become evident that elements exist in both nations which may at no distant day precipitate them into war. In Germany, Socialistic Communism is advancing with rapid strides, weakening the Government and rendering the prosecution of successful war increasingly difficult. It may happen that when the moment arrives for a life-and-death struggle with France, the German Government may be engaged in suppressing a Socialistic insurrection of its own citizens and so be incapable of driving the French army back after the fashion of the last war.

In France the condition of society, social and political, is an interesting study. It presents a spectacle whch students of history have been accustomed to recognize as the precursor of coming trouble. As the experienced seaman detects in the sky, at sunset, warnings of an approaching hurricane, which are imperceptible to the landsman, so the leaders of public opinion in Europe, whose historical studies have made them quick to note the premonitory signs of national crises, have already sounded with respect to France.

THE NOTE OF WARNING

Among the ominous signs is the remarkable position now occupied by Gambetta in France. At his word ministers rise or fall. He does not assume responsibility, but he has more actual power than the President of the Republic or the Premier. His position is equivalent to that of a dictator, although, nominally, he occupies an almost unofficial station. That such a man but a few years ago comparatively unknown, should have been able to attain so high a position is remarkable and shows how ripe the French nation, ostensibly a republic, is for the change to despotic rule. There is little doubt that Gambetta might, if he chose, seize the reins of government and make himself ruler of France. It is probable that such an event may never occur; but while the condition of the people renders a revolution of that kind practicable, there is always the risk of some other man, some daring ambitious man, like Prince Jerome Napoleon, taking the opportunity Gambetta could take if he would.

The recent crisis is significant from another point of view. Gambetta's policy is framed on the astute principle of statecraft that the leaders of the people should "follow public opinion in advance." That is to say, they should possess the power of intuition, should be able to see what the people would like before the preference becomes a formal demand from them, and to be first to give that desire realization. Gambetta has followed this course throughout his public life with marked success. He gave his support to Thiers and to MacMahon when they were popular, and he withdrew it as soon as the tide of popularity gave the first signs of ebbing. He has followed the same course with the ministers, and it was mainly through his attitude that M. de Freycinet found it necessary to resign.

Such a man is Gambetta, and the world may see, as in a mirror, when it watches him, what is the current—the tendency—of public opinion in France. It is significant therefore, that the view prophetic expositors have taken of the probable relations of France and Germany finds confirmation in the present attitude of Gambetta. Within a few weeks

EUROPE WAS STARTLED

by a speech he delivered at Cherbourg, which plainly indicated a desire for war. It was not so much that a prominent Frenchman delivered that speech, but a conviction that he would not have delivered it had he not been confident that it would find a responsive echo in the breasts of the people. In a word, that the project of war with Germany is becoming a popular one among the French people.

Prophetic students believe that such a war must break out at least seven years (Daniel 7 : 26 and 9 : 27) before the end of the age. If, therefore, the end of the age is to be about 1890, then we may expect this great Franco-German war to occur in 1882-3.

The following extracts from two prominent English newspapers confirm this view.

The London Times, of September 24th, says:

"The new French Cabinet, which takes its name from M. Jules Ferry, has been completed by the appointment of M. Barthélemy Saint-Hilaire to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. No safer man could have been chosen for the supreme direction of a department demanding at the present moment rather discretion than either energy or excess of zeal and activity. The new Foreign Minister was at all times more of a scholar than of a statesman, and never filled any place of great importance except in the capacity of private secretary to M. Thiers, whose intimate friend and almost shadow he was during the latest and most momentous period of the great man's career.

"The policy of M. Thiers from the close of the German war to his final retirement and death was characterized by its caution, and it may not be mere chance that brings to the management of France's diplomatic relations a man, now in his seventy-sixth year, the best qualified, both by his age and by his experience of the terrible crisis through which M. Thiers piloted his country, to follow up that course of action which ten years ago saved France from mortal danger, and to resist the youthful impulses of politicians apparently bent on replunging her into rash ventures, and exposing her to new risks.

"M. Gambetta has placed himself in the attitude of a setter-up and puller-down of Ministries.

THE KING-MAKER

cares not as yet, or perhaps dares not, to be king himself, but will suffer no other sovereign than one who will consent to be a puppet in the hands of a too visible wire-puller. Whether the time will ever come in which he will step forward and seize the prize which he now seems rather to disdain than to covet, it would be premature to say; but it is certain that M. Gambetta will take no office which does not confer upon him the absolute, undivided, and unchallenged authority of a Dictator.

"There is no form of government in which the institutions of the State are more apt to emerge into the rule of one man than a so-called democratic republic. The example of many an ancient, mediæval, or modern transatlantic State supplies us with irrefragable proofs of this assertion. The Medici in Florence, from old Salvestro and Cosmo Padre della Patria down to the Magnificent Lorenzo and the mean Cosmo, the first Grand Duke, were but a race of merchants who by the affectation of anti-aristocratic tendencies, won the hearts of the multitude, who seldom or never aspired to official distinction for themselves, but who so openly and yet so irresistibly swayed the popular vote in the election of magistrates that the choice could only fall on persons amenable to the Medici ascendency and devoted to the Medici interest.

"It is thought by many that M. Gambetta is master of the situation, and can give events such a turn as will best answer his purpose. And when France, after having tried and used up all other men, is brought to acknowledge that there is, after all, no other man than M. Gambetta, then, and then only, he will feel that his day has come, and that he owes himself to his country.

"The important point is how far this Gambetta supremacy is compatible with France's good government or safety. Whether with or without reason, is supposed to bode no good to France's neighbors. His menacing speech at Cherbourg was sufficient to alarm Prince Bismarck and to set Count Moltke to study fresh tactics. Perhaps, however, on reaching the pinnacle of his glory, Gambetta may not show himself as rash and aggressive as it suited him to appear when in opposition. He may, perhaps, feel disposed to enjoy his greatness at his own leisure, and to avoid all ventures that may put it in jeopardy. He may then abate not a little of his implacability to priests and monks, and of his eagerness for that revenge for which he was supposed to be clamoring.

M. GAMBETTA'S FOREIGN POLICY

"But the question is whether his old partisans, the men he mustered under his standard, whom he inoculated with his uncompromising ideas, will leave him at rest—whether they will allow him to play false to them, and be baffled of the good times that were promised to them. Already the hounds are at him in full cry. There is no end to the vituperation that is levelled, to the mud that is flung at him, by those very organs of the extreme parties that were till lately so loud in his praise."

The Illustrated London News says:

"Prevalent opinion, both in and out of France, attributes the present French crisis to M. Gambetta. There can be no doubt of his paramount political power. His fiat is decisive. No Ministry has been able to act independently of him and continue to maintain its ground. If France places almost unlimited confidence in him as a statesman, he must, sooner or later, place confidence in France by accepting the constitutional headship of her Administration. But we cannot be surprised, after his speech at Cherbourg, that many people, both at home and abroad, should identify him with a purpose that may hereafter fill the heart of Europe with disquietude, and inflict upon his own countrymen immeasurable suffering—namely, a war of revenge against Germany.

"If it be true, as his enemies impute to him, and as some of his professed friends ardently desire of him, that he is meditating for France, 'a policy of revenge'; if he is looking forward to the re-conquest of Alsace and Lorraine; if every step that he takes is taken with a determination of ultimately measuring strength once again with the German Empire, it is to be feared however far off may be the struggle, that the interval between now and then will be employed in the furtherance of any policy but such as the interests of humanity would require. Military ideas will, of necessity, continue to pervade the European Continent, and peace, such as it is, will be but a silent preparation for war. The Franco-German question will still remain to excite the apprehensions of the Continental public. It is a vision of the future which we shudder to look upon."

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

(Continued from page 655.)

A Companion's Duties.

In spite of the sisters' oft-repeated predictions of the reverse, I and my luggage arrived safe and sound at the little station of Alliston.

As soon as I left the carriage a footman came up to me, and, touching his hat, inquired if I were Miss Lindsay. When I answered in the affirmative, he took charge of my luggage, and led the way to a carriage which was waiting for me outside the station.

We drove on in the darkness for some distance, through what seemed to be country roads and lanes, for I could see no lights by the wayside, and nothing to break the darkness of the night.

After a long time the carriage stopped in front of a small house, which I saw must be a lodge, for by means of the light which came from a diamond-paned window I could see a woman opening some large iron gates for the carriage to go through.

When we had passed the lodge I expected every moment to reach the house, and my heart beat faster and faster in expectation of my arrival. But we went on and on and on for at least a mile before the lights of the great house appeared, and we stopped before the door.

The footman got down from the carriage and rang the bell. The door was opened by a grave and solemn butler, and I went inside, feeling as if I were walking in my sleep, so tired and confused was I with my long journey.

I was ushered through a spacious hall, filled with stags' horns and old swords, and stuffed birds and foreign curiosities, and old oak cabinets, up a very wide staircase to a room at the top of the house. It was not a large room, but it was very pretty and comfortable, and a cheerful fire was blazing in the grate.

The maid who had shown me my room told me that Miss Trafford would be glad to see me as soon as I was ready, so I hastened to take off my dusty travelling dress, and to make myself ready to go down-stairs.

After about half an hour the maid came back again to conduct me. We went through several long passages, past a number of doors, until we arrived at Miss Evelyn Trafford's room.

The maid opened the door, and I went in. The gas was not lighted, but the fire was blazing brightly, and by its light I could see a young lady lying on a low couch on one side of it. She was very pretty, with small, delicate features, and a beautiful fair complexion, and appeared to be about seventeen or eighteen years of age. On the sofa beside her were lying two kittens curled up on a velvet cushion, and in front of the fire was a little spaniel fast asleep on the hearth-rug.

As soon as the door opened Miss Trafford held out her hand to me.

"Come in, Miss Lindsay," she said; "come to the fire; you must be tired and cold; it's dreadfully cold out, is it not? There, Flossy, get up and let Miss Lindsay come to the fire."

She had a pretty, childish manner, which was very winning and pleasant. "I am so glad you have come," she said, when I was seated, "and you look so nice. Do you know, I thought you would be dreadful, before you came! When papa said one day that it was so dull for me up here alone he must get me a companion, I actually cried, Miss Lindsay. It was very silly of me, I know, but then I always am a silly child. I pictured to myself what this companion would be like, and I thought she would have gray curls, and spectacles, and a brown alpaca dress, and always talk as if she were talking out of a book."

I could not help laughing heartily when she said this.

"Oh, I am so glad you can laugh," said Miss Trafford; "the companion, in the picture I made of her, never laughed—she only smiled, as if she was thinking, 'How foolish every one in the world is, and especially this weak-minded child I have to take care of.'"

This, of course, made me laugh again, to Miss Trafford's great satisfaction.

"Papa said he would get me somebody young and charming if he could, and he told me when he was writing about you how old you were, but I didn't think I should like you a bit, and I didn't want you to come at all."

"I hope you will change your mind soon, Miss Trafford," I said; "I will try not to be very disagreeable."

"Oh, I have changed my mind," she said quickly; "I changed it as soon as you came in at the door. I always judge by first sight. If I love people when I first see them, I always love them; and if I hate them, I always hate them. I never change my mind afterward."

"Do you think that is a good plan?" I said; "don't you think it is rather an unfair way of judging?"

"Oh, I don't know about that," she said; "it always answers very well for me. I liked you when you came in at the door, and I mean always to like you. I wish Ambrose would bring the dinner, the gong sounded long since. I am sure it is time for it, and you must be so hungry. Miss Lindsay, will you please ring the bell?"

One of the footmen soon appeared with a small round table, which he placed between Miss Trafford's couch and my chair. The table was already prepared for dinner, with everything in its proper place.

"Oh, it is so nice to have you here," said Miss Trafford. "Do you know, I haven't been down-stairs to dinner for five months. Isn't that dreadful? And I have always had dinner quite alone, except twice, when there was no one staying here, and then papa came up to my room and had dinner here. It was such fun; he and I had this little table, and Ambrose came in here to wait. I laughed all the time, and so did papa; it seemed such a little room after the dining-room, and the three men did not at all know where to stand, because there was no room for them to come close to the table."

"Then you have only been ill five months?" I said.

"Only five months! as if that were not long enough," she said; "it seems more like five years to me!"

"Yes, it is a long time," I said; "but I was afraid you might have been ill longer still. I do not know what made you ill."

"Didn't papa tell you? How funny of him! Now, if I had been writing to you, I should have told you the whole story. What did he tell you?"

"He only said that he wanted a companion for his daughter, and asked for my references."

"That was just like papa," said Evelyn; "he always does everything in what he calls a business-like way, which I always say means never telling anybody anything."

"Will you tell me what made you ill?" I asked.

"Yes, it was that young horse," she said; "such a beauty! you must see him, Miss Lindsay; he is quite black, and has a white star on his forehead, and his name is Wildfire, because he flies along so fast. Papa said he was too young for me to ride; but I was not a bit afraid, and Cousin Donald asked me to go out with him for an hour. Cousin Donald is very fond of me," she said, laughing; "he would like me to marry him; but that would never do, you know. Papa says he is very poor, and he would not hear of such a thing. But Cousin Donald is very good-looking, and I like riding with him, he rides so well, and we had a splendid ride that day; but then Wildfire threw me, and all my fun was over."

"Were you much hurt?" I asked.

"Yes," she said; "the doctors said my spine was injured; only a little though," she added quickly, "and if I keep very, very still, and never walk about for a year, they think I shall be quite well again. Oh dear! I wish the year was over now! But it will be much nicer now you have come."

"You must tell me, please, Miss Trafford, what my duties are," I said.

"Oh, don't talk about duties," she said, pretending to stop her ears; "I can't bear the word. I never could do anything because it was a duty. That's just the sort of word the companion in my picture used to say. She used to draw up her head and look through her spectacles, and say, solemnly, 'Miss Evelyn, remember your duties.'"

"But you will tell me what my work is to be here," I repeated; "Sir William did not mention it in his letter."

"You won't have any work," she said, "except to amuse me; you are to be my friend, if you like to call that work—to read to me, and talk to me, and have meals with me, and make the year go a little quicker."

"That isn't very hard work," I said.

"Oh, I don't know," she answered; "you'll find me a very tiresome child sometimes, and if you had come in the brown alpaca dress, and gray curls, and spectacles, I would have led you such a life that in less than a week you would have said to papa, 'Sir William Trafford, I must beg to resign the charge of your flippant and wilful daughter.' Before you came papa said we were to have some profitable reading in a morning, and story-books only after luncheon; but I hate profitable reading, and papa never makes me do what I hate."

"What kind of reading do you mean?" I inquired.

"Oh, history and geography, and all such things; I never could bear them. What is the good of knowing who Henry VIII.'s wives were, and which of them he beheaded; and nearly giving one's self brain-fever in trying to remember what relation John of Gaunt was to everybody else."

"I am very fond of history," I said; "I think some parts are quite as interesting as a story-book."

"Oh dear, oh dear!" she said; "you ar talking just like the brown alpaca dress! I shall expect you to pull the spectacles out o your pocket in a minute." And then I could d nothing but laugh, and in a moment she ha changed the conversation, and was rattling o about something else.

"There are not many visitors here just now,' she said; "you'll see them all by and by. They generally pay me a visit after dinner. And min you stop when they come; I want you to se them all. The brown alpaca dress always got u when any one came in, and made a very sti bow, and went away and shut herself up in he bedroom. So mind you don't do the same: yo must look at all the people well, and tell m what you think of them, when they are gone."

"Oh, I should not like to do that," I said.

"Why not?" she said, laughingly; "I don' mind telling you what I think of any one There is Lady Eldridge; she is very grand an stately, and I don't like her a bit; and there i Lord Moreton—he never has a word to say, an is very stupid; but he has a quantity of mone and a splendid estate, and papa is always sayin what a nice young man he is. And so he ma be, perhaps, in some ways; at least he is ver harmless, but then he squints, and I never coul marry any one who squinted—could you, Mis Lindsay?"

"I don't know," I said, laughing; "I neve thought about it."

"Well, I couldn't, it would drive me mad And then there is Alicia Hay—papa's old mai cousin—and if you ask me what I think of her, think she is trying very hard to get married an never will. And then there is Lilla—but I won' tell you about them all now, you will see then for yourself by and by."

"Shall I ring the bell, Miss Trafford?" I inquired when dinner was over.

"Don't call me Miss Trafford," she sai quickly; "call me Evelyn; it sounds much nicer and is six letters shorter."

"But perhaps Sir William would not like it,' I objected.

"Oh! papa likes everything I like," she sai decidedly. "I wish you to call me Evelyn, an ean to call you by your first name too—' Miss dsay' sounds just like the brown alpaca. at is your Christian name?"

My name is May," I said; "and I shall be glad if you will call me May, instead of s Lindsay; I shall fancy I am at home n."

Well, then, it's settled, May," she said, hing: "and now you may ring the bell."

(To be continued.)

JACOB'S PREVAILING PRAYER.

. Lesson for October 24th, Gen. 32; Golden Text, Luke 18 : 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

E saw in our last lesson with how much ust Jacob met the promises of God. Truly, would not recall His blessing, but he who d inherit it must learn much, both of him- nd of his God, and because Jacob's faith did ring him into a life of intimate communion Him, God was obliged to train him by cir- tances often painful and humbling. When loved his cousin Rachel and served La- seven years to win her for his wife, it was who was given to him, with the words, ining an allusion bitter indeed to Jacob, 'I must not be so done in our country to give ounger before the elder" (chap. 29 : 26). Jacob was obliged to serve another seven . thus unjustly dealt with, that he might the bitterness of his injustice to his brother. en, later on, he served with Laban for and herds, we see how Laban, with jeal- yes, changed his wages ten times. And on his side would not trust God to give ne "fatness of the earth," which He had sed him, but he had recourse to a strata- n order to obtain for himself that which had said should be his wages (chap. 30 : . Again, when Laban's sons complained riches which Jacob had acquired, saying he had taken away that which was their 's, then "Jacob beheld the countenance of , and behold it was not toward him as be- So he who had taken advantage of his r met with the same treatment from his and when God blessed him in earthly then the enmity of Laban was aroused t him. Then it was that the Lord inter- to protect His own servant, and said, rn unto the land of thy fathers, and to ndred; and I will be with thee." Yet, now, the subtlety of Jacob's natural heart ut, and instead of honestly saying to his hat he was called of God to return unto , he "stole away unawares to Laban rian, in that he told him not that he fled." ms to have been impossible to Jacob to raightforward thing, and just as impossi- him to obtain or retain possession of his goods, without annoyance and vexa- . And such is the life of those children of ho give Him only half their confidence, ep the reins of circumstances in their own when at last Jacob was separated from he "went on his way, and the angels of t him." Probably had he succeeded in away unawares from Padanaram, and if erstanding had been arrived at between d Laban, he would not have been encom- with such a heavenly atmosphere. O nly some strive to establish communion od without making a clean breast of confessed sin against man! Confession titution were among the righteous laws Old Testament (Lev. 5 : 1–6; 6 : 1–7), and d establishes the same rule. "If thou y gift to the altar, and there remember- thy brother hath aught against thee; ere thy gift before the altar; first be ed to thy brother, and then come and gift (Matt. 5 : 23, 24).

ugh Jacob had been met by the angels of t the fear of his brother was not eradi- . Could he then believe that God would back to the land of Canaan and there him into the hands of the revengeful brother whom he had left? Was not God's expressed will for his return his surest guarantee of safety? But Jacob is not alone in this mistrust. Most of the anxiety which is experienced by children of God arises from their looking at circumstances rather than looking to Him who sitteth above the water-floods. They think a past experience is sufficient warrant to doubt God in a present emergency; they act as though He were not the Almighty and were not their Father.

Jacob had recourse, as usual, to a plan of his own. He sent messages to his brother Esau, couched in the humblest terms. "Thy servant Jacob saith," and the message was addressed to "my lord Esau." When the messengers returned with the unwelcome news, "We came to thy brother Esau, and also he cometh to meet thee, and four hundred men with him," then Jacob was greatly afraid and distressed; and he divided the people that was with him, and the flocks, and herds, and the camels, into two bands, and said, "If Esau come to the one company, and smite it, then the other company which is left shall escape." Did he then count nothing upon the word of his God, "I will be with thee," that he should have deemed it necessary to make such a plan? Did he think God unwilling or incapable to deliver him from the hand of Esau?

As a last resource, instead of as a first necessity, he went to prayer, he appealed to God by the name by which He had revealed Himself at Bethel, "God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Isaac, the Lord which saidst unto me, Return unto thy country, and to thy kindred, and I will deal well with thee. I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth which thou hast shewed unto thy servant; for with my staff I passed over this Jordan; and now I am become two bands. Deliver me, I pray thee, from the hand of my brother, from the hand of Esau, for I fear him. . . . And thou saidst, I will surely do thee good, and make thy seed as the sand of the sea, which cannot be numbered for multitude."

After he had taken his own precautions, he called upon God. Now if deliverance was granted, was God to have the credit of it, or must it be attributed to Jacob's foresight? After having prayed he still continued making his plans, and set apart a present for Esau from his own abundance. But he took every imaginable precaution. His servants were directed to put a space between drove and drove, to say to Esau when he should inquire, Whose art thou? "Thy servant Jacob's; it is a present sent unto my lord Esau; and, behold, also he is behind us . . . For he said, I will appease him with the present that goeth before me, and afterward I will see his face; peradventure he will accept of me." What language was this?—if Jacob had really placed his cause in the hands of God! I will appease him from whom I have asked God to deliver me! What was this but unbelief? Peradventure he will accept of me! When he had appealed to God on the strength of His promised blessing to him—where was Jacob's faith?

He first sent the present for Esau over the brook Jabbok, then the two bands with which he had divided his family and possessions, "and Jacob was left alone." Yet he was not alone; "there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day." The same mysterious wrestler wrestles with us also, to subdue and conquer us. In trial, in sickness, in circumstances, there is One who wrestles with us and seeks to prevail. "When He saw that He prevailed not against him, He touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh; and the hollow of Jacob's thigh was out of joint as He wrestled with him." Jacob was subdued, weakened, rendered powerless; and then, and then alone, had he power.

Thus is it ever with us. "My grace is sufficient for thee, for my strength is made perfect in weakness" (2 Cor. 12 : 9). This is a lesson which all must learn who would prevail with God. When we attach value to our prayers, our efforts, our fasting, our light, and knowledge, our consistency or aught else, we are unable to prevail with God. When we see ourselves really crucified with Christ, then, by our very weakness, because by the power of Another, we can and do prevail. We are told of Jacob (Hos 12 : 3-6), "By his strength he had power with God; yea, he had power over the angel, and prevailed." But what kind of power? He wept and made supplication unto Him. "Therefore," says the Prophet Hosea, "turn thou to thy God . . . wait on thy God continually." Prevailing power and prevailing prayer consist in turning away from ourselves to our God, having our whole being closed, dead to ourselves, but open and alive unto God.

The stranger said to Jacob, "Let me go, for the day breaketh." Jacob, who had now no strength but to cling to Him who had prevailed with him, replied, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me." This was mighty power; he could hold his God prisoner until He had blessed him. And such power is ours when we are utterly rid of our own strength and self-dependence. All power in prayer comes from the consciousness of our complete failure in ourselves, the utter absence of any right on our part, and the undivided expectation from the faithfulness of a God who has accepted us in the Beloved. Then we see that to reject us is to reject Jesus, and we can cling with tenacity to our plea.

Our golden text tells us in the words of Jesus always to pray and not to faint—i.e., to be persevering in prayer. This is impossible so long as there is anything of self or of the flesh in our plea. When we are pleading for Christ's sake, and in His name, then to persevere is to honor God. When David prayed for the life of his child who was struck with sickness in judgment upon his sin, he persevered in prayer, but it was not prevailing prayer, for he sought his own ends, and it was contrary to the declared will of God, who had said "The child also that is born unto thee shall surely die" (2 Sam. 12 : 14). When Asa and Jehoshaphat prayed for conquest over their enemies on the ground of God's glory in His people and His promises made to them, then they prevailed, because they clung in helpless impotence to the truth of a God who cannot lie (2 Chron. 14 : 20). Let us only be sure of the justice of our plea—sure that we can urge it for the sake and in the name of Christ, then we have a right to say to our God, "I will not let Thee go except Thou bless me."

The stranger asked Jacob, "What is thy name? And he said, Jacob. And he said, Thy name shall be called no more Jacob (i.e., supplanter), but Israel (i.e., prince); for as a prince hast thou power with God and with men, and hast prevailed." With God and with men; our only guarantee that we should have power with men is that we first learn to have power with God. Nature always seeks to supplant others by human devices; this principle lies at the root of all emulation, strife, and other works of the flesh; it is quite another thing to overcome men because we have first prevailed with God; then there is no credit to us, and instead of wounding them they are awed by the presence of God in us. Jacob was ready to meet Esau now that he had prevailed with God, he would meet him now in another character. Most of our failure, if not all, with those who dwell in our own houses arises from our meeting them rather in the character of Jacob than of Israel, as supplanters who gain in our self-esteem or in the eyes of others, by every advance we make them. When, however, we meet them as God's princes, who live in His presence, there is nothing personal in our words and manners; we prevail.

"And Jacob asked him, and said, Tell me, I pray thee, thy name. And he said, Wherefore is it that thou dost ask after my name? And He blessed him there. And Jacob called the name of the place Peniel (the face of God); for I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved. And as he passed over Penuel the sun rose upon him, and he halted upon his thigh." There was light, warmth, glory upon Jacob, but he was a weaker man; he halted upon his thigh.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A League of Irish Landlords is in the Course of formation to oppose the organization of the Land League. The landlords see with consternation the apathy of the British Government on the state of Ireland, and believe that their only resource is to withdraw themselves from public affairs and form a union among themselves for mutual defence. An ominous piece of news is the statement, by the Irish correspondent of a New York journal, that Mr. Parnell has allied himself and his party with the Fenians, and the two organizations will henceforth operate in unison. The Land League will be the head, and the Fenians the arm of the movement.

A speech delivered by Colonel Waring, a prominent Irish landlord, last week conveys an idea of the critical condition of Ireland. He said: "It is useless to conceal from ourselves that we are on the eve of a crisis such as has not occurred for three quarters of a century. In all civilized communities the duty of protecting life and property is delegated to the State, and to the State, while that duty is duly and effectually performed, all loyal men are bound to leave it. But should the State fail to afford that protection which it is its duty to do, then more primitive methods of self-protection may have to be resorted to."

The agrarian outrages are now so numerous that they fail to attract more than passing notice. Two or three murders have been committed within the last few days.

The Extension of Time Accorded to Turkey for formulating an answer to the European Powers has served no useful purpose except to demonstrate the patience of Europe with the effete government at Constantinople. The answer of the Sultan was in reality a defiance of Europe couched in courteous but evasive language. He undertook, providing the naval demonstration immediately ceased, "to endeavor to persuade the Albanians to surrender Dulcigno," and at the same time promised to introduce reforms in other parts of his empire.

The Powers are tired of promises, and they know that if the Sultan seriously wished to obey Europe, Dulcigno would be ceded promptly. The position, therefore, has assumed a new form, and Europe has to consider by what means Turkey shall be coerced into obedience. France, Austria, and Germany are averse to war; but are also reluctant to detach themselves from the European concert. To meet this difficulty, a scheme has been devised the details of which have not been published, but it is rumored that one or more of the Powers will accept the position of "mandatories," and in that capacity execute the mandate of Europe against the Sultan.

The fact that large quantities of ammunition and war material are being sent to the English fleet in the Mediterranean indicates that Great Britain will be one of the mandatories, or that she has undertaken the task single-handed.

The idea that Turkey should dare thus to defy Europe would have been ridiculed a few years ago as incredible. The course the Sultan has taken is foolish and suicidal. But the sure word of prophecy reveals to us the purpose of God that Turkey shall fall, and He may be employing the temerity of her ruler as He did the obstinacy of Pharoah to work out His will.

The Popularity of the British Ministry is reported by the correspondents of American journals to be rapidly waning. It was hoped that with Messrs. Gladstone and Bright at the head of affairs, there would be peace abroad and prosperity at home. But Englishmen see with alarm that England is on the brink of war with Turkey; her government is defied and despised in Ireland, and important positions on the Indian frontier are being relinquished after being gained at the expense of British blood and treasure.

The Basutos of South Africa have Commenced armed hostilities against the British at Cape Town. The Basutos have been the allies of England for many years against the irruptions of Zulus and the raids of uncivilized tribes; but an act, recently passed by the local Parliament at Cape Town, gave great offence to the Basutos, and they are now in active hostility. On September 20th their armed men, to the number of twelve hundred, attacked the British station at Mohales Hoek, and on the following day another body of five thousand attacked Mafeteng. At both places the fighting continued all day, but the natives were ultimately beaten off. There is alarm at Cape Town, and reinforcements are being prepared to start for the front, while others are hurrying up from Algoa Bay. By the latest returns the Basuto population is numbered at over 127,000, and the European settlers are under 500.

A Train Heroically Saved.—A Man Named Coleman was working on September 24th at the erection of a cabin by the side of the Great Western Railway, near Banbury, England, and suddenly perceived one of the planks lying across the metals at a time when a train was fast approaching. With commendable promptitude he rushed on to the line to remove the obstruction, and so prevent a terrible accident. While shifting the plank, however, he was struck on the shoulder by the engine, and fell between the metals. The train, which was an unusually long one, passed over him, but on his companions going to remove what they imagined would be his dead body, they were surprised to find that he had escaped, though with severe cuts about the head and face. Coleman's conduct in thus risking his life to prevent an accident to the train, which was loaded with passengers, denotes courage of a high order. But it too often happens that heroism goes unrewarded unless it is displayed on the battle-field.

The Return of the Prodigal.—The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon recently narrated the following incident: "A somewhat venerable brother from the north of England called upon us recently and told us the following pleasing story: He said that while grieving over the course of a son, who was like the prodigal in the parable, he derived much comfort from a sermon of mine on the "Return of the Prodigal," in which I spoke of the joy of the prodigal, the joy of the servants, and the joy of the father; and he was stirred up to pray for the return of his boy, and sent a note to ask us to join him in prayer for that son at our Monday evening meeting at the Tabernacle. That young man is a Christian now, and his father is so full of joy at the change that has taken place in his son that he gave us a thank offering of £5 for the college."

A Despairing Soldier.—An Army Chaplain going round a hospital, said to a soldier, lying sick and wounded, "Is there anything I can do for you." "No." "Is there any friend I can write to for you?" "No." Next day the chaplain again said, "Is there anything I can do for you?" "Well, can you undo something for me," said the man with a fierce, despairing look. "There came a young soldier into my regiment who read his Bible and knelt down to pray every night. I jeered and scoffed at him until he gave up religion and learned to swear. I saw him shot down in battle the other day, uttering a blasphemous oath he had learned from me. Now I feel there is no hope or mercy for me." The chaplain replied, "There is forgiveness with God." "Nay," said the man, "I would not forgive myself." Alas, how many will be lost with the conviction on them that their conduct has been such that they could not even forgive themselves!

A Whole Family Smothered by Smoke.—A few weeks ago the following strange occurrence happened at St. Cierge, a village in the Jura. The principal room of an hotel there, known as the Cerf, was lighted by a hanging petroleum lamp, above which had been placed, for the protection of the ceiling, a metal plate. In course of time the wood-work above the plate became dessicated, and one evening it took fire, and when the hotel-keeper and his family retired to rest, was all aglow—a fact, however, which they did not notice. From the ceiling the fire was communicated to the room above, and was first discovered by a neighbor, who, early next morning, observing smoke issuing from the door, gave an alarm, when, as none of the inr could be aroused, the door was broken The fire, having gone on smouldering wit bursting into flame, had done little ma damage, and was easily extinguished; bu the people in the house—the landlord, his and sister — were dead. After the mann country people, they had firmly closed windows before going to bed, and the sr having no exit, had asphyxiated every c them. In like manner, those who volun live in a morally vitiated atmosphere and i its pestiferous fumes, wither and become ually suffocated, unless by faith and praye inspire the air of heaven and the breath Divine Spirit.

Going by the Almanac.—Fifty Years S country clergyman in Cheshire, Englanc called suddenly to attend a sick man, a boatman, who had been struck down in ment by cholera. He held out to the dyin the Christ he had never cared to receive i Then by the side of the poor corpse the man turned to the awestruck friends, them to prepare for another world ere it be too late, and to live by the Word of God he held in his hand. "Master," was tl disrespectfully-meant answer of another bo in that company, "we don't know nought the Bible here; we go by th' almanac." Tl intended no jest; he spoke out of the ignorance in which he and his fellows They had an almanac on board their boa they knew how to interpret it, but they nothing of a Bible.

A Blind Chinese Farmer was Converte Ninghai, in 1879, under the following p circumtances: Several years ago he hea Gospel from a Chinese evangelist, but d think much about it, for he was then perous man, having a small farm and ow vessel in which he used to do a good busi carrying goods between different plac man who had a grudge against him, taki vantage of an opportunity, rubbed a quai quicklime into his eyes, with the object priving him of sight. He partially succ but the sight not being entirely destroy unfortunate farmer's great anxiety was cover sight sufficient to be able to have venge by murdering his adversary, who, this result should he recover his sight, tr ously bribed others, who, preteding to tors who could cure his eyes by their tre destroyed what little sight remained; then to forego all hope of revenge, see sight was entirely gone, and in darkn solitude he remembered what he had he eral years before. He found his way to t sion station at Si-tin of Mr. J. W. (one George Muller's evangelists), and there h more of what he felt was so suitable to condition. He would hear a little and m upon it, until gradually the light broke i his darkened mind; and not only was he with joy to receive the glad tidings, but his influence in persuading others; and 14th December, 1879, he along with thre men, his relatives, were baptized, and and the wife of one of these three you were examined as candidates for baptism

The Persian Famine Fund.—Contr received from "A Friend," Turin, N. Y

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Works are at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at low as to bring them within the reach of ev Twelve Sermons on various subjects, with ph of Mr. Spurgeon, price 35 cents. John Plo Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, a volum sermons, $2.50. The Treasury of David, a cal exposition of the book of Psalms, five vol as Psa. 118, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth-D This popular gift-book contains a suitable selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for e in the year, with a blank space opposite graphs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. appear at their respective birthdays. The elegantly bound, and the price is 75 cents. tances should accompany orders.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

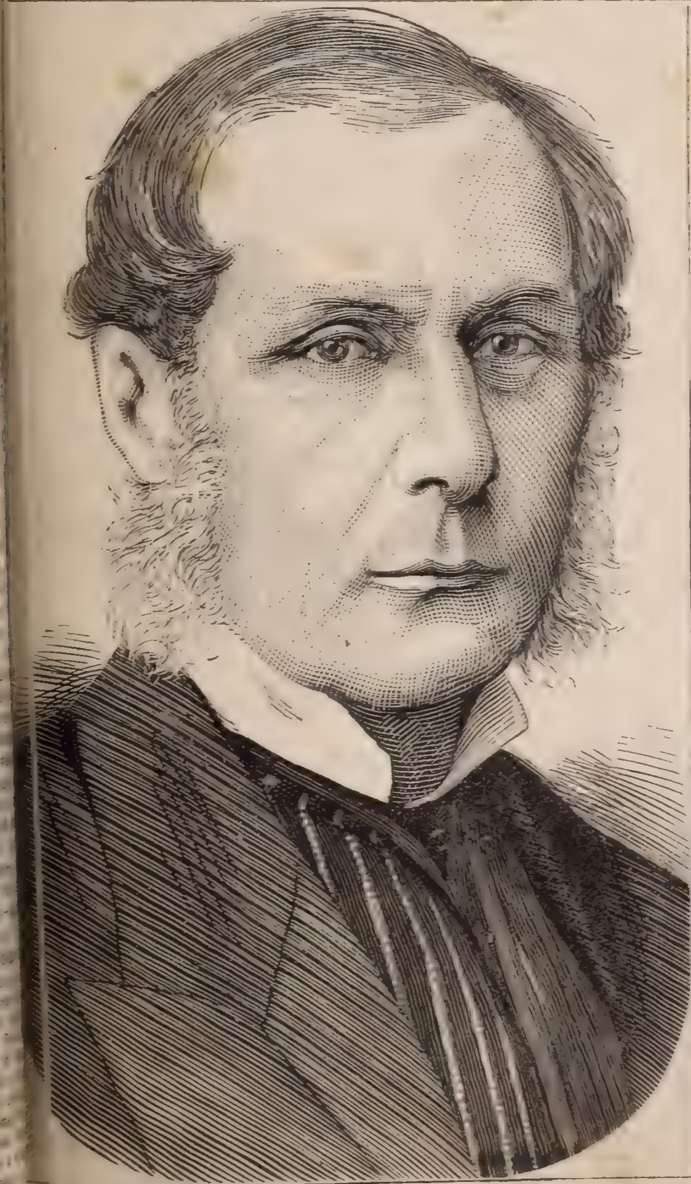
Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. ALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, Rev. W. M. AY AITKEN, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

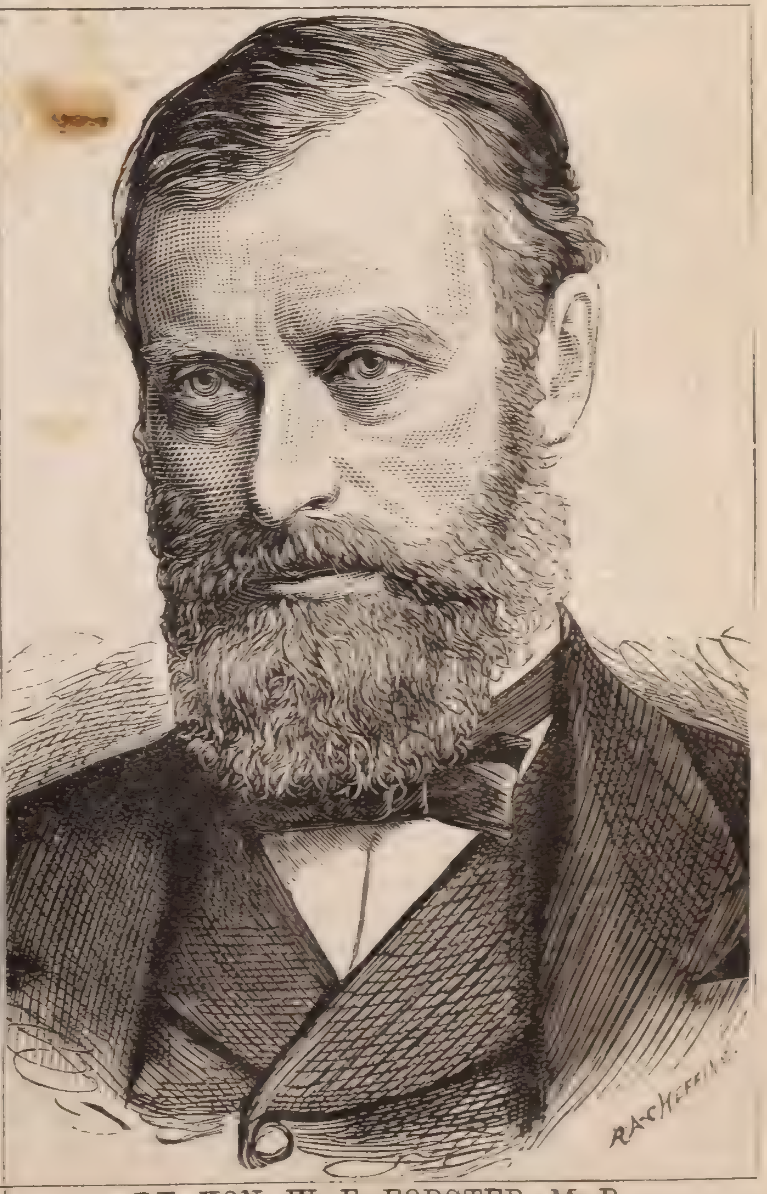
Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1880. 14th Year. No. 43–New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

ORTRAITS AND LIVES OF BARON SELBORNE, AND THE RT. HON. W. E. FORSTER, M.P.
USBANDS AND WIVES: A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
OCHESTER TOWER. A New Serial Story by Miss M. A. Paull (Continued).
ALES OF THE GROG-SHOPS—Bartle the Butler.
JOHN PLOUGHMAN'S PICTURES, with illustrations—A Mother's Heroic Resolve.
CURRENT EVENTS: The October Elections—The Tariff—The A. B. C. F. M.—Temperance Congresses—A Great Comet Approaching—A Woman's Fight with a Snake—A Fourteen Years' Companion, etc.
THE GENTILES AND FOUR COMING JUDGMENTS, by T. B. Baines, Esq., of Leeds, England.
TOKENS FOR GOOD. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
A CHOICE VINDICATED. (Continued.)
Joseph Sold into Egypt. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The Cession of Dulcigno—Proposed Arrest of Mr. Parnell—A Terrible Confession—Hurricanes in the South Seas, etc.



BARON SELBORNE,
Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain.



RT. HON. W. E. FORSTER, M. P.,
The Chief Secretary of State for Irish Affairs.

BARON SELBORNE, LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR OF GREAT BRITAIN.

His Birth in 1812—Obtains a Scholarship at Oxford—Graduates as "a First Class"—Becomes a Barrister in 1837 and a Q. C. in 1849—His Marriage—Elected a Member for Plymouth in 1847—Knighted and Made Solicitor-General—Becomes Attorney-General—His Views on the Disestablishment of the Irish Church—His Efforts at Law Reform—The Geneva Arbitration—His "Notes on the Liturgy" and "Book of Praise."

THE office of Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain is the highest position to which any member of the legal profession in that country can attain. It confers on its possessor both honors and emoluments. The Lord Chancellor presides in the House of Lords, and takes precedence, on occasions of state ceremony, over all peers except the Archbishop of Canterbury and the dukes of royal blood. By an ancient law his person is hedged about with special protection; to murder the Lord Chancellor constitutes high treason and is punished with the same penalty as the murder of the sovereign. The salary paid the Lord Chancellor is $50,000 a year, and he is besides entitled to a pension of $25,000 a year for life after he retires from office. He has besides, considerable patronage, for if a judgeship falls vacant by death or resignation, the Lord Chancellor selects a barrister to occupy the seat. He has also the power to appoint clergymen to the Church livings belonging to the sovereign.

It is somewhat of a drawback to these privileges that his office is of a more precarious character than that of other judges, for while all the others hold their offices for life, the Lord Chancellor resigns his office when the Cabinet resigns. While in office, besides his functions in the House of Lords, he presides in the Court of Chancery, and his duties there have earned for him the title of "keeper of the Queen's conscience." This has arisen from the principles which are supposed to guide that court. If any man is suffering under injustice which no existing law is competent to rectify, or if any man is injured by the action of any law which, being in ordinary cases beneficial, is from the peculiar character of his case manifestly oppressive then he may appeal to the Court of Chancery for relief. Thus arises the distinction between law and equity, and in Chancery equity is supposed to be the ruling principle. Thus, the terms of a bargain or the provisions of a will must by the letter of the law be strictly carried out, but if a suitor can show that he has been wronged or deceived or is the victim of imposition, he may, if he can convince the Lord Chancellor, obtain relief and redress.

For many years the Court of Chancery was a scandal to the British nation. The business of the court had fallen into arrear, and the property which had been confided to the custody of the court pending its decision was retained there an unreasonable time. Indeed, it frequently happened that it was sold by order of the court and the money applied to the payment of costs, which were sometimes so heavy that they absorbed the entire proceeds of the sale. Thus the litigants who quarrelled over the disposition of an estate and appealed to Chancery to arbitrate had the mortification of seeing it pass from their hands and its purchase-money distributed among barristers, lawyers, and court officers, in the shape of fees and legal expenses. But the scandal became too grievous to be endured, and when, in 1830, Lord Brougham took office he set himself vigorously to the work of reform. Old suits which had for thirty or forty years been before the court were promptly decided, and what remained of the contested property after payment of costs was handed over to the proper owners.

But few Lord Chancellors have the power of protracted work Brougham possessed, and it became evident that there would always be a danger of arrears accumulating. Rather than the scandal should arise again, several assistant judges, called Vice-Chancellors, were appointed, who transact Chancery business and relieve the Lord Chancellor of much of his judicial labors.

The present occupant of this honorable position is Lord Selborne, better known by the name of Sir Roundell Palmer. He is a man of pre-eminent mental acquisitions and sterling moral worth. His past career of almost unparalleled success is the result of the grand impetus supplied by Christian principle, and the legitimate reward of intellectual capacity and industry. His recent elevation to the woolsack, as one of the brightest luminaries and most able expositors of the law in Great Britain, has very naturally excited considerable interest, and, we take the opportunity to present our readers with a few particulars of his honorable antecedents.

The noble lord is the second son of the late Rev. William Jocelyn Palmer, who for many years was rector of the small rural parish of Mixbury, Oxfordshire. His mother was Dorothea, the youngest child of the late Rev. William Roundell, of Gledstone, Yorkshire. It was as Roundell Palmer that he fought his earliest and severest battles and gained his greatest laurels. He is now in the full maturity of his ripened powers and varied experience, having been born on the 27th of November, 1812, at Mixbury Rectory.

Having received the rudiments of an English education amid the usual environments of a retired rustic parsonage, he was introduced into a larger academical arena. Carrying with him a rich and lasting heritage of mental and moral influence from the devout atmosphere of the parental home, his tuition was advanced at the great public schools of Rugby and Winchester. The proofs of his industry at these famous centres of learning are abundantly evidenced by his subsequent

UNIVERSITY SUCCESSES.

In the year 1830, when only seventeen years of age, he gained an open scholarship at Trinity College, Oxford. As the scholastic standards of this ancient alma mater are exceedingly high, the ordeal was correspondingly severe, but the prowess of the youthful aspirant for this enviable distinction was equal to the occasion.

But this was only the early dawn which heralded the brilliant day. Prize after prize was won, and in the Easter Term of 1834 he graduated as a "first-class" in classics. Among his trophies up to this point were the Chancellor's prize for Latin verse in 1831; the Newdigate prize for English verse in 1832; and the prize for the best Latin essay in 1835. He secured the Eldon Law Scholarship in 1834, and in the same year was elected to a Fellowship at Magdalene College, Oxford. In 1837 he graduated Master of Arts, with distinction, and on the 9th of June in the same year was called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn, London.

The respective claims of the University and the Inns and Courts of Law having been duly balanced, and the Chancery Bar being determined upon as the theatre for the exercise of his talents, his career was rapid and distinguished, and in April, 1849, he was created a Queen's Counsel, and elected a Bencher of his Inn. The tide of his success is so uniform as to become almost monotonous, but what would otherwise have been a wearisome iteration, imperiously challenges our admiration, for each reward is a guerdon of merit and the recompense of real heroic work. Another conquest, however, must not be overlooked, which he made in 1848, for in that year of political upheaving and revolutionary unrest he married Lady Laura, the second daughter of the Earl of Waldegrave, and in her companionship has enjoyed the rich fruits of domestic felicity.

PARLIAMENTARY LIFE

now began to exercise its natural attractions upon his sanguine mind, and at the general election of July, 1847, he was returned as member for Plymouth, in company with Viscount Ebrington. His political programme was that of a Liberal Conservative. He was favorable to Free Trade, but friendly also to the restrictive navigation laws, and was conscientiously opposed to the endowment of the Roman Catholic clergy. He continued to represent Plymouth until July, 1852, when he was beaten by his opponent, and lost his seat. In June, 1853, h regained it, and retained it until March, 1857 when he did not reoffer himself as a candidate.

In 1861 Mr. Palmer received the honor o knighthood. In July of this year, though without a parliamentary status, he was appointed, a successor to Sir W. Atherton, as Solicitor General, in Lord Palmerston's Administration He was almost immediately elected M.P. fo Richmond, a borough in which the Earl of Zetland's paramount influence secured his return In October, 1853, on the death of Sir W. Atherton, he become Attorney-General. There is onl one more step and the pinnacle of the legal profession is gained; but in June, 1866, he wa compelled to retire with Lord John Russell' second administration. When, in 1868, the Liberal Party again succeeded to office, under th leadership of the present Premier (Mr. Gladstone), he was offered the Lord Chancellorshi Thus the highest goal of his young ambitio was placed within his grasp. The position o which barristers dream and to which they loo forward through years of weary toil was offere him at the age of fifty-five.

But Sir Roundell Palmer felt himself constrained to decline the honor. The questio which had carried the Liberal Party into offic was that of the disestablishment and disendowment of which Mr. Gladstone had promised as a matt of justice to Ireland if he were placed in powe If Sir Roundell Palmer had accepted the offic he must share in the responsibility of his co leagues in their policy, and his name would ha been identified in history with theirs as one the men who passed the Irish Church Ac From this step he recoiled. He believed it sin to take from the Church her supremacy a her wealth. He was opposed on principle what he believed was an act of spoliation, a not even the magnificent position of Lord Hi Chancellor could make him false to his principl He declined Mr. Gladstone's offer, but promis his support to the government on general qu tions. Sir Roundell kept his promise, but wh the Irish Church Act was introduced he w free from any pledge, and he denounced it wi vigor. Though reckoned among the friends the government, no member of the oppositi was more energetic in his defence of the Ir Church.

THE IRISH CHURCH,

In a speech delivered in the House of Co mons on March 22d, 1869, he said:

> "When I look at this bill I cannot conceal fr myself that the principle of it is not disestablishm in the sense in which I use that term, but disestabli ment accompanied by universal disendowment. T is a principle to which I cannot agree. It is ad cated as an act of justice; to my mind it is a gr act of injustice. It is advocated as likely to b salutary and beneficial consequences. I confess t I apprehend from it consequences which may t to destroy the salutary effect of those parts of measure from which I might otherwise have ant pated good results. It is my duty to inform House how far I am able to go with the govern on this point of disestablishment. I mean by di tablishment the severance of direct political relati between the institutions of the Church and the and the goverment of the State. Taking it in sense, and carefully separating the question of endowment from disestablishment, I must say I cannot agree with those who say that the severa of the political relations of the Church with the S is, and necessarily must be, an abnegation of nati Christianity or an act of national apostasy."

The measure was, however, triumphantly ried despite the opposition of friends and f and one real, substantial cause of Irish disc tent was swept away.

The Premier, on Sir Roundell Palmer dec ing the Chancellorship, had offered it to Sir Page Wood, an aged judge, distinguished for patient, plodding industry rather than for illiant talent. The offer was accepted and Sir . Page Wood became Lord Chancellor with e title of Lord Hatherly. But the infirmities advanced age pressed heavily upon him, and er a short period of office, his sight failed him d he resigned in 1872. Then the office was ain offered to Sir Roundell Palmer and ac- pted. He was raised to the Peerage with the le of Baron Selborne of Selborne, Hants. He ld the office of Lord Chancellor until the beral Party went out of office two years later. en he retired with his colleagues, but again k office on their return to power in the early t of this year.

ord Selborne has proved himself to be the y genius of law reform, for though many of learned and illustrious predecessors had ght to evolve harmony out of the chaotic onfusion worse confounded" of legal opinion l procedure, it was reserved for him to em- bly the practical principles which he saw to be essary for the dignity of the law and the fur- rance of justice in his comprehensive Judica- e Bill, which he initiated and passed in the er house in 1875, no essential departure m its principles having been made in it since, ept as referring to the requirements of the al Court of Appeal. The grand purpose ch Lord Selborne proposed to himself was to plify, economize, and render uniform the es of legal procedure, and to repose all func- s of law and equity in a single, undivided jurisdiction.

ord Selborne's name is associated in this try with the dispute between the United es and England on

THE ALABAMA QUESTION,

h was finally settled by arbitration at G eva. Our government claimed damages fr England for negligence during our civil w The British Government had suffered builders to build vessels for the Confederate St es, and among these Mr. Laird, of Birken- , had contracted to build the Alabama, a erful man-of-war. The vessel was ready for when our minister protested against the vio- n of treaty rights which its departure in- ed. But the British Government did not promptly, and the Alabama sailed for the World and effected considerable damage he Northern fleet. At the close of the war question was pressed on the attention of the sh Government, and was ultimately submit- o the arbitration of judges appointed by al European nations. Before this court Sir ndell Palmer appeared to defend his country. ade a brilliant defence, but it failed, and Britain was condemned to pay heavy ges for the injuries caused by the negli- e of her ministers. Sir Roundell Palmer's ess was, however, one of the most powerful loquent efforts ever made before any tribu-d Selborne's laurels have not been won on grounds only. In s won for himself a name. For a man e mind is stored with the archaic maxims echnical peculiarities of the law of England, st be as difficult as it is rare to develop the of fancy, or soar into the sunny and hazily heights of poesy. But the mind of Lord rne possesses an enviable elasticity, which es him to relax its discipline, and find con- recreation in the elevating influences of ong. It is thus that for several years he ved the leisure he could command, and the g fruit is manifested in a fascinating e, entitled "The Book of Praise," in a chastened and tender devotion proves esistible and inspiring charm. It is a col- n of about 400 evangelical hymns, and with each of them the author's name, the f composition, and original form. In the e he says:

LITERATURE

> "e arrangement which has been adopted may is explained. The Catholic Creeds and the Prayer, presenting in their simplest form and the natural order all the fundamental points of Christianity, appear to be the best basis for a classification of those hymns of faith and devotion which express feelings at all times appropriate to a Christian profession. It is refreshing to turn aside from the divisions of the Christian world, and to rest for a little time in the sense of that inward unity (in Christ) which, after all, subsists among all good Christians, and which receives illustration in this volume."

It is remarkable that for the last twelve years Great Britain has had for her Lord Chancellors three eminently Christian men, namely, Lord Hatherly (Sir W. Page Wood) from 1868 to 1872; Lord Selborne from 1872 to 1874; Lord Cairns, from 1874 to 1880; and now again Lord Selborne in the present year, 1880.

THE RT. HON. W. E. FORSTER, M.P.,

Chief Secretary for Ireland.

Birth in 1818—Visits Ireland in 1846-1847—Becomes M. P. in 1861—The Famous Education Bill—His New Appointment.

Mr. Forster is a good specimen of a typical Englishman. His abrupt manner and straightforwardness of expression earned for him years ago, both in Parliament and out, the sobriquet of "Yorkshireman." The right honorable gentleman has, however, repudiated his claim to that distinction. But even now the idea still lingers in the popular mind, and receives considerable strength and tenacity of life, not only from the characteristic traits of Mr. Forster's individuality, but also by the recollection that the only borough he has ever represented in Parliament is Bradford, and that his commercial relationships are linked with the chief trades and enterprises of the county of Yorkshire.

He was born in the town of Bradpole, Dorset, in 1818, and is therefore now in his sixty-second year. His parents being of the Society of Friends, he was sent to school at one of their own institutions, known as the Friends' School, at Tottenham. Mr. Forster began while yet a young man to take an absorbing interest in all kinds of public matters. He was made to be of use, and soon put himself into contact with philanthropic aims and efforts. He is one of those quiet natures which are full of noble purpose, and incapable of knowing that misery is within his reach without making an effort to help and save the suffering ones.

In 1846 Mr. Forster made an extended tour in this country, visiting North, South, and West, and obtaining a thorough knowledge of the country, the people, and the government. The knowledge so obtained has been very useful to him, and tended to give his mind that broad and liberal tone, that patience and toleration, by which he has been distinguished in public life.

During the Irish famine in 1847 he visited the suffering districts to ascertain for himself the extent of the distress, and distributed a relief fund which had been raised by the Quakers. A vigorously-written pamphlet which he penned on this occasion manifested the early and intelligent interest which he took in public affairs.

In April, 1859, he attempted to secure a seat in Parliament, and came forward in the Liberal interest as a candidate for the representation of Leeds, but was defeated. A vacancy occurring at Bradford, in February, 1861, his candidature for that borough was successful, and he was returned without opposition.

It was not long before his voice was heard in the House, earnestly asserting his views with dignified quietness and "an uncompromising plainness of demeanor." One who was qualified to speak of him thus continues the description by adding that Mr. Forster in the House of Commons exhibited "a close habit of thought linked with a loose and homely habit of speech —a tact which makes that very homeliness more suasive than the most polished courtliness could hope to be—a persistency in work which is not equalled by many men of like talent—and a patience unflaggingly good humored."

It was on

THE QUESTION OF EDUCATION

that Mr. Forster gained so much celebrity; for he was Vice-President of the Council, and accepted the responsible task of introducing that famous Educational Bill which will ever be associated with his name. He met with stern opposition, especially from the leading spirits of the Birmingham League, the object of which was to exclude the Bible from the schools. He saw further into the matter than his opposers, and he was most anxious to establish a principle as nearly as possible such as the greatest number could accept while it would benefit the whole nation. Appreciating highly the advantages of a good elementary education, he craved that boon for the young and the kingdom at large.

Mr. Forster adhered to the main principles of his bill, and pressed it forward until it had passed the third reading unimpaired by the opposition in Parliament.

The English correspondent of an American journal thus writes: "The Hon. W. E. Forster is never seen to greater advantage than when he stands at bay to bat the questions hurled at him from all sides of a vast audience. Mr. Forster occupied a prominent position in Mr. Gladstone's administration, was Vice-President of the Privy Council, and Chairman of the Education Board. He is the father of the Education Act of 1872, which is now transforming the nation from darkness to light, and of the Ballot Act, which has purified and enlarged her election machinery. He counts it a great personal honor that he had no small share in passing the Alabama Arbitration Bill, and so avoiding misunderstanding between ourselves and yourselves, if nothing worse."

To come back now to the great work of Mr. Forster's educational scheme, it must be noted that Mr. Dixon, the member for Birmingham in 1872, made an attempt in Parliament to pass a vote of censure on the Elementary Education Act. But, nothing daunted, Mr. Forster met the motion for censure by an amendment which, after a long debate, was carried, to the mortification of the secular education advocates.

When Mr. Gladstone became Premier this year, the question of who should be at the head of

THE IRISH DEPARTMENT

was an anxious one. A man was needed with an inexhaustible store of patience and possessed of consummate tact. On the one hand, he would have to meet Mr. Parnell and the advocates of Home Rule, and on the other hand, the landlords who sit on both sides of the House. Among the Liberal leaders is more than one gentleman owning large Irish estates, and among the Conservatives there are many such land-owners. Thus placed between two fires, the Irish Secretary must lead a stormy life, and could not hope to do justice and satisfy either party. That Mr. Gladstone should have selected Mr. Forster for that post and that Mr. Forster should have been willing to accept it, is an evidence at once of his brilliant talents and of his courage.

His first step was one of conciliation. During the Fenian agitation a bill had been passed depriving the Irish people in certain districts of the protection of the Habeas Corpus Act, and rendering it possible for the government to arrest and hold in prison persons suspected of treasonable practices without the formality of a trial. This bill had given the government extraordinary powers, and the Irish people regarded it as a grievance. They wished to have the same protection as other subjects of the queen, and Mr. Forster decided to dispense with the powers given by the bill. Recent outrages and the seditious speeches delivered by Mr. Parnell and his friends show that Mr. Forster's confidence was misplaced, or at any rate is not appreciated as it deserves. It may therefore become necessary for the sake of the classes threatened with violence to renew the obnoxious measure, but we may be sure that such a step will not be taken by Mr. Forster unless it is proved beyond a doubt that the policy of conciliation and kindness has failed to win the loyalty of the Irish people.

HUSBANDS AND WIVES.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Preached on Sunday Morning, October 17th, 1880.

"Let every one in particular love his own wife even as himself, and the wife see that she reverence her husband."—EPHESIANS 5 : 33.

Honorable Causes of Celibacy—Eminent Persons who never Married—The Majority of Married Couples Well Mated—A Happy Union of Opposite Temperaments—Disastrous Combinations of Fire and Gunpowder—Prescriptions for Domestic Happiness—I. Let a Spirit of Compromise be Dominant—II. A Spirit of Consultation—God has given the Wife Intuition—A Beautiful Incident of Wifely Help—III. Let there be no Secrets—Secret Letters, Associations—IV. A Spirit of Forbearance—V. Religious Toleration—VI. Cultivate each other's Religious Welfare—A Quaintly Pathetic Narrative from Cotton Mather's Life—"What the Lord thinks of it."—The Marriage of the Lamb.

ALL this good advice by a man who never married. He lived on to fifty-eight years of age, in eminent bachelorhood. Indeed, it was better for Paul to remain in single life, because he went on such rapid missionary expeditions that no companion could have endured the hardship. Celibacy in some cases is better. Such persons accomplish under such circumstances that which could not be accomplished in the other style of life.

I have known men who remained unaffianced in order that they might take care of the children of a deceased brother; and what would become of the world without the self-sacrifice and helpfulness of the maiden aunts, I cannot imagine.

Among the brightest queens of Heaven will be those who took care of other people's children. Alas for that household which has not within easy call an Aunt Mary! I know that there are caricatures, and ungallant things sometimes said; but so far as my observation goes, they are quite equal in disposition to their married sisters. The state of celibacy honored again by such persons as Macaulay and Washington Irving in literature, and Florence Nightingale and Miss Dix in philanthropy.

But while Paul remained in the single state, he kept his eyes open, and he looked off upon the calm sea of married life, and upon the chopped sea of domestic perturbation. He comes forth in my text to say, "Let every one in particular love his own wife even as himself, and the wife see that she reverence her husband;" implying that the wife ought to be lovable, so there might be something to love, and the man ought to be honorable, so there might be something to reverence.

It is

A MOST CONGRATULATORY THOUGHT

that the vast majority of people in the married state are well mated. When the news is first announced in the outside world of the betrothal, there may be surprise and seeming incongruity, but as the years pass by it is demonstrated that the selection was divinely arranged. There may be great difference of temperament, great difference of appearance, great difference of circumstances. That is no objection. The sanguine and the phlegmatic temperaments make appropriate union, the blonde and the brunette, the quick and the slow, the French and the German. In the machinery of domestic life there is no more need for the driving wheel than for the brakes. That is the best union generally which has just the opposites.

The best argument in behalf of marriage as a divine institution is the fact that the vast majority of conjugal relationships are the very best things that could have happened. Once in a while there is a resounding exception to the good rule, the attempt being made to marry fire and gunpowder, with the consequent explosion in the divorce courts; but in the vast majority of instances the conjugal relation is a beautiful illustration of what the Psalmist said when he declared, "God setteth the solitary in families."

Taking it for granted, then, that you are well mated, I proceed to give you some

PRESCRIPTIONS FOR DOMESTIC HAPPINESS;

and, first of all, I remark:

I. A spirit of compromise must be dominant. You must remember that you were twenty or thirty years forming independent habits and having your own way. In the marriage state these habits must be brought into accord, and there may be some ingenuity necessary. Be determined to have your own way, and there will be no peace. Let the rule be: In all matters of moral principle your determination shall be iron, and in all unimportant matters, willow. Whatever you may think of the word compromise in politics, without compromise there is no domestic peace. A great many people are willing to compromise, if you will do just as they want you to do; but there is no compromise in that. The rule ought to be: In all domestic matters, all social matters, all ecclesiastical matters, all political matters, firm adherence to fundamentals, easy surrender in non-essentials. Be not too proud or too stubborn to give up. Compromise! Compromise!

II. I remark, again, that in order to domestic happiness there must be a spirit of

CONSULTATION.

The home ought to be a cabinet, where all the affairs of the household and all the affairs of business life come under comparison, inspection, and advisal. That is an absurd rule we hear abroad in the world, that men ought never to take their business home. Ten thousand financial failures would have been avoided if men had consulted with their wives.

In the first place, woman has a capacity to judge of moral character which man has not. Before you invite into your business partnership any man, you ought to introduce him to your wife, and get her judgment as to his capacity and his integrity. After five minutes' conversation she will tell you as much about him as you will know at the close of twenty years, and perhaps you may find out too late.

A man proposes to come into your business partnership. You take him to your home. He tarries a little while, and is gone. You say to your wife, "Well, what do you think of him?" She says, "I don't like him at all." You say, "It's an absurd thing to form a prejudice against him on so short an acquaintance. I have known him for years, and I have never known any bad against him." "Well," she says, "I don't know why I have formed that opinion, but I tell you to beware. Put none of your financial interests in that man's keeping." Ten or fifteen years pass by. You come home some night and say, "Well, my dear, you are right; that man swindled me out of my last dollar." It is not because woman is wiser than man. It is because God has given her that peculiar intuition in regard to human character.

Now, you have no right to go into an enterprise which involves the homestead, or the education of your children, or the fate of your entire family, without home consultation. Of course, all this implies that you did not marry a fool. If at the marriage altar you committed suicide, you had better keep all your business affairs in your own heart and head. But let us hope that you have sound common-sense presiding in your household.

A BEAUTIFUL INCIDENT.

How much a wife may help a husband's business affairs was well illustrated in the case where the wife saved from the allowance of herself and the allowance of the family, a certain amount of money for a rainy day. After some time the husband, coming home, said, "Well, I'm going to suspend payment to-morrow. A few dollars would get me through, but I can't get the few dollars, and I'm going to ruin." That evening the wife said, "I wish you would hunt up the definition of the word 'independence' in Webster's Dictionary. Hunt it up for me." He opened Webster's Dictionary, and found the word "independence," and right opposite was a $100 bill. "Now," she said, "I would like to have you find the word 'gratitude.'" He turned t the word "gratitude," and there was anoth $100 bill. And before the evening was past sh asked him to read a verse of a certain chapter the Bible. He opened to the verse in the Bibl and there were $500, and before the evening ha passed, the man had financial relief to tide hi over his disasters. You call that dramatic. call that beautifully Christian.

In all expenditures there ought to be consult tion. Do not dole out money to your wife though she were a beggar. Let her know ho much you have, or how little. Appeal to h intelligent judgment, and she will be conten and your own disposition will not be irritate As long as you keep a mystery about your bus ness matters she will wonder that the allowan is so small. No honorable woman wants spend more money than can be afforded. Con into consultation with her on this matter. Sho what are all you necessary outside expenses, the money you must have for cigars and dinne at Delmonico's, and how much it takes for t club-house and for the political campaign, a then have her present all the domestic expense and then after consultation do your best.

It is a bad sign when a man dare not tell b business transactions to his wife. There something wrong. Suppose you that the giga tic forgeries which have been enacted in th country would ever have taken place if the wi had been consulted? The wife would ha said, "Stop! Let us live in one room in t poorest house on the poorest street of the poo est town, and have nothing but dry bread rath than that you should make yourself culpable t fore God and the law." In the vast majority cases where there has been exposure of gre frauds, the wife has been the most surprised p son in the community.

A BANKER

some time ago misused trust funds, and he we from fraud to fraud, and from knavery to kna ery, until it was necessary for him to leave ho before daylight. His wife said, "Where are y going?" "I am going to New York," said "I am going on the early train." "Why, is this sudden?" she asked. "Oh, no; I expect to go," and then he left the room and went to the room where his daughters slept, look upon their calm faces for the last time, as supposed, and started. He was brought ba by the constables of an outraged law, and is n in the penitentiary.

Do you suppose that man, with a good wi as he had, an honest wife, as he had, a Chr tian wife, as he had, could have got into su an enormity if he had consulted in regard to wishes? Consultation is the word—domes consultation.

III. Again: in order to domestic happine there must, in the conjugal state, be kept one from the other. What one knows b must know. It is a bad sign when one part in the conjugal relation is afraid to have letters opened or read by the other partn Surreptitious correspondence is always dangero If a man comes to you and says, "I am go to tell you a great privacy, and don't want to tell anybody, not even your wife," say to hi "Well, now, you had better not tell me, f shall tell her as soon as I get home."

NO SECRETS

There must be no secrecy of association. ought not to be unwilling to tell where you h been, and with whom you have been. So times an unwise wife will have a lady confida whom she makes the depository of priva which they are pledged to keep between th selves. Beware! Anything that implies husband and wife are two and not one imp peril, domestic peril, social peril, mighty per

In the vast majority of cases of domestic felicity coming to exposure in the courts, trouble began by the accidental opening of a ter which implied correspondence which never suspected. In the conjugal relations, crets kept one from another are nitro-glyce under the hearthstone, and the fuse is light

IV. Again : in order to your happiness there ust be a spirit of the weeks, the months, the years that you ere planning for each other's conquest, only e more genial side of your nature was observ- le, but now you are off guard, and the faults e all known the one to the other. You are are of your imperfections, unless you are one those self-conceited people who are quickly servant of faults in others, but oblivious to ilts in yourself ; and now, having found out all h other's imperfections, forbear.

FORBEARANCE.

f the one be given to too much precision, and other disorderly in habits ; if the one be ndthrift, and the other over-saving ; if the be loquacious, and the other reticent, for- r. Especially, if you both have inflammable pers, do not both get mad at once. Take n about ! William Cowper put it well when said,

> "The kindest and the happiest pair
> Will find occasion to forbear ;
> And something every day they live
> To pity, and perhaps forgive."

. Again : In order to your happiness, let e be no interfering with each other's pe- ar

RELIGIOUS SENTIMENTS.

ou are a Baptist and your wife is a Pedo- tist, do not go to splashing water into each r's faces ! If you are a Presbyterian and husband is a Methodist, when he shouts llelujah !" do not get nervous !

you have strong denominational proclivi- one of you had better go to one church, the other had better go to another church ; urrendering some of your intensity on that ct, as in hundreds of cases, come to some church as the Brooklyn Tabernacle, where, we adhere to the fundamentals of the Gos- e do not care a rye-straw for the infinites- differences between evangelical denomina- —putting one drop of water on the brow, t is enough baptism, and if not, then plung- e candidate clear out of sight, if that is red—not caring whether you believe you been foreordained to be saved or not, if you ly saved ; nor whether you believe in the erance of the saints or not, if you will only ere ; nor whether you prefer prayer by pal Liturgy or extemporaneous supplica- f you only pray.

not let there be any religious contests the breakfast-table or the tea-table. It but little difference from what direction ome toward the riven heart of Christ, if nly come up to the riven heart. Yet, I n many families there is constant picking posite religious beliefs, and attempt at tism. You, the father, fight for Episco- nd you, the mother, fight for Presbyteri- and your children will compromise the and be Nothingarians!

Again : I counsel you, in order to your ic happiness, that you

ATE EACH OTHER'S RELIGIOUS WELFARE.

a profoundly agitating thought to air-minded man and woman. You live r on earth ; you want to live together You do not want ten, or twenty, or ars to end your association. You want your companion into the kingdom of h you. If this subject is irritating in the ld, it is because you do not understand n stratagem.

Christian companion may take his or npanion into glory. How? Ask God, will tell you how. Perhaps by occa- eligious remark. Perhaps by earnest Perhaps by a consistent life. More by all these things combined. Paul rcefully when he said, "How knowest wife, whether thou shalt save thy hus- ow knowest thou, O man, whether thou e thy wife?" In this house, how many n remarried for the skies !

It has become so much the general rule that when in my congregation, as I often do, I find a family in which the wife is a Christian, and the husband is not, I just say frankly to him, "Now you have got to come in. You might just as well try to swim up against Niagara rapids as against the tide of religious influence which in this church is going to surge you into the kingdom of God. You must come in. You know that your wife is right in this matter of religion." She may be quick of temper, and you may sometimes lose your patience with her, but you know she is better than you are, and you know when she dies she will go as straight to heaven as a shot to a target.

"And if to-day, on the way home, a vehicle should dash down the street, and she should fall lifeless, with no opportunity for last words, you might have a doubt about what would become of you, and a doubt about what would become of the children, but you would have no doubt about her eternal destiny. Somewhere under the flush of her cheek, or under the pallor of her brow, is the Lord's mark. She is your wife, but she is God's child, and you are not jealous of that relationship. You only wish that you yourself were a son of the Lord Almighty. Come, and have the matter settled. If I die before you, I will not forget in the next world how you stood together here, but I will expect both of you. You must come.

"I say it in all Christian love and emphasis, as a brother talks to a brother. You must come. You have been united so long, you cannot afford to have death divorce you. How long it is since you began the struggle of life together ! You have helped each other on the road, and what you have done for each other God only knows. There have been tedious sicknesses, and anxious watching, and here and there a grave, short but very deep ; and though the blossoms of the marriage-day may have scattered, and the lips that pronounced you one may have gone into dust, you have through all these years been to each other true as steel.

"Now, to-day, I am going to remarry you for heaven. This is the bridal day of your soul's peace. Here is the marriage altar. Kneel side by side, take the oath of eternal fidelity, clasp hands in a covenant never to be broken. I pronounce you one on earth, I pronounce you one for eternity. What God by His grace hath joined together, let not earth or hell put asunder. Hark ! I hear a humming in the air—an anthem—a wedding march—organs celestial played upon by fingers seraphic."

I do not think I ever read anything more beautiful and quaintly pathetic than

COTTON MATHER'S DESCRIPTION

of the departure of his wife from earth to Heaven : "The black day arrives. I had never seen so black a day in all the time of my pilgrimage. The desire of my eyes is this day to be taken from me at a stroke. Her death is lingering and painful. All the forenoon of this day she was in the pangs of death, and sensible until the last minute or two before her final expiration. I cannot remember the discourse that passed between us, only her devout soul was full of satisfaction about her going to a state of blessedness with the Lord Jesus Christ. As far as my distress would permit, I studied to confirm her satisfaction and consolation.

"When I saw to what a point of resignation I was called of the Lord, I resolved, with His help, to glorify Him. So, two hours before she expired, I knelt by her bedside and took into my hands, that dear hand, the dearest in the world, and solemnly and sincerely gave her up to the Lord. I gently put her out of my hands and laid away her hand, resolved that I would not touch it again. She afterward told me that she signed and sealed my act of resignation, and though before that she had called for me continually, after it she never asked for me any more. She conversed much until near two in the afternoon. The last sensible word she spoke was to her weeping father : 'Heaven, Heaven will make amends for all!'"

Now let us be faithful in this relation of which I have been speaking. Do you want to know

WHAT THE LORD THINKS OF IT?

Read the sixty-second chapter of Isaiah, where He says : "As the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee." There is a wedding coming which will eclipse all the princely and imperial weddings the world ever saw. It was a great day when Napoleon took Josephine ; it was a great day when Henry VIII. led Anne Boleyn over the cloth of gold on the street, the cloth of gold reaching up to the palace ; it was a great day when the King of Spain took Mercedes ; but there will be a greater time when the Lord shall take His bride, the Church, to Himself.

Long time ago they were affianced, but she has been down in the wilderness. He has written her again and again, and the day of marriage is fixed. She has sent word to Him. He has sent word to her. But, oh ! was there ever such a difference in estate? The King on the one side, the bride of the wilderness, poor and persecuted, on the other. The wealth of the universe on the one side, the obscurity of the ages on the other. The pomp of heaven on the one side, the poverty of earth on the other. But He will endow her with all His wealth, and raise her to sit with Him on a throne forever.

Come, thou bridal morn of the ages! Come ! and there shall be the rumbling of great wheels, great chariot wheels, down the sky, and there shall be riders ahead and mounted cavalry behind, the conquerors of heaven on white horses. Clear the way ! A thousand trumpets blare. "Behold ! the bridegroom cometh : go ye out to meet Him."

Then the charioteers shall rein in their bounding steeds of fire, and the King shall dismount from the chariot, and He shall take by the hand the bride of the wilderness, all the crowded galleries of the universe the spectators. Ring all the wedding bells of heaven. The King lifts the bride into the chariot and cries, "Drive on ! drive up !" and the clouds shall spread their cloth of gold for the procession, and the twain shall go through the gates triumphant, and up the streets, and then step into the palace at the banquet, where ten thousand potentates and principalities and dominations cherubic and archangelic, with ten thousand gleaming and uplifted chalices, shall celebrate the day when the King of Heaven and earth brings home His bride from the wilderness. Make haste, my beloved. Be thou like to a roe, or a young hart upon the mountains of spices.

A Woman's Testimony as to the Influence of rationalism in the family was given in New York a few days ago. About sixty immigrants from Holland arrived at this port, and Rev. A. H. Bechthold, the pastor of the Holland Church, went to meet them, and render what assistance he could in getting their baggage through the Custom-House, and in other ways. Having done all he could for them, he addressed a few words of Christian counsel to the party, and they in reply told him they were "Moderns," as Rationalists are called in Holland. Mr. Bechthold expressed his regret at hearing this fact, and said he believed that the influence of rationalism was disastrous personally and relatively.

To the surprise of all, a woman who was the wife of the leader and spokesman of the party unexpectedly furnished confirmation of the minister's words. She said : "The dominie is right. The man who spoke before is my husband. And now let me confess that the time when we both joined the church, about thirty years ago, we did it in that simplicity of faith which made us extremely happy. We obeyed our parents, harmony and love prevailed between me and my husband, and we were prosperous on every side. But I cannot and will not deny that since we embraced Modernism, about ten years ago, it has gone ill with us. Peace has left my soul. Our families are not in harmony, and our children are not obedient. None of you (turning to the company) can deny that this is the case."

ROCHESTER TOWER.

By Miss M. A. Paull.

(Continued from page 663.)

Summary of the Story.

THE family of the Anerleys consists of Mr. and Mrs. Anerley, one son, Cecil, and two daughters, Emily and Constance, the heroine of the story. Mr. Anerley was interested in work at Albert Mission Hall in London. While addressing the poor people Mr. Anerley was stricken with death. The bereaved family was much helped by the friendship and counsel of the Rev. Hermann Ferguson, of whose church Mr. Anerley had been an honored officer. He secured a position for Constance Anerley in his aunt's school at Aix-la-Chapelle, to teach English and learn continental languages, whence she afterward returned and became a governess in a family at Brighton. At the suggestion of Mr. Ferguson, Mrs. Anerley resolves to accept Salome Stanley, a young and lovely woman, as a boarder into her house. Her history, so far as the minister knows it, is sad. She is a lawyer's orphan daughter, and has hitherto lived the life of a recluse. Soon after her introduction Cecil Anerley proposed marriage to her, upon which she acknowledged that she was already married, and that her husband, who was intemperate, had left her. She now becomes much benefited by Mr. Ferguson's preaching, and, on making application for permission to partake of the Lord's Supper, expressed her determination not to taste a drop of intoxicating wine. Thereupon Mr. Ferguson summons a meeting of his deacons, at which the whole question is discussed at considerable length, but no conclusion yet arrived at.

Visit to Canterbury—Constance attends Mrs. Mitchell—The Lady's Illness—Second Marriages—Mrs. Mitchell's Startling Proposition—Constance Anerley's Confession.

THERE was hardly a more inviting place in all England to the mind and imagination of Constance Anerley than the quaint old city near whose magnificent cathedral she awoke on Christmas morning, to listen with glad ears to the sweet Christmas chimes commemorating the royal birthday of Him who was at once most humble, most exalted, a human infant, and the King of kings.

The occasion that had brought Constance where, with girlish longing, she had very often wished to be, was, however, a sad one, and she was too sensible to attempt to conceal this fact from her consideration.

Ellen Mitchell, the devoted mother, the fond and tender wife, and the affectionate friend as she had proved herself to her young governess, was in a critical state of health, and in the weary failure of hope after hope of amendment her spirits had quite given way. It was at first suggested that Constance Anerley should take the superintendence of affairs at Brighton, aided by the pretty frequent oversight and counsel of Miss Lack.

But Mrs. Mitchell had piteously entreated her husband, if he could not come with her himself to Canterbury, not also to separate her from Miss Anerley. He was startled at her agitated manner, and more than surprised at the request. Her weakness became daily more and more evident, from the intensity with which she expressed herself concerning those matters in which she had formerly shown so much outward calm.

"My dear Ellen," said Mr. Mitchell, "I shall be extremely glad to arrange for Miss Anerley to accompany you, if it will add to your comfort in the slightest degree, and I will promise to come as much as possible myself. If you very much wish me to spend Christmas day with you, Ellen, I will get a friend to take my services for me."

She smiled brightly, and then answered, as she had been accustomed to answer him all her life long, "I shall like what you like best, dearest;" and then added, in a way so unlike her self-sacrificing disposition that Mr. Mitchell felt sure she must be very ill, "but if you could manage to be with me just this once, dear, I should be so pleased."

He had managed. He had taken alarm about her at last, as men of his self-indulgent nature will sometimes do when the wife who has given her life, her all, to them, is no longer able to mask weakness and fatigue and assiduity in their service by smiles and quietude.

He had been with her so often since she came to Canterbury that she felt quite flattered by his attentions, just as if she were the last, instead of the first person, who had a right to them. And now at Christmas he had come to her again, and brought with him her dearly-loved son, Percy, always so tender, so good to her, always so quiet and thoughtful when his mother was sick.

Her native air in the beautiful county of Kent had done little to restore her to health. The sweet quietude and retirement of her mother's pretty house, situated near the picturesque pleasuance so quaintly and probably historically named "Dane John," rested her and refreshed her for a time, but she soon flagged again. The old doctor who had ushered her into life, and had known and loved her through childhood to the present time, wore a graver face, Constance thought, almost every visit after he had left her side.

"My precious children, I do not feel as if I could bear to leave them. Who can care for them as I have done? But for my dearest husband, I do not feel, Constance, that he will be so forlorn. I know he will grieve a great deal and miss me sorely at first, and oh, how gladly I would spare him that pain if I could!"

This she said one day in a confidential talk with her governess. She could speak more freely to Constance Anerley than to her beloved mother, whose feelings gave way at the least hint respecting her child's probable death.

Constance was surprised beyond measure, and her feelings showed itself in every feature.

The surprise of Miss Anerley having somewhat abated, Mrs. Mitchell quietly proceeded.

"Men generally remarry, dear Constance, especially ministers, and it is better for them that they should," she said.

"How calmly you talk, dear Mrs. Mitchell! But you could not wish that he should—you could not like it if he did."

"Indeed, I could," she answered. "Whatever is for his comfort I must like."

"I cannot bear for people to marry a second time when they have had a loving husband or wife; it is quite dreadful to me," said Constance, in her old impulsive manner. She was thinking of her idolized father, of her own mother, and of Hermann Ferguson much more than of the Rev. Rowland Mitchell.

"We are differently constituted, dear Constance, and doubtless our heavenly Father fits us for precisely the spheres of labor and circumstances of being in which He places us. You must not mistake me. I should always desire to remain as a tender memory, a beloved being, in the heart of my husband, but I cannot expect, and I believe it would be very selfish in me were I to wish, that he should pass years of lonely widowhood for my sake."

"Yet you would never have married again had you lost him, dear Mrs. Mitchell."

"God forbid!" She said these words with a little cry almost of pain. "My dear Constance, how could I? He was the epitome of manhood—of mankind, to me, the essence of all manly beauty and goodness, the love of my life. You can't take a love and be content after knowing the love, and living years of such intense happiness with him that I can only picture heaven as happier."

She paused, and then continued, "You must not think that Rowland would now suppose it possible he could ever marry again, for indeed I don't believe he would think he ever could. I seem to see all that will happen as in a mirror. Let us call it a magic mirror, for I think it reveals to me the future more truly than ever any so-called magic mirror did."

"Dear Mrs. Mitchell," said Constance, "does it not pain you to talk in this way?"

"No, dear child, it is, on the contrary, quite a relief to me. Let me go on. My gradual decline will, insensibly to Rowland, somewhat reconcile him to any loss. He is not the kind of man to begrudge the expense and trouble of a long illness in a wife, though many men would."

"They are not men; they are brutes," thought Constance, angrily and indignantly, but for fear of exciting the beloved invalid she wisely forbore to speak.

"When death comes to me," continued Ellen Mitchell, "and this life is exchanged for home," here she smiled sweetly, "it will be like an avalanche of sorrow upon his poor dear head. H will be far down, plunged beneath depths anguish, and for a little, perhaps, none had be ter try to comfort him. He will almost live his study for weeks, possibly months. But th he will come up again, like a traveller in t Alps of whom I have read, stunned, bruise bleeding, but whole, and having gained mu experience. Every troubled soul in his cong gation, Constance, will be the better for r death. You think his sermons too flowery n sometimes, Constance; then the fierce wind w have swept over the flowers."

She smiled rather sadly at that thought, a Constance took her thin wasted hand in her o and kissed it many times.

"Gradually," continued Mrs. Mitchell, " will overcome the terror and horror of the a lanche, and want to look at the flowers and frui and all that is most beautiful again. Quiet, ju cious comfort through all, very little when can bear very little, and very much afterwa when he needs it—that is how he will require be treated. A woman's soothing presence alc can do it, and afterward he will learn to lc her for her kindness to him. Constance An ley, do I ask too much of you if I ask you to g him this? I have thought it possible sinc have known that I could not recover. You so clever, so like him in that, and he has ne been able to feel me his equal. And thou you are so young you love the children, and so wise in teaching them, and they all love passionately; you are next to me and their fat with every one of them, from Percy to li Sydney. Tell me, Constance, shall not my li scheme be pictured in my magic mirror?"

Mrs. Mitchell paused that Constance Ane might reply.

Such mingled surprise, aversion, annoya pity, wonder, filled her brain for a few mome that she felt almost stunned; and then, as thoughts grew clearer, she was intensely puz as to the mode of her answer, neither to wo nor to offend, neither to repel nor to dece This was a harder examination than any propounded by Cambridge or Oxford doctor

"Dear Mrs. Mitchell," she began at last, ing hard to hide the consternation into wl she was plunged, and gently smoothing as spoke the hand of the invalid which she held tween her own, "will you forgive me if I that this could never by any possibility happ In the first place, Mr. Mitchell feels so m older and so much apart from me altoget though he has been so kind and friendly, hardly even feel him a friend. I never inten marry a man so much older than myself, n minister, they have so little time for their h and their wives. I could never be patien you have been, dear Mrs. Mitchell; I sh scold if my husband did not do as I wante you could not wish it, could you?"

Constance tried to laugh as she said this, Mrs. Mitchell smiled quite cheerfully. The looked serious again, and said, "You feel this now, Constance, because you know so about him. If you could only know how he is you would feel it an honor to be as ated with him; to be allowed to be as I been, the one who should smooth life for and so free his mind from home anxieties enable him to pursue whatever course he th best in his church and in the world."

"Dear Mrs. Mitchell, that is not a bi kind of life I look forward to," returned stance, to whom this prospect had little th captivating. "If ever I marry—but I think that I shall want to marry for a great years yet. I have hardly tasted freedom school discipline; but if ever I do, the m marry must be in love with me for my own and he must make up his mind that I sh pect him to devote himself primarily to me to other things after me. First, the wif then the world, in whatever shape he tak world, church, chapel, exchange-shop, cou house, consulting-room, or museum."

(To be continued.)

THE GENTILES AND FOUR COMING JUDGMENTS.

By T. B Baines, Esq., of Leeds, England.

The Four Gentile Empires—The Political Displacement of the Jews—The Calling of the Gentiles—Four Classes of Judgments at the Second Advent of Christ—The Subsequent Millennium of 1000 Years.

The "times of the Gentiles" began with the Kingdom of Babylon, the head of gold in Nebuchadnezzar's prophetic dream. Then came the kingdom of the Medes and Persians, symbolized by the breast and arms of silver; the Greek monarchy, set forth in the belly and thighs of brass; and afterward the stronger and more enduring dominion of Rome, represented by the legs of iron. After this, "the times of the Gentiles" changed their nature; iron and clay mingled together, or the rule was divided among kingdoms of various origin and character, though all connected with the dismembered Roman Empire. Another vision shows us that in this last stage in a ten-kingdomed federal form, under the presidency of one specially energized by Satan.

THE ROMAN EMPIRE WILL REVIVE

It is when it has reached this phase that judgment will descend, a stone cut out without hands falling on the Gentile powers and crushing them to pieces, after which it grows into a mountain that fills the whole earth; or, as interpreted by Daniel, "In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever" (Daniel 2 : 44). Such is the history, prophetically traced, of the yet uncompleted "times of the Gentiles."

While these were running their course, the Jews—that is, the two tribes forming the Kingdom of Judah—fulfilled the seventy years of captivity foretold by the prophet Jeremiah. At the close of that period, the Babylonian Kingdom having been destroyed and the Persian established on its ruins, Cyrus issued a decree permitting the Jews of the captivity to return to Jerusalem, in virtue of which a small band, without political power or position, found their way back to the ruined city, and there rebuilt the temple. Nearly a century afterward, the same Gentile power gave a "commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem." From this "commandment" dates Daniel's

PROPHECY OF SEVENTY WEEKS.

It is divided into three parts, of seven weeks, of sixty-two weeks, and of one week. During the first part, of seven weeks, the city was rebuilt. The second part, of sixty-two weeks, comprehends the time from the completion of the city to the cutting off of the Messiah. The third part, of one week, which yet awaits its accomplishment, carries "the times of the Gentiles" to a close, "finishes the transgression" of the Jews, and brings in "everlasting righteousness," the desolator being destroyed, and the Messiah's kingdom established.

The political displacement of the Jews brought in "the times of the Gentiles." The moral or religious displacement of the Jews made way for "the coming in of the Gentiles." It was only when this took place that Israel really became "Lo-ammi," not My people, though they had long ceased to be the centre of God's government on earth. During the coming in of the Gentiles, God's purposes of earthly blessings are suspended. The stream of prophetic time ceases to run. It stagnated, so to speak, after the sixty-ninth week, when Messiah was cut off, and will not again begin to flow till after the fulness of the Gentiles has come in, and God once more takes up the thread of His purposes concerning the earth.

Meanwhile, the Gentiles brought into the vacant place of privilege and responsibility to God, under Christianity, have failed as signally as the Jews did under the law. The greater part have never accepted Christ, even in name; Christendom, the portion of the world which has nominally owned Jesus as Lord, has become a leavened mass, corrupt to its very core. The small handful of true believers in its midst have themselves ceased to present any corporate testimony, are rent into a hundred conflicting sects, have given up the "blessed hope" of the Lord's return for His saints.

But though the Lord "is long suffering to usward, not willing that any should perish," He "is not slack concerning His promise," and in a little while "the trumpet shall sound, and the dead (believers) shall be raised incorruptible, and we (the living believers) shall all be changed." This is the undated, ever-present hope for the Church.

When this "coming of the Lord" for His saints has happened, Christendom, the remaining branches grafted into the olive-tree, having failed to continue in the goodness of God, will be cut off. The fulness of the Gentiles having come in, the corrupt mass of false professors left behind will be dealt with by God in righteous judgment.

During the last unfulfilled week of Daniel's seventy weeks there will commence which precede the "day of the Lord," or the establishment of Messiah's kingdom. These judgments may be broadly divided into four different classes.

THE JUDGMENTS

First. The Jews and the rest of the Israelites will be restored, but only after fearful troubles, from which but a portion will escape. The Jews, who rejected the Christ, will receive the Antichrist, will enter into covenant with "the prince that shall come," the last phase of Gentile power, and will worship his image, "the abomination of desolation," set up in the holy place. The remnant of faithful ones who refuse to have part in these last scenes of wickedness and lawlessness will be persecuted with fearful persistency and malignity, many of them killed, the rest driven into exile. The time will be one of untold tribulation, so that, but for its shortness, no flesh could be saved.

Then the Lord Himself will appear in power and great glory, destroying with the sword out of His mouth the followers of Antichrist, easing Him of His adversaries and avenging Him of His enemes. The effect on the nation will be "like a refiner's fire, and like fullers' soap." Those who "abide the day of His coming," the purged remnant who "come out of the great tribulation," having "washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," shall be a holy people, their dross purged away, their judges restored as at the first, and their counsellors as at the beginning, and Jerusalem shall be "called the city of righteousness, the faithful city."

Thus shall Zion "be redeemed with judgment and her converts with righteousness," while "the destruction of the transgressors and of the sinners shall be together, and they that forsake Jehovah shall be consumed." The elect remnant of Israel also will be brought back, and made to inhabit the land.

Second. But besides the purging judgments referred to, there will be other acts of righteous government and retribution reserved for that dreadful period. Babylon, especially, will come into remembrance. The blood shed and the crimes committed in the name of Christ will then be righteously avenged. The beast and his confederates, themselves, following a still more fearful delusion, will hate the scarlet woman and make her desolate; the very power which has supported her will turn against her; and the cup which she hath filled shall be filled to her double.

THE CORRUPT CARCASS OF CHRISTENDOM,

Third. The fall of Babylon shows the doom of that soulless profession of Christ and that lifeless ecclesiastical organization which will survive when all true believers have been removed to the Father's house. But by whom is this apostate, corrupt system destroyed? By the beast and his coadjutors, that is, by that wicked head of the Gentile powers whose pride and blasphemy will at length draw down the lightnings of God's avenging wrath—the impious chief of those kings of the earth who shall "take counsel together against Jehovah, and against His Anointed."

This associated Gentile dominion is the third class dealt with in the judgments of the last week. The confederacy, headed by the prince and energized by Satan, will form a league with the mass of the Jews and their false Christ, and will gather together their forces to battle; when Christ will appear in His Glory, followed by the armies of heaven, take the beast and the false prophet and cast them alive into the lake of fire, and afterward destroy their followers with the sword that proceedeth out of His mouth. So end "the times of the Gentiles."

Fourth. But there is another class of judgments. The Gentiles who successively held the reins of government as a trust from God do not include the whole body of the peoples of the earth. This sceptre passed from the Babylonian to the Persian, from the Persian to the Greek, from the Greek to the Roman, and at length to the wicked king whose doom we have just seen. But the confederacy between the Jews and the Roman dominion will be directed against a power which at that time threatens Jerusalem with destruction.

This power, which God uses, like the Assyrian of old, as a scourge to the unfaithful Jews, will, when the hour for judgment comes, itself also be visited. When half the city has been carried off, Christ will appear for its deliverance, the besieging host will be cut off, and the remnant of the people saved.

MILLENNIAL JUDGMENTS.

This will close the preliminary judgments. The nation having been purged, Babylon consumed, the last Satanic form of Gentile dominion overthrown, and the enemies who sought to destroy Jerusalem scattered, Christ's kingdom will be established on earth. The saints, who have come purged out of the great tribulation, will receive dominion under Him.

The rest of the Gentiles will be divided into classes, and rewarded or punished according to their treatment of "these My brethren," the feeble remnant of saints harassed and wasted by the persecution of the beast and false prophet. But the great feature will be the fulfilment of all God's earthly counsels in the person of the Second Man, the Lord from heaven, who alone is worthy to receive the dominion, and who alone can exercise it for God's glory or for man's blessing. Satan will be cast into the bottomless pit, while the Bride, the Lamb's wife, seen in figure as the New Jerusalem, will reign with Christ a thousand years.

It is a solemn thing to trace the incurable hatred of the human heart to God. A thousand years' experience of Christ's righteous and blessed rule will not suffice to change the nature of man. No sooner is Satan loosed from his imprisonment than the nations rebel, but only to be at once destroyed with devouring fire from heaven. This last outbreak of human wickedness brings the world's history to a close. The earth is burned up, the elements melt with fervent heat, and no place is found for them.

Then the dead, who had no part in the first resurrection, are raised, are judged according to their works, and are cast into the lake of fire. Satan, death, and hades are all similarly destroyed. And now, the last enemy having been vanquished, the work of reconciliation, founded on the blood of the Cross, is completed; a new heaven and a new earth are created, in which righteousness not only reigns, as during the thousand years, but permanently dwells; Christ, having ruled "till He hath put all enemies under His feet," delivers up the kingdom to God, even the Father; and God, being now all in all, and no longer estranged by human guilt, makes His tabernacle with man.

Such, as traced out in the Word of the living God, is the prospect before the world. Are these the things which Christians are looking for?

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter.

The aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to The Manager, Christian Herald, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

SINGLE COPIES

can most conveniently be obtained through newsdealers. Any complaint that the Christian Herald cannot be obtained from a particular newsdealer is promptly attended to if we are given the name and street address of the dealer who does not keep it for sale.

NOTICE.

To give our readers an opportunity of introducing the Christian Herald to their friends, we will send the paper post free to any address from 1st October, to 31st December, 1880, on receipt of 25 cents.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Result of the October Elections in Ohio and Indiana has caused a genuine sensation throughout the land. The verdict of both States is so decisively Republican as to surprise even the leaders of that party. The contest in Maine had the appearance of a coming tide of Democratic success, so that had Indiana or even Ohio followed on the same line, it would not have caused so thorough a surprise as the result now announced. The majority in Ohio is variously stated, in the absence of official figures, to be about 20,000, with a gain of six Congressmen, while in Indiana it is fixed at about 6000. The Republicans in the latter State have also made important gains in other places on the ticket besides the election of Governor, and it is believed that a Republican will succeed Senator McDonald.

The Democratic party, both in its organs of the press and in the circular issued by the Committee, admits the severity of the double blow, but does not accept it as an augury of failure in the Presidential struggle. Mr. English, in a letter published on Friday, expresses his confident expectation that Indiana will reverse its majority in November. He bases that opinion on the belief that the whole strength of the Republican party was brought to bear on the contest, and in November only the local party will be encountered. It is also averred that Mr. Landers lost many votes by his indecision on the subject of finance. His principles on the financial question are described as not sufficiently pronounced to win the support of either hard-money voters or Greenbackers. It is exceedingly gratifying to notice that, in spite of the apprehensions expressed, the election was conducted in a peaceable and orderly manner, and a very heavy vote was polled.

General Hancock's Letter on the Tariff Published last week, illustrates the difficulty in which candidates are placed by the present condition of parties. Although the Cincinnati platform distinctly indorsed a policy tending toward free trade, General Hancock's letter scarcely conceals his sympathy with the principles of protection. The Republican party is similarly situated, for while the Chicago platform adopted a protective clause, General Garfield is said to be a member of the English Cobden Free-Trade Club and inclined toward a free-trade policy. This curious position may have been caused by the desire of both candidates to retain the support of every member of their respective parties, thus giving voters their choice to vote in each case according to the platform or the candidate. It is, however, scarcely a dignified position to assume, and it is probable that at no distant date, we may see a new party formed on this or some other important issue—a party which will drop all the antiquated, barbarous weapons of politics now in use, and without disparaging and abusing their opponents, or pitting one section of the country against another section, solicit the votes of patriotic citizens on the sole ground of principle and policy. The rise of such a party will be a sign of healthy political progress.

The Republican Demonstration in New York on October 11th was of an enthusiastic character. The illuminations, the decorations, and the numbers of persons taking part in the torchlight procession indicated the earnestness of the managers and the efficient organization of the Republican party in this State. Republican journals assert that over 40,000 men were in line, including deputations from Brooklyn, Philadelphia, and other cities. General Grant reviewed the procession from a stand erected in Madison Square, and appeared highly gratified by the enthusiasm displayed.

A Temperance Congress was Held at Syracuse, N. Y., on October 1st, under the auspices of the New York State Temperance Society, with the object of promoting temperance legislation. It is desired to arouse the people to the importance of passing an amendment to the State Constitution, prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage. The society hopes to induce our legislators to submit the question to the vote of the people, as is being done in Kansas, where it is believed the amendment will be passed by a large majority. There have now been three Congresses held in the State, one each at Saratoga, Elmira, and Syracuse and a fourth will shortly be held at Cooper Union, New York. The Women's Christian Temperance Union and the Good Templars of the State of New York indorse the proceeding, and have appointed committees to co-operate with the society. The Hon. William E. Dodge and another gentleman have each promised an annual subscription of fifty dollars to aid in the work. The officers of the society are Drs. Cuyler, Dunham, and Stryker; Revs. G. A. Smith and A. P. Burgess, and Professor Eli Johnson.

A Mysterious Tin Box Painted Black, with a skull and cross-bones portrayed on the lid, was carried by Professor Eli Johnson to the platform at one of the meetings of the congress, and was the subject of much curiosity. During his address Professor Johnson opened the box and disclosed a number of bottles containing chemicals, with a book of directions explaining their use. The box had been procured at the sale of the effects of a deceased wholesale druggist, and by the aid of the accompanying book Professor Johnson said he was able to produce from the chemicals, imitations of French brandy, whiskey, gin, port and sherry wine, and other famous beverages, so closely resembling the genuine article that even connoisseurs failed to detect the deception. He said there was no doubt that much of the liquor retailed at the bars of our cities was made in that way, and many of the ingredients used were deadly poisons. The book also contained a receipt for a preparation which, properly applied, gave new barrels the appearance of age.

The Want of Men was the Prominent Topic at the anniversary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, held at Lowell, Mass., October 5th. Dr. Clark said in his report that the statistics show an increase at almost every point, save in the working force of missionaries; there are a hundred more places in which the Gospel is preached; eleven more churches organized; twenty-five hundred more on the roll of church-membership; five hundred more youth in higher institutions of learning; and a thousand more in common schools. But death has carried off several earnest workers, so that the force of ordained missionaries, in the field or on the way thither, is less by five than it was a year ago. Professor Hartranft urged that missionary boards ought to acquaint themselves with the qualifications of young men in seminaries, and make out personal calls to them, and leave on their consciences the responsibility of declining the solemn appeal. "Under such an appeal, there will not be many," he said, "who will reply to the great call of God to His prophets, 'Here am I, send him!'"

The treasurer's report showed a gratifying increase upon the contributions of last year of more than sixty thousand dollars; the total receipts for the year were $613,527.51.

A Great Comet Coming.—Prof. Swift, Astronomer of the Warner Observatory, at Rochester, N. Y., discovered another large comet on the evening of October 10th. The new celestial visitor is in the constellation of Pegasus. Its rate of motion is quite slow, being in a northwesterly direction, so that it is approaching the sun. It has a star-like nucleus, which indicates that it is throwing off an extended tail. From the fact of its extraordinary size, we are warranted in presuming that it will be very brilliant, and the additional fact that it is coming almost directly toward the earth gives good promise that it will be one of the most remarkable comets of the present century. There is a possibility that further developments may prove this to be the great comet of 1812, which is being constantly expected, in which event astronomers will have an opportunity of testing the spectroscope for the first time upon these eccentric bodies, and ascertaining certainly what they are. The approach of this wonderful comet combined with the perihelia of the great planets, promises to render the near future a period of unusual interest to scientific men. The humble, faithful Christian, however, sees in these uncommon events and in social and political changes now occurring, those signs for which he was directed to watch, as precursors of the end (Luke 21 : 25).

An Important Enterprise is Projected which illustrates the progress the world is making in scientific achievements while it is retrograding in morality and spirituality. It is proposed to cut a ship canal through Cape Cod, shortening the journey to Boston, Mass., by nearly a hundred miles, and remove entirely the necessity of rounding Cape Cod, a dangerous point, where it is estimated 6000 tons of shipping and twenty lives are annually lost. The estimated cost of the canal is $9,914,625.18.

The Bible and Prayer Union.—The Number of letters received from readers of The Christian Herald making inquiries about the Bible and Prayer Union, indicates the extent of interest the project has excited. We shall feel a pleasure in doing all in our power toward extending and fixing this bond of Christian brotherhood. Christians of all denominations in this country and in Europe, who have adopted the plan of the Unions in reading and meditating on the chapter selected for the day, and offering their prayers for the objects suggested, have tendered their testimony of the benefits received. In Great Britain many remarkable cases of conversion have occurred, and higher degrees of spiritual life been attained as the result of the prayers simultaneously offered, and it is interesting to notice how frequently requests for prayer for a spiritual or temporal blessing are followed by requests that thanksgiving be rendered for the blessing vouchsafed.

The lessons selected by the American Union are consecutive Psalms; that for to-morrow (Friday) being Psalm 81; Saturday, Psalm 82, etc. It would be well if all our readers joined in the plan, and we shall be happy to facilitate it by pubishing such requests for prayer as may be sent to us.

A Fourteen Years' Companion was Exhibited a meeting last week in New York. A sea- ptain held up a little volume which had been aced in his hand by an unknown gentleman in is city in the year 1866. It was the Gospel of hn, and its perusal had been blessed to his ul. The captain said that whether ashore or sea, the book had been his constant compan- ever since. The simple gift had an effect the ent of which can never be estimated. Its in- ence on the captain could not fail to have oduced a change in his life, which must also e benefited the crews who sailed with him.

uvenile Highwaymen in New York.—The result of the tales of desperadoes and high- men published in many periodicals prepared the reading of boys was proved again last k at one of the New York police courts. A gave evidence that as he was carrying eighty- dollars to the owner of the house in which father lived, to pay the rent, he was met by other boys, both under thirteen years of age, whom he was acquainted. He told them errand, and they followed him, and when he in a lonely place they knocked him down took away the money. The young robbers went to a rifle store on Broadway and pur- ed, for sixty-five dollars, a repeating rifle, revolvers, one rifle cover, two large bowie- es, four boxes of cartridges, two fish-lines hooks, and two belts in which to carry their ls and knives. They contemplated starting siness as highwaymen on the pattern of their ite heroes, but the project was nipped in ud by their arrest for robbing the boy.

Lecturer was Interrupted by a Man in udience some time ago. The subject of the re was "Influence," and the speaker was ing that even the humblest and most insig- nt member of society might exercise a ben- influence. "Even the little child in that man's arms," he said, "can do good." t's true," ejaculated the man who held the The ready and emphatic confirmation sur- lecturer and audience, but the cause was ned at the close of the meeting. Then an went to the lecturer, and, after apologiz- r the interruption, said he had been a mis- drunkard, but two hot tears shed on his one night from the eyes of the child he had been the means of turning him is depraved course and making him a re- ble man. When the lecturer stated a fact claimed man had so good reason to in- he could not repress the exclamation.

oung Lady's Face Betrayed a Secret in a r way a short time ago at Avon Springs, ochester, N. Y. She had joined a picnic n a visit to the springs, and as they were ing drinking the waters, her face was ob- to undergo a remarkable change. She oted for the beauty of her complexion, it assumed a mottled appearance: large of a dark shade resembling the discolora- oduced by a blow appeared on her cheeks ck, and the skin surrounding the marks to a ghastly gray hue. Her friends be- larmed and summoned a physician, she insisted that she was perfectly well. physician's arrival the phenomenon was ed. The young lady had applied a prep- to her face to give brilliance to her com- , and the air, impregnated with the sul- the springs, had changed the effect of its nts, thus producing the disfigurement. re many people whose real character will be similarly revealed. Now "they de- ery one his neighbor," pretending to be Christians; but God says, "Behold I t them and try them" (Jeremiah 9:5-7) en will know that the beauty of charac- admired was only a mask put on for a po man's Fight with a Snake.—Mrs. Rachel , of Cairo, Greene County, N. Y., was a field of blackberry brush when she was by a queer sound. Her acquaintance kes soon satisfied her that the noise was the whistle of a black snake known as the racer, and she started on a run. The snake soon overtook her, and immediately began coiling itself about her body. With only a small tin pail as a weapon of defence, she fought desperately, but at a disadvantage, and the coils were drawn tighter until the snake got one around her neck and throat, and she fainted. Her husband, having heard her screams, hurried to her relief, and found her unconscious on the ground. He killed the snake and carried his wife home, but she carried for days a blue mark about her throat. The snake was as large around as a man's wrist and nearly twelve feet long.

The first form assumed by Satan in the world's history was that of a serpent, and his subsequent tactics have resembled those of the deadly reptile. But, unhappily, many who would fight for their lives against a real serpent consent to be governed and guided by him, and wear his yoke cheerfully. But at the last he will be driven from the scene of his conquests by a mightier One than he (Rev. 12:19).

A Sufficient Answer.—In Chicago it was Announced that the notorious blasphemer Colonel Ingersoll would deliver his lecture on the words, "What Must I Do to be Saved?" on a recent Sunday in McVicker's Theatre, Chicago. The Y. M. C. A. stationed a band at the door, and, as each one entered, handed him or her a card on which was inscribed, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." One of those who were about to enter paused and said, "That answer is sufficient; I don't care to hear any other," and walked away.

A Dying Reader to a Dying Audience.—The fourteenth chapter of John was read at a religious meeting in New York last week, and the selection of that chapter a gentleman present said reminded him of an incident of the war. A soldier mortally wounded lay on the field of battle, and as he felt his end approaching he opened his Testament and read for his own comfort and for that of some around him that same chapter; and as he read its blessed words one and another wounded man crawled as near as he could to hear as much as possible of the consoling words of Him who spake as never man spake. The scene was described as touching in the extreme. Several of the listeners died as they listened, and the reader passed away as he read. He was found dead, his hand clasping the Testament from which he read, and there were stains of his life's blood upon the book.

A Struggle with a Bear Occurred in Hoboken, New Jersey, last week. An Italian hired a performing bear from its owner for a trip round the neighborhood, ascertaining first what tricks she could perform. But the bear refused to exhibit the usual antics, when the man beat her over the head in a savage manner. This greatly enraged the animal, and she attempted to tear off her muzzle, but it was too strong. She then caught the Italian and tore his clothing into shreds, threw him to the ground, and hugged him so tightly that it was supposed he was dead. The wounded man recovered enough to crawl out of the reach of the bear, which was secured to a telegraph pole by a rope fastened to a ring in her nose. The wounded man was then taken to a drug store, where his wounds were dressed.

Marriages by Telegraph have the Recommendation of novelty in their favor, but an eminent authority points out that they may be attended with unpleasant consequences. During the past two years ten such unions have been solemnized, and there is a disposition apparent to bring the custom into more frequent use. In case of any dispute arising subsequently as to the legitimacy of the children of such marriages, the legality of the ceremony may be contested on several grounds. The parties were in every case in different States, and the laws of both have to be complied with, and it seems impossible that the laws of either should be fully complied with. One plea that may be urged is that the witnesses saw but half of the marriage (if they saw any of it), as only one of the parties was in their presence.

TOKENS FOR GOOD.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Shew me a token for good; that they which hate me may see it, and be ashamed: because thou, Lord, hast holpen me, and comforted me."—Psalm 86:17.

Where David Looked in the Hour of Conflict—Both Feet on the Rock—I. The Request for a Token—It was Desired in Faith—Fanciful Tokens—Tokens it is Permissible to Ask for—1. Answers to Prayer—Answered Prayers Hopeful Arguments—Prayer Like a Ship—2. The Preservation of Character—Honest Men in Dread of Insolvency—3. Deliverance from Trouble—4. A Sense of Pardoned Sin—A Man Saved from Shipwreck—5. Support Under Trial—The Scale of Strength Established—6. Cheering Visits from Christ and Anointing of the Spirit—II. The Result of Such Tokens—The Unhappy State of the Troubled Soul without God.

I WOULD have you note, beloved friends, at the outset, how this man of God, in the hour of conflict, looks to his Divine Protector. He does not run about to consult with friends, nor does he set himself down to digest his bitter sorrow in solitude, but he gets away to the Lord his God, who has covenanted to help him. That same God who in his brightest days was his exceeding joy is in his darkest night his surest consolation. Hence he cries, "Lord, show me a token for good. Do thou show it. Let it come from thee. All other signs and tokens I can forego, but do thou show me a token for good, and my spirit will be revived at once."

Oh, mourner, learn wisdom from the father of the wisest of men! We need not hesitate to copy the pattern set by the man after God's own heart. Oh! you who are surrounded by persecutors, will you not imitate David? You cannot do better in every adversity than to look unto the Lord, the ever-merciful. I know you have been casting about to the right and to the left to find anchor-hold, and still the vessel drifts. Now, throw the great bower anchor into the depths. Let it go right down deep out of sight, and let it get a grip upon eternal faithfulness, and your bark shall outride both wind and tide. Trust the quicksands of human confidence no longer. Look to the Lord alone.

It is a severance from man, a complete deliverance from the arm of flesh, that God designs by our trouble, and the sooner we come to it the better for us; certainly we shall the more quickly obtain the benefit designed by our trouble, and probably we shall the sooner come to the end of it.

"Trust with a faith untiring In thine omniscient King,
And thou shalt see admiring
What He to light will bring:

"Of all thy griefs the reason Shall at the last appear;
Though hidden for a season
'Twill shine in letters clear."

Observe that, in the case of David, all his troubles drove him to his God. I have noticed in the case of too many professors that they seem to have a fair-weather religion, a summer-season faith, which shrinks and loses its color in a little rain or a sharp frost, or when the wind blows from the cold corner of affliction. I hear of some who, when they are very poor, do not come up to the house of God. They say they have not proper clothes to come in, as if the Lord had respect unto our garments, which are nothing better than the covering of our shame. This is an idle excuse, and yet I know that poverty does drive some professors away from the God whom they profess to worship; they murmur and become discouraged, and give all up in a pet, as if they only loved God for the sake of bread, as a hungry dog will follow a stranger who feeds him.

There are others who say, "I cannot hold up my head among my brethren as I used to do, and so I stay away from the congregation," as if God wanted you to hold your heads up—as if He did not look most to those who hold down both their heads and their hearts. What, will you turn away from the stream because you are thirsty? Will you leave the bread because you are hungry? Is not godliness meant to be a comfort to you in your time of trouble? Do not poor men need the Gospel? Do you not require it all the more now that your comforts are so greatly diminished?

I think the more God chastens his people the more they love him. I am persuaded that are the best of his children. I do not say that any of you may wish for affliction; you will have enough of it without wishing for it; but I do avow my belief that the favorites of heaven are those who feel most of tribulation. Therefore, dear friends, let all your griefs send you in prayer to God, and you will then grow in blessing by every tribulation.

THE MOST WHIPPED OF THE LORD'S FAMILY

Once more, notice that the psalmist, while he thus looks to God, and is driven to him by his troubles, manifestly looks to God alone. There is not in this psalm a word about friends, allies, or helpers. He has but one request, and this is, "Bow down thine ear, O Lord, hear me." His heart is evidently saying,

> "My spirit looks to God alone:
> My rock and refuge is his throne;
> In all my fears, in all my straits,
> My soul on his salvation waits."

God alone—Oh! that is a word to be learned, to be learned by experience, and most assuredly none will ever know it unless they are taught by the Holy Ghost. I do not think we often learn it till we hear it in the thunder of divine power, when the deep-throated tempest within the soul mutters, "God alone! God alone!" In fair weather we are for mixing our trust, but when the whirlwind is abroad none but God will serve our turn.

Oh! my brother man, if thou wilt set one foot upon the rock of divine faithfulness, and the other foot upon the sand of human confidence, thou wilt go down with a great fall. Both feet on the rock! Mind that. Your whole confidence must be fixed upon your Lord. Hang only upon that sure nail upon which hangs the whole universe, and hang nowhere else. What says David? "My soul, wait thou only upon God, for my expectation is from Him." Beware of setting up a rival in the temple of thy trust.

With this as a preface, I now come to notice the particular prayer which David in this state of mind puts up. It was necessary to give you this preface as a kind of guard against the very common tendency which exists among God's people to depend upon signs and tokens. Especially as we are going to preach a little upon this prayer for a "token" it was essential to begin aright, lest we should add to the too common craving for signs and wonders. We will dwell first upon the request for a token, and then, if we have time, we will touch upon the result which David says would come of having such a token—that those which hated him would see it and be ashamed, because God had helped him and comforted him.

I. David puts up

A REQUEST FOR A TOKEN.

It was a token from God, mark you, and it was a token entirely according to God's will. Never forget that it was a token asked in faith, and not in unbelief; for there is a great distinction here.

Dear brethren, we have no right to say, "My God, I will believe in thee if thou wilt give me a token, and if not I will remain in hesitating unbelief;" for the English of that is, "I will reckon thee to be false unless thou show me a sign according to my will." If God be true, thou art bound to believe Him, whether He give thee a token or not; and thou art not permitted to suspend thy faith upon conditions of thine own inventing. Whether He will or will not give thee a token must be according to His own mind. He may give or withhold as He pleases; but thou art bound to believe Him, since every man is bound to believe the truth.

Moreover we have known some who professed to be the children of God, who have picked out certain tokens according to their own whims and fancies and follies, and they have spoken as if God must do this or that at their dictation. I fear that in some this is a wicked presumption not to be tolerated for a moment. At best it is a childish folly, which men in Christ Jesus ought long ago to have outgrown. I do not doubt that the Lord has indulged some of His little children with marks and signs while they were very, very feeble, which He will never give them again, and which they ought never to seek for again—which, indeed, now that they have grown up to riper years and to more strength of grace, they ought themselves to put away as childish things.

Not a few of these signs they may even suspect, saying, "Peradventure after all there was not so much in those marks and tokens as I thought there was. They helped me just then, but I could not rely upon them now; I prefer that which is better and surer." All the rapt experiences which we have ever had are not to be trusted in comparison with the word of God. I say it advisedly, even the sweetest communion we have ever had with Christ may after all be suspected, and indeed it is upon such ripe fruit that Satan soon sets his hand that he may rob us of its savor if possible, for he is not slow to cast doubts upon the holiest joys of God's elect.

Yet

WE MAY ASK FOR TOKENS

in a subordinate sense. Trusting in the Lord, token or no token; believing His word, evidence or no evidence, we may then humbly ask confirmatory seals to our souls. Taking His promise as it stands, and believing it, though the heavens themselves should seem to rock and reel—we may then say, "Yet Lord, inasmuch as I am but dust and ashes, and therefore weak and trembling, show me a token for good."

1. We may feel quite safe in seeking tokens of the kind which are mentioned in this psalm. And first, we may beg for answers to prayer, because the psalm begins with, "Bow down thine ear, O Lord, hear me." There is no fanaticism in expecting God to answer prayer, and there is no misuse of logic in drawing the inference that, if He does hear my prayer in the time of trouble, this is a token for good to my soul. Has my prayer been accepted before Him? Have I received the gracious answer of peace? Then let me be comforted thereby. Especially was I in deep distress where no man could help me, and did I then cry to Him, and did He come to my rescue? Assuredly, this is a seal that is set to my soul that I am no hypocrite. This is a token that I am no stranger to God, and that I am not cast away from His presence. Answered prayers are hopeful arguments of acceptance.

I am not too bold when I assert that the Lord has granted me according to the desire of my heart times without number. The devil himself can never dispute me out of facts—facts which shall forever stand on my memory, "engraved as in eternal brass," for out of the depths I have cried unto God, and He has as distinctly answered my prayers as though He had rent the heavens and come down to succor His servant. With overwhelming delight He fills me, for He hath had respect unto my cry. His tenderness to me in this respect has made my life singularly happy, though I have had a large share of pain and depression. When I think over the seasons in which the Lord has specially answered me, I bid defiance to all the sceptics and scientists who haunt our footsteps.

Brethren in Christ, you have, each of you, in your own way, according to your own need, had sure instances of the faithfulness of God to you, and these have been reviving tokens of love. At this present be of good cheer. Even if for a while the heavens should seem as brass, and prayer should not be heard, recollect that he did hear you in times gone by, and He is the same God, and changes not, and therefore is hearing still, and will answer by and by. Therefore cry mightily to Him.

It may be that your prayer is like a ship, which, when it goes on a very long voyage, does not come home laden so soon: but, when it do come home, it has a richer freight. Mere coa. ers will bring you coals, or such like ordina things; but they that go afar to Tarshish retu with gold and ivory. Coasting prayers such we pray every day bring us many necessaries, b there are great prayers which, like the old Spa ish galleons, cross the main ocean and are long out of sight, but come home deep laden wit golden freight.

Go on in prayer if you have no immedi answer, and let the answers you have had years gone by be tokens for good to your so this time.

> "God liveth still!
> Trust my soul, and fear no ill:
> God is good; from His compassion
> Earthly help and comfort flow:
> Strong is His right hand to fashion
> All things well for men below;
> Trial, oft the most distressing,
> In the end has proved a blessing:
> Wherefore then my soul despair?
> God still lives, and heareth prayer."

2. You meet with another class of tokens the psalm, and these concern the preservation character. Kindly read the second ver "Preserve my soul, for I am holy." I kno am speaking in these dark and troubled time many of God's children who are tried in b ness, and sorely exercised by the general dep sion; your great fear arises out of a dread failure to discharge your debts. You have b praying to the Lord about your business; perhaps Satan has tempted you to a measur unbelief against which you are daily fighting

Now has the Lord helped you to do which is honest and upright before men? He preserved your soul because you are co crated to Him? You have been a loser, bu that loss can you say, "No fault attaches to it is the act of God. Things have not prosp with me, but I have been diligent, and I used my best discretion, and I have curta every expense to save as much as possible have sought to eat my own bread, and not bread of another man, and I would sooner to labor with my hands in the most menial vice than that any should say of me that I forgotten the way of uprightness and integr

If such be the case, you will feel acutely difficulties of your pathway, but you must give way to despondency. Look up and the man, and by no means give up. Fly t Lord in this hour of need, and see what He do. It is written, "Let integrity and upr ness preserve me;" and if such has been case it is a token for good. You have not much if your character remains untarni After all, "a man's life consisteth not i abundance of the things which he possesse and "a good name is better than precious ment."

When God gives a man grace to rejoice i abundance, it is a great thing; but it is an favor when He gives to others of his people to rejoice that they are brought low. Th often more contentment in a narrower s than in a wider one, and a great deal les and anxiety, and more fellowship with God cottage than in a broad mansion. If God your character spotless, reckon that the of fire has not passed upon you. If the enables you to do the right, let Him do wh pleases with you. If we can pay twenty shi in the pound, and walk out of the hous from any charge of unjust dealing, we ma that the worst grief of all is over, for to an est heart it is a crushing trial to be unable every man his own. May the Holy Spiri you in the path of uprightness, and you not envy any among the sons of men.

3. A third form of token for good is fou

DELIVERANCE FROM TROUBLE.

We have seen that in the second verse "O thou, my God, save thy servant that eth in thee," and all through the psalm is crying for deliverance from trouble. addressing many who have felt the strok tribulation. You have been brought very low: in your horror it seemed to you like the lowest hell; but you have been brought up from it, and you can at this hour sing of delivering grace. We are not all hanging our harps on the willows; some of us are praising God upon the high-sounding cymbals because of His delivering mercy, for He has brought our soul out of prison, has delivered our soul from death, our eyes from tears, and our feet from falling. When these things come, they are to be regarded as tokens for good, if they come as the result of prayer and faith.

Come, friends, look back upon the rescues and recoveries of the past, and rejoice in the Lord. One good old saint, when she heard one sing,

"Each sweet Ebenezer I have in review Confirms his good pleasure to help me quite through," aid, "Why, my road, when I look back upon it is paved with Ebenezers. I cannot take a tep but what I step upon a stone of help; and n both sides I see so many records of the Lord's oodness that the road seems walled up by them n both sides." Many of us can say the same. ell, sure,

"His love in time past forbids us to think He'll leave us at last in trouble to sink."

4. There is another form of token which must ever be overlooked, and that is a sense of par-ned sin. This comes in in the third and fifth erses. "Be merciful unto me, O Lord: for I y unto thee daily. For thou, Lord, art good, nd ready to forgive; and plenteous in mercy nto all them that call upon thee." If you feel at your conscience is purged from dead works if you are walking in the light as God is in e light, and are enjoying fellowship with the ather, while the blood of Jesus Christ His Son eanseth you from all sin, then rejoice in the ken for good which is given you.

It may be that your purse is scant, but your sin forgiven! It may be that disease is creeping er your flesh, but your sin is forgiven! What bliss is yours, whate'er your trial may be! ppose yourself to be in danger of shipwreck: e ship is going down, the passengers are rieking with terror, for there is nothing before em but the murderous waves. The boiling ods will soon conceal the last vestige of the p: grim death opens his wide jaws! The last ment has come! But what do I see? What s that which rose upon the crest of the wave? was the the life-boat! Yes! Here comes the -boat, and you are put on board it!

What is your thought at the time? What st be your thought? What! Did you whine t, "I have lost my best portmanteau, which I t in my cabin." What a fool you would be if talked like that! The boatmen would be dy to throw you into the sea. No, your titude forgets all minor things, and rejoices the grand deliverance. You cry, "My life is ed! My life is saved! Blessed be the Lord saving me! My money, my very clothes— I started up in my sleep, and leaped into the -boat—I have lost them all, but I am alive, that is enough. Thank God, I shall see my ive land again!"

Shall a man who is delivered from hell, and ose sins are forgiven, go whining all the day g because he has lost his mony, or some other e, for trifle it is as compared with his soul. kin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he e for his life;" and if our life be saved in ist Jesus, through the forgiveness of our sin His most precious blood, how can we fret? y, man, God has given you a mercy that may llow up your troubles as Aaron's rod swalled up all the serpents. "Strike me, my ," said one of old, "Strike me as thou wilt, that thou hast forgiven me." The pardon in is such a token for good that all ills disear before it.

There is another token for good mentioned he psalm which you may well pray for. You find it in the fourth verse: "Rejoice the soul of thy servant: for unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul." This is

SUPPORT UNDER TRIAL.

It is a very blessed token for good when you are able to keep calm, quiet, and happy in the midst of losses, crosses, bereavements, and afflictions. All the water in the sea will never hurt the ship so long as it is outside: it is only that which enters the vessel that can sink it. Hence the Saviour says, "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God; believe also in me." In the world ye shall have tribulation, but let not your heart be troubled.

What does it matter to a man after all whether God increases the load and increases the strength, or whether he decreases the load and decreases the strength? If a man has to carry a pound weight, and he is so weak that he can only manage to carry eight ounces, well, he is an overloaded man; but if a man had to carry a ton, and God gave him strength enough to carry two, why, he would be a lightly-loaded man, would he not? It is not the weight of the burden, it is the proportion of the burden to the strength. Now the proportion of the burden to the strength was settled long ago—thousands of years ago. It is written, "As thy days, so shall thy strength be."

I think if we were wise we should be willing to accept—nay, we should even rejoice in—the abounding tribulations because of the abounding consolations.

We shall always be little, I am afraid, while our trials are little; but it is when we get into the deeper waters that the Lord helps us to swim, and he makes men of us then, and we begin to glory in tribulation also, because the power of God doth rest upon us. Oh! may the Lord give us faith to come up to this point, and this shall be for ever a blessed token for good when we can say,

"I stand upon the mount of God
With sunlight in my soul:
I hear the storms in vales beneath
I hear the thunders roll:
But I am calm with thee, my God,
Beneath these glorious skies;
And to the heights on which I stand
Nor storms nor clouds can rise."

May God endow us with that token for good; for serenity in suffering, patience in tribulation, joy in the very prospect of death—these are all as white stones, which are the secret signs of divine favor.

6. Cheering visits from Christ, and fresh anointings of the Holy Spirit, are also most sure tokens for good, and if not mentioned expressly in the psalm, must not be omitted in our sermon. They are, however, here in such phrases as these: "Rejoice the soul of thy servant," in verse 4; "unite my heart to fear thy name," in verse 11; "O turn unto me and have mercy upon me," in verse 16; and in the latter clause of our text, "thou, Lord, hast holpen me and comforted me." The Lord graciously visits his people, the clouds break, the night declines, and the day begins to dawn. Precious promises are applied to the heart with reviving power, hope is strengthened, and joy is renewed. Sweet communion is enjoyed under affliction, and Christ is seen sitting as a refiner at the mouth of the furnace. Sin is no longer allowed to burden the heart; yea, the very memory of it, so far as it would cause pain to the mind, is utterly removed, and the glad spirit rejoices in the consciousness of full acceptance with God.

"'Tis like the singing of the birds
When winter's frost is fled;
And like the warmth the sun affords
To creatures almost dead.

"'Tis like the comfort of a calm
Which stills a stormy sea;
And like the tender, healing balm
To such as wounded be."

Of such tokens for good may we enjoy rich store, until the day break, and the shadows flee away.

II. I had many things to say unto you, but I remember Paul's mistake that he made when he preached until midnight, and Eutychus fell from the third loft, for he had gone to sleep; and as I could not possibly raise a sleeper from the dead, as Paul did, I will not try the experiment of preaching as long as Paul did. I cannot say anything as to

THE RESULT OF SUCH TOKENS.

The influence of these tokens upon our foes must be undescribed save that many a time the favor of God to his people has been so conspicuous that their most malicious adversaries have stood in awe of them. Their answered prayers have been like armor to them, their patience has lit up their faces with an awe-inspiring splendor, and their integrity has been a wall of fire round about them.

Even the devil has stood abashed in the presence of the favored ones when God has dressed them in their marriage robes. He has known that they were of that chosen race against which he never can prevail. As for other enemies—"when a man's ways please the Lord He maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him." Like Pilate's wife, even worldly people have pleaded that good men should be let alone; the Lord has made them dream of the glory of their virtue, and they have been afraid. There is a dignity which doth hedge about those who are kings unto God. They that dwell in the uttermost parts of the earth are afraid because of the tokens for good which God sets on His saints.

Here we leave these words, only adding this, what an unhappy state must those be in who have troubles, but have no God to go to; enemies, but no heavenly defender; darkness, and no star of hope!

How poor must you be who cannot escape affliction, and yet have no helper in affliction! You run to your friends, do you? Ah, well, they are a poor refuge to fly to, for mostly they are our friends when we can help them, but when we need anything from them they do not know us.

You trust yourself, do you? Ah, well, I thought little of your friends, but I think less of you, for you are dust and ashes, and nothing else, and if your trust be in yourself it is a dream. And so you are a self-made man! your own creator? You need not be so very proud of your work. As you made yourself, and keep yourself going, you will come to a frightful end one of these days, when the inward force decays into weakness, and all the springs of nature fail. Whatever you make your god is like yourself, and both you and it must pass away ere long. Your hope shall be as a spider's web, and your expectation shall melt like the hoar frost when the sun arises.

THE LORD IS COMING,

the Lord is coming, and woe unto hypocrites in that day! It will go ill with self-confident men in that day. But as for such as trust the Lord, do you know what they say? and they speak as inspiration bids them speak—"I shall be satisfied." I am not yet; but I shall be satisfied And when shall I be satisfied? "When I awake with thy likeness." When the archangel's trumpet sounds, and wakes me into immortal perfection, then shall I be satisfied. Oh! seek the Saviour's face. Dear hearts, that never have sought Him yet, seek Him now; for there is no satisfaction to be had apart from Him. Get away to Him; get away to Him to-night. Cry unto Him, for He will hear you. Come unto him, for He will receive you. May His divine Spirit lead you to cast yourselves on Him, for He will in no wise cast you out. The Lord bless you, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Psalm 86.]

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it, and for its weekly circulation of more than 185,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

TALES OF THE GROG-SHOPS.

By a London Clergyman.

BARTLE THE BUTLER.

(A Tale in Two Chapters.)

CHAPTER FIRST.

"JOHN, where's Bartle?"

John was the footman. Bartle was the butler. The time was the dinner hour. The speaker was the master of the house, Mr. Oaklands.

"Bartle is unwell, sir."

At this news Mr. Oaklands looked at Mrs. Oaklands in a very significant manner. The look seemed to say, "We know very well what is the matter with Bartle."

"Dear me, dear me," said both simultaneously, "whatever shall we do with him?"

"Send Bartle up to me," said Mr. Oaklands.

After an absence of a few minutes John returned with the information that Bartle preferred staying where he was.

At this Mr. Oaklands descended to the pantry. He found Bartle in a very stupid condition indeed, trying to fill a decanter from a bottle he held in his hand, and only half succeeding in his efforts. With one eye shut and the other open, a lock of hair straggling down his face, his necktie disarranged, he looked as drunk as he was.

"Bartle, what is the meaning of this?" sharply asked his master.

Bartle smiled vacantly, and vainly endeavored to stand upright like a sober man.

"Bartle, I insist on knowing what you mean by this."

But Bartle had sense enough to know if he were to open his lips he would probably commit himself; and knowing, moreover, that he had nothing satisfactory to say, held his tongue. So Mr. Oaklands, judging that to talk to him in his present condition would be useless, prudently left him.

Poor Bartle! A more quiet, kind, and well-behaved man by nature never breathed. A better butler, too, when sober, there never was. Indeed, but for his good qualities he would long ago have been dismissed, for again and again had he transgressed and been forgiven on promises of amendment. He was a great favorite too with the young people, and their little voices were ever raised on his behalf when he fell into trouble. In addition to this he had a most worthy wife, who had been an old and faithful servant in the family, and a large number of children almost entirely dependent on him. You will see why so great an offender had been retained in the Oaklands' house.

Now when Bartle so solemnly promised amendment he meant it from his heart. He was really a most unwilling slave. But so tight a hold upon his appetite had strong drink obtained that scarcely ever did he open a bottle, hand around the wine at table, or even visit the wine-cellar, without a terrible conflict. He fought hard against it, and gave way only after a sharp struggle. To-morrow the poor butler's heart would be woefully sore as he looked back on the night before.

The Oaklands had a long conversation that evening as to what should be done with their butler, and came to the decision that no other course was open to them but to dismiss him altogether from their service. They were really sorry; but the peace of the household, and the corrupting influence of his conduct on the other servants, seemed to insist upon the long deferred step being taken. To-morrow Mr. Oaklands would dismiss him.

That night two little tongues prattled away with unaccustomed vigor, and two little heads worked with unwonted energy. The little girls (aged respectively ten and eight) had heard from their nurses of Bartle's disgrace, and although they said nothing at the time, their sorrow was great.

"Poor Bartle! I'm so sorry he's been naughty again, and made papa so angry," commenced the elder little girl, whose name was Fan.

"I'm sorry too, ever so much," replied Tots the younger.

"If papa turns him away to-morrow, Tots, won't it be dreadful?"

Tots felt it would be dreadful too, and said, "Poor Mrs. Bartle will cry, won't she, Fan?"

"Yes, and so will all the little Bartles too. I should, if I were a little Bartle. Wouldn't you, Tots?"

"I shouldn't ever be able to stop, I expect," answered Tots.

And both the little girls felt almost ready to cry then at the very thought of it.

"Only think," said Fan, "if they knew as much as we know about it now, they wouldn't sleep all night, I'm sure. I shouldn't, I know."

"Will they be like those poor people we saw yesterday singing in the street, Fan,' who look so cold?"

"I shouldn't wonder. Papa said it was drunkenness which brought people to do such things; and that if people only kept sober they would have nice fires and clothes, and be ever so different."

Tots couldn't forget that perhaps poor Bartle, with his wife and children, would by and by be compelled to earn their daily bread by singing in the streets, and so she said again,

"I hope they'll never be like them, Fan, to have to stand in the cold and wet without any umbrellas or warm clothes. Wouldn't it kill them?"

"Yes. Papa said that that kind of people never lives very long, because drink and wet and cold and hunger soon dig their graves."

"O Fan!" cried Tots, the great tears rolling down her cheeks, "isn't it dreadful? I shan't sleep all night, I'm sure. I dont feel as if I should ever go to sleep any more."

"I was wondering," said Fan, after looking very grave and thoughtful for a minute or two, "whether we couldn't help poor old Bartle in some way or other."

"Would my twopence a week buy very much?" timidly asked Tots. "How much bread and meat and potatoes and all that kind of thing would it buy, Fan? If it will help them from going about the streets, I should like them to have it all."

"I don't think, Tots, they could buy very much for twopence," responded her sister. "I'm afraid we can't help them much that way."

Tots looked very disappointed at this news, and kept quiet for some time.

"I've been thinking," said Fan, "of what Mr. Fellowes said last Sunday about the grace of God. Do you remember, Tots?"

No, Tots had quite forgotten all about it.

"Well, I don't remember very much, but I know he said that Jesus could make weak people strong, and that it was as easy for Him to help a drunkard as anybody who had a bad temper. I know," she continued, "He can keep back a naughty temper, because He helps me when I ask Him. Now, Tots, why shouldn't He help Bartle too?"

Tots didn't see any reason why Jesus shouldn't. Indeed she felt sure He would.

Then the question arose who should tell Bartle this. First they thought they would ask their mother. Then, deciding that this would not do, Fan resolved that she would tell him herself. As they lay in their little beds that night these two little girls offered each a simple prayer for poor Bartle.

"O God!" prayed Fan, "help poor Bartle, and make him better, and make papa less angry, and don't let him be sent away, for Jesus' sake. Amen."

Then Tots followed: "O God! don't let poor Bartle, and poor Mrs. Bartle, and the poor little Bartles, sing in the cold streets, for Jesus' sake. Amen."

"Now, Tots," said Fan, "mamma says when we pray we must not say, 'I wonder whether God heard us,' but we must say, 'I know God heard us.'"

"All right," said Tots. "We'll say 'I know then."

"And now," said Fan, "I think we'd bette go to sleep, or mamma will be coming up. This was more promptly done than either ha anticipated, for in a few minutes both were fas asleep.

In their dreams that night, as they told eac other the next morning, Bartle and his famil occupied by far the largest place. Fan was ea nestly talking, and telling him what the clergy man said, while Tots was giving him her two pences, and holding up her little umbrella ove their heads while they were singing.

As soon as Fan and Tots had finished the breakfast they made all the haste they could t the pantry, where they knew Bartle was to b found.

How miserable he looked, to be sure! H could scarcely lift his head even when the tw little girls entered, so thoroughly ashamed wa he. He only said, "Good-morning, litt misses," and went on cleaning the plate. Bu Fan and Tots were not to be put off in that way If Bartle would not speak to them, then the would speak to him.

After looking at the brisk movement of h hands for a minute or so, said little Tots, "Poo Bartle!" Whether it was that Tots though Fan too slow, or whether her own little hea was too full to keep quiet, sure it was that fo one reason or the other Tots instead of Fa broke the ice. She had touched him loving with her little hand before she said, "Poor Ba tle!" Fan was saying "Poor Bartle" to with her eyes.

The sight of his two little sympathizers, an their loving pity, quite broke him down. H was obliged to lay aside his polishing and s down. With his hands over his eyes, and h body bent half forward, he sobbed like a chil If he had been scolded or spoken to angrily an roughly, very probably he would have braved out. But, "Poor Bartle!" spoken with both li and eyes, and in such a loving, pitying way, qui disarmed him. It had touched a chord whic vibrated in spite of himself.

Tots had apparently exhausted herself, for sl did not attempt to add to her first remark. was now Fan's turn. Gently touching his han she said,

"Bartle, we're very sorry for you, Tots and Will you let us help you? We want to he you very much."

"I'm afraid you can't do anything, litt misses. I'm not worthy of anybody's help. I' a regular worthless one, I am, and can't be cur anyhow."

"But, Bartle," argued Fan, "why don't yo try very, very hard to keep sober? Don't yo think you'd do it then?"

"No, Miss Fan, I have tried as hard as ma can. I've taken the pledge; I've taken doctor medicine; I've read books about it; but, som how or other, it isn't any good. I'm afra there's no chance for me at all."

Here Tots chimed in, "I've got twopence week, Bartle."

But Bartle, not understanding Tot's train thought, could of course give no answer; an his silence, together with a shake of the hea from Fan, shut her up for some time.

"Bartle," said Fan, "have you tried Jesu Mr. Fellowes said last Sunday that drunkar and bad-tempered people can both be cured b the grace of Jesus. I wish you would try Jesu Bartle."

"Ah! Miss Fan, you don't know how hard is to keep from drink when you've got so muc to do with it as I have. I'm always smelling i and you can't tell how even the glasses of wi I pour out for luncheon and dinner set me o Nobody knows how hard it is but those who' tried."

This was quite a revelation to Fan, that h little glass of wine, when she had lunch with h parents, should prove such a source of dang to Bartle. She could hardly believe it, eve now, and so she said, "Do you feel it when you pour out my glass f wine, Bartle?"

"Yes, miss—everybody's."

Here Tots began to comprehend that perhaps e was involved too.

"And my glass of wine too, Bartle?"

"Yes, Miss Tots—every glass of wine."

Here was a difficulty which Fan and Tots had ot taken into account at all. It quite prevent- their saying anything for some time. Mean- hile Bartle had risen from his chair, and had commenced cleaning the plate. After a while n touched Bartle's sleeve, and, with a very rnest look, said,

"Bartle, would it be any help to you if I were give up my glass of wine?"

Tots immediately put the same question in out the same words. The butler could hardly ieve his ears. As he said afterwards, you ght have knocked him down with a feather. see those two sweet little faces looking aight up into his, and putting such a question that, was a sight that as long as he lived he ld never forget. It was wonderful.

JOHN PLOUGHMAN'S PICTURES.

re of his Talk, by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

NDER this title the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon has ed a sequel to his earlier volume, entitled, "ohn Ploughman's Talk," of which not fewer th 300,000 copies have been sold. In his pre- to the new volume, Mr. Spurgeon says :

'John Ploughman's Talk' has not only ined an immense circulation, but it has ex- sed an influence for good. Although its is rather moral than religious, it has led y to take the first step by which men climb etter things, and this fact has moved me to mpt a second book of the same character. I continued to use the simplest form of our ner-tongue.

To smite evil—and especially the monster of drink—has been my earnest endeavor, assuredly there is need. It may be that the of drunkenness is not more common than it to be; but it is sufficiently rampant to sorrow in every Christian bosom, and to all lovers of their race to lift up their voices ist it. I hope that the plain speech of John ghman will help in that direction.

have somewhat indulged the mirthful vein, ver with so serious a purpose that I ask no veness. Those who see a virtue in dulness full permission to condemn, for a sufficient er will approve."

I speak a word of praise in behalf of Mr. geon's deliberate performances would be a of supererogation. It would be as super- as to "paint the lily or gild refined gold." nion of rich humor with deep piety, and astened, spontaneous use of it, under the nce of a just judgment, are among the manifestations of intellectual power, but . Spurgeon, especially of late years, we seen this union to a remarkable degree. ing to the utterances of his racy wit, which, h vivid, is like summer sheet-lightning, either scathes nor scars, we are reminded of his favorite authors, John Bunyan, and e more than Mr. Spurgeon illustrates the ty of his aphorism, "Some things are of ature as to make one's fancy chuckle while rt doth ache. We append verbatim what s in connection with the accompanying pic- re e's not much profit in this game. Think an and a boy and four horses all standing r the sake of a mouse! What would old Tusser say to that? I think he would in this fashion:

R STOP A PLOUGH TO CATCH A MOUSE.

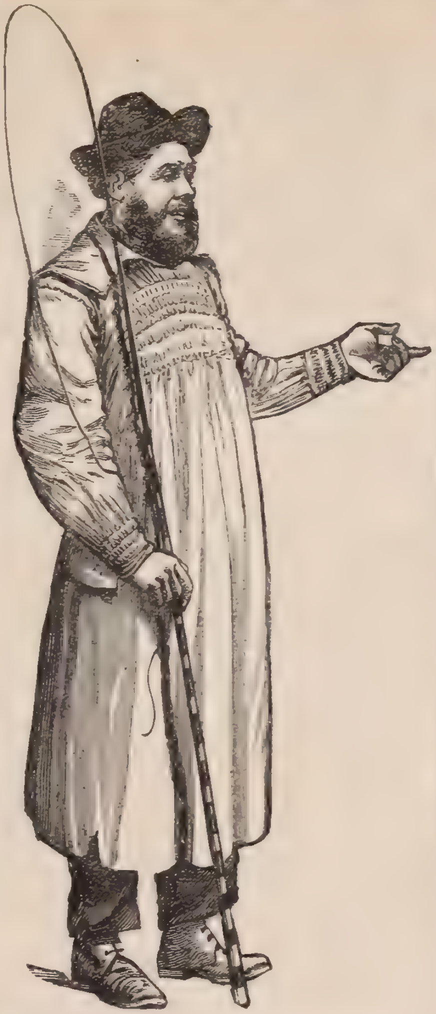
A ploughman derseveth a cut of the whip
f for idle pretence he let the hours slip.

of people act like the man in our picture. ave a great work in hand which wants r wits, and they leave it to squabble over etty nothing, not worth a fig. Old mas- n would say to them :

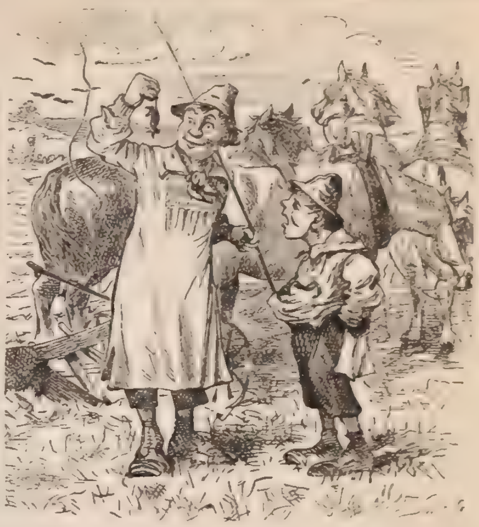


No more tittle-tattle, go on with your cattle.

He could not bear for a farmer to let his horses out for carting even, because it took their work away from the farm, and so I am sure he would be in a great stew if he saw farmers wasting their time at matches, and hunts, and the like. He truly says that the main chance must be minded, and the little things must be borne with. Nobody would burn his house down to kill the black beetles, and it would never answer to kill the bullocks to feed the cats. If our baker left off making bread for a week while he cracked the cockroaches, what should we all do for breakfast? If the butcher sold no more meat till he had killed all the blow-flies, we should be many a day without mutton. If the water companies never gave the Londoners a drink till they had fished every gudgeon out of the Thames, how would the old ladies make their tea? There's no use in stopping your fishing because of the seaweed, nor your riding because of the dust.

Now, our minister said to me the other day, "John, if you were on the committee of some of our societies you would see this mouse-hunting done to perfection. Not only committees, but whole bodies of Christian people go mouse-hunting." "Well," said I, "minister, just write me a bit, and I will stick it in my book, it will be beef to my horse-radish." Here's his writing:

"A society of good Christian people will split into pieces over a petty quarrel, or mere matter of opinion, while all round them the masses are perishing for want of the Gospel. A miserable little mouse, which no cat would ever hunt, takes them off from their Lord's work. Again, intelligent men will spend months of time and heaps of money in inventing and publishing mere speculations, while the great field of the world lies unploughed. They seem to care nothing how many may perish, so long as they can ride their hobbies. In other matters a little common-sense is allowed to rule, but in the weightiest matters foolishness is sadly conspicuous. As for you and me, John, let us kill a mouse when it nibbles our bread, but let us not spend our lives over it. What can be done by a mouse-trap or a cat should not occupy all our thoughts.



"The paltry trifles of this world are much of the same sort. Let us give our chief attention to the chief things—the glory of God, the winning of souls for Jesus, and our own salvation. There are fools enough in the world, and there can be no need that Christian men should swell the number. Go on with your ploughing, John, and I will go on with my preaching, and in due season we shall reap if we faint not."

Our readers will recognize the engraving accompanying this article as a portrait of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, in the costume of an English farm-laborer.

A MOTHER'S HEROIC RESOLVE.

To honor Christ is forcibly illustrated by Mrs. Pennefather, of Mildmay, in a recent number of Service for the King.

"A 'widow and desolate,' she had two bright young sons who promised to be the stay of her declining years. But God had fulfilled the dearest wish of her heart, and revealed to both her boys the constraining power of the love of Christ. A strong missionary purpose took possession of the mind of her eldest son; and the mother, who had asked for the conversion of her child to God, accepted the answer. He was soon engaged by one of our missionary societies, and Africa was announced as his destination.

For a little while all went well, but ere long the young life succumbed to a climate which had proved fatal to so many, and the sad news had to be conveyed to the widowed mother. It was a sorrowful mission for the officer of the society who undertook to carry the tidings, and a yet more difficult message was to follow.

After some conversation with the heart-stricken mother, and many words of united prayer and consolation from God's own Book, her friend paused, and, taking her hand, he said very solemnly, 'And now we want Joseph.' The widow buried her face in her hands, and for some minutes they remained in silence; then, lifting her streaming eyes to heaven, she repeated the words,

'Were the whole realm of Nature mine,
That were an offering far too small;
Love so amazing, so divine,
Demands myself, my life, my all.'

The resolve was made, and the brother went out to fill the vacant place. Is not the Master saying to both parents and children, 'Come, follow me' and 'ye shall have treasure in heaven'?"

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

(Continued from page [illegible].)

New Aquaintances.

SOON after the dessert was cleared away a rustling of silk was heard in the passages, the door opened, and three ladies entered the room.

The first was a stout, elderly lady, very handsomely dressed. In her younger days I felt sure she had been a beauty, and I think she must have been greatly admired. But she had, I thought, an unpleasant expression in her face, and a haughty and disagreeable manner.

"Well, Evelyn," she said, as she swept past me without a word or a look, "how are you feeling now?"

"Oh! very nicely, thank you, Lady Eldridge," she said; "Miss Lindsay and I have had quite a pleasant chat together."

"Miss Lindsay, ah! yes, I see," said Lady Eldridge, turning to me for the first time; "the young person whom Sir William has engaged as your companion, Evelyn, I believe."

And then she took no further notice of me, but sat upon the sofa at Evelyn's side, fanning herself vigorously.

There was something in Lady Eldridge's manner which made me uncomfortable and uneasy, and I had withdrawn to the table with my work as the two other ladies advanced to the fire, not intending to take any part in the conversation, when a pleasant, gentle voice by my side said kindly, "You must be tired with your long journey, Miss Lindsay; had you to stop many times by the way?"

I looked up and met one of the sweetest faces I have ever seen. It was not exactly a pretty face, and the features were far from handsome, but there was such a beautiful expression upon it that you could never have called it plain. I should have been very puzzled if any one had asked me how old she was. At one time she looked quite young, not more than four or five and twenty; and the moment afterwards I detected strong marks of care, or anxiety, or trouble on the face, which made me think she must be at least ten or fifteen years older.

I told her about my journey, and then she asked me one question after another, in the kindest, pleasantest way, as if she really cared to know all I had to tell her. She led me on from one subject to another, and I found myself telling her of our old home; of Maggie, and my hopes and fears for her; and of many other things, while Lady Eldridge and Evelyn were talking together on the sofa; and all the chill and repression which had come over me when Lady Eldridge entered the room entirely passed away, and I felt perfectly at my ease again.

When I told her of our leaving our dear old home her eyes filled with tears, and she said quietly, "I know what a trial that is; I have gone through it myself. What a comfort that there is one home where there will be no parting and no going away!"

Such a happy, thankful feeling came into my heart as she said this. There was something in the way she said it, as well as in the words themselves, which made me feel sure that my new friend was one who loved the same Lord I loved. And, if I had felt drawn to her before, I was doubly drawn to her now.

We had no opportunity for further conversation, for Evelyn was growing weary of Lady Eldridge, and invited us to come nearer to the fire.

"Put away your work, you industrious girl," she said to me. "The brown alpaca always had her work close to her fingers' ends at a moment's notice."

"My dear Evelyn," said Lady Eldridge, "a most profitable way for a young person."

But Evelyn took no notice of her, and turned to my new friend.

"Where have you been all day, Lilla?" she said. "You have only been to see me three times."

"Have I been so negligent as that, dear?" she said. "I must mend my manners to-morrow; but I have been very busy writing letters, so you must forgive me."

Until I had turned to the fire I had not looked at the third lady who had come into the room. She was sitting languidly in an arm-chair by the fire, with her eyes fixed on the door, as if she were looking anxiously for some one to enter. She was decidedly advanced in middle age, yet she was dressed like a girl of seventeen; in a low, white evening dress, and a most elaborate gold chain and locket round her neck, she looked dissatisfied and restless, as if she was always striving to reach some object which was eluding her grasp. She took no particular interest in the general conversation which was going on, but seemed either lost in thought, or not thinking at all.

Lady Eldridge was giving an account of Eastern life, which she described as the most delightful life on earth. I found she had lived many years abroad, and was going to Constantinople the following spring.

She could not settle in England more than a year at a time, she said. "Those miserable skies, those depressing fogs, those dreadful rainy days—enough to make any one commit suicide who has lived in the East, my dear." And Lady Eldridge fanned herself again at the bare recollection of it.

She kept up a continual run of conversation for about half an hour; but she gave me an idea of being a woman who had hardly opened a book in the whole course of her life, and who was thoroughly ignorant of everything except the worldly ways of the worldly world, in which she seemed to be anything but ignorant.

But her chattering was brought to a close by a rap at the door, and the announcement that the gentlemen had arrived in the drawing-room.

"Those tiresome men!" said Lady Eldridge; "as if they could not amuse themselves for half an hour without sending for us. Well, Alicia, I suppose we must obey the lords of creation and go down-stairs. Good-night, Evelyn, my dear."

And, without taking the slightest notice of me, Lady Eldridge sailed out of the room.

The other two ladies said good-night to both of us, and followed in her train, and Evelyn and I were left alone.

"Well, what do you think of them?" she said as soon as the door was shut; "bring your chair close to the fire and tell me."

"I think that the lady who sat near me has one of the sweetest faces that I ever saw," I said. "I could quite believe in any one loving her at first sight."

"Oh! Lilla, yes; isn't she nice?" said Evelyn carelessly; "every one seems to like poor Lilla."

"Why do you call her poor?" I asked.

"Oh! because she has had so much trouble," Evelyn answered; "she was engaged to a young officer a good many years ago, and it was broken off; his father persuaded him to marry some one with more money. Lilla is papa's first cousin, and she often stays here; it is very dull for her at home; her father has married again, and his new wife is such a horrid old thing, who treats Lilla as if she were a child of twelve. But Lilla never complains; she is very patient. And what did you think of Lady Eldridge."

"I had rather not say, please, Evelyn; I do not think it is very kind to talk about people so much."

"Oh! it won't hurt Lady Eldridge, I assure you," she answered; "she is miles too high up in the world to be hurt by anything you or I may say or think of her—at least she thinks that she is. Papa says she has nothing to boast of if her antecedents were looked into. She was quite poor, and lived in some remote Eastern city, when her good looks attracted Sir Hugh Eldridge's attention, as he was passing through the place, and he married her. But she thinks herself a perfect queen now, and lords it over everybody.

"I often pity her poor maid. It is 'Lawrence, here,' 'Lawrence, do this,' 'Lawrence, do that,' from morning till night; for Lady Eldridge thinks it is a disgrace to do the simplest thing for herself, or even to know how it ought to be done. She boasts of being as ignorant as a baby about all money matters, and cannot even pay á bill for herself. Silly old thing!" said Evelyn contemptuously; "I have more respect for Alicia Hay than I have for her."

"Is that the lady who sat in the arm-chair by the fire?" I asked.

"Yes, poor thing!" said Evelyn; "she wouldn't talk a bit to-night. I know why just as well as if I had been there. It was just because Lor Moreton didn't take her down to dinner;" an Evelyn laughed at the thought of it. "Didn' you see how she looked at the door every tim a step came in the passage, because, sometimes papa comes up for a few minutes on his way t the drawing-room to cheer me up a little; an sometimes he brings one of the gentlemen wit him; but they didn't come to-night, so poo Alicia was quite disconsolate; she had not th heart to talk to any one. And if she only kne —oh, if she only knew what Lord Moreto really thinks of her!"

"Poor thing!" I said; "is she very fond him?"

"Oh, not of him in particular," said Evely laughing; "but you see poor Alicia is gettin old; she really is, though she would be ver angry if any one told her so, and she wants ve much to be married, and to have a home of h own."

I was not sorry when Evelyn asked me to rin the bell for her maid Clemence, and I was liberty to go to my own room, for I was ve tired after all the travelling and excitement had gone through that day.

I lay awake for many hours, watching t flickering of the firelight, and listening for t striking of a large clock in the hall, whose dee sonorous voice could be heard in every part the great house.

The next morning I awoke before it was lig and had been dressed for more than an hour fore Clemence came to conduct me to her you mistress's dressing-room. I found Evelyn lyi on a sofa by the dressing-room fire, in a pret pink dressing-gown, and with her fair hair har ing down in long waving tresses. She looke perfect picture, I thought, and one that a artist would take pleasure in painting. S seemed pleased to see me, but was languid a tired, and not so much inclined for talking as s had been the night before.

Breakfast was brought up soon after I arriv and, while we were eating it, the door open and an elderly gentleman came in. He had e dently been very handsome in his younger da and there was a cheerful, pleasant, good-te pered expression on his face, which made h look younger than I imagine he really was.

"Oh, papa," said Evelyn, brightening up moment that she saw him, "I am so glad have come! How naughty of you not to co last night! I wanted you so much to see M Lindsay—May, I call her now," she add laughing.

Sir William shook hands with me very kin and said he hoped I should soon feel at ho and that his little daughter would not wear out with her chattering.

"Now, papa, what nonsense!" said Eve gayly; "May was at home when she had b here ten minutes, were you not, May? And likes chattering just as much as I do. You just as if she was the brown alpaca I told about. But she is not a bit like her; she i nice, papa, and we get on together famously

"That's right," said Sir William, seat himself on the sofa; "and how is my little this morning?"

"Only a little tired, papa," she said wear "the pain kept me awake last night."

He looked at her very anxiously, I though he stooped over her and gently arranged pillows, as carefully and tenderly as any wo could have done.

"Keep very quiet this morning, little g he said; "I will not let any of them come you. Miss Lindsay will read to you, and can lie quite still."

"Oh, no, thank you, papa," she said ch fly; "let them all come; it does me good to ive people coming in and out; it amuses me; ey are so funny, some of them, aren't they, pa? Don't they make you laugh sometimes?"

ir William made some evasive answer, and nced toward the end of the room, where I s sitting at work.

'Oh, you need not mind her, papa," said elyn aloud; "she is not the brown alpaca. I an to tell her everything, and to talk just the e when she is in the room as when she is out t."

ir William seemed rather amused at the rapid ndship that had sprung up between us, but it not appear to displease him, for he smiled dly at me, and gave me a few more words of come as he rose to leave the room.

(To be continued.)

JOSEPH SOLD INTO EGYPT.

S. Lesson for October 31st, Gen. 37. Golden Text, Prov. 19 : 21. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HE history of Joseph is a striking illustration at great principle of the Christian life that must bear suffering in order that we may be pared for glory. "Heirs of God, and joint s with Christ; if so be that we suffer with , that we may be also glorified together" (Rn. 8 : 17). The meaning of Joseph is in- e, addition; "Joseph is a fruitful bough," his father, "even a fruitful bough by a well" . 49 : 22); and it is just the fruitful children od who are most surely called upon to suffer. ery branch that beareth fruit, He purgeth hat it may bring forth more fruit" (John). "He shall sit as a refiner and purifier ver; and he shall purify the sons of Levi, urge them as gold and silver, that they may unto the Lord an offering in rightousness" 3 : 3).

acob dwelt in the land wherein his father was nger. . . Joseph, being seventeen years old, feeding the flock with his brethren . . . Joseph brought unto his father their evil t." This is first introduction to him. that which follows we may believe it was spirit of talebearing, but from a sense of that he told his father of the sin of his ren. This was no easy task for a younger er. He laid himself open to the worst of ill- g, and forfeited all popularity among them. oseph was a child of God, and lived, not to at was pleasant, but what was right, and more impossible to him to be party to a sin cealing it than to bear the worst of conse- es by making it known. There is a great nce between the needful and the needless ure of sin. When, for instance, a servant re of unfaithfulness in another servant, ils to tell her mistress of it, she becomes a to the sin, and so sins against God, against istress, and against her fellow-servant, to she ought to be faithful; if she seeks to the responsibility, saying, "It is none of siness," she is acting selfishly and dishon- . But when a servant has confessed a made restitution, and received pardon, if fellow-servant speaks of it further, and to it unnecessarily in the presence of , then she is guilty of a want of love. The ule applies among children, fellow-work- tc. We need the uprightness of true love, will do the right thing, let it cost what it ay.

he ill-will of Joseph's brothers against him . all lie at his door. His father Jacob was t, for we read, "Now Israel loved Joseph han all his children, because he was the his old age; and he made him a coat of olors." How common, but how danger- the sin of partiality in parents! Our ly Father is "no respecter of persons" o : 34), and in the measure in which we le Him we shall learn to know no man, n our own children after the flesh. We arn to put our own selves and our own out of the question in dealing with nd instead of allowing idiosyncrasies in them to appeal to something similar in our nature, we shall love, train, and guide them for God. Then the fact of one child being the youngest will be no excuse for a partial love to him, and it will be quite out of the question to make marked and visible distinctions, as Jacob did by the coat of many colors. Many parents are responsible for a terrible bitterness of spirit in their children one against the other because they have been guilty of indulging in some trifling partiality toward one more than another. Young hearts, in which self is dominant, are intensely sensitive to anything like injustice. "And when his brethren saw that their father loved him more than all his brethren, they hated him, and could not speak peaceably unto him."

Joseph had a life unknown to his family, which they had no power to understand or to enter into; probably his father understood him better than any other. "Joseph dreamed a dream," and in those days dreams were communications from God. "He told it his brethren; and they hated him yet the more." All their natural pride of heart would rebel against this young upstart as they would think him, who not only went hither and thither clad in the distinctive garment which marked him their father's favorite, but also set himself up to hold a communion with God which they did not as much as aspire to. This was unbearable to these natural men.

Perhaps Joseph was not wise to tell his dreams to his brothers, as they so nearly concerned himself. It is very common in the early days of our life as believers to speak of our inward experience to everybody, not knowing or considering whether they are able to understand and appreciate it. In the energy of the flesh, and with much self-confidence, we judge that that which is blest to us must be blest to others also, and thus we do much which is not done in the spirit. Joseph's brothers set down to sinful ambition that which was really a revelation of God to him. When he told them his dream "they hated him yet the more." We notice how in his inward communings he was occupied, not with things present, but with his future reign and glory. And so is it with all those who are in God's training school. They have in sight the goal—"the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 3 : 14); but they must first learn to suffer for a while (1 Peter 5 : 10). Joseph's brethren said to him, "Shalt thou indeed reign over us? or shalt thou indeed have dominion over us? And they hated him yet the more for his dreams, and for his words." After he had told his second dream his father also rebuked him. No one understood him; he was alone in his family "separate from his brethren" (Gen. 49 : 26). "His brethren envied him, but his father observed his saying."

This loneliness in the family is one of the keenest trials of young Christians, but nothing so tends to throw them upon God as being misunderstood by man; and we may be quite sure that the story of his wrongs was poured into the bosom of his God, who enabled him to see all things in His holy light. We see how Jacob sent him to visit his brethren who were feeding the flock in Shechem. He was ready to go and serve the brethren over whom he knew he should rule in the future; and when he did not find them he made no excuse to come home without fulfilling his mission, but took pains to find them, and said to a stranger whom he met, "I seek my brethren; tell me, I pray thee, where they feed their flocks." And being directed to Dothan, he went after his brethren and found them there. All his manner of acting toward them was a proof that he had nothing against them, that the enmity was all on their side.

Perhaps some young, newly-converted soul may read these pages. Let me ask of such, Can you take all the injustices misunderstanding through which you pass, from God's hand and not from man's? Can you look with tender, compassionate love on those who wrong you, knowing that they are blind and cannot understand you until God opens their eyes? Every moment of suffering which you are called upon to bear is a precious opportunity of manifesting Christ to those who know Him not, and of showing them that in very deed you live not unto yourselves, but unto Him which died for you and rose again.

Joseph's brethren, unrestrained by the presence of the spirit of God, were bent on mischief. "When they saw him afar off, even before he came near unto them, they conspired together to slay him. And they said one to another, Behold! this dreamer cometh. Come now, therefore, and let us slay him, and cast him into some pit; and we will say, Some evil beast hath devoured him; and we shall see what will become of his dreams." Oh! how unconverted men rebel against the fact that the living God has really to do with those who trust in Him! They will not have it at any price; they know well that if it be true then they are shut out from God and heaven, and therefore they will seek by any means in their power to disprove the relation which subsists between God and His children.

There was a difference between the brethren of Joseph. Reuben, the eldest, was a weak man; he wanted to save Joseph for his father's sake, but was not bold enough to stand against his ten brothers; so he said, "Shed no blood, but cast him into this pit that is in the wilderness, and lay no hand upon him." So, when Joseph was come to his brethren, "they stripped Joseph of his coat, his coat of many colors that was on him. And they took him and cast him into a pit," but God watched over His child. "The pit was empty, there was no water in it. We only know what Joseph suffered at this time from the words spoken afterward by his brethren in Egypt (chap. 42 : 21), "We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear."

Having acted with this wanton cruelty, his brethren sat down to eat bread, so heartless is man when the spirit of jealousy and revenge is upon him. Just then a company of Ishmaelites passed by, and Judah, who had more power with his brethren than his weaker elder brother, said, "What profit is it if we slay our brother, and conceal his blood? Come, and let us sell him to the Ishmaelites, and let not our hand be upon him; for he is our brother and our flesh." "And there passed by Midianites, merchantmen; and they drew and lifted up Joseph out of the pit, and sold Joseph to the Ishmaelites for twenty pieces of silver; and they brought Joseph into Egypt." Reuben was evidently not present at this transaction, for he "returned unto the pit; and, behold, Joseph was not in the pit; and he rent his clothes. And he returned unto his brethren, and said, The child is not; and I, whither shall I go."

How terribly was Jacob's sin of deceit visited upon his children, and on him through his children, when his sons "took Joseph's coat, and killed a kid of the goats, and dipped the coat, in the blood; and they sent the coat of many colors, and they brought it to their father; and said, This have we found: know now whether it be thy son's coat or no." He had deceived his father, he was deceived by his sons in his turn. "He knew it, and said, It is my son's coat; an evil beast hath devoured him; Joseph is without doubt rent in pieces." Thus his surmise prevented his sons from telling the lie, but the holy eye of God saw the lie acted.

It was a fearful retribution to Jacob for his partiality to his son Joseph. "And Jacob rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his loins, and mourned for his son many days. And all his sons and all his daughters rose up to comfort him; but he refused to be comforted; and he said, For I will go down into the grave unto my son mourning. Thus his father wept for him.' It is not to be wondered at that his children failed to comfort him, when every word of consolation was hypocrisy, for they had caused his grief, and how could they, with the sin upon their consciences, lead their father to find his solace in his God?

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The European Contest with Turkey has Resulted in the Sultan signing an order for the cession of Dulcigno to Montenegro. He received information that England as representative of Europe contemplated seizing the port of Smyrna, and holding it until he complied with the demands of Europe. There is suspicion that even now the crisis is not over, as the Sultan's order, being obviously granted under compulsion, may be resisted by the Albanians with impunity, and it is a suspicious circumstance that the harbor of Smyrna is now being protected by torpedoes, which looks as though the Sultan had only schemed to gain time.

The note announcing the surrender, which the Sultan handed to the ambassadors of the Powers at Constantinople, expresses the hope that the pressure of the Powers will be relinquished as regards the settlement of the other pending questions. As these pending questions include the cession of considerable territory to Greece, in which the British Premier is much interested, there will probably be another contest. It is now said that the Sultan never attached any real importance whatever to the surrender of Dulcigno to the Montenegrins—his real fear was that the Great Powers would unite to demand a further carrying out of the Treaty of Berlin and the cession of Janina to the Greeks.

On the Greek question Great Britain will not have the general support of Europe, which fact will encourage Turkey to resist the pressure of England. The probabilities of war are therefore increased, and the London correspondent of the New York World states that there is a growing apprehension that "war is almost inevitable at a very early date, probably in the spring of 1881, and some financiers in the city usually reckoned as shrewd and far-seeing men are already planning extensive operations with the outbreak taken for granted. The Greeks are determined to obtain possession of Janina at all hazards and cost, and Mr. Gladstone is as resolute in his determination to help them, while Turkey will yield no more—indeed, can yield no more."

The Arrest of Mr. Parnell and the Leaders of the Irish Land League in Ireland is expected to take place, the law officers of the British Government having advised the ministers that there is sufficient evidence in the reporter's notes of their speeches to convict them of conspiracy. The Government apparently think the arrest of the leaders would be a more efficacious proceeding than suspending the Habeas Corpus Act.

How serious the situation is, may be learned from a letter written by Mr. James A. Froude to the London Times on October 12th, in which he says: "Ireland and the Irish people may still be safe if we show that we are not afraid; that we will at least try to be just, and that one function of justice is to punish crime. If Messrs. Gladstone and Forster have their way, then civil war, is, I think, inevitable. Home rule will follow, and Ulster Protestants will never submit to the legislation of a home-rule Parliament. I am greatly attached to the Irish people. I wish to save them from the fate which surely awaits them if they are again brought into collision with this country."

A Religious Revival is Progressing among the descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty, who twenty years ago removed from Pitcairn to Norfolk Island. They have always borne the character of being more under the power of the Gospel than average Christians are, and it would appear that their love for the truth has not abated of late years. Their invariable custom has been to assemble every morning in the ordinary place of worship for prayer, before proceeding to their daily work; and in this respect they resemble the seventy or eighty persons who form the whole population of the lonely little island of St. Kilda, in the Atlantic, on the north-west coast of Scotland, and who, although an isolated community, are apparently the most godly and simple-hearted people in the British Isles. The Norfolk Islanders have three full services every Sabbath and their Scripture knowledge is said to be great. The educational acquirements are also of no mean order, there being an excellent school on the island. The spiritual oversight of this peculiar congregation has during the past thirty years or upward been under the Rev. Mr. Nobbs, who on the occasion of his coming to England was presented to the queen, and immediately afterward ordained by the Archbishop of Canterbury as Minister of Pitcairn Island. Mr. Nobbs, who is an old naval officer, and whose life seems to have been a checkered one, is a devoted man.

The Lord Mayor of London Elected for the ensuing year is a Methodist. An English journal states that this is the first time a member of that church has held the honorable position of chief magistrate of the city of London. The lord mayor elect is Mr. Alderman McArthur, member of Parliament for Lambeth. There is no doubt as to Mr. McArthur's love for Methodism, nor as to his fidelity to Liberal principles. It is especially interesting to learn that during Mr. McArthur's mayoralty a Pan-Wesleyan Methodist Conference will be held in London.

The Welcome Intelligence is Received that the horrors of the famine in Persia are abating. Mrs. S. J. Rhea, writing to the Chicago Interior, says: "The famine is over, the harvest is in, is excellent and abundant, and the millet which the missionaries sowed is especially cheap, and will feed the poorest. The public charities have ceased, the soup-houses are closed, and the missionaries are planning other and more directly spiritual work for the coming winter. It is well that the money has not yet entirely ceased to flow for famine relief, as many are utterly impoverished, having sold everything for bread, even the timbers of the houses and all their cattle; and many helpless ones remain unprovided for—aged persons, widows and orphans, especially orphans. Little pitiful children beg for homes; even Mohammedans knock at Christian doors."

A Remarkable Confession of Crime has been made in Holland. A clerk in a Government office accuses himself of having kidnapped the son of a rich man on September 23d, and having written to the father demanding a ransom of $30,000. He asserts that he subsequently murdered the boy, and has given himself up for punishment. The dread of poverty for himself and his family is the motive he assigns for the attempted extortion which led to the atrocity.

Mr. Spurgeon's Girls' Orphanages are well on their way toward completion. The corner stones of two new houses were laid on Monday, October 4th. The Rev. Hugh Stowell Brown laid the corner stone of the Liverpool House, and Mr. G. Palmer M.P., that of the Reading House. Mr. Spurgeon says, concerning Mr. Brown:—"By his means Liverpool has done grandly for us. The Boys' Orphanage has given shelter to twenty-one ministers' sons, and such interest may be wisely secured in the Girls' Orphanage. Oh, that the good Physician's hand may give us back our limbs again, free from anguish and weakness, and then we shall weep for joy at the sight of the rising walls of the Girls' Orphanage." Speaking of his illness, Mr. Spurgeon writes: "Troops of orphans, students, colporteurs, and evangelists seem to march through my poor brain both sleeping and waking. All must be left with the Lord. Where could they be better?"

Hurricanes in the South Seas have wrought great devastation in the islands of Maré and Lifu (Loyalty Islands), where two of the London Missionary Society's mission stations are located. The Rev. J. Jones, writing from Maré, says: "In this district there are scarcely any houses left standing; the sea rose to a fearful height, sweeping stone houses and stone walls completely away. My house was made a place of refuge by the poor homeless people. They brought their children in crowds to escape the wind, rain, and sea; some of the people were carried in quite exhausted. No fire could be kept alight, the houses being all washed away; consequently no food could be cooked, except in my kitchen." The Rev. S. Creagh writes fro Lifu: "Terrible destruction has been done very few of our chapels remain intact. O beautiful chapel at Xepenhe is a mass of ruins the gable wall, built of solid masonry by Frenc practical workmen, was blown flat down. C coanut-trees have fallen by thousands; the yan cocoanut, and banana crops, which bade so fai are all ruined."

An Idiotic Pursuit is Described by an Eva gelist. He says: "A friend of mine in Irelan told me of something that happened one day his works. He is a manager in a large founde there, and he said that there was an idiot b who sometimes brought dinner to one of t men. One day he was going along with a t can containing his father's dinner, when, just he got to the door of the foundery, the sun bur out from above, and striking across the little f low's path, it cast his shadow before him. Th poor idiot boy forgot all about his father's di ner, and was so taken up with his shadow th he ran five miles right off after it. When found that he could not catch it, he stoppe only to see that he had lost the dinner on t journey. He ran after his shadow, but after he found that he hadn't his shadow nor his di ner either." This is just like the Prodigal, w not only loses the portion that his father h given him, but gains nothing in exchange, n even the object for which he sacrificed his po tion.

A Significant Fact in Connection with t immorality abounding in great cities is record by Mr. Edward W. Thomas, who has, for nea a quarter of a century, acted as secretary to t London Female Reformatory Institution, whi has dealt with upward of 10,000 cases of fem degradation. He states, in the annual report cently issued, that he "never yet met with pledged abstainer among the fallen, and wi but few cases of women who were daughters total abstainers, or belonged to families carefu reared in temperance principles." An extensi experience has convinced him that drinking indirectly as well as directly a prolific source female demoralization.

A Converted Jew Refused a Fortune in N Zealand, which was offered him on condition renouncing Christ. He was a cook at Ashb ton Station, where he died on July 12th; t facts were then for the first time publish The New Zealand Recorder says: "Our parted friend was a Jew by birth. When we fi learned this we asked him, 'Then are you st looking for the Messiah to come?' when he plied, in a tone of earnestness, and with a lo of animation we shall not soon forget, 'I beli that Jesus Christ is the Son of the living G and that he died for me. His mother, when became a Christian, offered to place a fortune his service if he would return to the faith of fathers; for his relatives were wealthy. He plied, 'Mother, I love you all very dearly, bu cannot do it; I must be faithful to my Saviou He was a kind father, and leaves two sons mourn his loss."

Contributions Received. For the Persian Fa ine Fund, $8.00. from G. O. Ostergram St Paul Mi —For the Salvation Army $5 from M. E Hod Bethel Springs, Tenn.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchm (London) for October may be obtained at the of of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Price six cents.

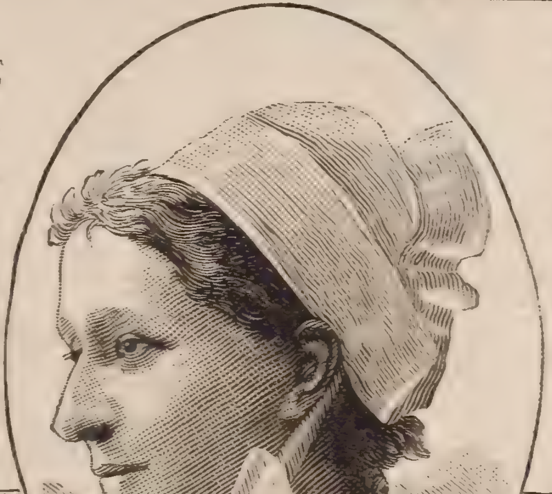
The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Works are on at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at prices low as to bring them within the reach of every o Twelve Sermons on various subjects, with photogr of Mr. Spurgeon, price 35 cents. John Ploughma Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, 60 ce The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, a volume of f sermons, $2.50. The Treasury of David, a homil cal exposition of the book of Psalms, five vols., as as Psa. 118, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth-Day Bo This popular gift-book contains a suitable pass selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for every in the year, with a blank space opposite for au graphs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. Spurg appear at their respective birthdays. The book elegantly bound, and the price is 75 cents. Re tances should accompany orders.

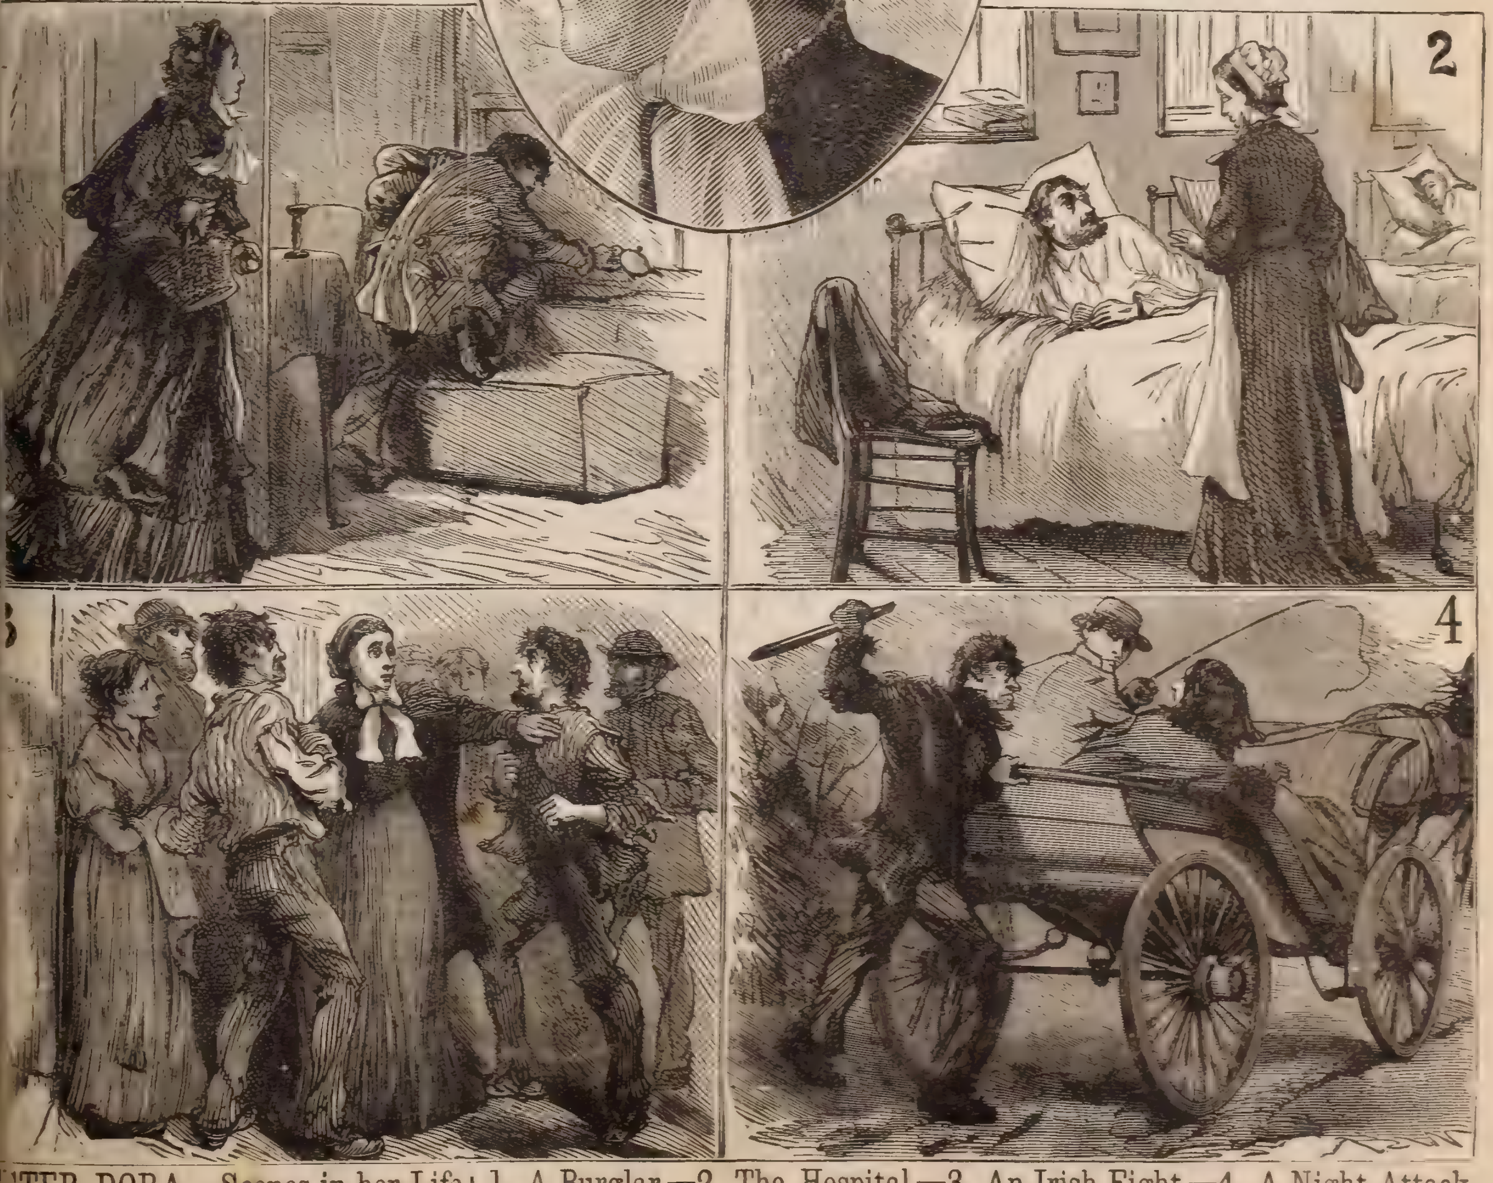
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1880. 14th Year. No. 44—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

RTRAIT OF SISTER DORA, THE HOSPITAL NURSE. With Sketch of Her Life.
E PRESIDENCY. A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage—An Immigrant's Testimony.
CHESTER TOWER. A New Serial Story by Miss M. A. Paull (Continued).
Vision of Hell. By a Wesleyan Minister—"Show Your Tickets, Please"—A Strapping Navvy.
RRENT EVENTS: The Tariff in the Campaign —Dr. Talmage on a Voter's Duty—The Boston adies' Bank—A Union Soldier's Sword Returned —An Inebriate at a Prayer-Meeting—Dangerous rossings—A Blacksmith's Church—An Engagement Declined in Faith—A Horse on a Railroad restle—Suicide over a Three Dollar Loss, etc.
THE PLAIN MAN'S PATHWAY TO PEACE. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
GROWING REVOLUTIONARY LAWLESSNESS A PROPHETIC SIGN. By Rev. M. Baxter.
A Sailor's Last Words—Characteristics of Irishmen.
A CHOICE VINDICATED. (Continued.)
Joseph in Prison. S. S. Lesson by Mrs M. Baxter.
TALES OF THE GROG-SHOPS—Bartle the Butler. Chap. II.
DR. TALMAGE'S FRIDAY EVENING TALK.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The Irish Political Prosecutions —Turkey Still Equivocating—Heathenism in an English Diocese—Russian Newspaper Warnings—Anarchy in a Turkish Province—Prince Napoleon's Programme—A Five Hooded Snake—The British South African Difficulty—A Wife's Devotion, etc.





SISTER DORA.—Scenes in her Life: 1. A Burglar.—2. The Hospital.—3. An Irish Fight.—4. A Night Attack.

SISTER DORA, THE HOSPITAL NURSE.

Born at Hauxwell in 1832—Device to get rid of Ugly Bonnets—Her Great Personal Beauty—Family Surroundings—Becomes School-mistress—Adventure with a Burglar—Enters the Sisterhood of the Good Samaritans—Commences Nursing—Is Sent to Walsall—Prostrated by Small-Pox—Her Head Cut Open by a Stone—Nurses the Miscreant Who Confessed the Deed—Her Consideration for Her Patients—Power of Endurance—Tenderness toward Children—Belief in the Efficacy of Prayer—Stops a Fight—Is Attacked by a Footpad at Midnight—Health Fails—Dies on Christmas-eve, 1878.

There are not a few persons who would apply the epithet of eccentric or fanatical to such a life as that of Sister Dora. To selfish people especially it must seem almost incredible that a lady well educated and of refined tastes should voluntarily leave a luxurious home to perform duties often disagreeable and sometimes loathsome. But to those who have been with Jesus and learned of Him, Sister Dora's work seems the living expression of the Saviour's teaching, and her service was accepted by Him who said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me." A life of self-denial and of self-sacrifice for others is a sanctified life, and its details will be interesting to every true Christian.

DOROTHY WYNDLOW PATTISON was born at Hauxwell, England, a tiny village near Richmond, Yorkshire, on January 16th, 1832. Her father, the Rev. Mark James Pattison, was for many years rector of Hauxwell, and belonged to an ancient Devonshire family, while her mother was the daughter of a Richmond banker.

Dorothy, or Dora, as she herself preferred to be called, was the youngest but one of twelve children, the eldest and the youngest children of the family being sons, the rest daughters. From her mother she inherited uncommon beauty of features and complexion, and from her father an imposing figure and dignified bearing.

Until her fourteenth year she was a very delicate child, with no promise of that superb physical development, endurance, and strength which she subsequently attained. On account of her health she was not allowed to "do lessons" regularly like other children; but though left to follow her bent with less restraint and discipline than fell to the lot of the older children of the household, still the atmosphere of good-breeding around her from her birth constituted an educational influence of a high and healthy character.

She learned as if by instinct, growing into habits of minute observation, and quietly storing up in her marvellously retentive memory what she saw and heard. From the very first, too, her strong will and indomitiable perseverance were manifest. Her biographer says: "If she could not get her own way easily, she did not give it up, or take refuge in sulks or in an outbreak of temper, like most children; but rather, meeting with opposition seemed to stimulate her active mind to find a device for getting her way somehow." The following is one of her own stories in illustration of this. She and her next sister had what they were pleased to consider extremely for Sunday wear. Complaints, however, were useless, and Dorothy set her brains to work to accomplish her end. One very rainy day the children knew that their mother had gone out for a long drive. Dorothy ran to her sister and said, "Be quick; now's our chance of spoiling our bonnets." They fetched the obnoxious articles and put them on, threw open the library window, put their heads well out, and let the rain work its worst upon the velvet. Then, at Dora's suggestion, and not at all to hide what they had done but merely to complete the operation, they put the bonnets away, soaking wet as they were, into their boxes. Sunday morning came: "Where were the bonnets?" Dora replied firmly, "Quite spoiled; we can never wear them any more." They were condemned, however, to wear them; and not on that Sunday alone, but for many Sundays afterward, they appeared in church with the monuments of failure upon their heads.

UGLY VELVET BONNETS

From her fourteenth to her twentieth year she rapidly grew in vigor and health, engaging in active out-door exercises, so that she became noted for her skill in various boyish games, and was famous for her daring as a horsewoman.

Those who knew her at this period say that her personal beauty was very remarkable. She was tall and slender, about five feet seven inches in height, and perfectly well made. Her hands were small and exquisitely formed, her features nearly perfect in their regularity, and the forehead wide and high. She had dark tightly-curling brown hair, waving all over her head, which no amount of cutting off or covering with caps could ever smooth; and the softness and roundness of youth, the extreme delicacy of her whole coloring and complexion, added to the liveliness of her expression, and made her a fascinating creature to look upon.

Her family were in easy and, indeed, affluent circumstances, but were distinguished by their devotion to the sick, the poor, and the suffering. It was usual among the sisters to plan how they could save from their travelling expenses or how deny themselves at the table, that they might be able to give away more generously than they were able to without the self-denial. The nine years after twenty were so beautifully spent in her home that her father called her his "Sunshine." She faithfully attended upon her mother's failing strength, and watched beside her death-bed.

Her enthusiasm and spirit of adventure were first thoroughly roused by Miss Nightingale's heroic work during the Crimean War a quarter of a century ago. She wanted to join the band of women who went out as nurses, and implored her father to let her go; but he wisely refused, telling her that, untrained and undisciplined as she was, she would be worse than useless adding that she had enough to employ her at home, if she would only think so.

But she felt that she could not be contented any longer at home, that a voice Divine was summoning her forth to labor. She felt compelled to go. To her had come that call which many a soul hears: "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" Her beginning was a very humble one. In October, 1861, Dora Pattison, in reply to an advertisement, finally quitted the shelter of the home roof, and became a village schoolmistress in the parish of Little Woolston, on the borders of Buckinghamshire.

Here she not only taught her children at school, but she followed them to their homes, nursed them when they were unwell, and visited their parents and others of the poor and sick in the village. For three years she continued to work at Woolston, but she was not altogether satisfied with the nature of her work or the character of her surroundings.

Dora's loneliness was at times disturbed, and on one occasion she had an unpleasant

ADVENTURE WITH A BURGLAR.

One day, when she happened to be at home, an ill-looking man came to beg, and she noticed that he took a critically observant look round her little kitchen. That evening she went to sit up with a man in the village who was dangerously ill. He died in the course of the night, and as Dora was returning home through the fields between one and two o'clock, she saw a bright light burning in her kitchen. She unlocked the door just in time to recognize the same man who had begged of her in the daytime, and to see him making his escape through the window of the adjoining room, with all her small collection of silver spoons and forks which she had brought from home, and a teapot which she especially valued. She never discovered any trace either of the thief or of her property.

Having neglected a severe cold which she had taken, she broke down in health, and by the advice of her friends went to Redcar, on the Yorkshire coast, for change and restoration. Here, as she got better, her insatiable desire for work returned, and to gratify her taste for nursing she entered the Sisterhood of the Good Samaritan. whose headquarters were at Coatham, but wh were engaged in various works of mercy i different parts of England. Here she unde went an exceptionally severe course of training shrinking from no hardship, stooping to the pe tiest details, and choosing danger and hardsh rather than ease.

Early in 1865 Sister Dora was sent to Walsal. to help in nursing at a small cottage hospital r cently established there. and at that period un der the charge of the Sisterhood to which sh was attached.

DESCRIPTION OF WALSALL.

The town then contained about 35.000 inhabi ants, and lay on the borders of the great coal an iron district in South Staffordshire, called by th very expressive name of "The Black County. At night the spectator seems to be transporte into the infernal regions, where the blindin glare of blast furnaces, the snorting of engine the ponderous thud of steam-hammers, and th clang and whiz and whirr of the machiner sounds which never cease, but which are le noticed during the day, bewilder the sense Little swarthy, half-naked pigmies (for so the appear by the side of gigantic fires) come and g in the flashing light like demons dancing roun their unquenchable flames. Forests of tall chin neys of every variety of shape vomit forth vo umes of smoke and fierce tongues of flam When Sister Dora commenced work in this l cality the men were described as many of the professing no religious belief whatsoever, an the women as leading hard lives of drudger drunkenness and immorality being scarce looked upon as a disgrace.

Here, then, Dora set to work with characteri tic energy, and early caught small-pox from t patients; but even in her delirium she show the bent of her mind by occupying herself tearing up her sheets into bandages. At th time the Walsall people were not only suspicio of the Sisters, erroneously supposing them to members of a Roman Catholic institution, b actually persecuted them with such materi arguments as stones and mud. Their patien and self-abnegating tenderness at length, ho ever, began to bear fruit, and almost the last i stance of active opposition fell upon Sister Dor This is the story as related by her biographer

"THAT'S MY MAN."

At the time of the celebrated Murphy ric Dora was walking, rather late one evenin through the town to visit a patient, when a l from the other side of the road called ou "There goes one of those sisters of misery!" a threw a stone which cut open her forehead. N long afterward this same young fellow w brought into the hospital, having met with severe injury in a coal-pit. Sister Dora, w never forgot a face, recognized him at once, sa ing to herself, "That's my man."

He was some time under her care, and she b stowed upon him probably more than usual a tention. One night, when he was recoverin she found him quietly crying. "I wouldn't a him what was the matter," Sister Dora sa when relating the incident, "because I knew w enough, and I wanted him to confess." length it came out, with many sobs, "Sister threw that stone at you." "Oh," she replie "did you think I did not know that? Why knew you the very first minute you came in the door." "What!" he exclaimed, "y knew me, and have been nursing me like this It was his first practical experience of good turned for evil, and he did not know what make of it.

She was regarded by the rough men who cupied the wards from time to time as an an of light, and if it were possible she would alw give them their tea with her own hand. W could ask with such real anxiety and tendern after their pain, and how they had been beari it? a question which not a few of them shra from answering.

Here she evidently found the "enlarg sphere" for which she had so long pined. S ed every opportunity for increasing her knowl- lge of dressing wounds and surgery, and add- g to her skill in the arts of healing. She went r way so noiselessly and undemonstratively at it was not until she was again prostrated by ness that the real value of her services was dis- vered. In process of time the hospital was moved to a healthier situation, and enlarged a manner correspondent to its needs. Sister ra was placed in charge of the new building, d its internal organization was intrusted to r.

The record of her struggles through religious bts and fears toward the light may help many other weary one. At one period she seemed e giving up, but a wise friend, the Rev. Mr. igg, incumbent of Walsall, pointed out that ive service of mind and body seemed her ecial calling, and that, having put her hand the plough, she could not turn back.

er powers of endurance seemed wonderful. er her hospital work was over she would start o to visit loathsome alleys. Occasionally she s up whole nights with dying patients, for om it was considered useless to do anything, who were therefore deserted by their friends. night she was sent for by a poor man who much attached to her, and who was dying what was called "black-pox," a virulent n of small-pox. She went, and found him in emis; only a neighbor was with him. But a ll piece of candle was left, and she therefore the woman money and begged her to has- back with lights. She went, but never re- ed.

fter a little while the dying man raised him- up in bed with a last effort, saying, took him, all covered as he was with the loath disease, into her arms, and kissed him, the le going out almost as she did so, leaving in total darkness. He begged to be held, she sat on thus with him in her arms till he , and then in the early dawn groped her way or assistance.

"SISTER, KISS ME BEFORE I DIE!"

e was very tender toward little children, and great success in quieting them when fretful, soothing them when in pain.

"DON'T CRY; SISTER'S GOT YOU," would say to a struggling babe, carrying it in her right arm, while going about doing d work with her other hand. And pres- the little one would yield to the magnet- f her gentleness, and go off into a happy . Once a child of nine, dreadfully burned, ast the period of feeling pain, was brought e hospital. The extreme exhaustion of ap- hing death frightened the child, and Sister sat down by her, and talked to her about aviour and the bright home she was going soon, till the terror was exorcised, and a of content wreathed the pallid lips. "en you come to heaven, Sister, I'll meet you gates with a bunch of flowers," were the girl's last words, her eyes resting, no , on the flowers which Sister Dora always within sight for the comfort and cheer of tients.

regards those who were the objects of her ude, she took pains to let them see that red for them individually, telling them he prayed for them one by one, and that they went out from under her care she not forget them.

rough fellows, of course, constantly came body had ever seen such a woman as this —so beautiful, so good, so tender-hearted, ng and so gentle, so full of fun and humor, f sympathy for broken hearts as well as ery other kind of fracture, and the best that many of these poor maimed men had nown. She was the personification of ess and unselfishness to them; skilful and n her work, a great matter where wounds ncerned, and in a place where there was to be done and few people to do it.

r the patients' supper had been served ad prayers always, even when, as some- happened, her many duties and labors had so delayed her that most of the patients were asleep; for she said, "The prayers go up for them all the same." She spoke unreservedly to her household upon the absolute necessity of constant private prayer, and thought no real blessing could attend the hospital unless those who worked in it fulfilled their duty in this respect. It is said of her that so unflinching was her faith in that she never touched a wound without lifting up her heart to the Giver of all virtue, and asking that healing might be conveyed by her means; and never set a fracture without a prayer that, through her instrumentality, the limb might unite.

THE EFFICACY OF PRAYER

As years passed on she became able almost to fulfil the Apostle's command, "Pray without ceasing." But the striking feature of her prayers was the strong faith which animated them. She did not pray because it was her duty, or even because she wished to fit herself to hold communion with God hereafter, but because she believed that everything she asked for would be granted to her. She firmly held to the supernatural power put into the hands of men by means of the weapon of prayer, and the practical faithlessness in this respect of the world at large was an ever-increasing source of surprise and distress to her. The thought of the lives led by most of those who were brought into the hospital weighed heavily upon her mind, especially if, as was frequently the case, they were insensible from an accident, and never likely to recover consciousness. "Well," she would say, "we must pray;" and at night, when the ward was quiet, she might often be seen kneeling by the bed of some such sufferer. "These patients are my crosses," she would say; "there seems so little hope to bear one up." Her old servant, who slept in the next room to her mistress, used often to hear her praying aloud for hours at night.

The little small-pox ambulance, was only too well known at one time in the streets of Walsall. During an epidemic one or more patients could be placed on the floor of the carriage in their beds, while by their side sat Sister Dora.

STOPPING A FIGHT.

There is a place in Walsall well known to the police called Marsh Lane, which is infamous on many accounts, but chiefly as the scene of Irish fights. One night, as Sister Dora passed the entrance to this lane, she saw a motley crowd collected, and in the midst a bloody fight was going on, with which the police were not venturing to interfere. She immediately turned down the lane, and plunging through the crowd, which made way for her right and left, she took possession of a high doorstep, where her appearance gained for her the attention she desired. She addressed the crowd in her usual fashion, flinging well-aimed raillery at the combatants. They stood for a moment or two abashed, like two furious bulldogs, and then, with the tenacity of the same creatures, again rushed on each other, urged on by the cries of the crowd. In one moment Sister Dora had thrown herself between the wild animals, holding them each back with an arm which either of the men could have broken as easily as he could have snapped his tobacco-pipe. Her appeal was all-powerful; they allowed her to win the day, and the fight was at an end.

A MIDNIGHT ATTACK.

It was Sister Dora's custom, during the latter months of her work, to drive to Sutton, about seven miles from Walsall, in a little pony carriage. She was always driven on these occasions by the porter of the hospital. Twice on the road she and her companion were attacked by men who evidently had evil intentions. Once, just as they were entering Sutton, two ruffians sprang out of a hedge, but a man on horseback appearing just at the moment, the men fled. Shortly after this they were driving more slowly than usual one dark night, when a man suddenly rushed across the road and ran after the carriage. The porter whipped up the pony, and Sister Dora, turning round, saw that the man had a large thick stick in his hand. "I had only time," she said, "for a short prayer, when the stick was brought down heavily on the back of the carriage. I had leaned instinctively to one side as I said my prayer, and thus my head escaped the blow which was intended for it."

For fifteen years Sister Dora continued her labors with strong will and unflagging energy, the constraining power through all being love to Christ, and a tender yearning for the erring and the suffering; but at last her own strength began to fail. This was in 1877. She consulted a confidential surgeon, and found that a complaint had set in which must ultimately end her life, involving great pain and admitting of no cure. She was determined to keep this a profound secret from all but herself and her doctor. For nearly twenty months she continued to go about her duties as usual, spending the night by the bedside of wretched, dying patients, soothing, exhorting, encouraging, going almost down with them into the dark valley of the shadow of death. She was sometimes fearful, perhaps not without reason, lest they should cling too exclusively to her and to the human support which she afforded them. Yet her religion was eminently spiritual. To one who tried to follow her she gave the wholesome advice: "When you want to lead any one to Jesus, remember you must point, and take care not to stand in the way yourself."

DORA'S LAST ILLNESS AND DEATH.

When the hospital was closed for a time, while a new building was erected, Dora went first to stay with her relations, and then to London and to Paris to see some new surgical appliances. She visited the Exhibition, and seemed to enter into everything with her wonted zeal. But at last, in October, 1878, she broke down entirely. She went to Birmingham to see her doctor, and was taken so ill there that she was supposed to be dying; but she insisted on being removed to Walsall, "to die among her people." The committee of the hospital engaged a small house for her, the new building being not quite ready; but from the time she went she never left her bed. The hospital was opened in her name, but she never saw it.

She bore her intense sufferings heroically and resignedly. They were days of mental darkness and depression, as well as of bodily pain. "I cannot pray; I cannot think. I sadly fear I shall be lost. I can only trust." But she triumphed at length by faith in a personal Saviour.

On Saturday, December 21st, 1878, it became evident that the end was really drawing near. Sister Dora's depression now seemed greater than before, and a dread, amounting to horror, of the last pangs of death came upon her. Her coughing was incessant. At times all was loneliness and darkness; but still the faith in which her life had been passed stood her in such good stead that one of her nurses, who had watched many death-beds, testified, "I never saw such faith and patience." She anticipated a welcome from those souls whom she had herself led to God, and the idea comforted her. Repeatedly she exclaimed, "Oh, I hope I shall sing my Christmas carol in heaven."

On the morning of Tuesday, the 24th, she said, cheerfully, "I am dying; run for Sister Ellen." Meanwhile an old companion tried to soothe her, saying, "Our blessed Lord is standing at the gates of heaven to open them for you." But she no longer needed such consolation, for all her darkness was dissipated by the gathering glory-cloud, and she answered, "I see Him there; the gates are opened wide." At two o'clock in the afternoon she was at rest.

Almost the whole population of Walsall went to her funeral, many rough workmen weeping like children at the grave. She left a memory which will not soon pass away, of one who, though not free from faults and error, was yet a true and noble worker for God and man, and such "a succorer of many" as will not speedily find her equal on earth.

THE PRESIDENCY.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Preached on Sunday Morning, October 24th, 1880.

"Brethren, ye have been called unto liberty: only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh."—GALATIANS 5:13.

An Unbiassed Utterance—Freedom of American Ministers—A Word that Stirs the Blood—Do not let Liberty Degenerate into License—The Defamation of Presidential Candidates—Paine's Attack on Washington—The Boston Sentinel's Monumental Inscription—The Present Candidates Assailed—Mrs. Surratt and the $329 Accusation—The Grave of Falsehood—Scurrilous Newspapers—The Antipathy of Some Journals More Desirable than Their Praise—The City Sewer in the Inkstand—A Question High Above All Others—The Question of Sectional Strife—The Quarrel Ought to Cease—Three Reasons for Patriotism—Our Fathers' Graves, Our Cradles and Our Children's Birthright—A Thousand-Armed Prayer.

WE are in the midst of the quadrennial Presidential excitement, and this Sabbath morning and next Sabbath morning as a Christian patriot I have some earnest words to address you. I have no partisan fetter on either hand or either foot. I get my instructions neither from Chicago nor Cincinnati, but from the throne of God.

It is a fortunate thing that in this country we are not tempted as ministers of religion by governmental patronage. In some lands the church is supported by the state. St. Peter's at Rome has cost the government two hundred millions of dollars. Xerxes took from the Temple of Belus a hundred millions of dollars. The English Government pays annually to the Archbishop of Canterbury seventy-five thousand dollars salary, seven hundred and seventy thousand to all the bishops, and eighteen thousand of her clergy are supported by government.

In this country we have less temptation to surrender private judgment to state dictation. Still there is a mighty pressure brought to bear upon ministers of religion here to make them think this way or that, vote this way or that, preach this way or that; but they must rise out of all such prejudices, and higher than any instructions from their congregations, or from the printing-press, and take their commission from the Lord.

There is in my text

ONE WORD THAT STIRS THE BLOOD

of every genuine man. That is, liberty. "Brethren, ye have been called unto liberty." That word was written under Nero, the tyrant, detested of all ages: going incognito through the streets at night for the mere pleasure of robbing passengers; bedaubing Christians with tar and pitch and setting them on fire to light up the parks; kicking his own wife until she died; ordering his own mother assassinated, and then committing suicide. Of course under such a tyrant the word liberty cost Paul his head; but while the emperor slew the man, the word was indestructible, and it has remained the most arousing and revolutionary word of the ages.

It got into the Magna Charta and England was free; into the Declaration of American Independence, and started our nation on its high career; into the speech of Garibaldi and the pronunciamento of Victor Emanuel, and Italy shook off the dust of the grave; into France, and overthrew the Napoleonic dynasty; under a hundred despotic thrones, and will keep them rocking until they fall flat.

It took hold of the printing-press and broke off its shackle, and made it the mightiest agency for intelligence and evangelization the world has ever known. And that word will keep on its rounds until in all the earth there shall not be a tyrant's sceptre, or a slave's chain, or an oppressed workman, or a benighted intellect. Liberty for the state. Liberty for the Church. Liberty for the printing-press. Liberty for the pulpit. Liberty for the platform. Liberty for all continents, all islands, all zones, all ages. "Brethren ye have been called unto liberty."

But there is not only in my text a driving-wheel, there is a brake; not only an inspiration, but

A LIMITATION.

"Brethren, ye have been called unto liberty: only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh." Liberty, but not wild license. Liberty, but not moral recklessness.

First, I charge you, so far as I have any influence as your pastor and teacher, that while you exercise full liberty in political discussion, you do not surrender to the spirit of license which shows itself in slanderous implications of public men. Take down the newspaper files of the last eighty years, and you will find that in Presidential elections especially the public seemed to have felt that they were called upon for wide abuse of dignitaries. All those men who have gone up into the gallery of national and political sainthood, while they lived went chin deep through the slush of lampoonery and pasquinade, and there was no exception.

Thomas Paine wrote and published a letter to George Washington, in which he said: "Treacherous in all private friendship, and a hypocrite in public morals, the world will be puzzled to know whether we had better call you an apostate or an impostor, and whether you abandoned good morals or never had any."

All that about Washington! John Quincy Adams consoled himself with the fact that he had not more misrepresentation and scandal to endure than his father, John Adams, and declared that in that Presidential election it seemed as if there were men who did nothing but manufacture lies about him. On the 4th of March, 1801, the day on which Thomas Jefferson was inaugurated as President of the United States, the Sentinel, of Boston, wrote this derisive epitaph

"MONUMENTAL INSCRIPTION.

"Yesterday expired, deeply regretted by millions of grateful Americans, and by all good men, the Federal administration of the government of the United States: animated by Washington, Adams, Hamilton, Knox, Pickering, McHenry, Marshall, Stoddard, and Dexter, aged twelve years. Its death was occasioned by the secret arts and open violence of foreign and domestic demagogues. As one tribute of gratitude in these times, this monument to the talents and services of the deceased is raised by the Sentinel."

During the candidacy of Andrew Jackson for the Presidency of the United States, the whole country was flooded with coffin handbills representing six dead men, referring to the fact that General Jackson had during the war ordered six militiamen shot for desertion, and in other places he was pictorialized as he entered the Presidential chair as receiving his sceptre from the devil. President Martin Van Buren was always caricatured in his time as a rat—a rat. Thomas H. Benton and Amos Kendall were pictorialized as robbers hurling a battering-ram against the door of the United States Bank.

Last summer, in a museum at Put-in-Bay, Ohio, I saw a prominent newspaper, published in 1844, which represented Henry Clay as a libertine, a murderer, and a gambler; and how much that man endured from the public may be inferred from his eulogy of Kentucky: "When I seem to be assailed by all the rest of the world, she interposed her broad and impenetrable shield, repelled the poisoned shafts that were aimed for my destruction, and vindicated my good name from every malignant and unfounded aspersion."

On the same ticket with Henry Clay ran Theodore Frelinghuysen, called in those times "the vinegar-faced Presbyterian," although a more genial man never lived. From political assault and neglect Daniel Webster died of a broken heart at Marshfield. At the time of his nomination, the derisive cry was, "Who is James K. Polk?" although he had been a long while in the councils of the nation and Speaker of the House of Representatives. I will tell you, at this late age of the world, who James K. Polk was. He was the man who annexed Texas, one of the richest States of the Union, and, more than an other man of this century, made it possible for u to own everything between here and the Pacifi coast. And yet, during his administratio there were millions of men who never spoke him but with a sneer of contempt.

Those of you who are in mid life rememb the obloquy thrown upon Abraham Lincol "The Filthy Joker," "The Wholesale Butch er," "The Buffoon," "The Gorilla of t White House," the more refined epithets an more gentle of those used in regard to him. T others I cannot quote. All these great men the past have been apotheosized, and they ha gone into history honored and radiant.

But we are busy with the old business of BASE TRAVESTY.

We have our dictionaries down, hunting some new term of political damnation. Tw men are nominated for President of the Unit States in our time, both of them eminent, t one in the field, and the other in the councils the nation, and so far as I know, both of the good. Now, I am told in regard to one that unjustly and cheerfully hanged Mrs. Surratt; th he is ignorant of all public affairs; that he ro across the battle-field, and with an oath neglec ed wounded soldiers; that he was engaged in infamous oil swindle; that he is a "weak a ambitious man," wanting the Presidency, a willing to do anything unprincipled to get i and that he has "a bee in his bonnet," and on, and so on, and so on, and so on.

I am told, in regard to the other candidate, th he took unlawful counsel fees; that he took sto in the Credit Mobilier when he knew it was national swindle, and I see it written on t sides of houses, and on doorsteps with chalk, t number of dollars he is said to have gained that fraud—329. And so on, and so on, and on, and so on.

Now, I would like to gather up all the anat mas about the first man I mentioned and p them in a grave, and lift a monument with t epitaph: "Here rest the large family of Repu can falsehoods. Requiescat in Pace." The would like to gather up all the anathemas ab the other man, and put them in a grave, and a monument with this epitaph: "Here rest t great family of Democratic falsehoods. Requ cat in Pace."

Do you think that by maligning the men the opposite party you can forward your ow I tell you no. There is in human nature so thing that puts it in sympathy with the duced. Falsehood does more harm to the who utters it than the one against whom it uttered. If I had a scale delicate enough weigh defamation, I would tell you in one m ute who will positively be the next President the United States. I would take all the scur ity about Hancock and put it on one side scales, and I would take all the scurrility ab Garfield and put it on the other side the scale scurrility against scurrility—and having fou out which was the heavier, I would make a w good prophecy.

The fact is, that when a man is up for office in Brooklyn, New York, or the Uni States, he becomes a target. The fact that is up seems to be proof that he ought to brought down! We put all his public aff and all his private affairs under scrutiny, and turn on the electric lights, and if there be a thing that we can twist into seeming wro doing, there are multitudes of people as mu delighted as though they had discovered a n star or found a new invention. And the now, in this country—the air is full of carr crows scenting carcasses. Caw! Caw! Caw!

And in this connection let me say that th are newspapers in the United States which se to mistake wild license for liberty. There some newspapers whose whole business calumny. Their columns are stuffed with their editorials reek with it, they seem to dema that their reportorial corps shall bring ho chiefly putrefaction. They would give more one quillful of filth than a hogshead full althy product. They tip the end of the city ver into their editorial inkstands. They break- t and dine and sup on indecency. They roll it, swine in the mire. Those unclean political d literary wretches write with a quill not icked from the stupid goose, or the sublime le, but from the turkey-buzzard. Ghouls! ouls!

he only alleviating fact is that it sometimes duces a recoil of righteousness, or a reaction. e best commendation some men can have is to e certain papers assail them. Their assault positive eulogy. I want no better commen- ion of certain men than that certain papers antagonistic to them. Such papers are bad ugh at other times, but in Presidential elec- s they quadruple their wickedness.

he time will come when respectable men will patronize such papers, will not be seen hav- them in their hand; and when literary and tical sins cease to pay, then the publications cease. Have nothing to do, pen, tongue, or , with slanderous malediction of public men. it be possible that any of you are so dim of t that you cannot see in this great national est there are tremendous principles in- ed? I call you away from the work of the tical scavenger to the work of the Christian iot.

here is in this autumnal election

A QUESTION HIGH ABOVE ALL OTHERS

ount Blanc is higher than an anthill. The tion of the common schools nothing com- d with it, the question of the tariff nothing pared with it, the Chinese question nothing pared with it; and that great question is, how hall turn the solid South and the solid North one great solid nationality.

e Republican party says, "Elect our man sectional strife will cease." The Demo- c party says, "Elect our man and the sec- l strife will cease." I shall not go into that tion now; but I call your attention away mean and personal altercation and slander- mplication of public men, to that one great al question. Discuss it. Pray over it. in regard to it. Massachusetts and Ala- after long divorce need to be remarried, he Penobscot and the Appalachicola need d out they are sisters.

the sake of civilization and religion, for the of the financial and moral welfare of the e, break up that aggravating line between wo sections. Let the people go down and up to the national cemeteries at Richmond lurfreesboro, and by the graves of the Blue he Gray forgive, and forget, and pray, and ace each other.

y years of altercation are enough. Bad enough. National debt enough. Graves h. Widowhood enough. Orphanage h. Agony and woe enough.

ope in God that we have the last political rm in which there is any mention made of North or South. If this quarrel is to go m age to age, and forever, we might better allowed the South to go in 1860. Your s and brothers imperilled their lives and hem for the retention of the South, not ve might be in more convenient antago- but in the hope that in the future there be amity and good understanding. Be l how you defeat the object of that holo- for which it was enacted, for which it was d.

the sections visit each other; and as last you had brigadier-generals of the South per Institute, New York, before you get h with this national contest have brigadier- ls of the North in the great halls of ston and New Orleans. And when northern ant to fly from the wintry blasts, let them he orange-groves of Florida; and if Geor- ant to fly from the torrid blasts, let them to Saratoga Springs or to Manhattan You met each other face to face to ; why not meet each other face to face to You crossed swords, now cross palms. ot the sun of this generation go down on our national wrath. Before those of us who are in mid-life lay our heads in the dust, let the nation be pacified. Let these angry sectional voices be hushed, or we cannot well sleep our last sleep; they will disturb our pillow of dust. Be still the North be still the South, be still the East, be still the West, while one great united nation does homage to the God of the Maine forest and the Florida lagoons, the Michigan wheat-fields, and the South Carolinian rice-swamps, the New Jersey peach-orchards and the cotton plantations of Mississippi. Let the ballot-box of next Tuesday a week be the altar on which shall be sacrificed our sectional hates, and the throne on which national unity shall begin her sway.

You see in this first sermon of the two sermons I am to preach on the Presidential contest, I have two designs—the one to bring you away from slanderous implications of public men, and the other to concentrate your attention upon the best way of obliterating sectional antipathies. Oh, my friends, you and I ought to DO OUR BEST FOR THIS COUNTRY.

There are three reasons why: our fathers' graves, our own cradle, our children's birthright. When I say your fathers' graves, your pulses run quicker. Whether they sleep in city cemetery or in village graveyard, their ashes are precious to you. They lived well and they died right. You will not submit to have their tombs dishonored by the reign of any government other than that under which they lived and died.

Then, this land has been our cradle. It may have rocked us roughly, but it was a good cradle to be rocked in. Oh, how much we owe it. Dear land of our boyhood and girlhood days! and it is to be our children's birthright. We will soon be through with it. We will see only a few more of the blossoms of the spring, we will gather only a few more of the harvests of the summer, we will pluck only a little more of the fruits of the autumn; but our children, they must get it through us as we got it from our fathers—a free land, a happy land, a Christian land. We cannot have them trodden of despotisms, or lashed of cruelties, or affrighted of anarchy. We must hand this country to them over the ballot-box, over the school-desk, over the church-altar, and charge them to put their life between it and any keen stroke that would destroy it.

And Thou, Lord God Almighty, we lay hold of Thee in

A THOUSAND-ARMED PRAYER.

(Remember our fathers' bleeding feet at Valley Forge. Remember Marion and Kosciusko. Remember the hunger and the cold and the thirst, the long march and the fever hospital. Remember the fearful charge up Bunker Hill. Remember Lexington, and Yorktown, and King's Mountain, and Gettysburgh. Remember the lake where Perry fought, and the Hampton Roads where the Cumberland went down. Remember Washington's prayer by the camp-fire. Remember Plymouth Rock and the landing among the savages. Remember Independence Hall, and how much it cost our fathers to sign their names. Remember all the tears, and the blood of three wars—1776, 1812, 1864.) Remember a groan that was mightier than all other groans, a thirst that stung worse than any other thirst, a death that was ghastlier than all other deaths—the mount on which Jesus died to make all men happy and free. And for the sake of all this sacrifice, human and divine, deliver this nation, O God! And whosoever would blot it out, and whosoever would cut it down, and whosoever would turn it back, let him be accursed.

Go home to-day in high hopes. The car of our national progress will never roll backward. The eternal God is on the side of this nation.

"He has sounded forth the trumpet that will never call retreat,
He is sifting out the hearts of men before His judgment seat;
O be swift; my soul to answer Him, be jubilant my feet
    Our God is marching on."

THE GOSPEL IN ROME.

At a recent meeting in Exeter Hall, London, the Rev. J. Wall, who has been engaged in missionary work in the Italian capital, gave an interesting account of his labors.

He said, when he first went to Italy he devoted himself much to the dissemination of the Word of God. The priest generally appeared as the enemy of God's Word. But the population did not go with him; for when they saw the Word of God burned in the streets by them, a storm of indignation generally set in against the priests, and they said that the men who burned the Word of God could not be the friends of God.

On his first entrance into Rome, long before the Italians had taken possession of the city, he managed to take some copies of the Gospel, concealed in the lining of his carpet-bag, and distributed them to the people. In after years he frequently heard that persons who possessed copies of the Word of God had resorted to all kinds of means to conceal them from the priests.

On one occasion a Roman came into their meeting for the first time, and stated that years ago he had found a solitary Testament which some visitor had timdily thrown into a passage of one of the streets of Rome. The man had found the Testament, and had read it to his wife and mother-in-law. The three of them had become converted to Christ. Among the populations in the city, and in the surrounding towns and villages, in one week he sold 800 copies of the New Testament, and shortly after that an American gentleman provided means for issuing 10,000 copies of the first edition of the New Testament published in Rome, and those copies were printed within sight of the Vatican. The Testaments were soon sold, and the want was felt to be greater than ever. An English gentleman in Rome, seeing the work, and being satisfied and thankful to God for it, offered to print an edition of fifty thousand copies, and of that edition they had sold almost thirty thousand copies in various parts of Italy.

AN HONEST PRIEST.

On one occasion travelling with a priest who during the journey, did everything in his power to convert him to Catholicism, after he had finished, he (Mr. Wall) thought it was his turn to begin, and having noticed during the conversation that this priest bore deeply rooted in his soul a burden of unpardoned sin, he told him how once in his own life he had been in the same state of mind, but that he had found a Saviour, and the sin had gone, the fear of death had been removed, and judgment had now no terror: the work of Christ was a pleasure and a privilege, a kind of reality, a kind of royalty sent from heaven to the soul; and he said, "Now speak to me as a man? If you had the power by one word, or by one single act of yours, to change me from what I am into what you are, would you do it?" The priest looked at me, and said, "No, I would not."

AN EXCOMMUNICATED QUEEN.

When the present Queen of Italy came to Rome as Princess of Piedmont, she came as an excommunicated person, and a priest (Father Grassi) who ventured to give her the sacrament was sent into retreat. After fifteen days' penance he was allowed to come out of prison; but the king knighted him. That priest was one day walking down the street, and seeing a notice to the effect that the Gospel was preached in a certain place, he came up into Mr. Wall's room. They had many conversations together, and the result was that he left the Romish Church, and was baptized. Being cited before the Inquisition which had functions in Rome, although without ability to execute its decrees, Father Grassi appeared and made his protest, denouncing the Catholic system as an imposture. That protest was published and circulated throughout the city, and the result was that Signor Grassi commenced to preach the Gospel. A Protestant chapel was built for him, in which he had ministered for some years.

ROCHESTER TOWER.

By Miss M. A. Paull.

(Continued from page 678.)

A Domestic Creed—A Fancied Future—The Rev. Mr. Mitchell's Consideration—A Visit to Canterbury Cathedral—An Excursion to Dane John—A Strange Man makes a Demand—Revelation of a Startling Circumstance.

MRS. MITCHELL smiled again. The young girl's piquancy and bright, determined way of thinking and speaking had a charm for her, perhaps because she had herself so lacked outward firmness and self-reliance, though she was both firm and self-reliant in a quiet inward manner in all things wherein principle was at stake. Now she remarked gently,

"You do not put things quite in their right order, Constance. First, in a man's life, God, even if you choose to put his wife second. My idea of it is, God, duty, home. Would you reverse it, Constance? Wife and children, or whatever ties a man may have, make his home for him as they are subservient and helpful to his duty to God and man."

"Yet, if poets speak truly," said Constance, "if those who appear to write with the clearest perception of human nature, say truly, there comes a time to most men and women when nothing else seems of any moment in comparison with the love they long for in each other."

"I fully believe that, Constance," replied Mrs. Mitchell softly. Perhaps her mind reverted to the years, not so very long ago but that they were almost as fresh in her memory as the events of yesterday, when the love of her, the desire to win her, the joy of a new-found love, were the aims of Rowland Mitchell's life, when he was so absorbed in her as to be in danger, as he often laughingly said, of forgetting everything else.

"But all our days cannot be wooing days, Constance, nor should we, could we, wish them so. Days of union when noble work is accomplished together are even sweeter."

Constance was still silent. She kissed Mrs. Mitchell's hand now and then to let her feel her sympathy and interest in all she said; meanwhile she busied herself on the little nightdress for Maud which she was making.

Mrs. Mitchell presently leaned back in her easy chair, and was quiet so long with closed eyes that her companion thought she was asleep. But when at length Constance turned to her again her eyes were open, and she said, "My plan does not suit your hopes then, Constance?"

"Nothing could be farther from my thoughts or possible wishes, dear Mrs. Mitchell," answered the young girl firmly. She hesitated a little after these words, unused as she was to hesitate, and then went on, "I have been thinking over all you have said, and, do you know, I have been considering that it sometimes happens the very people you would suppose likely to marry again never dream of doing so, while others, on the contrary, whom you would suppose not at all likely to, are the very ones who do." Constance was thinking rather bitterly of her mother in this light. "I shall not be surprised should Mr. Mitchell be so unhappy as to lose you if he clings passionately to your memory all his days, and refuses ever to take anyone else into your place, because, indeed, nobody else could fill it."

Constance was hardly prepared for the brilliant smile that illuminated for a moment the wasted features of the gentle invalid.

"It is possible you may be right," she said, "but I ought not to wish it—for his sake I ought not."

"Do you not think, dear Mrs. Mitchell," said Constance tenderly, "that it will be better for you not to trouble yourself by separating yourself from him, even in idea, at all? You are his, and he is yours; God only should separate you. It almost seems like wronging him and yourself, too, to fancy a future, as you did just now, which so very likely will never come."

"I think you may be right, Constance," said the minister's wife a second time. "I have not seen the matter before in that light."

This conversation had taken place a week or two before; and now Constance was listening to Canterbury bells on a brilliant, sunshiny, frosty, sparkling Christmas morning, and feeling very glad indeed that she had been able to firmly set aside the painful subject which Mrs. Mitchell had introduced.

The Rev. Rowland Mitchell had arrived the day before, and had been grieved to observe the increasing weakness of his wife—increased considerably, as it appeared to him, since his last visit, about a fortnight before. Church matters and the ordination of a young friend had kept him away too long. He decided that nothing should ever keep him so long from her again.

"While I am here, Miss Anerley, I shall release you as much as may be from attendance upon my dear Ellen," he said, in a sadder, humbler tone than Constance had ever heard him use before. "I shall not leave her at all while I can be with her. You had better have a little change, and let Percy take you some walks."

If Rowland could be in sight, could sit beside her, could hold her hand in his, or let her lay her poor aching head on his shoulder, could read to her, could sing to her in his sweet mellow voice, the invalid seemed perfectly content—she wanted nothing, no one else.

So on Christmas morning after breakfast, while the bells from the many churches of the venerable city filled the frosty air with sweetest music, Constance Anerley, accompanied by Percy Mitchell and little Maud, paid her first visit to the glorious old cathedral, that stands at once a monument of history and of beauty in its picturesque precincts, themselves a study for an artist. And when they had entered the vast pile with its noble avenue of arches, reflecting in stone the solemn fairness of the Almighty's architecture in mighty forests and woodland shades, and when the soft, luscious notes of the organ, embalming as it were the music of the centuries, breathed out the tender, graceful strains of Handel's exquisite "Pastoral Symphony," the soul of Constance ws lost in an ecstasy too self-absorbing for any words.

She thought amidst the pageantries of the cathedral service of that richer, more gorgeous ritual, that high mass long ago, so rudely and harshly interrupted by fierce and cruel men, when the proud and mighty Becket, more priest than man, more ruler than subject, was stricken down in the glory of his pride, and the cathedral church of the nation was stained indelibly with the prelate's blood. Such places as Canterbury Cathedral are like irrefragable links, binding the past and the present together. "Footprints written here on the sands of time" can never be erased.

Mendelssohn's lovely Christmas hymn, "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing," was given as the anthem by the bright, clear young altos of the chorister boys, blended with the fuller, deeper notes of manly basses and tenors. A short sermon, and then they came out into the sunny cathedral yard. The trees around, of several centuries' growth, were beautiful with frozen snow, and with heaven's radiant blue shining between their whitened boughs, it was a dazzling picture. Roofs and flying buttresses and towers were white with glittering snow, too hard to thoroughly melt even in the sunbeams, and with many a long icicle dependent from hoary walls and stems of ivy in the shady nooks.

"Do let us go to Dane John before we go in, Miss Anerley," said Percy; "they won't want us till dinner-time, and it is so splendid."

"If you will run on and ask how your dear mamma is, Percy, and if I can be of any use, and if you find I am not wanted, we will go," returned Constance.

The boy gladly accepted the conditions, and hurried forward. He returned and said that his mother had had a very quiet morning, that his father had read her to sleep, and that they could not do better than stay out a while longer. So they proceeded to Dane John, walking along the upper path of the public grounds beside the old city wall. The scene was lovely here also. There is a peculiar charm about a sunny winter lar scape, when Nature traces her lines of beauty the sparkling, radiant brightness of sunlit froz snow—gold and white.

Life was very full of joy to the little girl tl day, only vaguely clouded by the knowledge tl dear mamma was not well. With the unselfi ness that had by God's grace become natural her, Mrs. Mitchell insisted that her child should, for as long as possible, be kept free fr anxiety respecting her.

Percy and his little sister were in advance Constance, when a ragged, dissolute-looki man, turning up a by-path from the lower race, suddenly came toward her. Constai was not by any means of a nervous tempe ment, yet, though not frightened, she was tainly disagreeably surprised when the man ca up to her and demanded of her rather than quested some assistance.

"I have nothing for you," replied Constan and was passing on, but he put himself in path defiantly.

"What do you mean? Allow me to pas she said quietly, with a dignity that was natu to her.

"I dare say I seem a rude, ill-mannered low," he said then, with a smooth polished cent and good address, "but, Miss Anerley must beg you will not refuse my request."

Puzzled beyond measure as to his knowle of her name, Constance stood still and sil waiting for him to leave her. She percei now that he was so close to her, that he sm most disagreeably of drink. She was not s to attribute his impertinence to that cause. how could he know her? She was almos stranger to the city herself, she had been so l away from London, and she could not remem seeing the man at Brighton. It was strange; she tried hard to recall his cou nance, but could not succeed.

"You know Salome Stanley?" he said ruptly.

"Miss Stanley! What has my knowledg her to do with your coming to me?"

"Much," he replied laconically. "Sal Stanley and I are very nearly related."

"If it were so she would not send you her me," said Constance firmly; "I know her well to believe that."

"If you knew that harm, disgrace w come to her, would you not wish to save he

"Certainly from harm; disgrace we can make for ourselves. Nothing could bring grace to her, in my opinion." Constance s out for her friend as fearlessly as it was pos for her to speak, and added, "I know her well to doubt her."

The strange man smiled rather grimly and agreeably, and Constance felt that she woul very glad indeed to get rid of him, when P and Maud came back to her again from a they had had together to make the little g feet warm, and she welcomed the interrup The stranger stared at Percy, and Percy st at him.

"Master Mitchell?"

"Yes."

Percy still looked at him curiously afte had answered him.

"Do you know this man, Percy?" a Constance, still more surprised.

"Yes, he is one of the porters at Bright mean, he was at the railway station."

"Quite true. I have done anything, Anerley, to earn a penny honestly. Do you to know how I am related to Miss"—he al hissed out that monosyllable—"Stanley?"

"Certainly not; it is no business of mi said Constance coolly. "People often hav misfortune to have disagreeable relations, it is their misfortune, not their fault."

Again she was passing on, when he prevented her.

"You must give me something; I really no money," he said.

"And I am not one to be threatened giving," returned Constance. "Do not co me to send for the lodge-keeper to remove you from the gardens."

"You will repent it if you do," he said. "I ould surprise you more than you dream of."

"I don't want any surprises from you," an- wered Constance haughtily, "Come, Percy— ome, Maud, we must go."

(To be continued.)

GROWING REVOLUTIONARY LAWLESSNESS A PROPHETIC SIGN.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

THE assassination of Lord Mountmorres, on he night of September 25th, at Rusheen, Ire- nd, because of some fancied grievance against m as a landlord, is one out of many evidences f an increase of a lawless spirit among the asses in Ireland—the same spirit which stalks road in Russia in Nihilism, in Germany in ocialism, and in France in Communism.

Prophetic expositors have repeatedly shown at Daniel's "Time of trouble, such as never as since there was a nation, even to that same me" (12 : 1), may be expected about the pres- t period, and that it will be a repetition of the rrors of the French Revolution of 1793, on a ger scale. It is instructive to bear in mind w France, in 1789, gradually drifted from a ate of peace and prosperity into a condition of archy, after beheading its king and queen.

The great French Revolution, as recorded in lison's Europe, shows what men will do after at, by general consent, the barriers of religion d law are thrown down. The briefest allusion them will serve to show into what depths of ominable wickedness human nature can sink der the influence of infuriate passions quite controlled.

"Fifty thousand revolutionary committees re in operation, from Calais to Bayonne. ve hundred thousand persons, drawn from the egs of society, disposed, in these committees, he lives and liberties of every man in France" ison, vol. iii. p. 8). "Pache, Hébert, and aumette, the leaders of the municipality, pub- y expressed their determination to "dethrone King of Heaven, as well as the monarchs of e earth." To accomplish this design, they vailed on Gobel, the apostate constitutional shop of Paris, to appear at the bar of the nvention, accompanied by some of the clergy his diocese, and there abjure the Christian h. . . The churches were stripped of all ir ornaments. . . Their plate and valuable tents were sent to the mint to be melted wn."

"During several weeks, daily abjurations by constitutional clergy took place at the bar the Convention." It was openly declared t "God did not exist, and that the worship Reason was to be instituted in His stead." e services of religion were universally aban- ned. The pulpits were deserted throughout he revolutionized districts; baptisms ceased; burial service was no longer heard; the received no communion, the dying no con- ation.

heavier anathema than that of Papal ver pressed upon the peopled realm of France he anathema of Heaven, inflicted by the mad- s of her own inhabitants. The village bells e silent. Sunday was obliterated. In lieu he services of the church, the licentious fêtes be new system were performed by the most ndoned females; it appeared as if the Chris- worship had been succeeded by the orgies the Babylonian priests, or the grossness of Hindoo theocracy.

n every tenth day a revolutionary leader nded the pulpit and preached atheism to the ildered audience; Marat was universally ied, and even the instrument of death was ed the holy guillotine. On all the public eteries was placed the inscription: "Death eternal sleep." God was openly challeng- nd defied in one of the churches in Paris.

he foregoing is a picture of what will be the e of things all through the world in a few years' time, when the Seventh Vial brings "the political earthquake, so mighty and so great as was not since men were upon the earth" (Rev. 16). We are living now just at the close of the Sixth Vial, which dries up the mystic Euphrates or Turkish Empire. It is well, therefore, for us to know that things will grow worse and not better during the next few years, until the Second Advent of Christ takes place, and then, the Millennium will dawn on the earth.

A VISION OF HELL.

By the Late Rev. Robert Young, Wesleyan Minister.

WHILE residing in a British colony as a Christian missionary I was called one evening to visit Miss D——, who was said to be dying. Mrs. Young, by whom she was met weekly for religious instruction, feeling a deep interest in her spiritual welfare, accompanied me to her residence. We found her in the chamber of a neat little cottage, exceedingly ill, but confiding in the merits of Jesus, and after spending some time with her in conversation and prayer, we commended her to God, and took our departure, without the least hope of seeing her again in this life. Soon after we left she seemed to die, but as the usual signs of death, which so rapidly develop themselves in that country, did not appear, her friends anxiously waited to see the end.

She remained in that state for several days, during which period we repeatedly visited her, and the only indications we could perceive that life was not extinct were a slight foaming at the mouth and a little warmth about the region of the heart. She was watched with great interest both night and day, and after having been in this state for nearly a week, she opened her eyes and said, "Mr. C—— is dead." Her attendants, thinking that she was under the influence of delirium, replied that she was mistaken, as he was not only alive but well. "Oh, no!" said she, "he is dead; for a short time ago, as

I PASSED THE GATES OF HELL,

I saw him descend into the pit, and the blue flame cover him. Mr. B—— is also dead, for he arrived at heaven just as I was leaving that happy place, and I saw its beautiful gates thrown wide open to receive him, and heard the host of heaven shout, 'Welcome, weary pilgrim!'"

Mr. C—— was a neighbor, but a very wicked person, and Mr. B——, who lived at no great distance, many years had been a consistent member of the church of God. The parties who heard Miss D——'s startling and confident statements immediately sent to make inquiries about the two individuals alluded to, and found, to their utter astonishment, that the former had dropped down dead about half an hour before, whilst in the act of tying his shoe, and that about the same time the latter had suddenly passed into the eternal world. For the truth of these facts I do solemnly vouch. She then went on to tell them where she had been, and what she had seen and heard.

VISIT TO HEAVEN.

After being sufficiently recovered to leave the house, she paid us a visit, and Mrs. Young, as well as myself, heard from her own lips the following account of what she had passed through. She informed us that at the time she was supposed to die a celestial being conducted her into the invisible world, and mysteriously unveiled to her the realities of eternity. He took her first to heaven, but she was told that, as she yet belonged to time, she could not be permitted to enter into that glorious place, but only to behold it, which she represented as infinitely exceeding in beauty and splendor the most elevated conceptions of mortals, and whose glories no language could describe.

She told us that she beheld the Saviour upon a throne of light and glory, surrounded by the four-and-twenty elders, and a great multitude which no man could number, among whom she recognized Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Martyrs, and all the Missionaries who had died in that colony, besides many others whom she mentioned, and although those parties were not named by the angel that attended her, yet she said that seeing them was to know them.

She described those celestial spirits as being variously employed, and although she felt herself inadequate to convey any definite idea of the nature of that employment, yet it appeared to be adapted to their respective mental tastes and spiritual attainments. She also informed us that she heard sweet and most enrapturing music, such as she had never heard before, and made several attempts to give us some idea of its melodious character, but found her notes too earthly for that purpose.

While thus favored, the missionaries already referred to, and other happy spirits, as they glided past her, sweetly smiled, and said they knew whence she came, and, if faithful to the grace of God, she would, in a short time, be admitted into their delightful society. All the orders of heaven were in perfect and blessed harmony, and appeared to be directed in all their movements by a mysterious influence, proceeding from the throne of God.

She was next conducted to a place whence she had

A VIEW OF HELL,

which she described in the most terrific language, and declared that the horrid shrieks of lost spirits still seemed to sound in her ears. As she approached the burning pit, a tremendous effort was made to draw her into it, but she felt herself safe under the protection of her guardian angel. She recognized many in the place of torment whom she had known on earth, and even some who had been thought Christians.

There were princes and peasants, learned and unlearned, writhing together in one unquenchable fire, where all earthly distinctions and titles were forever at an end. Among them she beheld a Miss W——, who had occupied a prominent station in society, but had died during the illness of this young woman. She said that when Miss W—— saw her approach her shrieks were appalling, beyond the power of language to describe, and that she made a desperate but unsuccessful effort to escape.

THE PUNISHMENT OF LOST SOULS

she represented as symbolizing the respective sins which had occasioned their condemnation. Miss W——, for instance, was condemned for the love of money, which I had every reason to believe, was her besetting sin, and she seemed robed in a garment of gold, all on fire. Mr. O——, whom she saw, was lost through intemperance, and he appeared to be punished by devils administering to him some boiling liquid. She said there was no sympathy among these unhappy spirits, but that unmixed hatred, in all its frightful forms, prevailed in every part of the fiery regions. She beheld parents and children, husbands and wives, and those who had been companions in sin, exhibiting every mark of deep hatred to each other's society, and heard them in fiendish accents upbraiding and bitterly cursing each other. She saw and despair, and heard nothing there but the most discordant sounds, accompanied with weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth.

NOTHING IN HELL BUT MISERY

While she gazed upon this revolting scene, many souls arrived from earth, and were greedily seized by innumerable devils of monstrous shape, amid horrid shouts of hellish triumph, and tortured according to their crimes.

This fearful view of the state of the lost agrees with the testimony of S.T., whose case is on record in Mr. Wesley's Journal (Vol. ii. pp. 22-26, Edit. 1829). She tells us that while in her trance the place of the condemned was unveiled, and she "saw a vast number who stood up cursing and blaspheming God, and spitting at each other, and many were making balls of fire, and throwing them at one another." She also "saw many others who had cups of fire out of which they were drinking down flames, and others who held cards of fire in their hands, and seemed to be playing with them."

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter.

The aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50
per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to The Manager, Christian Herald, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

SINGLE COPIES
can most conveniently be obtained through newsdealers. Any complaint that the Christian Herald cannot be obtained from a particular newsdealer is promptly attended to if we are given the name and street address of the pealer who does not keep it for sale.

NOTICE.

To give our readers an opportunity of introducing the Christian Herald to their friends, we will send the paper post free to any address from 1st October, to 31st December, 1880, on receipt of 25 cents.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Final Aspect of the Presidential Campaign is remarkable for the prominence which the question of the tariff has assumed. The subject in the early stages of the struggle was relegated to the position of a side issue ; now it is the principal topic in speeches on both sides. This is eminently satisfactory, and is significant of the power of the people as compared with that of their leaders. All the efforts to array the voters in two sections and confront a solid South with a solid North failed. Sectional animosity found no congenial soil in the mass of the people, and all efforts to sow the bitter seed proved abortive ; but as the question of the tariff, with all its absurd and grotesque anomalies, came up, public interest was quickened, and the leaders saw in it a power to move the people. Thus, not for the first time, have the people led those who professed to be the leaders, and have displayed a keener political insight into vital questions than their teachers. In this question much of the national prosperity is bound up, and the fact is generally recognized. The party which the polls next week will place in power, be it Republican or Democrat, will find in this question its golden opportunity, and the eager manner in which the people have taken up the subject should teach that party the necessity of dealing with it in a wise, cautious, and enlightened spirit.

The Responsibility of Voters.—At this Critical period, as we stand on the eve of a decision which will affect our national policy during the next four years, it is important that every voter rightly understand his position on the great questions of the day. The following weighty utterances cannot, therefore, be too urgently pressed on public attention. In speaking recently of the voter's duty, Dr. Talmage said :

"The intensity with which both parties have been looking to the elections in Maine and Ohio and Indiana admits the fact that there are hundreds of thousands of people in this country who have no opinion of their own ; they want to see which side has the best prospect of winning, and then they cheer mightily on that side. If the October elections go for Garfield, they will hurrah for Garfield. If they go for Hancock, they will hurrah for Hancock. In other words, many of the human race are like sheep. They go this way or that, because others go this way or that. What difference does it make to you or to me how others vote? It is a matter between us and God. The majority may be right or wrong, but with my own conscience I must be right, with your own conscience you must be right."

The Loss of the Steamer Alpena, of the Goodrich Transportation Line, with all on board, is another of those maritime disasters of which we have had so many during the last few months. She sailed from Grand Haven on Friday, October 15th, for Chicago, and nothing has been heard of her since. Fears were excited on Monday by the report of a mail carrier that wreckage was being washed ashore at Stony Creek, a hamlet on the shores of Lake Michigan, and a messenger was immediately dispatched to investigate the report. Then it was found that the Alpena must have perished in the fearful storm which raged over the lake on Saturday morning. A piano, portions of the vessel, and articles from the freight she carried, were seen and recognized, and on Wednesday several bodies were washed on shore. There was no passenger list kept at Chicago, or at the lake ports the Alpena touched at, so that the exact number of the lost cannot be ascertained. It is, however, feared that at least seventy persons must have gone down with the vessel.

A Fatal Accident of a very Melancholy Character occurred in Brooklyn October 19th. Miss M. Porter, a young lady whose remarkable beauty and earnest Christian character had gained for her the love of an extensive circle of friends, was riding with some friends in Prospect Park. The party were just leaving the park when a carriage and pair of horses dashed furiously in their midst. The horse Miss Porter was riding reared and threw her. Then he rushed on wildly, dragging on the pavement after him the poor girl, whose habit was entangled with the saddle. When he was stopped, Miss Porter was extricated and carried to a physician's house ; but her injuries were so serious that she died in an hour afterward. The accident is attributable to bicycle riding. The horses attached to the carriage which scattered the party of equestrians had been frightened by the sudden appearance of one of those stealthy machines which have occasioned so many calamities.

John Taylor, the Mormon President who was chosen to succeed Brigham Young, sent out thirty more missionaries last week to labor in Europe. They include several Englishmen, a Welshman, a Swede, and men of other nationalities, and each one is assigned a field of labor among his own countrymen. They will probably be able to send over many dupes, but they would not succeed so easily if those they preach to, had been in Laramie, Wyo., last week and seen Josephine Taylor, the daughter of the president, begging her bread there. She had fled on foot from Utah, encountering innumerable dangers, and braving poverty and all other ills rather than live any longer in the polygamous city. She stayed but a few hours in Laramie, and after obtaining food pressed on east, fearing nothing but capture by her father's emissaries.

The Failure of the Ladies' Bank at Boston, Mass., has caused much misery among a class ill prepared to buffet with the world. The career of the institution is a curious one, and we briefly describe it, in order that our readers may be warned against the host of unprincipled persons who are at the present time seeking the confidence of the public.

A short time ago the Ladies' Deposit Bank was opened in modest quarters in Boston, and the managers offered to receive deposits from women of not less than $200 and not more than $1000, interest to be paid quarterly in advance, at the rate of eight per cent per month. They stipulated that depositors should be spinsters or widows, self-supporting, and not engaged in any immoral pursuit, and possessed, of no houses in their own right. As the proposal to pay eigh per cent interest per month meant the annua payment of ninety-six dollars interest for ever hundred dollars deposited, it would have bee naturally met with incredulity ; but it was give out that the bank was a benevolent institution, an that wealthy Quakers had contributed a fund o a million and a half of dollars to enable the ban to encourage provident habits among strugglin women. The bait was successful : over a thousand ladies deposited money, among them seamstresses, school teachers, female physicians, an widows, who paid in altogether more than a million dollars. Now the scheme has collapsed, an the manager and cashier have been arrested The distress produced is very serious, and man helpless invalids and aged widows are rendere penniless. It cannot be too often enunciate that there are few exceptions to the busines maxim that "High interest is only anothe name for bad security."

Secretary Evarts on Behalf of the Administration has applied pressure to the Turkish Government to insure the punishment of the murderers of Dr. Parsons, the American missionary assassinated recently in Armenia. The Secretar authorized the American Consul to attend th trial and engage able counsel for the prosecution, and a war-vessel was sent to Constantinople in case of difficulty arising. There wer three men implicated in the crime, and of these the principal, a Turk named Ali, has been sentenced to death by hanging, and his two accomplices to imprisonment at hard labor for fiftee years.

A Yellow Fever Memorial.—A Celebratio was held September 22d at Memphis, Tenn., i the nature of a thanksgiving holiday. Ther has been no yellow fever epidemic there this yea and the citizens celebrated their freedom from by a general rejoicing, in which they had the co dial congratulations of citizens throughout th Union. The city was gayly decorated with flag and crowded with visitors, who had come to joi in celebrating the continued good health Memphis. A long procession, composed representatives of every branch of business an trade, marched through the streets. Two larg arches had been built, one composed entirely cotton bales. At night the city was illuminate

A Remarkable Revival has Taken Place a village in Alabama, as noteworthy in its characteristics as the revivals in cities, in which th converts are numbered by thousands. One wh witnessed the manifestation writes from York Ala. : "A few months ago the Presbytery of Tu caloosa organized here a little church of fifte members—four men and eleven women. Th Presbytery convened with them recently for i fall meeting. The special presence of the Ho Spirit was recognized at the very first. The entire meeting was joyous, blessed, glorious. I that small community eleven professed the faith in Christ, and nine were added to th membership of the little church, and another d clared his intention to seek admission at an ear day. The deepest interest was not manifeste by women or young people, but the Word an the Spirit laid hold with special power almo exclusively on men in the prime of life. Of th eleven converts, ten were grown men ; and these ten, eight were over twenty-five years age, and all heads of families. So it was n only an extensive work of divine grace, consi ering the size of the community, but was sure most extraordinary in the material that w gathered in."

The Bible and Prayer Union.—The Lesso for the ensuing week are : Friday, Psalm 88, an the consecutive Psalms for the following day Requests for prayer have been received : Fro a minister without a charge for more complet consecration and to be speedily led to a field labor. From a friend at Philadelphia deep interested in the work of Mr. Geo. Muller, th the preaching tour that servant of God is no making in the United States and Canada may blessed of God to the conversion of souls ; als for the orphans in the Bristol Orphanages.

The Sword of a Union Soldier who was Killed t the battle of Petersburg in 1864, fell into the ands of a Southern officer, who has written to New York journal offering to restore it to the mily of the deceased soldier. It has been aimed by a teacher in one of the Brooklyn hools as her father's sword. She was made orphan by his death, her mother having died efore the war broke out. Her subsequent reer is interesting as an illustration of the markable means God sometimes employs to lfil His promise to the orphan. (Jer. 49 : 11.) When the news of the fatality arrived, the Thirenth Regiment, to which the man belonged, at ce adopted her as its child, and its members luntarily assessed themselves one dollar each ear to educate and support her. A veteran ember of the regiment, known as "the father," k charge of her, and for fifteen years has tched over her. She was sent to a preparatory hool, and then to Vassar College, where she lously pursued her studies and distinguished self so that she became the pride of the iment. Upon leaving college, where she was duated with high honors, she was provided h a position in one of the Brooklyn public ools, where she is now a successful teacher.

Christian who had been Before his Con- sion in the lowest depths of intemperance, was ting his experience at a meeting of the Y. M. A. at Auburn, N. Y., on September 18th, n it was noticed that a stranger present was ening intently. He had been observed loiter- near the door prior to the meeting and had n cordially invited to enter. At the close of narrative he said : "My friends, if there's any help as this you speak of for a miserable , I want it. I am wretched and unhappy, I tried to drown my misery and unrest in k, but the more I drink the more wretched el. O! I wish I could get this peace and piness you are talking of." The effect on e present was like an electric shock. For- lifeless prayers had no place then, and earn- etitions for the stranger's reclamation were ented. The man was visited by some of the bers on the following day, and hopes are en- ined that by God's grace he will be convert- Who knows how much may hang on an ation to a Christian service?

ngerous Railroad Crossings are made the ects of warning in the columns of the daily . There are a large number of places where racks cross roads on which there is consider- traffic, and though the companies at such s display the notice "Railroad Crossing; out for the Locomotive," yet pedestrians rivers of wagons frequently meet their death . During last year the number of persons and injured by casualties of this kind, sive of those who suffered in the great ions was, in the State of New York alone, The same carelessnes of danger and dis- d of warnings characterize men in these rs that we notice in spiritual matters. young man must daily come near places he is warned that the life of his soul is in peril; yet how many, impelled by the "to see life," cross the tracks of the yer at the doors of the gambling-house, heatre, or the bagnio, and are destroyed. 4 : 14–16.)

ee Remarkable Services have been Held Central Baptist Church, Providence, at als of a quarter of a century each. In in 1855, and in 1880 Dr. Murch, of own, N. Y., has preached in the church s in commemoration of the organization cause. In his letter accepting the invita- preach this year's sermons, he quaintly ed that the church would probably be d to get somebody else to preach the cen- anniversary sermon.

acksmith's Achievements in the Cause ist are described by a lady who recently visit to Hasbrouck, N. Y. It appears blacksmith from Massachusetts settled ng ago at Fallsburg, Sullivan Co., N. Y. s an earnest Christian, well read in the Bible, almost the only book he ever opened. He was anxious to do some work for the Saviour, and finding that the village of Hasbrouck was destitute of the means of grace, he resolved to get a church erected there. He begged a building lot from a farmer, and having thirty dollars of his own, saved by care and thrift, he devoted twelve dollars to paying stonemasons to lay the foundations of the church with stones he carried with his own hands from the mountain side. Messrs. Palen and Co., of New York, hearing of his effort, gave him a deserted tannery in the neighborhood, and some sympathizing friends lent him horses to drag lumber from the tannery to the church. He worked at his forge early and late, but every spare hour saw him and his boys laboring at the church, and last spring he had the gratification of completing the roof. Then presents flowed in: one sent paint for the walls, another Bible and hymn-books, and another money to provide seats. So the place has been completed and dedicated free of debt, and the lady who visited it speaks in the highest terms not only of the little church, but also of the sound gospel sermon she heard the blacksmith deliver in it to an attentive congregation.

"Ought I to Accept?" was the Question asked at a Y. M. C. A. by a man in sore need of employment, who had searched for it many days at Auburn, N. Y., and had at length been offered work in a liquor saloon. He was almost despairing when the offer was made, and though conscientiously opposed to the business, his necessities tempted him to yield. He told the liquor-dealer he must have the evening to decide, and he went to the Y. M. C. A. to ask advice. There he was counselled to decline it and trust in God. The matter was carried to God in prayer, and an assurance came that the prayer was heard, but there appeared no visible ground for hope. Faith was however justified in the result, for in less than three hours after the meeting closed, an eligible situation in one of the largest stores in the city was offered to the hesitating man and was thankfully accepted. He was saved from temptation and from violating the dictates of his conscience. Thus are we taught how wise it is to cast our cares on Him who careth for us. (1 Peter 5 : 7.)

An Attempt to Cross a Railroad Trestle at Milwaukee, Wis., on Friday, October 1st, came near costing a man his life. He is an employe of the Bay View Rolling Mills, and had been on an excursion, in the course of which he had drunk so much liquor as to render him almost insane. Returning at night in his buggy, he attempted to take a short cut by crossing a railroad bridge over Kinnickinnick River. The bridge is intended for the exclusive use of railroad trains, and the ties of which it is made are several inches apart. The night was dark and the horse crept cautiously along the track, but the intoxicated driver, when about half way across, became impatient and struck him several times; the horse darted forward, made a false step, staggered and fell into the river, dragging the vehicle and man after him. Happily assistance was at hand, and the man was rescued from his perilous situation. The drunken man's foolhardiness excites our astonishment, but how many are treading a path in life equally insecure, under which is an unfathomable abyss, from which no hand can rescue. (Prov. 29 : 1.)

A Suicide was Caused by the Loss of Three dollars, on Saturday, October 16th. A conductor on the Sixth Avenue horse-cars, New York, returned to his boarding-house that evening much depressed in mind. On being questioned he complained that he had lost three dollars, a whole day's wages, during the day. The loss seemed to prey upon him, and at last he rose from his seat, and taking a razor, cut his throat, and died in a few minutes. Had the young man rightly estimated the value of life, and understood the object for which it was given, no money loss, however large, could have so agitated him as to drive him to the wicked act of self-destruction (Luke 12 : 15).

THE PLAIN MAN'S PATHWAY TO PEACE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And when Jesus departed thence, two blind men followed him, crying, and saying, Thou son of David, have mercy on us. And when he was come into the house, the blind men came to him: and Jesus saith unto them, Believe ye that I am able to do this? They said unto him, Yea, Lord. Then touched he their eyes, saying, According to your faith be it unto you. And their eyes were opened; and Jesus straitly charged them, saying, See that no man know it."—MATTHEW 9 : 27–30.

The Cure Extremely Simple—Different Experiences in Conversion—I. Many Persons much Troubled—An Edinburgh Young Man and a Musselburgh Fishwife—The Easiest Way out of the Slough of Despond—Hindrances in the Way to Christ—1. Ignorance—2. Prejudice—3. Downright Bad Teaching—The Sect of Betweenites—4. Natural Pride—5. Exceptional Comformation of Mind—6. Remarkable Satanic Assaults—II. The Trouble not Essential to Salvation—Despair not a likely Preparation for Faith—The Inward Tumult often the Work of the Devil—Hundreds of Christians without the Experience—All the Essentials without it—Despair not Commanded—III. A Privilege not a Loss—Christ most Prominent—No Valuables Evidence Lost.

I AM not about to expound this incident, nor to draw illustrations from it, but only to direct your attention to one single point in it, and that is, its extreme simplicity. There are other cases of blind men, and we have various incidents connected with them, such as in one instance the making of clay, and the sending of the patient to wash at the pool of Siloam, and so forth. But here the cure is extremely simple: the men are blind, they cry to Jesus, they come near, they confess their faith, and they receive their sight straightway.

In many other cases of miracles that were wrought by Christ there were circumstances of difficulty: in one case a man is let down through the tiling, being borne of four; in a second case a woman comes behind Him in the press, and touches the hem of His garment with great effort; we read of another who had been dead four days already, and there seemed to be a clear impossibility in the way of his ever coming forth from the tomb; but everything is plain sailing here. Here are blind men, conscious of their blindness, confident that Christ can give them sight; they cry to Him, they come to Him, they believe that He is able to open their eyes, and they receive their sight at once.

You see there was, in their case, these simple elements—a sense of blindness, a desire for sight; then prayer, then coming to Christ, then an open avowal of faith, and then the cure. The whole matter lies in a nutshell. There are no details, no points of care and nicety which might suggest anxiety: the whole business is simplicity itself, and upon that one point I want to dwell at this time.

There are cases of conversion which are just as simple as this case of the opening of the eyes of the blind; and we are not to doubt the reality of the work of grace in them because of the remarkable absence of singular incidents and striking details. We are not to suppose that a conversion is a less genuine work of the Holy Ghost because it is extremely simple. May the Holy Spirit bless our meditation.

I. To make our discourse useful to many I will begin by remarking, in the first place, that it is an undoubted fact that

MANY PERSONS ARE MUCH TROUBLED IN COMING TO CHRIST.

It is a fact which must be admitted, that all do not come quite so readily as these blind men came. There are instances on record in biographies—there are many known to us, and perhaps our own cases are among them—in which coming to Christ was a matter of struggle, of effort, of disappointment, of long waiting, and at last of a kind of desperation by which we were forced to come.

You must have read Mr. John Bunyan's description of how the pilgrims came to the wicket gate. They were pointed, you remember, by Evangelist to a light and to a gate, and they went that way according to his bidding. I have told you sometimes the story of a young man in Edinburgh who was very anxious to speak to others about their souls; so he addressed himself one morning to

AN OLD MUSSELBURGH FISH-WIFE.

And he began by saying to her, "Here you are with your burden." "Ay," said she. He asked her, "Did you ever feel a spiritual burden?" "Yes," she said, resting a bit, "I felt the spiritual burden years ago, before you were born; but I did not go the same way to work that Bunyan's pilgrim did."

Our young friend was greatly surprised to hear her say that, and thought she must be under grievous error, and therefore begged her to explain. "No," said she; "when I was under concern of soul, I heard a true gospel minister, who bade me look to the cross of Christ, and there I lost my load of sin. I did not hear one of those milk-and-water preachers like Bunyan's Evangelist." "How," said our young friend, "do you make that out?" "Why, that Evangelist, when he met the man with the burden on his back, said to him, "Do you see that wicket gate?' 'No,' said he, 'I don't.' 'Do you see that light?' 'I think I do.' Why, man," said she, "he should not have spoken about wicket gates or lights, but he should have said, 'Do you see Jesus Christ hanging on the cross? Look to Him, and your burden will fall off your shoulder.'

"He sent that man round the wrong way when he sent him to the wicket gate; and much good he got by it, for he was likely to have been choked in the Slough of Despond before long. I tell you, I looked at once to the cross, and away went my burden." "What," said this young man, "did you never go through the Slough of Despond?" "Ah," said she, "many a time, more than I care to tell. But at the first I heard the preacher say, 'Look to Christ,' and I looked to Him. I have been through the Slough of Despond since that; but let me tell you, sir, it is much easier to go through that slough with your burden off than it is with your burden on." And so it is. Blessed are they whose eyes are only and altogether on the Crucified.

The older I grow the more sure I am of this, that we must have done with self in all forms, and see Jesus only if we would be at peace. Was John Bunyan wrong? Certainly not: he was describing things as they generally are. Was the old woman wrong? No, she was perfectly right: she was describing things as they ought to be, and as I wish they always were. Still, experience is not always as it ought to be, and much of the experience of Christians is not Christian experience.

It is a fact which I lament, but, nevertheless, must admit, that a large number of persons, ere they come to the cross and lose their burden, go round about no end of a way, trying this plan and that plan, with but very slender success after all, instead of coming straightway to Christ just as they are, looking to Him and finding light and life at once. How is it, then, that some are so long in getting to Christ?

HINDRANCES.

I. I answer, first, in some cases it is ignorance. Perhaps there is no subject upon which men are so ignorant as the gospel. Is it not preached in hundreds of places? Yes, thank God, it is, and illustrated in no end of books; but still men come not at it so; neither hearing nor reading can of themselves discover the gospel. It needs the teaching of the Holy Spirit, or else men still remain in ignorance as to this simplicity—this simplicity of salvation by faith.

2. In many cases, too, men are hindered by prejudice. People are brought up to the belief that salvation must be through ceremonies; and if they get driven out of that they still conclude that it must certainly be in some measure by their works. Numbers of people have learned a sort of half-and-half gospel, part law and part grace, and they are in a thick fog about salvation. They know that redemption has something to do with Christ, but it is much of a mixture with them; they do not quite see that it is all Christ or no Christ.

3. With many, indeed, the hindrance lies in downright bad teaching. The teaching that is too common nowadays is very dangerous. The service makes no distinction between saint and sinner. Certain prayers are used every day, which are meant for saints and sinners too—ready-made clothes, made to fit everybody, and fitting nobody at all. These prayers suit neither saint nor sinner, thoroughly beautiful as they are and grand as they are; but they bring up people under the notion and delusion that they are somewhere in a condition between being saved and being lost—not actually lost, certainly, but yet not quite saints—they are betweenites, mongrels—a sort of Samaritans that fear the Lord and serve other gods, and who hope to be saved by an amalgam of grace and works.

4. Besides that there is the natural pride of the human heart. We do not like to be saved by charity; we must have a finger in it. We get pushed into a corner; farther and farther are we driven away from self-confidence, but if we cannot find a hold by any other means. With awful desperation we trust in ourselves. We will cling by our eyelashes to the semblance of self-confidence: we will not give up carnal confidence if it be possible to hold it.

WE HANG ON BY OUR TEETH

Then comes in, with our pride, opposition to God; for the human heart does not love God, and it frequently shows its opposition by opposing Him about the plan of salvation. The enmity of the unrenewed heart is not displayed by actual open sin in all cases, for many by their very bringings-up have been made to be moral, but they hate God's plan of grace, and grace alone, and here their gall and bitterness begin to work. How they will writhe in their seats if the minister preaches divine sovereignty; they hate the text, "He will have mercy on whom He will have mercy, and He will have compassion on whom He will have compassion." They talk of the rights of fallen men, and of all being treated alike; and when it comes to sovereignty, and God's manifesting His grace according to His own absolute will, they cannot endure it.

5. In some instances the struggle of the heart in getting to Christ, I have no doubt, arises from a singularity of mental conformation, and such cases ought to be looked upon as exceptions, and by no means regarded as rules. Now take, for instance, the case of John Bunyan, to which we have referred. If you read "Grace Abounding," you will find that, for five years or more, he was the subject of the most fearful despair, tempted by Satan, tempted by his own self, always raising difficulties against himself; and it was long, long, long before he could come to the cross and find peace. But then, dear friend, it is to the last degree improbable that either you or I will ever turn out John Bunyans. We may become tinkers, but we shall never write a "Pilgrim's Progress." We might imitate him in his poverty, but we are not likely to emulate him in his genius: a man with such an imagination, full of wondrous dreams, is not born every day, and when he does come, his inheritance of brain is not all a gain in the direction of a restful life.

Now, you, dear friend, may be an odd person. Very likely you are; and I can sympathize with you, for I am odd enough myself; but do not lay down a law that everybody else must be odd too. If you and I did happen to go round by the back ways, do not let us think that everybody ought to follow our bad example. Let us be very thankful that some people's minds are less twisted and gnarled than ours, and do not let us set up our experience as a standard for other people. No doubt difficulties may arise from an extraordinary quality of mind with which God may have gifted some, or a depression of spirit natural to others, and these may make them peculiar as long as they live.

6. Besides, there are some who are kept from coming to Christ through remarkable assaults of Satan. He sets upon them with all the brutality of his fiendish nature, and expends his malice upon them, because he fears that they are about to escape from his service, and he will no longer be able to tyrannize over them. As Watts says,

"He worries whom he can't devour.
With a malicious joy.

Now, if some come to Christ, and the devil is not permitted to assail them; if some come to Christ, and there is nothing strange about thei experience; if some come to Christ, and pride and opposition have been conquered in thei nature; if some come to Christ, and they are no ignorant, but well instructed, and readily see the light, let us rejoice that it is so. It is of such that I am now about to speak somewhat more a length.

II. It is admitted as an undoubted fact tha many are much troubled in coming to Christ but now, secondly, this is to a real, saving coming to the Lord Jesu Christ. I mention this because I have know Christian men distressed in heart because the fear that they came to Christ too easily. The have half imagined, as they looked back, tha they could not have been converted at all, because their conversion was not attended wit such agony and torment of mind as others spea of.

NOT AT ALL ESSENTIAL

I would first remark, that it is very hard to s how despairing feelings can be essential to salvation. Look for a minute. Can it be possibl that unbelief can help a soul to faith? Is it n certain that the anguish which many experienc before they come to Christ arises from the fa of their unbelief? They do not trust—they sa they cannot trust; and so they are like the troubled sea which cannot rest. Their mind tossed to and fro, and vexed sorely through unbelief: is this a foundation for holy trust?

Here is God's way of salvation, and He d mands that I do trust His dear Son, who di for sinners. I perceive that Christ is worthy be trusted, for He is the Son of God, so th His sacrifice must be able to put away my sin; perceive also that He laid down His life in t room, place, and stead of His people, and ther fore I heartily trust Him. God bids me tru Him, and I do trust Him without any furth question. If Jesus Christ satisfies God, He ce tainly satisfies me; and, asking no further que tion, I come and trust myself with Him. Do not this kind of action appear to have about all that can be needful?

Yet, once again, dear friends, much of all th struggling and tumult within, which some have perienced, is the work of the devil, as I have alrea said. Can it be essential to salvation for a m to be under the influence of Satan? Is it nee ful that the devil should come in to help Chris Is it absolutely essential for the black fingers the devil to be seen at work with the lily har of the Redeemer? Impossible. That is not judgment of the work of Satan; nor will it think, be yours, if you will look at it. If y never were driven either to blasphemy or desp by Satan, thank God you never were. Y would have gained nothing by it; you wo have been a serious loser.

Once again, many instances prove that all t law work, and doubting and fearing, and desp ing, and being tormented of Satan, are essential, because there are scores and hundr of Christians who came at once to Christ, these two blind men did, and to this very know very little about those things. I could it were proper, call upon brethren who are aro me at this moment who would tell you th when I have been preaching the experience those who come to Christ with difficulty, have been glad that it should be preached, they have felt, "We know nothing of all this our own experience."

Taught from their very youth the way of G trained by godly parents, they came under influences of the Holy Spirit very early in l they heard that Jesus Christ could save th they knew that they wanted saving, and they just went to Him. I was about to say, almost as naturally as they went to their mother or their father when they were in need: they trusted the Saviour, and they found peace at once. Several of the honored leaders of this church came to the Lord in this simple manner.

Now we do not tell you that there are a few such plain cases, but we assert boldly that we know hosts of like instances, and that there are thousands of God's most honored servants who are walking before Him in holiness and are eminently useful, whose experience is as simple as A B C. Their whole story might be summed up in the verse,

"I came to Jesus, as I was,
Weary and worn and sad;
I found in Him a resting-place,
And he Has made me glad."

I will go yet farther and assure you that many of those who give the best evidence that they are renewed by grace cannot tell you the day in which they were saved, and cannot attribute their conversion to any one sermon or to any one text of Scripture, or to any one event in life. We dare not doubt their conversion, for their ives prove its truth. You may have many trees n your garden, of which you must admit that you don't know when they were planted; but, if you get plenty of fruit from them, you are not very particular about the date of their striking oot.

I am acquainted with several persons who do not know their own age. I was talking to one he other day, who thought herself ten years older than I found her out to be. I did not tell her that she was not alive because she did not now her birthday. If I had told her so, she would have laughed at me; and yet there are ome who fancy that they cannot be converted ecause they do not know the date of their conersion. Oh, if you are trusting the Saviour, if He is all your salvation and all your desire, and your life is affected by your faith, so that you ring forth the fruits of the Spirit, you need not orry about times and seasons.

Now, proceeding a step farther, there are all e essentials of salvation in the simple, pleasant, appy way of coming to Jesus just as you are; for he first is repentance, and these, though they el no remorse, yet hate the sin they once loved. hough they know no dread of hell, yet they feel dread of sin, which is a great deal better. hough they have never stood shivering under e gallows, yet the crime is more dreadful to em than the doom. They have been taught God's Spirit to love righteousness and seek ter holiness, and this is the very essence of rentance.

WHAT ARE THE ESSENTIALS?

Those who thus come to Christ have certainly tained true faith. They have no experience ich they could trust in, but they are all the ore fully driven to rest in what Christ has felt d done. They rest not in their own tears, but Christ's blood; not in their own emotions, but Christ's pangs; not in their consciousness of in, but in the certainty that Christ has come save all those that trust Him. They have th of the purest kind.

And see, too, how certainly they have love. Faith works by love," and they show it. They en seem to have more love at the first than ose who come so dreadfully burdened and npest-tossed; for, in the calm quiet of their nds, they get a fairer view of the beauties of Saviour, and they burn with love to Him, d they commence to serve Him, while others, yet, are having their wounds healed, and are ing to make their broken bones rejoice. I not wishing to depreciate a painful experice, but I am only wanting to show, as to this cond class, that their simple coming to rist, as the blind men came, their simply beving that He could give them sight, is not one it inferior to the other, and has in it all the entials of salvation.

For, next, notice that the gospel command implies in itself nothing of the kind which some have experienced. What are we bidden to preach to men—"Be dragged about by the devil, and you shall be saved"? No, but "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." What is my commission at this time? To say to you, "Despair, and ye shall be saved"? No, verily; but "Believe, and you shall be saved." Are we to come here and say, "Torture yourself: mangle your heart, scourge your spirit, grind your very soul to powder in desperation"? No, but "Believe in the infinite goodness and mercy of God in the person of His dear Son, and come and trust Him."

That is the gospel command. It is put in various forms. This is one: "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth." Now, if I were to come and say, "Tear your eyes out," that would not be the gospel, would it? No, but "Look." The gospel does not say, "Cry your eyes out," but "Look." And it does not say, "Blind your eyes with a hot iron." No, but "Look, look, look." It is just the very opposite of anything like remorse, despair, and blasphemous thought. It is just "Look."

What is the gospel again? Is it not to eat the bread of heaven? "Eat ye that which is good." There is the gospel banquet, and we are to compel men to come in; and what are they to do when they come in? Silently to look on while others eat? Stand and wait till they feel more hungry? Try forty days' fasting, like Dr. Tanner? Nothing of the sort. You might think this to be the gospel by the way some people preach and act, but it is not so. You are to feast on Christ at once; you need not fast till you turn yourself into a living skeleton, and then come to Christ.

Come as you are. Do not try to make a righteousness out of your unrighteousness, or a confidence out of your unbelief, or a Christ out of your blasphemies, as some seem to do; nor dote so foolishly as to imagine that despair may be a ground of hope. It cannot be. You are to get out of self, and into Christ, and there you will be safe. As the blind man said, when Christ asked him, "Believest thou that I am able to do this?" so are you to say unto Him, "Yea, Lord." Trust yourself with your Saviour, and He is your Saviour.

A PRIVILEGE NOT A LOSS.

III. I conclude with one more observation, that those persons who are privileged to come to Jesus Christ softly, pleasantly, and happily, are not losers. They do lose something, certainly; but there is not much in it. They lose somewhat of the picturesque, and they have the less to tell. When a man has had a long series of trials to drive him out of himself, and at last he comes to Christ, like a wrecked vessel tugged into port, he has a deal to talk of and write about, and perhaps he thinks it interesting to be able to tell it; and, if he can tell it to God's glory, it is quite proper that he should.

But I ask you this, when those blind men came to Christ just as they were, and said that they believed that He could open their eyes, and He did open their eyes, is there not as much of Christ in their story as there well could be? The men themselves are nowhere, but the healing Master is in the foreground. More detail might almost take away the peculiar prominence that He has in it all. There He stands, the blessed, glorious opener of the eyes of the two blind men; there He stands alone, and His name is glorious!

Perhaps you may suppose that persons who come thus gently lose something by way of evidence afterward. "Ah," said one to me, "I could almost wish sometimes that I had been an open offender, that I might see the change in my character; but, having been always moral from my youth up, I am not always able to see any distinct mark of a change." Ah, let me tell you, friends, that this form of evidence is of small use in times of darkness, for if the devil cannot say to a man, "You have not changed your life"—for there are some that he would not have the impudence to say that to, since the change is too manifest for him to deny it—he says, "You changed your actions, but your heart is still the same. You turned from a bold, honest sinner to be a hypocritical, canting professor. That is all you have done: you have given up open sin because your strong passions declined, or you thought you would like another way of sinning; and now you are only making a false profession, and living far from what you should do."

Have you come to Jesus? Do you come to Jesus? If you have come, and you doubt whether you have come, come over again. Never quarrel with Satan about whether you are a Christian. If he says you are a sinner, reply to him, "So I am, but Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, and I will begin again."

HE IS AN OLD LAWYER,

you know, and very cunning, and he knows how to baffle us, for we do not understand things so well as he does. He has been these thousands of years at the trade of trying to make Christians doubt their interest in Christ, and he understands it well. Never answer him. Refer him to your solicitor; tell him you have an Advocate on high who will answer him. Tell him you will fly away to Christ again; if you never went to Jesus before you will go now, and if you have been before you will go again. That is the way to end the quarrel. As to evidences, they are fine things in fine weather, but when the tempest is out wise men let evidences go. The best evidence a man can have that he is saved is that he is still clinging to Christ.

Lastly, some may suppose that those who come gently to Christ may lose a good deal of adaptation for after usefulness, because they will not be able to sympathize with those who are in deep perplexity, and in awful straits when they are coming to Christ. Ah, well, there are enough of us who can sympathize with such; and I do not know that everybody is bound to sympathize with everybody in every respect. I remember mentioning one day to a man who had considerable property that his poor minister had a large family and could scarcely keep a coat on his back. I said I wondered how some Christian men who profited under the ministry of such a man did not supply his wants; he answered that he thought it was a good thing for ministers to be poor, because they could sympathize with the poor.

I said, "Yes, yes, but then, don't you see there ought to be one or two that are not poor to sympathize with those who are rich." I would give them turn about, certainly, and let the poor pastor now and then have the power to sympathize with both classes. He did not seem to see my argument, but I think there is a good deal in it.

It is a great mercy to have some brethren around us who, by their painful experience, can sympathize with those who have been through that pain; but do you not think it is a great mercy to have others who, through not having undergone that experience, can sympathize with others who have not undergone it? Such a testimony will comfort the poor soul; and so, if you lose the power to sympathize one way, you will gain the power to sympathize in another; and there will be no great loss after all.

To sum up all in one, I would that every man and woman and child here would come and trust the Lord Jesus Christ. It seems to me to be such a matchless plan of salvation, for Christ to take human sin and to suffer in the sinner's stead, and for us to have nothing to do but just to accept what Christ has done, and to trust ourselves wholly with Him. He that would not be saved by such a plan as this deserves to perish; and so he must.

God grant that none of us may reject this way of grace, this open way, this safe way. Come, linger no longer. The Spirit and the bride say "Come." Lord, draw them by the love of Jesus. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—John 3: 14-36.

TALES OF THE GROG-SHOPS.

By a London Clergyman.

BARTLE THE BUTLER.

(A Tale in Two Chapters.)

CHAPTER II.

BARTLE did not answer the children at first. He thought, perhaps, they might forget they had asked the question if he gave no answer. He remained silent for a while, apparently intent on his work. But these two little ladies were very resolute in their demands, for Fan repeated her question, as also did Tots.

"Well, little misses," he said at last, "it would help me. I wish I could give up altogether having anything to do with wine, that I do. It's the curse of my life. I'm never safe so long as I'm opening bottles, and visiting wine-cellars, and pouring out wine. "But," he continued, "you mustn't think of giving up wine for me. You mustn't really."

"But I will," said Fan with great determination, "if papa and mamma will let me."

"And so will I," said Tots with equal decision.

"I wonder whether papa and mamma would give up wine too for Bartle's sake?" asked Fan of Tots. "They don't take very much."

"I shouldn't wonder," replied Tots; "let's go up and ask them."

Quickly opening the pantry door they were about to run up-stairs, when who should they see outside but their father himself.

Mr. Oaklands had come down to give Bartle his formal dismissal. He had not seen any reason to change his mind, but he was quite convinced it was the right thing to do. So now, with the full determination not to be turned from his purpose by prayers, tears, or promises of amendment, he was about to enter the pantry when he heard talking there. He at once recognized the voices of his little girls; so, standing there, he listened; and wonderfully touched was he by the loving tones with which they spoke, and by their evident longing to act the part of true friends to the butler. He felt more proud of his little girls than ever before. And the way in which his firm resolution not to be moved gradually softened, melted, and finally disappeared, surprised him more than he could say.

The greatest surprise of all to him was when his little daughters so emphatically declared themselves resolved to sacrifice their daily glass of wine for Bartle's sake; and he was not altogether displeased at the good opinion they evidently had of their parents' disposition, counting it not a hopeless task to induce even them to deny themselves for the poor man's sake.

If such a proposition had come from any other source, or from the same source in any other way, he would have been much displeased. He would have pronounced it outrageous to expect a master to give up the use of strong drink because a servant was tempted thereby. But his little girls' behavior had put the question in quite a new light. Bartle was a servant undoubtedly, but was he not also a brother for whom Christ died? There was one text too which he could not keep out of his mind, and which, as often as he cast it out, presented itself again: "Destroy not him with thy meat for whom Christ died."

Both Mr. and Mrs. Oaklands were Christians, trusting only in the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ for salvation, and seeking to please their Lord and Master in all things. A duty once seen they were willing to perform, cost what it might.

As he took his two little girls up-stairs from the pantry door to their mother, he was earnestly considering whether to save even his butler was not a worthy and a noble task.

"Have you dismissed him?" asked Mrs. Oaklands, when they entered her morning-room.

Mr. Oaklands stooped down, and kissing his little daughters, whispered, "Tell mother, darlings" and left it all with them.

"Mamma, Bartle is going to be very good. We've told him about Jesus, and he does really want to be better. He said so, didn't he, Tots?"

"Yes, mamma," added Tots, "he's dreadfully sorry;" adding quickly, "and we want to give up our glass of wine if you and papa will let us."

Mrs. Oaklands looked surprised but not displeased, whereat Fan grew bolder, and said, without any more preface,

"And, mamma, we want you and papa to help Bartle, and not take any wine either. It hurts him, he says, to even smell it when he is pouring it out."

Tots looked pleadingly on her father and mother, as much as to say, "Do, please, do.'

"Do you know anything about this, dear?" asked Mrs. Oaklands of her husband.

"I have not dismissed Bartle," he answered; "for when I reached the pantry door, who should I hear there but these two young ladies."

And then he told her all that he had heard, and how they had pledged themselves, if permitted, to drink no more wine for Bartle's sake, and had even expressed themselves hopeful of winning over their father and mother to the same self-denial.

"There can be no doubt," he said, with a smile, "that that would be cutting the tree up by the roots, for if Bartle had no wine to supply, there would be no visits to the wine-cellar, no decanting required, and no pouring it out at table; consequently, as far as we are concerned, there would be no temptation put in his way. Many of our friends will no doubt tell us we are acting an absurd part, and will laugh at us a good deal; but if it will really save the man and his family from utter ruin, we need not mind that. The servant's soul is as precious as the master's, and God forbid we should be the means of wrecking a single life."

"I think so too, decidedly," replied Mrs. Oaklands. "If we dismiss Bartle, he is a lost man, and in his fall his wife and children must accompany him. By an act of self-denial, which none of us would much feel, we should save no less than eight lives, certainly in body, and perhaps in soul. Then we will decide, dear."

I will not attempt to describe the wonderful happiness of Fan and Tots, or their boisterous thankfulness. It is more easily imagined than described, how they rushed down to poor Bartle, and told him of the resolution the whole family had come to; how he would not be called upon any more to pour out wine for the family, and how they had done it all for his sake.

Bartle was so overwhelmed with astonishment that all he could do was to thank God over and over again; and more than that, it was really the beginning of better things with him, for he never forgot the text which had so worked on his master's mind—"Destroy not him with thy meat for whom Christ died." And after a time, although not at once, he drank in the spirit of the last words, and really believed with his heart that Jesus died for him. He never gave way to strong drink again, for he fought against its power with grace not his own, and so overcame.

And Mrs. Bartle—judge how thankful and happy she must have been when she heard of her husband's pardon after his disgrace.

If the two little tongues prattled away so busily the night before, that evening they were more nimble than ever.

"I'm so glad it's all right," said Fan to Tots.

"So am I, ever so much," responded Tots.

"You see, God did answer our prayers, didn't He?" said Fan again.

"Yes," replied Tots; "I felt sure He would."

"So did I," returned Fan.

In their prayers Bartle and his family were again as prominent as before. This was Fan's prayer:

"O God, you were so good to hear us last night; and we do thank you so much. We thought you would; and don't let Bartle ever do wrong any more. For Jesus' sake. Amen."

Tots prayed thus:

"O God, you've made Fan and me and the Bartles so happy. You did hear us last night—of course you did, and we thank you so much. For Jesus' sake. Amen."

In their dreams, too, the Bartles were equally prominent. And what bright dreams they were! There was Bartle and Mrs. Bartle, and the little Bartles, all in a circle, and Tots and Fan in the middle, and all smiling away as hard as they could; and when they tried to stop, they couldn't for very gladness of heart. This was Fan's dream.

While Tots spent all her night in shutting up umbrellas, and dropping her pence in the missionary-box, until it was so full that a penny stuck out at the top.

A "STRAPPING" NAVVY'S CONVERSION.

THE Rev. G. Warner, a Methodist minister, says the Gospel has won some splendid triumphs on the Isle of Dogs, near Blackwall, London. At a meeting one night a man prayed, "Lord! some o' these 'ere people says as how they was brands pluckt from the burnin'. Lord! I was a blazin' tar-barrel, I was; but Thou didst fetch me out, Lord." This man is an illustration of what the grace of God can effect. Like too many of his class, he had spent a large proportion of his hard-earned wages in drink. Out of that came complaints and quarrels at home, in which the "weaker vessel" went to the wall." Frequently the strap which he buckled round his waist was taken off and applied to his wife's shoulders. He had more than one of these, and one day, in return for his attentions, his wife cut one up and made him a pudding of it. She took it to him to his work for his dinner, but did not stop to see how he enjoyed it. When they next met he gave her a taste of that he had been wearing; but this did not cure her of strap-cooking. She had all the persevering pluck of her sex, and so cut up the next she laid her hands on, and made him another pudding.

But religious convictions presently ended the strapping business, and then she made puddings from beefsteaks instead of from the beef's hide. Jem signed the pledge, and wife-beating was over. He was somewhat affected as to the other sins besides that of drunkenness, and the Holy Spirit began to woo him to truth and righteousness. Then he heard a female preach, and was fairly broken down. However, he hastened from the chapel, but was led to return as they were holding a prayer-meeting. Looking in, he saw the people in such a glow of delight as looked more like heaven than anything he had ever seen, and, he crield for mercy, and found it, to the joy of his sou. He had early come under the power of the tobacco-appetite; but now, he said, as he took his little black pipe, something seemed to say to him, "Why, you look more like a drunken blackguard than a decent Christian!" This he regarded as the voice of God, and so, in His name, renounced the pipe forever. There is happiness at home now but it may be said of this as of another case i which a man expressed his experience in a love feast, "Before I got converted there was no much peace at our house; my wife knows was a Tartar." The wife replied, "Ah! thou we'rt, lad; the cream-o'-tartar!"

"Show your Ticket Please!"—Major Whittle the evangelist, who is conducting religious services in England, related the following inciden at one of his recent meetings. "I well remember entering a railway train at night, when i was exceedingly cold. The inspector demande of every one to show his ticket before he coul pass, which compelled the passengers to unbutton their coats and otherwise greatly incommode themselves. Many expressed their impatience in hot words and bitter complaints 'You are a very unpopular man to-night,' sai my friend pleasantly. 'I only care to be popular with one man,' he replied; 'that is th superintendent.' Noble words for the Christia soldier to adopt. 'That he may please Hi who hath chosen him to be a soldier.'"

DR. TALMAGE'S FRIDAY EVENING TALK.

October 22, 1880.

Defalcations—A Period of Freedom—But the Devil is not Dead—The Eternal Retribution—Local Nominations to Office—Importance of Wise Selection—The White House not to Dwarf the City Hall—The Bicycle Accident—A Startling Lesson—The Death-bed of a Young Man—A Splendid Christ—Rest in the Bosom of God.

WE have this week, for a rarity, two defalcaions—one of a Boston banker for $82,000, and he other of a Chicago railroad man for $50,000. Perhaps you have noticed that during the last ear there has been almost a cessation of such inancial catastrophe. For four or five years preious the papers every day had whole columns levoted to the story of embezzlement on a large cale.

What shipwreck of whole fleets of life inurance companies! The great cities seemed to ie with each other in gigantic forgeries. Hardly prison, but through its wickets looked some bsconding cashier. But that mighty crop seems arnered, and we have had almost a dearth of big ishonesties. Let us rejoice that a stout breeze wept through Wall Street, and Third Street, and tate Street, and all the other money markets of he land, and purified them.

Still, the news this week from Boston and Chiago shows that the devil is not dead. Notwithanding all the lessons we have learned, people ill live beyond their income, and to get means r indulgences they will put their hands in other eople's pockets. The forger's pen is not worn it, the burglars key is not rusty, the perjurer's ible is not lost. We must have new illustraons by which to show the young men of to-y that fraud will out, that old-fashioned honty in the long run pays the most, that the best y to get a dollar is to earn it, that there is no ding place for those who wrong their fellows, nce the chief of police makes proclamation, d the lightnings of the telegraph are on the ase, and, above all, the retributions of eternal stice are dispatched for the pursuit.

There is not an honest man, however poor, in oston or Chicago to-night, but is happier than e two defaulters, however well they may have cured their ill-gotten gains. Such riches, if ey do not, according to the Bible figure, take ngs and fly toward heaven, will coil like sernts around the heart, to chill and sting it with morse unutterable. It is not so much what u have, as how you got it. If you want to ake the silver and gold of earth bright, you had tter wash them with sweat from your own tems. Remember that financial failure on earth nothing compared with eternal defalcation.

This has also been the week of office in New York and Brooklyn. The most the public attention is diverted to the ional contest, when the fact is that our prosity as neighborhoods and cities will be more ected by the local elections than by the ional. It is no small question who we shall e for district attorneys and auditors and conllerships and justices and mayors.

LOCAL NOMINATIONS

Do not allow the question as to who shall ocy the White House, make you indifferent as who shall stand in your city to see that right orwarded and wrong discomfited. You want elligent men, honest men, pure men in all posis of trust. You cannot be independent of officials. Their competency or incompecy will directly or indirectly affect every rch, every family, every individual. Do not, er the impression that such offices are of little importance, let them fall into the ds of those loose of habit or stupid of brain. se cities standing at the gates of the sea. e more to do with deciding the destiny of nation than any other cities. Washing is the political capital, but New York its suburbs are the commercial capital of erica.

The throne of this continent is New York. John Sherman comes here to find out what to do next. Wall Street runs clear through from the top of Maine to the bottom of Texas. The local elections of these three great cities which by ferry-boat are practically one, and soon by bridge and tunnel will be literally one, must be of vast importance, and you no more need to have your national ticket dictated by conscience and religion, than your local suffrages. May God save these cities, and make them as pleasant and happy for our children, forty years from now, as to-day they are pleasant and happy to us.

This week

THE BICYCLE

has been doing fearful work. Every day it has frightened horses by the score in different parts of the land, but its work this week has been death in conspicuous places. That the bicycle in the right place has its mission I have no doubt. There seems to be great exhilaration in riding it, or so many would not take it for pastime and recreation. The fact that it frightens horses is nothing against it, for so does the wheelbarrow, so does the falling kite, so do many things useful in work and play; but it ought to be confined to hours and places. Our citizens ought not to be in peril of having their families demolished every time they ride in Prospect Park.

A horse, be he never so gentle, never could and never will understand a vehicle whirling along with nothing to push it and nothing to pull it, seemingly no reason why it goes or why it stops, and standing up when one would suppose it ought to fall down. Men as well as horses would be frightened, were they not capable of understanding its explanation. The authorities of this and other cities are called upon by the agonizing disaster of this week to pass some regulations that will hinder the recurrence of such a tragedy.

A young woman, attractive and accomplished, the pride of her acquaintances and the idol of her father's house, this day carried to the sepulchre. All our sympathies are aroused for the desolated household, while we learn for ourselves the startling lesson. It seems that neither in our pleasures nor our work we are secure from accident and death. A horseback ride ordinarily means health, means hilarity, means glad companionship, means long life; but in this case it was calamity.

Our only wise course is to be ready—not by morbid apprehension, not by shutting ourselves away from the world, not by standing aloof from the congratulations of life, but by wise preparation for the future state, to make ourselves independents of earthly changes. To that Christian girl, death was transition from a bright home on earth to a brighter home in Heaven. Will our exit from this life be a lifting up or a casting down? Although sudden departure is well known to be a possibility, yet it seems to require some awful crash like this to make us realize it. "What thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might."

I was this morning summoned to

THE DEATH-BED OF A YOUNG MAN

who was prominent in our revival meetings of last spring. Amid severe sufferings, God is with him. I told him what I had a right to tell him: to drop all his fears, and all his anxieties; and when he told me that his arm, part of which had been amputated, hurt him so he could not pray, I said, "Then you need not pray: just rest on the bosom of God, and think of nothing but Christ and Heaven and you will go straight through." Then he smiled and said, "Yes, He is a splendid Christ."

O my friends, will it not be grand when we all get through with the struggles of this life? Safe in harbor after the loud storm. Safe in celestial peace, after the hard fight of our earthly existence. Still, we must be patient. We must not want to go until our day's work is done. No time to sheathe the sword before the victory is gained. While our arm is strong, it must toil. While our vision is clear, it must be on the watch. While our life lasts, it must be consecrated to God.

"Thy saints in all this glorious war
 Shall conquer though they die;
They see the triumph from afar,
 And seize it with their eye.

When that illustrious day shall rise,
 And all thine armies shine,
In robes of victory through the skies,
 The glory shall be thine."

A SAILOR'S LAST WORDS.

"The Plank Bears me."

SOME years ago a ship was caught in a storm off the coast of Wales. After battling with the tempest for some time, she got among the breakers and went down, all on board descending with her to the depths of the sea, to lie down in a dark watery grave, except one young sailor, who was dashed, by the fury of the foaming billows, upon the beach, in a very exhausted and almost lifeless condition. He was carried to the nearest house, where he was carefully and kindly treated, and eventually restored. During his recovery, one day a minister called upon him, and discovered that he was very anxious about his soul and the life that is beyond death. He was seeking a sure haven for his troubled spirit, but finding none. The minister, realizing the condition of the young sailor, said, "Suppose when you were in the sea, tossed about by the waves, that a plank had been thrown within your reach and you had laid hold of it, would it not have borne you up and saved you from perishing? Well, then, if you lay hold of Jesus Christ, He will save you. He bore your sins, He died to save you."

The young man's face beamed with joy and satisfaction as he said, "I'm saved." Many years passed away; the minister went to spend the evening of life in a town in the North of England. The sailor went to sea and visited many a land and many a shore and when his life was drawing to a close, came home, and settled in the same town.

One day the aged silver-haired man of God was asked to visit a man who was evidently passing away. He sat down by the bedside of the aged tar, and spoke to him of Jesus and the land that is fairer than day. The dying man was struck with the sweetness of the speaker's voice. Memory rushed back to the cottage where he had first heard that voice, and recognizing his old friend just before he went home, he exclaimed, with delight and joy, "Thank God, the plank bears me."

Characteristics of Irishmen.—Christopher Crayon, an English newspaper correspondent, says of Ireland: "One's first impression when you land in Ireland is that Rag Fair has been robbed of its treasures, and that the old clothes of the kingdom are shipped off to Ould Ireland. As to the dress of the 'finest peasantry in the world,' Paddy's hat is of the kind you may see any day on a scarecrow in any English garden. His coat (of Irish frieze) is of the peculiar pattern which we in England associate with full-dress and good dinner or evening parties. He rejoices in an enormous shirt-collar of the most ancient type. Then he wears knee-breeches and black stockings, and thus, with his red or green waistcoat, and his neckcloth of many colors—though he does not always wear one—he is a compound of the brigand and the parson.

"The Irish are kind, however, in their way, and I was much struck at Limerick with the care with which a group of them looked after a poor blind woman who happened to come for a ticket as they were clustered round. As to their domestic affection, never shall I forget the weeping and kissing and howling and shrieking which I beheld at more than one station as some emigrants were bidding their friends good-by. In a few minutes after, however, the train moved off, the fiddler played an Irish jig, and tears gave way to smiles. The Irish are an emotional people, and are always ready for a laugh or a cry."

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

(Continued from page 687.)

The Dangers of an Easy Life.

SIR WILLIAM turned as he came to the door and said gravely,

"Lord Moreton is very anxious to see you this morning, Evelyn; shall I let him come when you get into the other room?"

Evelyn laughed heartily.

"Yes, if it is any amusement to him, papa," she said; "I am sure he amuses me. Oh! if you had only seen him the other day; he came up when Alicia Hay was sitting beside me, and neither of them spoke a word. He sat looking at me, and she sat looking at him, and they were both perfectly stupid."

"Lord Moreton is a very worthy young man, Evelyn," said her father gravely.

"Oh! a very worthy young man," she repeated in exactly the same tone—so exactly that I could scarcely keep from smiling; "but the worst is, papa, that I don't like very worthy young men; they are so dreadfully uninteresting—at least, if Lord Moreton is a specimen—they sit and look at you, and then clear their throats, and try to make some feeble remark, and break down in the middle. Oh, dear! it is so amusing. Now Cousin Donald never does that; he can make himself very agreeable; I wish he would come to see me."

"Donald has other business to attend to," said her father rather sharply; "he has no time to lose now; Donald must make his way in the world."

"Yes," she said rather sadly; "poor Donald!"

"I do not know why he need be pitied," said Sir William dryly; "if he will only work he will soon be able to earn a very fair income."

"But Donald does not like work," said Evelyn; "he says he would like to be independent, and to have plenty—plenty of money."

"He never will have plenty of money," said Sir William, almost angrily, as he shut the door.

"Papa does not like poor Donald," she said, as soon as he was out of hearing; "but he is so handsome, and he has such nice brown eyes. I do not know why papa dislikes him so much. I think it is because he is afraid he likes me too much. It is very strange that he does like me; I should have thought that he would have hated me, because if I had never been born Cousin Donald would have lived here, and would have been just like papa's son. That makes me feel so sorry for him."

"Is he much older than you?" I asked.

"Yes, he is six years older," said Evelyn; "and papa and mamma had been married a long time, and they thought they would not have any children of their own, so papa was talking of adopting Cousin Donald, and educating him and leaving the property to him. Uncle and aunt were very pleased about it, because they have so many children. Cousin Donald is the eldest of thirteen now, and there were plenty of them even then, so they were quite willing to spare him to papa. But of course when I came I put an end to all that little plan," she said, laughing.

"And where is your Cousin Donald now?'

"Oh, poor fellow! he is in a bank, and he does so hate doing sums; he always did. They make his head ache, he says. He likes riding and shooting and fishing, and all such things, just the kind of life he would have had here, you know; it is very hard for him, is it not? And I am afraid he is rather lazy, and they say he wastes his money. But he is so good looking, and I really think he cannot help it—yes, I really think he cannot help it."

"Cannot help what?" I inquired.

"Oh! being extravagant," she explained. "He buys beautiful little bouquets for his button-hole, and all sorts of little unnecessary things of that kind, and the money goes very fast. But it must be so hard to see pretty things and not to be able to buy them. I should never be able to do that; as soon as ever I see anything I like I send into the shop and have it brought out to me at once."

I smiled to myself as I went on with my work, for I was thinking how different Evelyn's experience had been from mine. She seemed to guess my thoughts.

"I suppose you have not always had everything that you wanted and wished for?" she said.

"Everything I really wanted—yes," I answered; "everything I may have wished for—no."

"Oh, dear! was it not very tiresome?" she asked.

"I think it was good for me," I said.

"Good for you!" she repeated; "that's just like the brown alpaca. How could it be good for you?"

"I think it made me enjoy all the more the good things which were given me," I said; "things that perhaps you might have thought nothing of, and things which would have given you no pleasure at all."

"What sort of things?" asked Evelyn.

"Oh! any little present that was given me; any new book or picture; any little pleasure, or treat of any kind. We had so few new things that when anything fresh came it was prized and valued more than I can tell you. I really think it gave us more enjoyment than far grander things would give you."

"Oh, I dare say," said Evelyn; "there are some things that I wish for just for a minute, and then when they come I do not care for them. If you only saw the number of books on those shelves, the leaves of which have never been cut. I wished for them, and ordered them, but when they arrived I had given up wishing for them, and I have never begun to read them."

I thought of the little shelves at home, which had held my small library, each volume of which was the prized gift of some friend, and which had been read and re-read, until I knew their contents almost by heart.

Before I had been long at Alliston Hall, I came to the conclusion that the enjoyment of this life is much more evenly distributed than many of us think. For where pleasures are many the enjoyment that they give is comparatively small; while where they are few and far between they cause so much larger an amount of enjoyment that the lives of those who receive them are quite as full of sunshine and brightness as they would be if their pleasures were more in number.

My life at Alliston Hall was a very happy one. Day after day went by without any care or anxiety, and every one was so kind to me that I could not feel lonely or homeless any longer.

The more I knew of Evelyn Trafford the more I loved her. In spite of her light, careless way of talking, there was a great deal of genuine kind feeling in her, and I am sure she did all in her power to make me happy. I never once remember, the whole time I was with her, feeling uncomfortable on account of my position in the house. Both Sir William and Evelyn treated me as if I were one of the family, and I received nothing but kindness from their numerous visitors and friends. Lady Eldridge was the only exception. She, whenever she made her appearance at Alliston Hall, thought it her duty to keep me fully aware who she, Lady Eldridge, was, and who I, May Lindsay, was, and of the immense and immeasurable distance between us.

The guests at Alliston Hall did not pay very long visits, so I had constant change and variety in my life, and heard and saw a great deal more of the outer world than in our quiet country home.

And yet, although everything around me was so pleasant, and though every one was so kind to me, I had not been many months at Alliston Hall before I began to feel restless and unhappy. For I felt that I was not walking so closely with God as I had done before. I had become cold and careless, rising late in the morning and hurrying over my prayers, and then going through the day in an idle, careless spirit, hardly ever thinking of my Lord or trying to please Him.

For some time this did not make me at all unhappy. I had so much to think of, and there were so many pleasant visitors staying in the house, and so many books to be read, and there was so much to be done to amuse Evelyn and to make the days pass happily for her, that I gave myself no time to think about the state of my soul. But the visitors left and we were quiet again, and then I felt an empty, dissatisfied feeling in my heart, which I cannot put into words.

My conscience was very busy now, and brought to my recollection all my neglect of my best and dearest Friend, all my coldness and indifference to Him. I would have given anything to feel His presence as in times past; but He seemed far away from me, and I felt too cold even to pray to Him. But though I had so terribly forgotten Him, my Lord still remembered me.

It was Sunday afternoon. Evelyn had fallen asleep on the sofa, and I went out into the garden till she awoke. There had been showers all the morning, but now the sun was shining brightly, and the rain-drops were sparkling like diamonds on the grass.

I went along one of the grassy terraces, and turned down a quiet path, shut in by evergreens which led by a gentle descent down to the sea This was my favorite walk, and I always chose i when I came out alone. There were severa seats on this path, so situated as to catch a pee of the sea through the shrubs and trees, whic grew down to its very edge.

As I turned a corner in this winding path, suddenly came upon Miss Lilla Irvine, sittin upon one of the seats reading her Bible. apologized for disturbing her, and was going t turn back, when she asked me if I would no stay a little and read with her. "You and love the same Lord, May," she said; "I kno we do, and I think it would help us to talk t gether of Him sometimes; at least," she adde "I am sure it would help me."

"Oh, Miss Irvine," I said, as I sat down b side her, "if you only knew—"

"If I only knew what?" she said gently.

"If you only knew how careless I have bee lately; I have hardly thought about Him all."

"What has been the matter, May?" s asked.

"Oh, I don't know," I answered; "I thin everything has been too smooth and nice latel somehow, it is easier to do right when the ro is rather rough; don't you think it is, Mi Irvine?"

"Yes," she said; "when things go wron and all seems against us, we are driven prayer, May—we feel we must pray then; b we ought not to need driving into our de Lord's presence.

"Oh no," I said; "I know we ought not.'

"And oh, May," she said earnestly, "if get self-confident, and leave off prayer, we sh soon have a fall; we are not safe for a sin moment if we are not strong in the Lord, and the power of His might. You will be having fall if you do not come back to Him, May."

"I wish I could come back, Miss Irvine,' said, "but it is easier to get wrong than to right again. I got up this morning rather e lier, and tried to pray, but I could not fix thoughts on what I was saying; all sorts things kept coming into my mind, and I gave up at last."

"Yes," she said, "I know what that is; he answers to heart. I have often found that wh I have left God, and have been pleasing mys I have lost the power to pray."

"How is it, Miss Irvine?" I asked.

"I think," she said, "that the Holy Spi has been grieved, and without His help we c not pray."

"Then what do you think I should do?' asked.

"I think," she said, "you should go back the Lord, just in the same spirit in which you fi came to Him. Go to Him, and ask Him to receive you, to take away all the sin which is separating you from Him, and to give you the comfort of His presence again. And then I think you should especially pray that you may once more have the help of the Holy Spirit.

"Will you not go back to Him at once, May?" she said, laying her hand upon mine.

"Oh, Miss Irvine, I will; indeed I will," I said.

"Go now, dear," she said.

So I left her sitting there, and went on, down he winding, shady path to the sea. It was a uiet, solitary place. The only sounds that ere to be heard were the splashing of the aves upon the rocks, and the cries of the white a-birds as they flew backward and forward on he little rocky islands, which lay about half a ile from the shore.

(To be continued.)

JOSEPH IN PRISON.

S. Lesson for November 7th, Gen. 39-40. Golden Text, Ps. 37 : 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"REST in the Lord, and wait patiently for m : fret not thyself because of him who pros- reth in his way, because of the man who ngeth wicked devices to pass." So speaks r golden text, and this is the wisdom of such believe that their cause is in the hands of d. He is Almighty and Omniscient; He can cern the thread in every labyrinth, and un- rel all which is entangled in our life's circum- nces: why then fret, why be discouraged, en everything seems to be going wrong? d brings us into circumstances, to us appar- ely impossible, that He may manifest Himself t us, and lead us to a fuller confidence in His nerly providence.

His eye was upon Joseph, His hand was lead- him, and the cruelty and injustice of his thers only led Joseph into a more entire de- dence upon and submission to, his God. "Jo- sh was brought down to Egypt; and Poti- pr, an officer of Pharaoh, captain of the guard, Egyptian, bought him of the hands of the maelites, which had brought him down her. And the Lord was with Joseph, and he a prosperous man; and he was in the house is master the Egyptian." How many there among believers, who excuse their decline in y on the ground that their ministers are not ous, that they are far removed from Bible lings, that they have no prayer-meetings, and Christian friends around them! Joseph had e of these; probably there was not a believing in the whole land of Egypt; but the Lord, alone can make these outward means a sing, the Lord Himself was with Joseph.

t no external help supersede the presence of living God; if we have not enough commun- with Him, if we are not on a sufficiently in- te understanding with Him, to dispense any outward means should it be necessary, e very means may become a snare to us, but presence with them may make them an un- blessing. Let us have to do with man ugh God, and not with God through man. reat was the effect of God's presence with ph that "his master saw that the Lord was him, and that the Lord made all that he did osper in his hand." A pagan, a worship- f false Gods, saw in this young man a pres- which he could not account for, a power to h he was stranger.

eph acted in all things before the eye of : we can well understand how this would a man, who saw not the mysterious Being had such power over his slave. Joseph have had many difficulties: the language of t, the manners and customs were all new to his work as a slave, after having been the g son—all was strange, difficult, impossible n alone; but the Lord was with Joseph, he made all that he did to prosper—in the age, in the knowledge of his master's mind ; the house and property—by what seemed tuition, but was really the inspiration of his God, he spoke the language, and did all things without failure.

God had shown Joseph that he should reign, and no power of earthly circumstances could hinder him from rising to his level; as oil when mixed with water, he must be above and not below circumstances and people. This is also the privilege of those whom Christ has made kings and priests unto God, as soon as they cease to live unto themselves. Joseph found grace in his master's sight, "and he served him, and he made him overseer over his house, and all that he had he put into his hand. And it came to pass from the time that he had made him overseer in his house, and over all that he had, that the Lord blessed the Egyptian's house for Joseph's sake; and the blessing of the Lord was upon all that he had in the house, and in the field. And he left all that he had in Joseph's hand; and he knew not aught he had, save the bread which he did eat."

All seemed now to be going well: he who was hated of his brethren, and unjustly sold to be a slave, had risen by the power of God's presence with him, to a position of influence; surely now he would continue to rise. But no; "Many are the afflictions of the righteous" (Ps. 34 : 19); "In the world ye shall have tribulation" (John 16 : 33); "As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten" (Rev. 3 : 19). Joseph had yet to pass through deep waters. Subjected to the most fearful temptation by his master's wife, he did not consider his own will or pleasure, but said, "How can I do this great wickedness and sin against God?" Taking a position regardless of self, and dealing with temptation in its relation to God's glory, he was invincible; just as, later, the Saviour Himself opposed to every suggestion of the tempter, "It is written" (Matt. 4 : 4). Oh, had Eve done the same in the garden, she would not have fallen; but she saw the tree that it was "good," "pleasant," and "to be desired" (Gen. 4 : 6), and so gave "place to the devil." (Eph. 4 : 27.)

The wife of Potiphar, in her diabolical revenge on him whom she was powerless to draw into sin, accused him of the very sin he had so stoutly refused to commit, and thus was Joseph, the honored, trusted servant, the innocent and injured man, thrown into prison. But in his spirit was no bitterness, no mistrust of God; sorrow there was, but no unbelief. "The archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him, and hated him: but his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob." (Gen. 49 : 23, 24) If ever mistrust of God were allowable, it would be in a case like this. Had the faith of Joseph been superficial, it would have broken down under the weight of his sorrows, but he could never forget the revelations of his God that he should reign in the future, and his knowledge of Him made it possible to him to bide his time. How many there are who have hard thoughts of God under sufferings much less than Joseph's, who think they are hardly dealt with, and have never deserved to suffer so much: they have not learned to "rest in the Lord," and "wait patiently for Him."

"The Lord was with Joseph, and shewed him mercy, and gave him favor in the sight of the keeper of the prison." Again he rose to his level; wherever he was, whether in his father's house, in the house of Potiphar, slave though he was, or in the prison, lying under so fearful an accusation, still Joseph rose to the surface, because the Lord was with him. Oh, how vain and fruitless it is to seek to combat with circumstances! Alone we cannot conquer them but let us be "strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might" (Eph. 6 : 10), and we rise superior to them as naturally and as easily as did Joseph in Egypt. Had he occupied himself with the injustice done him by man, he could not have risen above it. He might have said, "My brothers have wronged me;" "I have done them only good, and they have requited me with evil. I brought blessing into Potiphar's house, and all I have got for my faithfulness to him has been to lose my good name, and be cast into prison without having done any wrong.

But Joseph professed another spirit. Ever occupied with God, he stood on a level superior to man, and thus he was not broken hearted by the loss of his master's confidence, for he had another and a better Master; a heavenly Father cured his home-sickness for an earthly father, and the presence of God gave him a holy and dignified independence of all persons and things. In the prison, as in Potiphar's house, everything was committed into Joseph's hand; "and whatsoever they did there, he was the doer of it. The keeper of the prison looked not to anything that was under his hand; because the Lord was with him, and that which he did, the Lord made it to prosper."

Thus it was that Joseph was free from himself, and even while suffering such grievous wrongs could enter into the trials of others. In the fortieth chapter we find that two men of Pharaoh's household, the chief butler and the chief baker, had offended their lord the king of Egypt, and were thrown into the prison, "where Joseph was bound. And the captain of the guard charged Joseph with them, and he served them: and they continued a season in ward." We need not be astonished when we hear that these men each had a dream. They were brought in contact with one who communed with God by dreams, and the infection spread to them; they came under the same influence.

"Joseph came in unto them in the morning, and looked upon them, and, behold, they were sad. And he asked . . . saying, Wherefore look ye so sadly to-day?" When they told him that they had each dreamed a dream, and there was no interpreter of it, he replied, "Do not interpretations belong unto God? Tell me them, I pray you," thus including himself, as it were, in his God; for the Lord being with him, interpretations belonged to him also. The chief butler related how he had seen in his dream a vine which brought forth ripe grapes; and he took the grapes and pressed them into Pharaoh's cup, and gave the cup into Pharoah's hand.

The interpretation was not hidden from Joseph; he was God's interpreter to the chief butler, for he knew God's language, and the other did not. In the measure in which we enter into the heart and mind of God, we become His interpreters to other men; they know Him, see Him, hear Him not, and He makes Himself known and seen and heard through His children. Joseph said, "The three branches are three days: yet within three days shall Pharaoh lift up thine head, and restore thee unto thy place; and thou shalt deliver Pharaoh's cup into his hand, after the former manner when thou wast his butler. But think on me when it shall be well with thee, and shew kindness, I pray thee, unto me, and make mention of me unto Pharaoh, and bring me out of this house: for indeed I was stolen away out of the land of the Hebrews: and here also have I done nothing that they should put me into the dungeon."

Joseph was a messenger of good tidings to the chief butler; and this we are privileged to be, to all those who seek salvation through the shed blood of the Lord Jesus, typified by the pressed grapes. When the chief baker saw that the interpretation was good, he related also his dream, that he had three white baskets on his head, and in the uppermost were all manners of bakemeats for Pharaoh, a fit type of our own good works which take the uppermost place, and are all of our manufacture; "the birds did eat them." And Joseph told the chief baker how within three days Pharaoh would lift up his head from him, hang him on a tree, and the birds would eat his flesh —the end of all self-dependence. It was as Joseph had foretold: the chief butler was restored, the chief baker hanged. But Joseph had still lessons to learn; "yet did not the chief butler remember Joseph, but forgot him." Two long years more must he remain enduring wrong and injustice, before God raised him to the position which He had prepared for him.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Prosecution of Irish Agitators by the British Government is reported by the London correspondent of the New York Herald to have assumed definite shape. He cables the information that six members of Parliament are included in the list of those against whom charges are to be brought. The Secretary and Treasurer of the Land League, four journalists, and three private citizens are also named for prosecution. It is believed that the agitators relied for their safety on the provision of the law that trials should take place in the neighborhood where the crime was alleged to have been committed. As this would have involved their being tried by an Irish jury, they were certain of acquittal. The Government, however, recognized that fact, and will apply for change of venue, so that the trials may take place in England. The same correspondent states that large bodies of troops are being sent to Ireland to occupy disturbed districts.

Europe still Waits for Turkey to Surrender Dulcigno according to her promise. The British Government thinks the Turks really intend to surrender it, having decided to do so because Admiral Seymour had received peremptory orders to sail instantly for Smyrna, with or without the fleets of the other Powers. Those orders have not been annulled, but are suspended. If Mr. Gladstone sees reason to believe Turkey is only equivocating, those orders will be renewed.

On the subject of the cession of territory to Greece, the British Premier is said to be equally determined. Referring to these provinces, the London correspondent of the New York World telegraphs: "Mr. Gladstone will not allow the Porte to retain possession of the provinces for the cession of which Greece clamors so loudly. It is as certain as anything in the future can be that he will insist single-handed in the name of England upon their full surrender. This Mr. Gladstone believes to be the only way in which a satisfactory peace can be secured. The probability therefore remains that unless the Sultan's stubborn resistance should collapse unexpectedly, there will be a war, and a tremendous war, involving sooner or later the whole of Europe." Thus do journalists concur with prophetic students in their view of the near future.

Prince Napoleon Intends Assuming a More prominent position as a leader of opinion in France. The Paris correspondent of the London Times states that recent letters written by the Prince indicate a more active leadership than he has hitherto attempted, and when a deputation of Bonapartists waited on him asking him to renounce his claims on the throne in favor of his son, his reply indicated his intention to press those claims even at the risk of molestation by the Government. M. Raoul Duval, who is regarded as the mouthpiece of the Prince, has issued a party programme in which he enunciates radical principles, but urges patience and obedience to the Republic for the present.

Infidelity in Paris is Increasing rapidly among the upper classes, while Mr. McAll and his coadjutors are laboring to spread the Gospel among the poor. The society of Atheists lately organized already boasts of a membership of 15,000 in that city, besides having branches in all the large towns of France. They not only maintain a negative position, but have assumed an aggressive attitude toward the churches.

The Cost of the Afghan War was Stated by the Rev. J. D. Bate, at the Baptist missionary meeting in London of October 4th, to be forty million pounds. He has been for fourteen years an indefatigable missionary in India, and speaking with authority, from an extensive knowledge of India, he uttered an earnest protest against the extortion of those forty millions from the already starving and overtaxed masses of India. He said that ten million Hindoos had died in the recent Indian famines, which have terribly impoverished India, and that there is grave apprehension of the dissatisfied and distressed masses in India rising in a general rebellion against the British Government far exceeding the mutiny of 1857. It is well known that India is only held by military force, and Britain, amid coming troubles, may not be able to maintain this force. His experience is fully confirmed by others, who say that Britain's tenure of India is becoming strained and fragile. These facts agree with our expectations from Scripture prophecy, that Britain will lose legislative dominion over India as well as Ireland within a few years' time, as those countries never belonged to Cæsar's Roman Empire.

Newspapers in Russia do not Appear to enjoy more freedom under Gen. Melikoff than they did before that reformer took office. He recently summoned the editors of the leading journals to his office, and defined the lines within which their comments must be confined. They were informed that they had liberty to discuss the various measures and ordinances of government, but with the condition that they shall not agitate the public mind with their illusory dreams. This point was plainly declared by General Melikoff to refer to certain organs insisting on the necessity of society participating in legislative and administrative duties. It is thus evident that the hope of a constitutional government taking the place of a despotism must for the present be abandoned in Russia.

A State of Anarchy Prevails in the Border land between Macedonia and Albania. The London Times says: "The Christians are ripe for revolution. The Bulgarians and Mussulmans are armed, and assassinations on both sides are common occurrences. Anarchy reigns supreme. If some steps are not taken to restore order the population will probably be considerably diminished by mutual extermination."

The condition of Macedonia is said to rival the condition of France before the Revolution. Assassination was never so common. Within less than two months twenty-seven Turks, including a wealthy bey, near Kenprulu, and two tithe registrars, have been murdered by Bulgars in the district of Kenprulu alone. The Turks have been prompt to respond, and about double the number of Bulgarians have paid the penalty of their lives to the revengeful feelings of the Turks. The prisons of Kenprulu and Perlike are overflowing with prisoners arrested without accusation or warning. The interference of Europe in the internal affairs of Turkey is justified by such a state of affairs.

The English Trouble in Basutoland, in Africa, is assuming serious proportions. The Basutos were friendly to the British, and assisted them in their recent war with Cetewayo; but Sir Bartle Frere, the late representative of England in South Africa, demanded at the close of the war that the Basutos should give up their arms. They professed that they were entitled to bear arms, and besides, that they had purchased their rifles from the British and had paid for them. Rather than surrender the weapons they have attacked the British, and appear to be formidable foes.

The rising has now spread east of he Drakensburg Mountains, and a detachment of a hundred men sent up to restore order are unable to return, but are said to be safe. The hostility has already spread far beyond the limits of Basutoland. In Griqualand East the disturbances are said to be "alarming;" the Pondos and Galekas are also "restless." Should these tribes, too, break into open revolt, we are told that "there is no British force whatever available to act against them." It is impossible to view "the situation without the greatest concern." A space of country two hundred miles long and a hundred miles across is either in open hostility or on the brink of it.

A Wife's Devotion.—The "London Standard" relates a touching incident illustrating the exertions a brave woman is capable of making for the sake of one she loves. Marie Hagart was a French peasant whose husband, being unable to obtain employment where he lived, sought it in Paris. There he fell ill, and the news came that he was lying, without money or friends, sick in hospital. The wife was utterly destitute, but she thought only of her husband's strait, and taking up her child she set out to walk to Paris, a distance of more than three hundred miles. She traversed the long weary journey, begging scraps of food as she went, and sleeping by the roadside or in the fields at night. At last she dropped, footsore and exhausted, in the streets of a Parisian suburb, where she was found and cared for by the police. They made inquiry for her husband, and discovered that he had died only twenty-four hours before his wife arrived. Her journey had been fruitless, and the man never knew the exertion she had made to minister to him. The incident shows what are the depths of a woman's love, and sheds a light on the assurance given us that the love of the Saviour surpasses even the love of woman.

Neglect of Divine Service in England.—Dr. Fraser, the Bishop of Manchester, has found a parish in his diocese containing 1232 houses, where 906 heads of families openly profess that neither they nor their households attend any place of religious worship. An earnest appeal has been made by the Bishop to the various religious communions to give up their bickerings, and unite in an effort to bring Christians to a proper state of mind on the subject of getting the people to church.

A Five-hooded Snake has been Discovere near Trichinopoly, in Southern India. Snake are seldom known to have more than fou hoods; consequently the superstitious native worship it. Its nest is in a large anthill, which many people visit in order to be cured of thei different bodily ailments. They congregat especially every Friday and Sunday night, as th snake is said to make its appearance then. The present offerings of eggs, milk, fruit, incense, flow ers, and buckets with saffron-water and mone in them, and in addition to these every ma brings a rooster to be sacrificed. The blood o the bird is sprinkled, "and only the combs ar used, which are cut in pieces and strewed abou the place, and the birds are returned to tho that brought them by the priest, who gives them in return some 'consecrated ashes' signifyin acceptance." The devotees of such superstition need fervent prayer that they may be converte to a saving faith in Christ.

Dr. Tanner is Arranging to Put the Alcoho theory of distillers and some physicians to th test. He says that he has written to Dr. Rich ardson, of London, who has attained a wid reputation as an opponent of the doctrine tha intoxicating liquor is beneficial to the huma system, asking him to make an offer on hi behalf. Dr. Tanner offers to do the forty days fast in London, and asks Dr. Richardson t issue a challenge to the brewers, distillers, an doctors. They may select six men, as near Dr Tanner's age and physical condition as possible They can take wine, beer, or any spirituou liquor during the fast, and he will take wate only, and will see what the result will be. Dr Tanner says: "I am sure they can't stand it and the reason is plain. Alcohol checks th decomposition of tissue. If I'd taken alcoho into my system during my fast, it would hav stopped my supply of nourishment, and I'd hav starved to death."

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchma (London) for October may be obtained at the offic of The Christian Herald. Price six cents.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Works are on sal at the office of The Christian Herald, at prices s low as to bring them within the reach of every one Twelve Sermons on various subjects, with photograp of Mr. Spurgeon, price 35 cents. John Ploughman' Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, 60 cent The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, a volume of fift sermons, $2.50. The Treasury of David, a homilet cal exposition of the book of Psalms, five vols., as fa as Psa. 118, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth-Day Boo This popular gift-book contains a suitable passag selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for every da in the year, with a blank space opposite for auto graphs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. Spurgeo appear at their respective birthdays. The book i elegantly bound, and the price is 75 cents. Remit tances should accompany orders.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

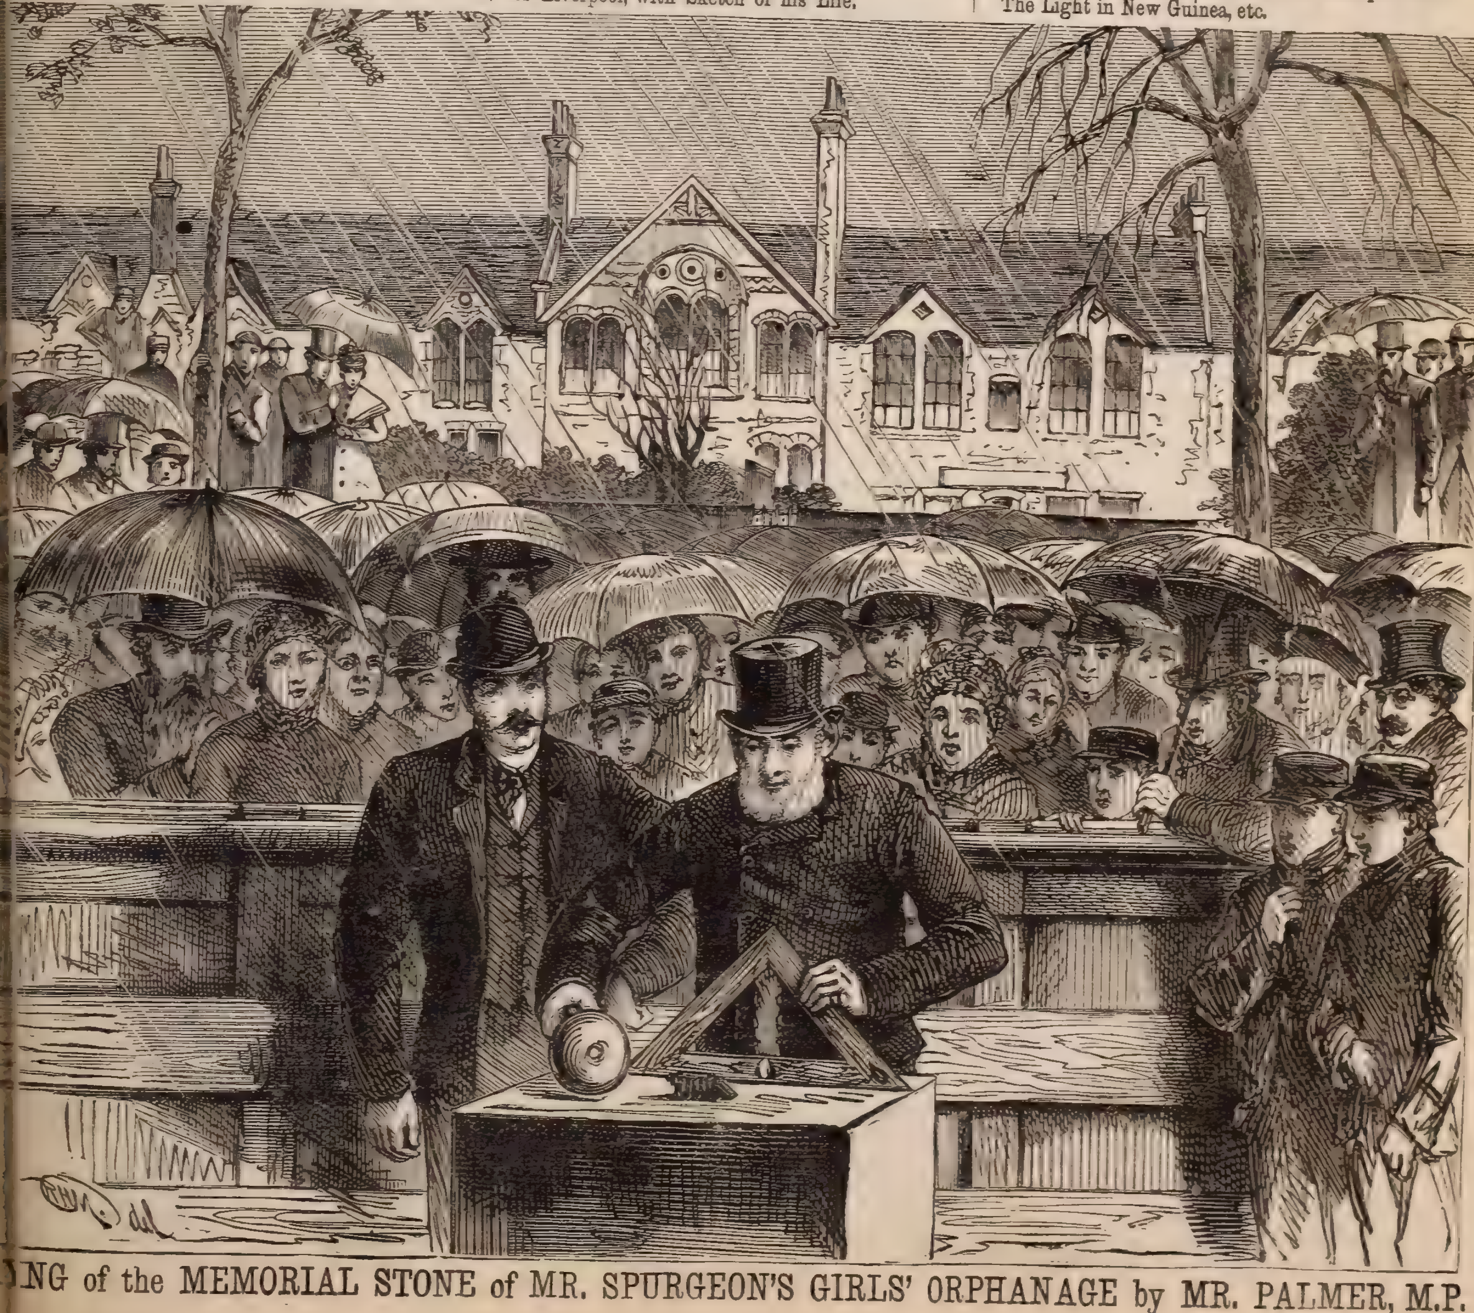
Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, Rev. W. M HAY AITKEN, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1880. 14th Year. No. 45—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

INTERESTING CEREMONY AT REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S ORPHANAGES. Picture of Mr. Palmer laying the Memorial Stone of the Building for Girls.
THE BALLOT-BOX. A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY. By P. W. E.
ROCHESTER TOWER. A New Serial Story by Miss M. A. Paull (Continued).
DR. TALMAGE'S FRIDAY EVENING TALK—The Three Pillars.
PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF MR. G. PALMER, M.P.
CURRENT EVENTS: The Presidential Election—An Ominous Sign of the Times—A Remarkable Legal Complication—Mineral Treasures Neglected—Twin Brothers, etc.
PORTRAIT OF REV. HUGH STOWELL BROWN, of Liverpool, with Sketch of his Life.
ASLEEP AND YET AWAKE—A RIDDLE. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
TALES OF THE GROG-SHOPS—Two Watchers.
A CHOICE VINDICATED. (Continued.)
Joseph the Wise Ruler. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.—A Christian Family Circle in Germany.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The Situation in Eastern Europe—Critical State of Ireland—Dr. Inskip's Tour—The Light in New Guinea, etc.



A NG of the MEMORIAL STONE of MR. SPURGEON'S GIRLS' ORPHANAGE by MR. PALMER, M.P.

REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S ORPHANAGES for BOYS and GIRLS.

Their Origin from Mrs. Hillyard's Gift of £20,000—Names and Donors of the Different Orphan Cottages—The Orphans Chosen by the Committee—The Girls' Orphanage.

THE picture on our front page this week illustrates the laying of two memorial stones, on Monday, October 4th, in connection with Mr. Spurgeon's Girls' Orphanage, at Stockwell, London. Taking advantage of the Autumnal Session of the Baptist Union, which this year has been held in the British metropolis, Mr. Spurgeon had invited the ministers and delegates, to the number of nearly 1200, and representing the churches of Great Britain and Ireland, to be present at the interesting ceremony.

The weather was most inauspicious, a heavy downpour of rain continuing almost without intermission from early morning till late at night; but there was a numerous company present on the Orphanage premises when the hour for the stone-laying arrived.

We would remind our readers that of which a picture appeared in the CHRISTIAN HERALD of October 31st, 1878, has for thirteen years been one of the recognized institutions which have flourished under the Divine blessing and Mr. Spurgeon's fostering care. The idea originated with a generous lady named Mrs. Hillyard, who devoted the magnificent gift of $100,000 for the inauguration of the work. To Mr. Spurgeon it seemed as if a voice from Heaven had thus called him to espouse the undertaking, and at every stage of its history since that period he has witnessed innumerable tokens of the Lord's approval. With that sagacity which characterizes him,

THE BOYS' ORPHANAGE,

CERTAIN GUIDING PRINCIPLES

were determined upon at the outset, and subsequent experience has abundantly proved the wisdom of the choice. The Boys' Orphanage is constructed on what is known as the Cottage Home system. Children want something more than a roof and four walls to shelter them; they want a home where the virtues of a Christian character shall be fostered and developed. To ignore social instincts and filial reverence by massing hundreds of children together in one huge barrack-like building is to incur a grave responsibility, if not to provoke failure. But when an institution is adapted as far as possible to compensate the loss of paternal influence and control, one of the essential elements of success is secured.

Mrs. Hillyard's gift was left untouched as the nucleus of a foundation fund, the amount required for the purchase of the land, and the erection of the buildings being cheerfully subscribed by the liberality of friends interested in the undertaking.

THE NAMING OF THE HOUSES.

Thus the first house was given by the late Mrs. Tyson, in commemoration of her twenty-fifth wedding-day, and is called the Silver Wedding House. The second is the gift of a commercial gentleman in London, and is called the Merchant's House. The third was erected by the joint liberality of Mr. William Higgs and his employes, and is called the Workmen's House. The fourth is the gift of the Olney family, and forms a fitting monument to the late Mrs. Olney, and is called from her Christian name the Unity House. The central houses in the terrace were erected from the fund subscribed by the Baptist churches of Great Britain, as a testimonial to Mr. Spurgeon, and these two are called the Testimonial Houses. Another house was raised by the contributions of ministers, who were trained in the Pastors' College, and is called the Students' House; and the last owes its origin to the gifts of Sunday-school children, and is called the Sunday School House. These, together with the dining-hall, play-hall, schoolrooms, laundry, and infirmary, make a picturesque group, which, as a monument, attests the value of prayer, the benevolence of the Christian public, and the goodness of God.

The institution is non-sectarian. Fatherless children between the ages of six and ten are eligible for admission, irrespective of their denominational associations. In view of the necessity which bereavement implies, sectarian distinctions are of no account. The absorbing aim is the conversion of the children to Christ.

MODE OF ADMISSION OF THE ORPHANS.

Candidates are selected by the committee, not elected by the subscribers. By this arrangement the greatest need out-weighs all other considerations, and the poorest succeed in gaining admission. Only those who have canvassed for the election of a child to an institution, and know the expense entailed and the anxiety and fatigue involved, can fully appreciate the relief to a poor widow which this system affords.

The institution is open to all classes of the community. When a family is bereft of the bread-winner, the poverty involved may differ in degree, but in every case the widow is an object of pity, and the fatherless children claim compassionate regard. There is but little to choose in this respect between the widow and family of a tradesman and those of a laborer; indeed, it often happens that the poverty of the former is more acutely felt. The families of professional men are least of all able to cope with the difficulties of their altered circumstances.

THE GIRLS' ORPHANAGE.

The fact that Mr. Spurgeon and his friends were not able to assist poor widows whose families consisted of girls only, led to the determination to extend the institution as soon as the Lord's hand should be seen directing them. There was no desire to precipitate the work, but to go on with the work of the Boys' Orphanage, and wait for the opportunity, which, they felt, would come sooner or later. At length a series of Providential circumstances plainly indicated that the time had fully come for commencing the Orphanage for Girls. In faith in God the enterprise was initiated, and the first stroke was struck, by the following words of Mr. Spurgeon, at a meeting for celebrating the

TWENTY-FIFTH YEAR OF HIS MINISTRY

at the Metropolitan Tabernacle when a testimonial of £6233 ($30,292) was presented to him.

"Here is one point of a new departure. A day or two ago the lady who founded the Boys' Orphanage sent me £50 for the Girls' Orphanage. I answered somewhat to this effect: 'I am very grateful for the proposal, but at the same time I am not very well, and the times are not very hopeful, and therefore I had rather not begin any new work just yet.' I proposed to keep the £50 in case we did build a Girls' Orphanage, and, if not, to put it over to the Boys'. 'No,' said our friend, 'you are right in your judgment, but take the £50 as the first brick, for I am fully assured that many more bricks will shortly be added. Now I propose that £50 of the testimonial should be placed with my dear friend's £50, that we may found the Girls' Orphanage together. I will not say more, because she never has been outdone, and I do not think ever will be. I do not mean to press this new enterprise just now, but only to moot it, and see whereunto this thing will grow. Other eggs will come to the nest-egg, and the nest will become full, and then we shall have another family of little chicks. I feel as though I was laying the first stone of the Girls' Orphanage, and you were all saying 'Go ahead.' This is a good note of our present page of history—'Second twenty-five years of pastorate commenced by the inauguration of project of Girls' Orphanage.'"

After other donations had been received by Mr. Spurgeon, the property known as "The Hawthorns," bordering on the Boys' Orphanage, was offered for sale, and secured for the sum of £4000, the entire purchase-money being contributed by friends. The newly-acquired house was found to be admirably adapted for a temporary orphanage, and it was resolved to open it at once, and thirty girls were immediately admitted.

MEMORIAL STONE LAYING AT MR. SPURGEON'S GIRLS' ORPHANAGE, ON OCTOBER 4TH.

Letter from Rev. C. H. Spurgeon—Speech of Mr. Palmer, M.P.—Rev. J. Spurgeon's Response—Rev. H. S. Brown's able Speech—Anecdote of the Old Scotch Baptist Woman.

THE ceremony of laying the memorial stones of two of the houses belonging to Mr. Spurgeon's Girls' Orphanage at Stockwell—namely, the Reading House and the Liverpool House—took place on October 4th, at half-past two, amid pouring rain. They are respectively intended as memorials of the help received toward the orphanage buildings from the friends at Reading and Liverpool.

The following

LETTER FROM MR. C. H. SPURGEON,

president of the institution, was read by the Rev. James Spurgeon: "To the members of the Baptist Union: As Chairman of the Stockwell Orphanage, I welcome you to the institution, deeply regretting that I cannot do this in person, in heartiest tones of brotherly love. We thank the brethren who will lay the stones, and the many generous friends whom they represent, and we thank all who will look on and give us the benefit of their kind wishes. May the orphanage grow rich in prayers to-day. There are 249 boys and 32 girls in residence at this hour, and when the new houses are complete our usual number will be 250 boys and 250 girls.

"This is a great family; and Unbelief inquires, 'Whence shall we find bread for this multitude?' But Faith sees a sure supply when she knows that thousands will be praying for it. I would rather have your prayers than a donation of £20,000, for something more than mone is needed—health for the children, wisdom fo the managers, patience for the teachers, grac for us all. Personally I am recovering strength but I am unable to leave the house. Pray excuse my infirmity, and continue your forbearance to this evening's service, from which must be absent. God's blessing on the Readin House, and the Liverpool House, and on thos other houses which record the zeal, the gratitude, and, in one case, the resignation of th donors.

The Rev. James Spurgeon, having read th foregoing letter, added: "This row of building will cost more than 11,080 pounds. We hav already in hand toward it something lik £7000. I think our friends have given us promises, or held out a hope, of somewhere abou £3000 more, making in all some £10,000, an there is a long £1000 yet to be raised. We than our good friends from Reading, because the have helped us in the past, and we thought w ought to record our gratitude by asking a frien from that quarter to lay a stone, and by callin a house after the name of our Reading friend We are deeply indebted to our friend Mr. Palmer for giving us part of his recess from h public duties in Parliament. I will ask him no to lay the stone."

Mr. George Palmer, M.P., then laid th stone, as represented on our frontispiece pictur and said: "Ladies and Gentlemen: It has give me very great pleasure to represent the town Reading on this particular occasion. I am gl that the town in which I have spent so ma years, and with which I am now and have be for a long time intimately associated, has gai ed, at any rate, another point of reputation another laurel in its crown—by being associat with the Orphanage at Stockwell."

THE LIVERPOOL HOUSE.

The stone of this house was laid by the Re Hugh Stowell Brown, of Liverpool, who said

"Mr. Spurgeon's Orphanage is an instituti that claims a large amount of sympathy and su port. There are many thousands of people this and other countries who, grateful to M Spurgeon, and for the great good that his d courses and writings have done them, are rea to render help to an institution which they kn has a large place in Mr. Spurgeon's large hea

'There are orphanages and orphanages, and s one presents some features that I think are rthy of special notice and special praise. One he noble catholicity of its spirit. It is not a arian orphanage.

Then again I greatly like this division of the hanage into so many houses. It is not all great barn-like, or park-like, or palace-like ding, but there are so many of these houses, of which has far more of a home look, and ikely to inspire more of the home feeling one could expect in a huge edifice where a t number are gathered together. I think it is far better for the health, both of body mind that this method of distribution should been adopted. I do not say that in this ret the Orphanage is unique, but at any rate better than most that I know, and it is a t deal pleasanter for us to have a Reading se and a Liverpool House, than, say, a rd' inscribed to Reading or Liverpool. es and gentlemen, I consider it a masterce of sagacity on the part of Mr. Spurgeon he has adopted this method of naming the us houses of the Orphanage, and a very stroke. If you have a friend that is at all o-do in the world—well, no harm comes of g one of your children after him.

ow, when a house is called after a town, of e all Mr. Spurgeon's friends in those —and he has many friends in all our —will feel deeply interested and specially l to render support. This stone that I laid is a stone of memorial, but it is also a of expectation—of anticipation. It is laid pirit of thankfulness for the past, and in a of hope for the future—the faith, that is , which is the confidence of things hoped om the Liverpool friends, and I have no , they will do all they can in order to this Liverpool House a success.

ow, when my friend Mr. Spurgeon did me onor of asking me to lay the memorial of this building, he was good enough to at his friends in Liverpool had done his nage so much kindness that he did not to do this in expectation of my bringing sum of money on this occasion; but still ght, and my friends thought, that it would for me to come empty handed. Hence, much pleasure, at any rate, in present connection with the laying of this me stone, a check for two hundred and fifty , in the hope, and I think I may say the ce, that there will be more to follow."

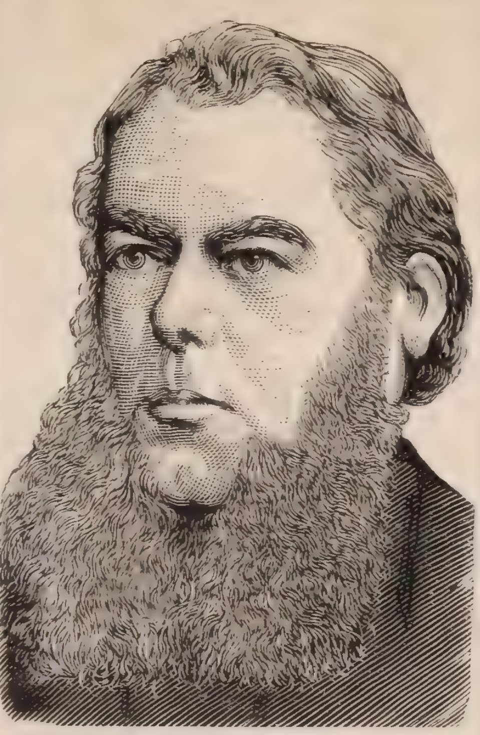
Rev. James Spurgeon then thanked Mr. Brown in an appropriate speech.

CDOTE OF A BAPTIST SCOTCHWOMAN.

Rev. W. Brock, President of the London Association, in the course of a short mentioned the following incident:

as once in an out-of-the-way part of Scotar the Pass of Killiecrankie, and some l me that there was an old Baptist woman a house in a wood on a steep hillside. s a Baptist minister, although I was out holiday, it was said that the least I could to go and see her; and I went. She was ven years of age. She had not left her r twenty years through infirmity. We a pleasant chat, and I told her I was ndon. Now what do you suppose she to know about London? Nothing about en; the only thing she wanted to know ut Mr. Spurgeon—how many children got? what were their names? were e their father? what was the Tabernacle uld people hear there? and the rest. s this poor, bed-ridden soul, and her ans of grace for twenty years had been geon's weekly sermon as it was printed to her. Now, we honor Mr. Spurgeon reaching, for his college work, and the I may be permitted to say that the ge puts the top-stone to the whole. d the Orphanage, and restore its presiealth and strength!"

ev. J. T. Wigner then offered prayer, roceedings terminated.



REV. HUGH STOWELL BROWN, OF LIVERPOOL.

Causes of Mr. Brown's Popularity in Liverpool—Parentage and Early Associations—Studies Land-surveying and Engineering—Becomes an Engine-driver—His Conversion is followed by a Desire to Become a Clergyman—Labors as a City Missionary, and in 1848 Accepts the Pastorate of a Baptist Church—Impending Resignation for Evangelistic Work.

THIRTY-TWO years have gone since the fame of Mr. Stowell Brown's earnest efforts among the working-men of Liverpool first reached the metropolis and convinced the more thoughtful of London ministers that what had been so successfully achieved in the North might at least be attempted in the South. It had but to be announced that he would preach or deliver an address, even on a Sunday afternoon, when the best men might well have deemed it doubtful whether a congregation could be gathered, and instantly there was a mass of people for whom room enough could scarcely be found. It mattered not where he stood up to preach, whether in chapel, theatre, or hall, he could collect an audience such as minister had never seen in any regular place of worship, who were utterly ignorant of any form of religious service whatever, but three thousand of whom would listen to Mr. Brown with an interest which only deepened the longer he spoke.

It is true he owed something, perhaps, to his rough-and-ready style of speech, and to the uncommon subjects which he announced as the texts of his addresses, viz: "Five shillings and costs," "Taking care of Number One," "The Devil's meal is all bran," "I can't afford it," "The Englishman's house is his castle," "Do thyself no harm," "God's poor and the devil's poor," and a host of other titles equally striking. We all know, however, that though an audience may be gathered once by a striking handbill, a lecturer will not be so successful a second time, unless he proves beyond all question that what he says is of sterling and abiding interest. In Mr. Brown's case the artisans of Liverpool found that though the titles of his addresses were out of the common way, what he said was more remarkable still, and the impressions produced on numbers of hearts were deep and ineffaceable.

With Mr. Brown's antecedents, to some it may have seemed strange that he did not elect to labor in the Established Church. His father was a clergyman of the Church of England, and his uncle was the well-known Rev. Hugh Stowell, of Manchester, after whom he was named. He was born at Douglas, Isle of Man, in 1823, and very early it was the great desire of his life to become not only a member of the Established Church, but a clergyman of the same communion. At first, however, on his school days being ended, it seemed as if a different course had been marked out for him; for at about fifteen he was sent from Douglas to England to study, with a view of preparing to become an engineer. He worked at land-surveying and other matters, but did not find the business much to his taste, and he was not sorry one day to relinquish the whole business in favor of—engine-driving.

He did not, however, relinquish habits of study even in this calling, and, though an engine-driver, managed to find time for self-improvement. The day's work was hard; but four or five hours he would at least secure for reading and meditation. We are told that his first classical exercises were written with a piece of chalk on the fire-box of the locomotive he was driving; and although it might not have greatly tended to the comfort of nervous passengers to know that they were being conducted to their journey's end by a driver who was studying Greek, it may fairly be set down as another illustration of the pursuit of knowledge under difficulties.

When it pleased God to reveal His Son in him, his ardent desire was to become a clergyman, and with this end in view he entered college, to prepare for the work. Now, however, as he began to study, and honestly to think for himself, doubts and difficulties presented themselves which had never crossed his mind before, and to which he felt that a fair answer must be given ere he could take a step further. These doubts had reference to certain teaching contained, as he believed, in the occasional services and catechism of the Church of England; and as he could not solve them satisfactorily to his own conscience and understanding, he felt that there was nothing left him but to relinquish all thought of a ministry in connection with the Church of England.

He then became a member of a Baptist Church, and with a stronger purpose than ever devoted himself to the great work of winning souls for Christ. He became a city missionary in Liverpool, and perhaps he owed much to the experience he gained while engaged in visiting the homes of the poor of the great seaport. In 1848 he received an invitation to become the minister of Myrtle Street Baptist Church, and this has been his pastoral sphere ever since.

He has also undertaken work beyond his own pastorate, and has often made visits to London to lecture before the Young Men's Christian Association. Mr. Brown has frequently advocated the cause of missions in various parts of the kingdom, and few will forget his manly avowal and defence of peace principles in times of national panic. He is an orator on any subject on which he speaks, but especially on the theme dearest to the heart of every true minister of Jesus Christ—the precious Gospel. This theme was dear to him when, more than thirty years ago, he devoted himself to the work of "warning and exhorting every man," and, as life has advanced, increasing years have but added increasing urgency to his appeals to men of all classes of society to find in Christ their Saviour and their all.

Mr. Brown has announced his intention of resigning official connection with the Church in Liverpool in March, 1881, and devoting himself unreservedly to evangelistic work—an undertaking for which his mental characteristics, moral stability, rich spiritual experience, and physical qualities pre-eminently fit him, and we trust that his new enterprise will receive much blessing from God.

On Monday, October 4th, Mr. Brown laid the memorial stone of the "Liverpool House" in Mr. Spurgeon's Girls' Orphanage. His racy and practical address on the occasion will be found in another column.

THE BALLOT-BOX.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, October 31st, 1880.

"Two cubits and a half was the length of it, and a cubit and a half the breadth of it, and a cubit and a half the height of it."—EXODUS 37 : 1.

The Ballot-Box the Ark of the American Covenant—The Struggle for the Ballot—The Foes of the Ballot-box—1. Ignorance—How to Correct the Evil—Make Ignorance a Crime—2. Spurious Voting—3. Intimidation—An Infamous Practice—4. Bribery—The Disgrace of American Politics—5. The Rowdy Drunken Caucus—The Ballot-box Needs Washing—No Property Qualification—Ignorant Plutocrats—Woman Suffrage—The Salutary Influence of Woman—Incident of a Poor Soldier Giving Away a Fortune—The Great Snow-storm of Ballots—The Two Angels on the Ark—All America to be United under One Flag.

LOOK at it !—the sacred chest of the ancients, about five feet long, three feet wide, and three feet high. Within and without of gold, on the top of it representations of two angels facing each other with outspread wings. The book of the law and many precious things were in that box. The fate of the nation was in it. Carried at the head of the host, in the presence of that box, the waters of the Jordan parted. Costly, precious, divinely charged, momentous box !

Unholy hands must be kept off of it. It was generally called the ark of the covenant, but you will understand it was a box, the most precious box of the ages. Where is it ? Gone forever. No crypt of ancient church, no museum of the world has a fragment of it. But is not this nation God's chosen people ? Have we not been brought through the Red Sea ? Have we not been led with the pillar of fire by night ? Have we no ark of the covenant ? Yes. The ballot-box is the sacred chest,

THE ARK OF THE AMERICAN COVENANT.

The law is in it. The will of God and the will of man are in it. The fate of the nation is in it. Carried before our host, the waters of national trouble part. Its fate is the fate of the American Government. Next Tuesday ten million men may uncover their heads in its presence. Mighty ark of the American covenant, thou ballot-box of a free people !

It is a very old box. In Athens, and long before the art of printing, the people dropped pebbles into it, expressive of their will. After that beans were dropped into it—white beans for the affirmative, black beans for the negative ; but as through that process it was easy to see which way a man voted, the election sometimes took place by night. If a man was to be voted out of citizenship, or, as you would say, ostracized, his name was put upon a shell and the shell was dropped into the box. In Parliament, O'Connell and Grote and Macaulay and Cobden and Gladstone fought for the full introduction of the ballot-box, and in 1872 it became one of the fastnesses of the English nation.

It is now one of the corner-stones of our American institutions. It is older than the Constitution. Tell we what will become of the ballot-box and I will tell you what will become of the American Government. What a change of feeling in regard to it since Sidney Smith shot his keenest shafts of ridicule at it, and William Cobbett felt called upon to answer thirty-eight objections to its existence ! Without the ballot-box there can be no free institutions, and there can be no permanent peace. Give the people every year, or every four years, an opportunity of expressing their political preferences, and for the most part you avoid insurrection and revolution. If they cannot have the vote they will have the sword.

When John Milton was visiting in Italy he noticed that the gardeners and farmers were cultivating the side of Mount Vesuvius while the volcano was in eruption, and he asked them if they found it safe so to do. "Oh, yes," they said, "the danger and the alarm are before the eruption takes place ; then there is earthquake and terror all through the country, but after the lava begins to pour forth all the people feel relieved." It is the suppression of the popular will that makes moral earthquake, political earthquake. Give the people full expression through the ballot-box and there is national relief, national satisfaction. And yet there are and I have thought this morning it would be appropriate if as a Christian patriot I enumerated some of those terrible enemies.

MIGHTY FOES TO THE BALLOT-BOX,

I. In the first place, ignorance. Other things being equal, in proportion as a man is intelligent he is qualified for the right of suffrage. You have ten, twenty, thirty years been studying American institutions through all the channels of information. You have become acquainted with the needs of our country. You know all that has been said on both sides the tariff question, the Chinese question, the educational question, the sectional question, and you have made up your mind, and day after tomorrow I see you coming down off your front steps. I say, "Good-morning, neighbor ; hope you are all well to-day. Which way are you bound ?" You say, "I am going to vote." You take your position in the line of electors, you wait your turn, you come up, the judge of election announces your name, your ballot is deposited, you pass out. Well done.

But right behind you comes a man who cannot spell "president," or "controller," or "attorney." He cannot write his own name, or if he does write it, if he can write at all, he makes a small "i" for the pronoun of the first person, which, while very descriptive of his limited capacity, is very hard on good orthography. He cannot tell you on which side the Alleghany Mountains Ohio is. There are educated canary birds and educated horses who have more intelligence than he. He puts in his vote for the opposite candidate, and he cancels your vote. His ignorance weighs as much as your intelligence. That is not right ; everybody says that is not right.

How to correct the evil? By laws of compulsory education well executed. Until a man can read the Declaration of American Independence, and the Constitution of the United States, and the first chapter of Genesis, and write a petition for citizenship with his own hand, and calculate how much is the interest of the United States debt, and tell the difference between a republic, a limited monarchy, and a despotism, he is not fit to vote at any polls between Key West and Alaska. Time was when there may have been an excuse for ignorance, but not now and in this day, when the common school makes knowledge as free as the fresh air of Heaven.

In 1872, in England, there were two million seven hundred thousand children who ought to have been in school, but there were in school only one million three hundred and thirty-three thousand six hundred. About fifty per cent. And of all those who were in school, not more than five per cent got anything worthy of the name of education. Much of this foreign ignorance is added to our American ignorance, and next Tuesday there will be tens of thousands who will vote though they may have no more qualification to do so than they would have qualification to lecture on astronomy.

Now, I go for a law which, after it has given a sufficient number of years of warning, shall make ignorance a crime. I go for a law which would place a board of examination side by side with the officers of registration, to decide whether a man has enough intelligence to become one of the monarchs who shall decide the destiny of this Republic. From that quarter there comes more danger to the sacred chest, the ballot-box, the ark of the American covenant.

II. Another powerful enemy of the ballot-box is

SPURIOUS VOTING.

If in this city of Brooklyn one thousand scoundrels have already been discovered as having registered for a vote next Tuesday, when they have no residence here, what may you judge in regard to other parts of the country ?
in the best city on the continent there be thousand such men, who can estimate the nu ber in less fortunate cities ? I warrant you th there are five thousand, if not ten thousar names on the books of registration in New Yc City that need scrutiny.

What a grand thing is this law of regist tion. Without it election day is a farce ;
how sad is the condition of things when in State of Maine both parties charge upon other party, each party upon the other, the o rage of the ballot-box. The law needs a kee twist for the neck of the repeaters. They n something more than slight fine and short prisonment. They are attempting the assassi tion of this Republic. In olden times when n with unholy hands touched the ark of the co nant, they dropped dead. Witness Uzza.
when men through spurious voting lay unh hands on the sacred chest, the ark of the Am ican covenant, they deserve extermination.

III. Another powerful foe of the ballot-bo

INTIMIDATION.

There are corporations which compel their ployés to vote as they, the head, wish them.
a delicate and skillful way they simply intim to their employés that if they do not vote as employers vote, they will be frozen out of establishment. There are thousands of s places. You can go to villages where there factories, and finding out the political sentim of the men who own the factories you can how the election will go. Now, that is damna

When an employé does his work well, gives you full equivalent in toil for what pay him in wages, you have no right to ex any more of him. He sells you his work.
does not sell you his political or his relig principles. Yet you are too wise to say, " did not vote as I wanted you to vote, now I charge you." You call him in some day and fault with his work, and you tell him that have an uncle, or an aunt, a cousin, or a n or a nephew who will have to have his s tion ! But he knows why you discharge and God knows. You are not fit for Amer citizenship.

There must be on the ark of the cove
the sacred chest, no shadow of corporat capitalistic intimidiation. I am not surpris the vehemence of Lord Chief Justice Ho England, when he says,

"Let the people vote fairly. Interfe with a man's vote is in behalf of this or other party. If such cases come before me tried, I shall charge the jury to make the off pay well for it."

Let there be no monocratic, or militar mobocratic intimidation. Just as soon as i precinct of the United States a man cannot as he pleases, there is something wrong.

IV. Another powerful foe of the ballot-b

BRIBERY.

No one will ever know how many thou or millions of dollars have been raised to the election next Tuesday. I do not know party has raised the most money. I know the chief affront of the Democratic party one of their candidates is that he will giv ten thousand dollars. On the other ha know that the Republican party have laid of two and a half per cent upon those who office under Government, or at the star that tax, and if the salaries average seven dred dollars, and there be one hundred tho office-holders, then they had a fund at the
of one million seven hundred and fifty tho dollars. But how much has been raised in parties I have no means of determinin simply know it is a sad state of things. I s know that there will be neighborhoods an ies where the announcement will be m private, "so many thousands of dollars many votes."

I tell you that bribery is the disgrace of ican institutions.

It is often the case that men are nomina office with reference to the amount of mo

eir own they can put into the contest, or the nount of money they can command from their ends. Senators and Congressmen and Governs buying their way into office. I tell you no ws in this respect. Your own patriotic hearts ve been pained with it.

It is often the case that the bribe comes in the m of official position. "Wheel your eloence into my side, and when I get to be Presint I will make you Secretary of State or, you all be Postmaster-General or minister to gland. Wheel your eloquence into my side, d when I get to be Governor you will be Survor-General. Wheel your eloquence into my e, and when I get to be Mayor you will be on Water Board." The simple fact, is that by the he many of those who are running for office to the chair they are from the crown of the d to the sole of the foot mortgaged with dges, and the people who will go to Albany o Washington to get offices are applying for itions that were gone three months before election.

here are two long lines of worm fence, one of worm fence reaching to Albany, the other of worm fence reaching to Washington, and he time of the nominations there are great titudes of citizens astride these fences, equally sed, ready to get down on that side where can get the most emolument. Bribery for se who receive it, and bribery on the part of se who give it kicks both ways; and it is a race to the ballot-box, and it is a scourge to sacred chest, the ballot-box, the ark of the erican covenant. In the name of God I dence it.

Another powerful foe of the ballot-box is rowdy and ballot-box is robbed of its power of choice n in a back room of some groggery the inees are made, and men come up to the balox on election day, and they only have a ce between two evils.

DRUNKEN CAUCUS.

ow, you respectable men of both parties, I ge you that, having saturated your handkerwith cologne or some other disinfectant, you own and take possession of the caucus. You your work on election day, and you begin o weeks or two months too late. In some e cities of the United States—I do not say city, but in some cities of the United States— the elector comes to the polls on election he finds that the nominees are such a , greasy, stenchful crew there is no choice. t if he vote for some outsider? He merely vs his vote away. Now, honorable men of klyn and New York, go and take possesof the caucus, though when you return you have to hang your hat and your coat e line in the back yard.

is high time these things were changed. rican politics have got very low, and in States they are controlled by men who are nore in need of good morals than of a bath- Snatch the ballot-box from such despera- Where is the David with the courage to back the ark of the covenant from Kirjathn? You all see there is need of reformation ballot-box when in our day it could send eed to the New York Legislature, and a Morrissey, the prince of gamblers, to the ican Congress. The ballot-box needs to be d, and set on a higher pedestal.

me propose by way of improvement that ve in this country a property qualification. say that if men have a certain amount of state they are more likely to have a finanterest in good government; and they say s soon as a man gets property he becomes us and conservative. I have to reply that perty qualification would shut out from the -box much of the best brain of this coun- Literary men are almost always poor. The a good kind of implement for mending orld, but a poor implement for gaining a ood. I could call the roll of hundreds of y men who never owned a foot of ground, ever will own a foot of ground until they get under it—professors of colleges, editors of newspapers, ministers of religion, book-makers depending on a scant and uncertain royalty paid by the publishers. A property qualification will shut out these men, and a great multitude who, though they never owned a house on earth, will have a mansion in heaven.

On the other hand, you will notice that there are those who by accident of fortune got vast estate, while they are in profound stupidity; as an English millionaire told me on the steamer going over to Europe, that he was going to see the dikes of Scotland, and as a lady of much pretension, who had just returned from Europe, upon being asked last summer on the cars by a member of my family if she had seen Mont Blanc, said, "Well, really, I don't know; is that in Europe?"

There is no more complete ignorance than you will sometimes find dismounting from a four-thousand-dollar equipage at the door of a Madison Avenue mansion. Now, I have to tell you the property qualification would be a gigantic injustice.

There are only two ways in which you will ever mend these matters—one by more thorough legal defence of the ballot-box, and the other by more thorough education and moralization of the people.

I have sometimes thought that perhaps we may be obliged to call upon woman to help us in the reformation of the ballot-box. Wherever she goes there is adornment and beautification. I suppose you have noticed the difference between the cleanliness of the gentlemen's cabin on the ferry-boat, and the ladies' cabin. I suppose you have noticed the difference between the cleanliness of the gentlemen's smoking-car on the rail-train, and the other cars in which women are passengers. Give woman the right of suffrage, and our polls on election day, instead of being cheerless and repulsive, will be saloons of beauty.

In this very month of October—October 12th—in eleven thousand of the school districts of the State of New York women voted, or had a right to vote. Order everywhere. By what justice have the majority of the grown people in this country been disfranchised? Simply because they are women. Give woman the ballot, and that will decide the Mormon and the temperance questions. A woman owning property must pay taxes. Ought she not then to have a right to say something in regard to the expenditure of those moneys?

Many of us have been opposed to female suffrage, on the ground that we do not want woman's delicate nature to confront the insults and the blasphemies and the disorder of election day; but when she has the ballot there will be no insults, no disorder, no blasphemies on election day. It is not so much what the ballot would do for woman, as what woman would do for the ballot.

I cannot understand how there should be such an aversion to woman's political preferment among Americans and among Englishmen in this day, when we have a great-souled Mrs. Hayes reigning in the White House and a Queen Victoria in Windsor Castle.

The ancient ark of the covenant was carried into captivity, away off to Kirjath-jearim; but one day that sacred chest was put upon a cart, and oxen were fastened to the cart, and the chest was brought back to Jerusalem with shouting and thanksgiving. So the ballot-box has been carried into captivity of demagogism and mobocracy; but I should not wonder if by prayer to God with thanksgiving that sacred ark of the covenant would be brought back and put into the temple of Christian patriotism. Take the first step in this direction next Tuesday. It may be the last vote you will ever deposit for the highest office in this country. I know that we sometimes find centenarians pleasantly boasting that they have voted for nearly all the Presidents; but the majority of men never vote for more than three or four. Do you think your vote of no importance?

A poor soldier went into the store of a hairdresser in London, and asked for money to get back to the army. He had already stayed beyond his furlough, and he must have quick transit. The hairdresser felt sorry for him and gave him the money. "Now," said the poor soldier, "I have got nothing to give you in return for your kindness except this little slip of paper, which has on it a recipe for making blacking. The soldier gave it, not supposing it to be of great value. The man received it, not supposing it to be of any great value. But it has yielded the man who took it two million five hundred thousand dollars, and was the foundation of one of the greatest manufacturing establishments of England.

But I have to tell you that that little slip of printed paper that you will drop into the ballot-box next Tuesday will seem to be more insignificant, and yet it may have a moral and a national value beyond all estimation. So I charge all your solemnity next Tuesday. About seven o'clock in the morning will begin the great snow-storm of the nation's suffrages.

The white flakes will fall in all the villages between the Highlands of Navesink to the Golden Gate of the Pacific—so silently falling that the keenest ear will not detect one out of the millions. Snowing on until noon, snowing on until night. The octogenarian will come up to the polls with trembling hand, and scanning the ballot with spectacled eyes, will give the ballot to the judge of election.

The young man who has been patiently waiting the time when he would have a right to vote will come up, and proudly and blushingly hand in his suffrage and pass on. The capitalist with diamonded finger and the workman with hard first will come up, and the vote of the one will be as good as the vote of the other. Snowing, snowing, snowing, until at sundown all these flakes will be united and compacted into an avalanche ready to slide down in expression of the nation's will.

Stand out of the way! In the awful sweep of the white avalanche, may there go down sectionalism and political fraud ten thousand feet under, forever under! Remember that you not only have a vote, but a prayer which may be more powerful than a vote. God only can control the suffrages of a city or a nation.

I told you at the opening, that on the top of the sacred chest of olden times there were facing each other with outspread wings. Why not on the top of the great chest, the ark of the American covenant, there shall be two angels—the angel of the North and the angel of the South, long looking different ways, now face to face with outspread wing of blessing. Let the quarrel begun at Fort Sumter at half past four o'clock on the morning of April 12th, 1861, end at the ballot-box at seven o'clock, November 2d, 1880, after long altercation magnificently won.

TWO ANGELS

Oh, sirs, we cannot live under any other form of government than that under which we are living. The stars of our flag are not the stars of thickening night, but stars sparkling amid the red bars of morning cloud. Let the despotisms of Asia keep their feet off the Pacific coast. Let the tyrannies of Europe keep their feet off the Atlantic coast. We shall have in this country only one government, and on this continent only one government. At the south, Mexico will follow Texas into the Union, and Christianity and civilization will stand in the halls of the Montezumas, and if not in our day, then in the day of our children, Yucatan and Central America will wheel into line of dominion.

On the north, Canada will be ours, not by conquest, for English and American swords may never clash blades, but we will simply woo the fair neighbor of the north, and she will be ours, and England will say to Canada, "You are old enough now for the marriage-day. Giant of the West, go take your bride." Then from Baffin's Bay to the Caribbean there shall be one republic, under one banner, and with one destiny—a free, undisputed, Christianized American continent. God grant it. Amen!

ROCHESTER TOWER

By Miss M. A. Paull.

(Continued from page 695.)

A Startling Revelation—Percy's Indignation—One Mystery Solved—The Rev. Mr. Mitchell's Consideration—Constance Sends a Letter each to Cecil and Salome—And Receives Replies.

TAKING no notice of Miss Anerley's intimation that the disagreeable interview should cease, the strange man planted himself fully in her path again.

"Let this lady pass," said Percy indignantly. "What do you mean by being so rude to her?"

But the man only drew nearer still to Constance, and whispered in her ear.

"What would you say if I told you that Salome Stanley is my wife?"

It was horrible to Constance to hear such words, even from a man whose sobriety was to be doubted, and whose impudence was glaring, and who was probably an adept at every kind of lying for his professional purposes as a beggar. She knew all this, and yet the words almost staggered her. There had always seemed some mystery about that lonely, gentle, refined, retiring woman; could it be this?

Constance tried to pass him without further parley; but she could not altogether hide from him the surprise and perplexity his words had occasioned, and he triumphed in his success.

"What do you say to that, Miss Anerley?" he demanded.

"It is not my business to say anything; I am not Salome Stanley's guardian." She spoke almost scornfully, more anxious than ever to get rid of this tiresome man.

"But this knowledge will at least dispose you to lend me five shillings," he said coaxingly. "You will not refuse to lend five shillings to the husband of your friend?"

"I work for my money," she said, fixing her dark eyes searchingly and unflinchingly on him. "You are equally able to work for yours. Besides, I have no proof whatever that you speak the truth. The fact that you have been drinking makes me altogether inclined to doubt your veracity. If I gave you five shillings, a Canterbury publican would soon have it in his till. I altogether decline to aid you."

"You call yourself a Christian, I suppose," he said, with a sneer.

"I hope you do not call yourself one," retorted Constance, with ready wit. "It is the duty of a Christian to support himself and his by honest industry, and to abstain from drinks that rob him of his senses and his strength, and make him ready to insult his countrywomen. Good-day, sir."

Bowing coldly, she pushed past him, and then hurried home with Percy and little Maud.

"What did that fellow say to you, Miss Anerley, when he had the impudence to whisper in your ear?" inquired Percy. "I almost felt inclined to knock him down just then."

"That could do no good, Percy. He was trying to make me believe that he was very nearly related to an intimate friend of mine."

"What cheek!" said the boy. "Yet he did talk well for a beggar, or even for a railway porter—I mean grammatically, and all that. I have noticed that even when I used to know him at the Brighton station. He wasn't there very long."

"I expect he may be a broken-down gentleman," said Constance; "a man who has ruined his fortunes by drink and dissipation. I wonder how he knew my name?"

"He helped up your box on to the cab the evening you came, and perhaps if he knew the name any way he remembered it."

This was the probable key to one mystery. If it were indeed his wife who lodged with them in London, he might know the name of Anerley very well. But solving this smaller puzzle only increased the magnitude and difficulty of the other. How came he to be the husband of Salome Stanley, and why had she failed to acknowledge him and call herself by his name?

Salome Stanley was her maiden name. Hermann Ferguson had told them that. Poor, poor, Cecil, too! He had been refused, she knew, but must he henceforth be utterly without hope? With a horrible plunge, as it felt to herself, Constance entered a depth of distress she had not at first realized. Salome Stanley, if she were in secret a married woman, had behaved shamefully to Cecil all along—shamefully.

Constance had to use a violent mental effort to keep herself alive to surrounding objects of attention during that Christmas day. She longed for night, when she might abandon herself wholly to the consideration of the overwhelming subject. Slowly the hours passed. By her natural force of character she put aside the event of the morning and her duty in regard to it till she could give to it the calm reflection of the quietude of night; but very naturally something of their adventure had to be recounted, for Percy and little Maud were full of it.

Without betraying the secret she was so anxious to keep, Constance managed to give a correct idea of the annoyance she had experienced. Mr. Mitchell told her she had far better have appealed at once to the lodge-keeper or to any gentleman walking in the grounds of Dane John, and Constance replied she had firmly made up her mind to do so, if she had not ended the parley when she did.

The Christmas meals were the more cheerful that Mrs. Mitchell, considerably revived, managed to sit up for a little while on each occasion, she ate a small slice of turkey and a minute portion of the rich Christmas pudding temptingly offered to her by her husband at dinner, and some wafer-like bread and butter of his cutting at tea, with a better appetite, she declared, than for many days past.

"Nelly," said the reverend gentleman, as he sat beside her, after she had listened to a few hymns from her husband and Constance and Percy and little Maud, and then retired early to bed; "if we can only get you about again, my dear, I shall know better how to value you than I ever have known yet."

"Why, you always have prized me far more than I deserved, Rowland."

"I've been a selfish brute, Nelly," he answered emphatically and not very clerically, laying so heavy a stress on the word brute as to imply a capital in every one of its five letters; "but only get well, my precious wife," he continued, "and you shall see I have learned a lesson."

Late that night Constance sat in her moonlit chamber wrapped in her railway rug for warmth, because the air was frosty and chill, and anxiously inquiring of herself, What ought I to do? To save Cecil from further bitter disappointment as much as was possible, to spare poor Salome herself the bitter and deserved reproaches of Mrs. Anerley, which Constance could not doubt she would justly incur, to warn the wretched wife of her husband's whereabouts, if indeed he were her husband—all these things seemed necessary to be done.

But if he were only a drunken villain, who had used a lady's name to her detriment, in order to deceive and victimize herself, Constance Anerley, what an insult to inflict upon Salome Stanley, even to write as if her union to the wretched outcast were an acknowledged fact. Cecil would not thank her for such easy credulity—such interference with Salome's affairs. She knew her brother well enough to be certain that, gentle and good-tempered and easy as Cecil generally was, he had a depth of unusually unawakened feeling, that anything concerning Salome Stanley had power to arouse.

Again, a new idea crossed her mind. She had often wondered that Cecil, after being repulsed, had not wished Salome to leave his mother's roof. Directly she had heard to the contrary, and his firmness about it, she had puzzled herself as to what possible motive he could have. She began now to ask herself whether it were possible that Salome had given Cecil her confidence when she had refused his offer, and whether Cecil had determined to shield from her drunken husband in the shelte home in Eglinton Terrace.

At last, after much deliberation, deliberat that was anxious and even prayerful in spi though Constance might have conscientio refused to call it so, so careful was she not profess, even to herself, anything which she not sure of possessing, she determined to w a letter to her brother and another to Salc Stanley.

Taking her desk directly her resolution formed, she penned the following:

"DEAREST CECIL: I was begged of by a r to-day who was smelling of spirits, and wh words, therefore, are very likely not to be pended on; but the information he was t enough and impertinent enough, perhaps false enough (I am sure I wish this with all heart), to give me was possibly so important you to know, that, after long and seri thought, I dare not withhold it from you.
called himself the husband of Salome Stanl
With all the love you can imagine, I am,
Cecil, now and ever, your affectionate sister,

"CONSTANCE.

That note, short as it was, she had found cult to compose. The other cost still m trouble:

"MY DEAR SALOME: Would it pain you much to know that I have, unintentionally my own part, learned a secret which you h as I believe, kept from us all till now? I heard that you are married, and I am afraid it is to a worthless, bad man. Oh, Salc dear, why did you not let me help you bear trouble, as far as ever it was possible for m do so? If I have been misinformed, if you still Salome Stanley, if that wretch I have who claims the title is happily not your husb do relieve my mind of this horror at once.
ever loving friend,

"CONSTANCE ANERLEY

To the first letter she almost immedi received this answer:

"You did exactly what was right, Consta to intrust your painful news to me. But d blame Salome. Shield her, Constance, fror proach and harm, by all the love you bear to and to me. Do not think she has not conf in me; she has. She married rashly, bli years ago, a cousin of her own name, who pected her money would be left in her power. He kept away from her when he f this was not the case, and pursued his fo wild course. Don't give him anything, have anything to say to him; if he dare to lest you again, threaten him with the law."

Salome wrote:

"Constance, dear Constance, what must think of me? Already I dread that you lo me instead of love me, and regard me as th ceiver of your whole family, of Mr. Fergu and of every one. I am guilty of very r that is wrong. I lack the moral courage th so strong in you, and have again and a done the easy wrong, not from set purpose it and to be wicked, but because I was so bly afraid to do the difficult right, and sh like a coward from doing it. Had you bee foolish as I have been in the past, you wou least acknowledge it, and take its mise consequences calmly in the present. I have your brother my sad history; circumstance quired that I should do so. Ever since he thrown around me the kindness of a brothe shield me as much as possible from difficult danger. I cannot ask you to keep anyt from your mother and sister, Constanc must leave my secret in your kind hands, k ing you will deal with it honorably as my fr
If you have any idea where my unhappy band is at any time, please let me know.
name is Stanley; he is my first cousin. I di assume a wrong name, only a false title—'
If you can love me a little even now, that of yours could never be more prized than by unhappy friend, SALOME STANLE

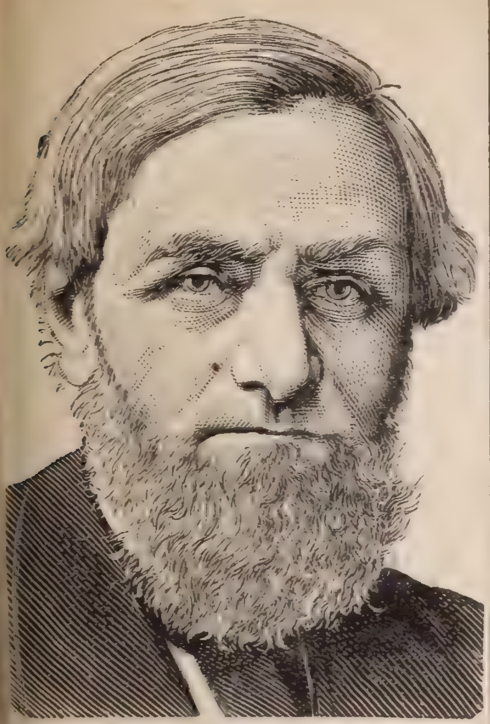
(To be continued.)



GEORGE PALMER, ESQ., M.P.

lis Business Relationships—Municipal Responsibilities—A Member of the Society of Friends—Elected to Parliament in 1878—Description of Huntley & Palmer's Biscuit Works.

MR. PALMER, whose portrait we give this eek, is about sixty years of age, and is the ief of the eminent and successful biscuit es- ablishment of Messrs. Huntley & Palmer, eading, Berkshire. He is the eldest son of e late Mr. William Palmer, whose honored ame is even yet a household word in the local- y in which he resided.

Mr. Palmer is a member of the Society of riends, and has consistently taken a deep in- rest in everything relating to the education of e people. As a member of the Peace Society has always discountenanced the bellicose pro- nsities of those who appear to delight in war, d has done all in his power to discountenance course to deadly armaments as the final ar- trament in international disputes.

When a vacancy occurred in the representa- n of Reading in Parliament, Mr. George Palm- reluctantly permitted his name to be put in mination for the office of Member of Parlia- ent. So enthusiastic were the electors in his pport that, although he departed from the ual practice of English candidates in his can- ss, and never solicited a single vote, he was cted by a large majority.

At the general election this year he was again urned at the head of the poll. He has spoken several occasions in the House of Commons, ere he is listened to with the respect univer- y accorded to men of business habits and rling integrity.

HUNTLEY & PALMER'S BISCUIT WORKS.

he manufactory of Messrs. Huntley & Palmer he largest of its kind in the world. It was ablished on a large wholesale scale about ty-five years ago by the late Mr. Huntley and George Palmer, the subject of this sketch. gives employment to more than 2500 work- ple, and above 1000 sacks of flour are weekly verted into cakes and crackers, of upward of ndred and fifty different varieties, in which vast quantities of milk, butter, sugar, and s are used. The buildings, which cover y acres of ground, and the machinery, driv- y a pair of great steam-engines of 120-horse er, have been admired by many visitors, as as the beautiful order and cleanliness of the nises and everything that is in them; but still more, the provision that is made for the comfort and health of the little army of male and female "hands," who have schools for their children, a library and large reading-room, and other institutions for their social benefit.

A visitor to the factory, describing what he saw, says:

"The economies exhibited within the factory gates are evidence of a continuous process of thought, acting upon a single object—cheap and perfect production. As you approach, you perceive that a railway has been laid through the heart of the factory. A train of biscuits is moving out of the establishment. Overhead an aerial line carries a train of nuts and crackers across the Kennet River, which divides the groups of buildings. From the picturesque confusion of red brick houses a little forest of chimneys towers into the air, which is feathered lightly with smoke.

"You enter the labyrinth of bakeries, sheds, storerooms, and magazines, and you are bewildered with biscuit crates travelling up in lifts, casks sliding down to places toward the biscuit railway station; with golden showers of aromatic nuts and cracknels dancing of their own accord out of rows of ovens into baskets; and with long processions of trays moving majestically into ovens. Then you pass into departments where men with flat wooden spades are mixing the biscuit materials (mathematically weighed and delivered from an upper floor through tubes in revolving pans), or where the tougher material of hard biscuits is being kneaded in drums or rolled into lengths that look like thick blanketing.

You turn and you light upon ovens that are positively raining filberts, and at hand are boys pressing biscuit crowns and other moulds, each covering his pan. Then you are introduced to rows of powerful machines that are punching out biscuits from endless bands of spotless dough, and gently depositing them upon trays that move in admirable order toward the ovens hard by.

A little beyond is the cracknel department. The cracknel requires distinct machinery, for it is cast into yonder boiling caldron, fished out with hand-nets, and plunged into cold water before it is ready for the oven. All this is very daintily and precisely done, and the method by which care is insured in the baking is as ingenious as it is equitable. To each oven is attached a premium. There is a baker to every group of ovens. For every pound of biscuits he spoils he is fined. The baker we questioned observed that 'last week he spoiled biscuits to the extent of sixpence,' which would be deducted from premium on good baking."

On Monday, October 4th, Mr. Palmer, laid the memorial stone of the "Reading House," which forms an integral part of Mr. Spurgeon's Girls' Orphanage at Stockwell.

THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY.

By P. W. E.

The Resurrection of the Body First Positively Taught by Christ—Old Testament Saints who Believe in it—I. The Importance of the Doctrine

THE doctrine of the resurrection of the body is very different from the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. The light of nature is sufficient to teach us that the spirit is immortal; but the resurrection of the body is clearly taught in the Bible. The body, in which we now exist, is to be raised, changed, and is to live with the spirit. As we now have a natural body, so we are to have a spirtual body; a heavenly as well as an earthly body. Spiritual body means a material body—that is, suitable for the spirit. It takes the place of the natural, or soul body. We are to have a real, a substantial body, like unto our Lord's glorious body, in which He ascended on high.

There were those in the Old Testament times who seemed to have some faint glimmerings respecting the resurrection of the body; but no clear, positive teachings were given on the subject until Christ, death's great Abolisher, taught it.

Abraham believed in the resurrection of the dead; for it is said in Hebrews 11 : 19 that He accounted "that God was able to raise Isaac up, even from the dead; from whence also He received Him in a figure."

Joseph must have believed in the resurrection; for he "gave commandment concerning his bones;" and surely he would not have been so very anxious about his bones had he not believed they would be rasied again (Hebrews 11 : 22).

Job says: "For I know that my Redeemer liveth; and that He shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God, whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another" (Job 19 : 25, 26, 27).

David sang prophetically of Christ, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption" (Psalm 16 : 10). It is declared in Heb. 11 : 35 that such was the faith of some of the martyrs when they were tortured they "refused to accept deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection."

The Lord Jesus Christ and the apostles brought to light the doctrine of the resurrection of the body in a very prominent manner; for they explicitly and frequently declare it. Our Lord says, "Marvel not at this, for the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear His voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation," or judgment (John 5 : 28, 29) The Bible teaches us:

First. The importance of the doctrine of the resurrection of the body.

Second. The resurrection of the just.

Third. The resurrection of the unjust.

Fourth. That these mortal bodies are to be raised, changed and to consist of flesh and bones.

1st. The IMPORTANCE OF THE DOCTRINE.

The alpha and omega of the gospel preached by the apostles was, that Jesus Christ died and rose again from among the dead, according to the Scriptures, as the first fruit or sample of those who slept.

When they chose another apostle, in the place of Judas, they said, "One must be ordained to be a witness with us, of His resurrection;" so that the very office of an apostle was to be a witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus. When Peter addressed the multitude, on the day of Pentecost, he declared unto them that David spoke of the resurrection of Christ (Acts 2 : 27). The charge against Peter and John, when taken before the council, was, "They taught the people and preached through Jesus Christ the resurrection from among the dead" (the proper rendering of the Greek, Acts 4 : 2).

Having been examined and set free, it is said, "with great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus; and great grace was upon them all" (Acts 4 : 33). It was this that stirred the curiosity of the Athenians when Paul preached among them. They said, "He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange gods; because he preached unto them Jesus and the resurrection" (Acts 17 : 18). Truly did Paul say, when brought before the council of Pharisees and Sadducees, "Of the hope and resurrection of the dead, I am called in question" (Acts 23 : 6). And equally did he assert, "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain" (1 Cor. 15 : 14).

From these Scriptures we see the doctrine was considered very important indeed by the Lord Jesus and the apostles. If it was so then, it is no less so now; if it had its opposers then, we must expect them now. As the most bitter enemies of the docrine of the resurrection were professors of religion then, so are they now.

(To be continued.)

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

SINGLE COPIES

can most conveniently be obtained through newsdealers. Any complaint that the CHRISTIAN HERALD cannot be obtained from a particular newsdealer is promptly attended to if we are given the name and street address of the pealer who does not keep it for sale.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

ordering the Christian Herald for 1881 are hereby offered the paper free from the time their remittence is received till the end of the present year.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Presidential Election.—The Christian HERALD goes to press before the result of the great national contest is announced. Our readers will have probably learned from telegraphic reports, before they read these lines, which of the candidates has been chosen to administer the affairs of this great nation during the next four years. The office which Henry Clay once described as the greatest and most honorable in the whole world involves also responsibilities, the gravity of which cannot be exaggerated. The man elected thereto ought to have the prayers of every patriotic Christian citizen, no matter what political party claims his allegiance, that he may be enabled to discharge those responsibilities uprightly and conscientiously in the sight of God.

The wisdom that Solomon asked for and received at the hand of God should be craved on behalf of the new President, that he may be guided in all his steps, and be so blessed of God in his high position that during his term of office he may be an example of righteousness, purity, and godliness to the people, and that under his Presidency the country may advance in all that becomes a Christian nation, and enjoy the smile of the King of kings and Lord of lords. As the Rock of Israel said to David, "He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God; as the light of the morning when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds." Disappointment must be the lot of one of the great political parties in the contest, but even to the disappointed ones the consolation remains that "the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever He will." Of this we may be assured, that "He careth for us," and that the future of our land, whoever may be at the helm of affairs, is in the hands of the all-wise Being in whom our fathers trusted, and that faith should banish forebodings.

The Nomination of Mr. William R. Grace for the office of Mayor of New York by the United Democracy of the city is viewed with apprehension by the secular press, and an acrimonious discussion has ensued on the subject. Mr. W. R. Grace is an Irish Roman Catholic and if he is elected the expenditure of the whole of the taxes raised by the city will be controlled by Roman Catholics. Mr. Grace is said to be an eminently respectable citizen, and qualified to discharge the duties of the mayoralty, but his nomination is considered even by Roman Catholics, to be an unwise step, in view of the fact that the other two members of the Board of Apportionment are also Irish Roman Catholics. Owing to the preponderance of that element on the board, the sixteen thousand dollars distributed in charity last year, were unequally divided; Roman Catholic institutions received twelve thousand and Protestant institutions only four thousand dollars. This glaring inequality may be increased rather than diminished by Mr. Grace's election.

Temperance Congress.—The New York State Temperance Society will hold a Temperance Congress in New York City, December 5th–12th. They request all the ministers of New York, Brooklyn, and suburbs to co-operate with them by preaching from their pulpits a temperance sermon, on Sunday, December 5th. Following this, for five evenings, there will be mass meetings in Cooper Union. These will be presided over and addressed by prominent ministers and other well-known popular friends of temperance. Each day during the Congress week the ladies will hold two or more drawing-room meetings for the wealthier classes in different parts of the city. Sunday afternoon, December 12th, there will be five mass meetings for children. All churches, temperance societies, and friends of temperance are invited to co-operate in the work.

The Death of Rev. William S. Plumer, D.D., LL.D., occurred on Friday, October 22d. He was one of the most highly respected Presbyterian ministers in the South, and his loss is mourned by the whole Church. He had submitted to a painful surgical operation, which had been successfully performed, but during his convalescence a complication of diseases set in which in his enfeebled condition proved fatal. Dr. Plumer was born at Darlington, Pa., in 1802, and studied at Washington College, Va., and Princeton, N. J. After ministering for eight years in Richmond, Va., he removed to Baltimore in 1847. He accepted the chair of Professor of Theology at the Western Seminary, Alleghany City, Pa., which he occupied until 1866, when he took the same position in the Presbyterian Seminary at Columbia, S. C. He was the author of several valuable theological works, including commentaries on the Psalms, the Epistle to the Romans and the Hebrews.

The Conduct of the Rev. I. S. Kalloch, the Mayor of San Francisco, and the incidents of the quarrel between him and the journalist in which the latter lost his life, has been considered by the Baptist ministers of California. Some of the churches refuse to meet with the San Francisco association until it has rid itself of the Rev. I. S. Kalloch. The First Baptist Church of Stockton notified the officers of the association that it would not entertain the association, because it would be in the hands of those who sustain Mr. Kalloch, for whose "irregular practices" the church desires to hold "no responsibility."

Neglected Treasures in Large Quantities have been discovered in Arizona. Some miners have found an ancient copper mine on the eastern side of the Verde. It bears evidence of having been worked many years ago, and it is thought that either the Aztecs or the Apaches must have used it. The remarkable circumstance in connection with the discovery is that the copper was cast aside as worthless, and this fact leads to the belief that the mine was worked for the paint. There are now on the dump rich and easily worked carbonates, while every spot where high-colored, soft material showed itself has been worked out. Several rock tools which have been found, with battered edges, and stains of ore on them, prove that implements of stone were used. They ran a tunnel into the ledge nine feet high and from six to eight feet wide. It is about twenty feet long. In places there are walls built and the waste matter thrown behind them. If those ancient miners had have known how valuable was the treasure they neglected in comparison with the material they used, they would have acted very differently, but they could not foresee the value which that neglected treasure would realize in later days. Men act now in spiritual matters much in the same way. The riches of Divine grace wealth neglect, while they labor diligently for they and worldly honor. A day of awakening is at hand, when they will learn that it profits a man nothing to gain the whole world if he lose his own soul.

Honey Was Found in the Walls of a Church at Bladensburg, Md., recently by some painters, while at work on the outside of the building. They discovered holes in the boarding, and saw many bees passing in and out. Some of the boarding was removed, and between the joists was found a solid mass of honey twelve feet in length. It is a strange place to find honey, although many sinners have in the interior of the building had their eyes opened to find that which was sweeter than honey to their souls. (Psa. 119: 103).

An Apt Reply to a Scoffer Was Made a few days ago by an agent of the Bible Society, who had given away some Bibles to a party of sailors. A notorious scoffer taunted the agent with the worthlessness of his work, and in proof held up a Bible he had bought from one of the sailors, who had sold it for a glass of rum. The agent had previously stated his conviction that the Bibles would get into the right hands, and when this particular copy was held up for his confusion, he was quite unabashed, and said to the scoffer very calmly, "Well, I am glad it has come to you, for I do not know any one who needs it more."

Lieutenant Schwatka, the Arctic Explorer delivered an interesting address at Chickerin Hall, New York, on Thursday, October 28th, i which he related his thrilling adventures whil searching for relics of the Franklin expedition Next week we hope to publish a portrait of Si John Franklin, with a sketch of his life.

The Rev. Geo. E. Jayne, Pastor at Provo City Utah, will be obliged to any reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to send him, by mail only, packages o back numbers of the paper for distribution among th Mormons. He writes: "I can use many thousand of papers to advantage in the Territory, and the may be blessed under God in the conversion of som souls. The Mormons get little to read except th priesthood publications, all of which seek to mislea them and keep them bound in error's chains. Th people will read other papers if they are taken t them, and the papers help to introduce the pastor t the homes of those he desires to reach and save. Pastors are requested to read this notice to the congregations.

The Bible and Prayer Union.—The Lesson for the ensuing week are: Friday, November 5t Psalm 95, and the consecutive Psalms on th following days. The following requests fo prayer we have received, and cordially commen to our readers (James 5: 16).

From a lady for the conversion of her tw sons-in-law, and of an invalid friend in spiritu darkness.—A reader who ten years ago received remarkable answer to a prayer requests the praye of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for th restoration of her father's health, if consistent wi the will of God, and also that a friend may be pr served from falling again under the power of liquo —From a sorrowing mother for the reclamation of h profligate son.—From a Christian depressed by th worldliness of the Church; he asks that prayer offered that it may be delivered from conformity the world.—From an Irishman recently come America, to whom the perusal of the English editi of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was blessed a few yea ago, that he may be enabled to resist the temptatio of dissipated associates with whom his employme brings him in contact.—From a young man, for th conversion of his brother, a medical student, fo whom prayer has been offered for more than twen years.—From a subscriber about to commence eva gelistic work in a godless German locality, for th blessing of God on his labors.

A Converted Incendiary's Confession was made two weeks ago to the Farmers' Mutual Insurance Company at Montpelier, Vt. Ten years ago, while still a stranger to God, a farmer claimed and received two hundred dollars from the company as compensation for his losses by a fire on his farm. By the grace of God he was subsequently converted, and the first thing he did was to go to the insurance office and confess that he had set the buildings on fire himself to raise money in an emergency, and give himself up to justice. The voluntary confession astonished the agents, who refused to prosecute him. They made arrangements with the man or restitution, and he returned to his home with n easier conscience. It is frequently alleged hat the new birth does not influence a man's worldly policy, but this incident shows that there re cases in which a very uncommon result is produced by a change of heart.

Twin Brothers Separated for More Than fty years met in a remarkable manner lately. Their father died in Adams County, Pa., in 1862, when they were children, and their mother being oo poor to support and educate them, one was ent to friends in Washington County and the ther to Westmoreland County. Soon afterard the mother died, and the brothers hearing othing of each other for many years, each supɔsed the other dead. One of them became a iller, and the other kept a toll-gate in Alleıany County. One day the latter went out the house to collect toll of an old gentlean who was driving through the gate. A eighbor stood by, who made the remark that e traveller and the keeper looked enough alike be twins. This brought about inquiries on e part of the two old men. The traveller oved to be the toll-keeper's twin brother. He d lived for years in Bradford, only a few iles from the toll-gate, in another county.

The resemblance between the two brothers us leading to their recognition, although they d not seen each other since childhood, is very markable. The Christian has never beheld the ing he is privileged to call his Elder Brother, t though clad in glory, we shall recognize m, for He knows every one of his brethren ; d we know that when He shall appear we all be like Him (1 John 3 : 2).

A Boston Child's Explanation of the Cause her walking the street barefooted was very uching. Mr. H. L. Hastings relates that a y girl was met on State Street, Boston, one d day by a gentleman who asked her why she re neither shoes nor stockings. She said, My papa dets drunk." The reply fully counted for her wretched condition, and vealed a pitiable state of home life. The her of the simple but intelligent child was too sy helping to clothe the children of the rumler to attend to the wants of his own spring.

A Remarkable Legal Complication is said to st in Maine, which renders it impossible to ain the medical diploma without breaking t law. A law of Maine provides that every dical student, before he receives his "M.D." ll dissect a human body ; another law proves that no bodies shall be dissected except se of executed criminals, and still another abolishes capital punishment. The anomaly olved by the enactment of these three laws is urious evidence of the fallibility of human slators. It is no slight evidence of the di- origin of the Bible that the code of laws by ch Godly men in all ages and in all lands guided presents no difficulties of this char-r. (Psa. 19 : 7.)

n Ominous Sign of the Times was Observed ng his summer excursion by Dr. S. I. ne, one of the foremost Presbyterian minrs of this country. He noticed with someg approaching consternation the precocity hildren in different forms of vice. At one of largest hotels where he passed the Sunday children ruled the house. They rioted with- interference on the part of their par-, so as to make a bedlam of the house, and Sunday was turned into half a dozen Fourths of July. Their boisterous romping made conversation impracticable, and the parlor was speedily deserted. Dr. Prime remonstrated with the landlord, and received this reply : "The parents teach them to be saucy, and rude, and profane. I spoke to a child four years old, in the presence of its mother, reproving him for misconduct, and, to my horror, the little rascal turned and swore at me! His mother laughed and said, 'How funny!'" In another hotel Dr. Prime saw six tables in the parlor at one time surrounded by people playing cards, and some of these tables wholly occupied by little children, who, at an age when they could scarcely be expected to have acquired the rudiments of education, were now adepts in games that it would be better for them never to learn at all. When we reflect that the children of to-day will be the men and women of the future, the significance of these facts is realized.

James Caton, who is Blind and Deaf and dumb, and is an inmate of the New York Institution, was visited a few days ago by the Rev. E. Payson Hammond, who held services at the institution two and a half years ago. After Mr. Hammond's former visit, Caton gave evidences of conversion, and ascribed the change to the blessing of God on Mr. Hammond's address, which had been translated for him into the only language he understands—the pressure of the nerves of his right hand by his teacher.

Mr. Hammond writes : "I went to the institution again, especially that I might learn if James Caton was still trusting in Jesus. I wish I could transfer to paper the joy he manifested at my presence. His heart was overflowing. He said" (through his teacher) "that previous to his conversion he never could control his temper, but since then, in answer to prayer, the Lord had helped him to overcome this besetting sin. His appearance and communications moved my heart most deeply. I realized the power of God's spirit to reveal the love of Christ to darkened souls as I had seldom done before."

"A Girl For Sale" was an Advertisement that shocked the citizens of New York recently. The persons advertising, took the girl some years ago from the Milwaukee Orphan Asylum and adopted her. They afterward desired to rid themselves of her, but wished to be reimbursed with the money spent on her maintenance and education. They therefore offered her for sale for six hundred dollars. The proposed arrangement bears a close resemblance to many of the matrimonial schemes which are often called "good marriages." All thought of religion, love, or congeniality is cast aside, and the only question that is allowed to weigh is the amount of money in prospect. No wonder that so many scandals are continually occurring in society and our divorce courts are so overwhelmed with applications, when parents negotiate for their children's marriages as they negotiate for a business purchase, and on the same principle as the New York advertisers, who openly and unblushingly announce that they have a girl for sale.

Three Young Heroes Were Rewarded Last week for bravery at the Seawanhaka disaster last summer. They belong to the Grammar School at Harlem, N. Y. They were out rowing on the fatal day, and saw smoke issuing from the burning steamer. Without staying to consider their own danger, they rowed alongside the Seawanhaka and succeeded in rescuing fourteen of the passengers, including the captain of the boat. The Irving Club, desiring to recognize such an instance of heroism, caused three gold medals to be struck, which they presented to the boys in the presence of 630 of their schoolmates. But for the prompt assistance they rendered, it is probable that the loss of life would have been greater than it was. The boys appear to have had no difficulty in persuading the imperilled passengers to come on board their boat ; but when rescue by the gospel boat from a worse peril is offered to dying men, they prefer to remain on the burning ship of this doomed world.

ASLEEP AND YET AWAKE—A RIDDLE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"I sleep, but my heart waketh : it is the voice of my beloved that knocketh."—SOLOMON'S SONG 5 : 2.

Entire Perfection cannot be Attained Here—Biographies of Imperfect Saints Consolatory and Helpful—Beacons not Harbor Lights—I. Slumber Confessed—1. A State Recognized—2. A Matter Complained of—A Low State of Enjoyment—A State of Danger—3. A Fault to be Ashamed of—4. An Evil to be Fought Against—II. Watchfulness Claimed—Inner Life and Death—The Inward Life Manifested—By Uneainess—By Desire—By Discernment—By Self-chiding—By Action—Mr. Spurgeon's Pigeons Envied—III. The Mystery Solved—IV. The Lesson Learned—The Possession of Great Joy should Produce Carefulness—The Spirit's Work to be Remembered—Make Sure of True Faith.

WE are glad to perceive in this song the varied experience of the bride. She was the well-beloved of the heavenly Bridegroom, but she was not without her faults. Though the "fairest among women," she was human, and, therefore, she had not reached angelical perfection. She was not perfect, to begin with, for at the outset she confessed, "I am black, because the sun hath looked upon me : they made me the keeper of the vineyards ; but mine own vineyard have I not kept."

Brethren, we shall not be able to claim entire perfection so long as we are this side the hills of division. Till the day break and the shadows flee away, our Lord will have to sanctify and cleanse his spouse "with the washing of water by the word, that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing."

Nor are we alone favored with the poetic story of the bride ; we have also in the word of God

THE BIOGRAPHIES OF THE SAINTS,

the memoirs of the godly, and these are exceedingly useful to us. I fear we should not, brethren, at certain times, know whether we were God's people at all if we were not able to compare ourselves with others of the family. We may lose our way sometimes, as poor sheep have often done, and then though the greatest comfort is derived from seeing the footprints of the Shepherd, yet no small measure of consolation is to be gained through marking the footsteps of the flock. The sight of human footsteps on the sandy waste has caused us to take heart again.

We have exclaimed, "Here one has been who was surely a child of God, and though I am here I may be a child of God too. I have similar failings and weaknesses, and I chide myself for them ; but I will not utterly condemn myself and say I cannot be a believer, for I perceive that these spots were on others of God's children too." The perception of our likeness to others who were truly saints has often afforded us a spark of hope when we were in a maze, and dared scarcely hope that we were right toward God.

Frequently the experience of others will help us to thread our way when it winds and twists, and we cannot see an inch before us. The young man thinks that he understands himself, but no old man does so. Ask the man who is best acquainted with himself, and he will tell you that he is increasingly a riddle, and that his experience becomes an enigma more profound every day. But, my brethren, we must take care that we do not wrongly use the memoirs of saints as recorded in Scripture : they are not all for our imitation, but many of them for our warning.

Above all, the lives of the saints may never be used as an excuse for our faults. We shall not be justified in following afar off because Peter did so, nor in calling fire from heaven upon our enemies because James and John wished to do so, nor in quarrelling because Paul and Barnabas fell into sore contention ; We may wisely quote David as an encouragement to a penitent, that God will forgive his sin. but not as an apology for ourselves should we be tempted to commit the sin. We must often use even the saints of God rather as beacons than as harbor lights, as lighthouses set upon rocky coasts to advise us of the danger into which they fell. Come we, then, dear friends, to use the example of our text, with those due limitations which we have thus set forth.

We have in the text, first, slumber confessed—"I sleep;" but over against this there is wakefulness claimed—"but my heart waketh." Very soon we have mystery solved—how is it that the heart still keeps awake?—"it is the voice of my beloved that knocketh." Before we close we shall try, fourthly, to have a lesson learned out of the text. May the Holy Spirit make the whole subject profitable to us, and practically influential upon our lives.

I. First, then, here is SLUMBER CONFESSED.

The spouse laments her state, and sighs out, "I sleep."

1. It strikes us at once that her sleep is a state recognized. We are astonished that she should say, "I sleep," and we conclude that it is not so profound a sleep as it might be; for when a man can say, "I sleep," he is not altogether steeped in slumber. When children of God perceive their own imperfections and mourn over them, there is evidently a root of virtue in them; when they perceive the decay of their grace there is some grace left undecayed with which they are bemoaning their decline.

Infinite mercy has had some dealings with you, and has made you so far to be spiritually awake that you can feel that you sleep, and mournfully confess it.

2. Further, as this sleep is a matter recognized, so it is a matter complained of. The spouse is not pleased to sleep: she says, "I sleep," but she does not mention it as a matter for congratulation. She is not pleased with her condition. Here again I would remark that it is well for saints, when they perceive that they are in the least degree backsliding, that they should mourn before God, and accuse themselves before him.

This sleepiness is not a thing to be indulged in, but to be abhorred. To say the least of it, it is a low state of enjoyment. Sleep is peaceful and quiet, but it cannot enjoy the sweets of the senses, and the delights which the mind can receive thereby. Sleep is cousin unto death, and he that slumbers lies at the door of the sepulchre. The image of death is set upon the sleeper's face, and it is a miracle, and a sort of foretaste of the resurrection, that any man doth wake again after he hath fallen into a deep slumber.

We ought to complain of ourselves if we sleep, because it is a state of danger. While men slept the enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat. It is bad, then, to have a drowsy minister and drowsy church officers, for these will not watch the fields for God. He who sleeps is in danger of the thief or the murderer. While Saul lay stretched on the plain, Abishai lifted up his spear and said, "Let me smite him but this once." He who sleeps may lose his all, yea lose himself. Let us, therefore, dread this perilous state; and if we feel it creeping over us, let us shake ourselves, and say, "I sleep, but I will not give way to slumber. Lord, arouse me".

Sleep is

A STATE OF INACTION.

A man cannot do his daily business while his eyes are closed in slumber. There is a somnambulism which can do much; but I know of no spiritual somnambulism. You cannot walk the road to heaven asleep, nor preach the Gospel as you should, nor serve God and your generation aright, if you are in a spiritual slumber. I know a great many who are so; alive, I hope, but very sleepy. They do very little; they are too sluggish to attempt much. "The slothful man saith, There is a lion in the way; a lion is in the streets." This was his argument for keeping in the chimney-corner. In truth, the lion is about as real as the monster which has been described of late as prowling over this county of Surrey and devouring women and children all the way from Banstead Downs to Clapham Common.

Solomon seems to have been very familiar with this fable of the sluggards' lion, for in another proverb he makes the idler cry, "There is a lion without. I shall be slain in the streets." These poor creatures are so dreamy in spirit that they see a lion everywhere, threatening them if they try to do good in any form; they must needs sit quiet and still, and try to enjoy themselves as best their sleep will allow them to do, for they cannot venture out to work because of the lion. God help us to escape this lazy condition.

3. Yet again; this slumber should be not only a matter of complaint as an ill to be dreaded, but it should be regarded as

A FAULT TO BE ASHAMED OF.

A Christian man should not say, "I feel dull, careless, and inactive," and make the confession as if he almost deserved to be pitied for a misfortune which was no fault of his. My brother, you may be pitied, but you are also to be blamed, perhaps blamed far more than pitied. An apparent spiritual slumber may creep over us because the body is very weak and sickly, and here pity is allowable, yea, justly due.

Certain states and conditions of the flesh no doubt will overcome the spirit, as when even the choicest of the apostles slept in the garden. The Master at first said, "What, could ye not watch with me one hour?" but afterward he made a generous excuse for them and said, "The spirit truly is willing, but the flesh is weak." Make excuses for others, and let your Lord make excuses for you, but do not frame apologies on your own account. David writes in the psalm, "I said, This is my infirmity." Quite right, David, I dare say it was so; but the other day I said the same of myself, and ere long I answered to my conscience for it, for conscience asked, "Is it not your sin as well as your infirmity?" I was compelled to divide the statement, nay, at last to withdraw the first part of it altogether and cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner."

May we not be too ready to lay the blame of our impatience, our unbelief, or our hastiness upon the body when we ought to take all blame to ourselves. It is always safest to blame ourselves, and it is frequently dangerous to admit an excuse. Still, sometimes dullness may be an infirmity. When a man is weary with a hard day's work, or with business that has cost him long care, and he kneels by his bedside at a very late hour to pray, and finds himself going to sleep, I do not think that his fault is a very grievous one. It is certainly not that dreadful sin which shall never be forgiven, either in this world or in that which is to come.

When a man is brought very low by weakness of body, and he cannot on the Sabbath day feel himself up to the mark in all respects, I do not think we should hold a church-meeting and turn him out; nor do I think that he should excommunicate himself. When a widowed spirit is broken with bereavement, when the husband is dead, when children or brothers have died, when parents have been snatched away, and the heart is very heavy, if the heart cannot rejoice in the Lord, it is a pity that it cannot, but there is a measure of infirmity as well as fault in the heaviness of the soul. In such cases good people may guardedly say with David, "This is my infirmity." May God help us when we feel such infirmities that we may speedily rise above them, being made strong in weakness, and being taught to glory in infirmities because the power of Christ doth rest upon us.

4. Furthermore, it was an evil to be fought against. When a man is obliged to say, "I sleep," let him not content himself with sleeping on. Now is the time for much prayer: let him wrestle with this deadly foe till he is fully aroused. Falling into indifference on the road to heaven is something like sleeping on the vast plains of snow, where, if a man give way to the natural inclination to slumber which comes on through the intense cold, he may lie down and never rise again. Oh, take care, you that are looking for glory and eternal life, that you yield not to sleep for your Master cometh, and it may be that within another hour you may hear the midnight cry.

Let us whip ourselves with a strong resolve that we will not sleep. Let us say unto our soul, "Come, wake up! My spirit, thou shalt not sleep. This cannot be. I must not have it, I will not, I dare not. I will goad thee, I will crucify thee to the cross, for thou shalt not slay thyself with suicidal slumber." With this resolve, let us seek out means of waking ourselves up. Sometimes we may do well to seek for a better ministry than we have attended. Alas, there are ministries which are as cradles to rock babes to sleep in. There are preachers who charm most wisely, if their intent be to send the universe to sleep Beware of preaching which comforts you in idleness and increases your spiritual insensibility.

Christian converse, too, is another useful means of keeping us awake. John Bunyan mentions that in going over the Enchanted Ground the pilgrims, to prevent drowsiness, fell into good discourse. Here is his quaint rhyme about it:

"When saints do sleepy grow, let them come hither
And hear how these two pilgrims talk together:
Yea, let them learn of them in any wise,
Thus to keep ope their drowsy, slumb'ring eyes,
Saints' fellowship, if it be managed well,
Keeps them awake, and that in spite of hell."

Imitate this example, but if discourse does not avail, get to work for Christ. This is a very effective way of keeping yourself awake, God the Holy Spirit blessing you in it. In looking after the souls of others, your own soul will receive a watering. I do not think that soul-slumber so often visits the active as it does those who have little to do in the Master's service. I active service does not suffice, then cry mightil to God, "I sleep, my Saviour; awake me, I pra thee!"

Anyhow, this sleep is an evil which must b overcome. Come, make up your minds to-day members of this church, that you will not yiel to drowsiness. I hope none of you are incline to say, "Well, I may get to heaven in thi sleepy way, and so what matters it? My fellow members would put me in the ambulance an carry me along like a wounded soldier, and thi will be easier than marching at the double da after day." No, no, my brother, we hav enough of the invalided and wounded already We have as many as we can carry of the non effectives. We need no more.

I said years ago I would sooner lead a doze real live earnest Christians than a dozen hun dred of the half-and-half sort, and this feelin grows with me. I would almost as soon not b a Christian as be as some Christians are: the have enough religion to make them uncomfor able, but not enough to make them usefu They drink such shallow draughts that they ir crease their responsibility rather than thei energy. Oh for a deep draught of grace whic shall fill us with all the fulness of God, an make us men in Christ to the utmost capacit of our sanctified manhood! With this I leav the sleeping for another theme.

II. We reach the point of the paradox; her is by one who confessed to sleep. "My hea waketh," says the bride; "I sleep, but my hea waketh." It may seem an odd thing to sle and yet to be awake, but I commenced by sayin that the Christian is a great puzzle. Ralp Erskine's "Believer's Riddle" is a remarkab production, but every word of it may be jus fied by experience and by Scripture. A man a mass of contradictions, but a man in Christ far more so. He truly says:

WATCHFULNESS CLAIMED

"I'm in my own and others' eyes
A labyrinth of mysteries."

We are asleep and awake at the same time. Erskine rhymes it:

"Both sleeping flesh I have, that rests
In sloth unto my shame,
And waking grace, that still protests Against this lazy frame."

There is an inner life within every Christian which can never die, and there is about him an inward death which can never rise to life. Jesus said, "The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life;" hence this divine life, though it may grow weak and feeble and slumbering, yet never passes into the condition of absolute death, or even of complete insensibility. Somewhat of heaven is about the man of God when the earth encompasses him most. "Sin shall not have dominion over you:" God has the throne still, even when Satan rages most.

This inward life shows itself usually in the uneasiness of the declining heart. When a believer feels that he is not what he ought to be, nor what he wants to be, he cannot be happy. He cannot rest and be content. There was a time when such a condition would have satisfied him, but now he is distressed beyond measure, and like Noah's dove, finds no rest for the sole of his foot. Hear him sing in the minor key:—

"Where is the blessedness I knew
When first I saw the Lord?
Where is the soul-refreshing view
Of Jesus and His word?

"What peaceful hours I then enjoy'd!
How sweet their memory still!
But they have left an aching void
The world can never fill."

He sleeps, but his heart beats, sighs, and palpitates with dire unrest.

The inner life shows itself, too, in desire, for the heart is the seat of desire, and it leads the man to say, "I am not what I would be. I live at a poor dying rate: Christ's love is so great to me, and mine to him so chill. Lord, lift me out of this frozen state. I cannot bear this grave of lethargy. Lord, bring my soul out of prison! Give me more grace; give me to love Jesus better, and to be more like him. Poor as I am, I long to be enriched by thy love and mercy; Oh, visit me with thy salvation!" Such a pleading heart is still awake, though the mind may be dull. The Lord judges us by our earnest desires more than by our accomplishments.

An old writer says, if you send a man on horseback for the doctor, if the horse be a sorry jade hat cannot move quickly, you praise the man when you see him whipping and spurring and doing his best to hasten. You do not blame him or that which is beyond his power. So saith he —oftentimes when our desires do whip and spur our languid spirits God sees what a rate we would go at if we could, and He takes the will or the deed. Often our desires are so aroused hat we would harness the lightning and bit the empest if we could, and spur both to a swifter peed. Desires prove wakefulness; "I sleep, ut my heart waketh."

The spouse gave another proof of her wakeulness by her discernment. She says, "It is the oice of my beloved that knocketh." Even hen half asleep she knew her Lord's voice. ou may catch a true believer at his worst, but e still knows the Gospel from anything else, nd can detect another Gospel in a moment. ou shall come forth with all your eloquence, our poetry, and sweet concocted phrases, with something that is not the Gospel of the blessed od, and you shall for a moment please the ear the Christian, because of the literary excelnce of your address, but he soon detects you. This wakefulness of heart shows itself often the soul chiding itself. "I sleep," saith she. e would not have blamed herself as I have ed to describe her doing if she had not been some measure awake.

This blessed living wakefulness within the art will by and by display itself in action. The art will wake up all that is within us, and we all hasten to our Beloved. It is wonderful w a true Christian flies back to his God so on as the Spirit of the Lord sets him free from t net.

A friend at the back of this Tabernacle furnished me with some pigeons but a little while ago. They were taken home to Norwood, and shut up for a few days, and well fed, in the hope that they would stay with us; but no sooner were they set at liberty than they soared aloft, made three circles in the sky, and then flew direct for this spot. How I wished on my sick-bed that I had their wings, and could hasten hither too. It is so with believers. The devil may put us in captivity and shut us up a while, but give us the opportunity and our heart knows the way back to Jesus.

This puzzle of "I sleep, but my heart waketh," has been experienced by thousands. I quote no solitary instances: there are hundreds of the same. I lately met with a little poem by Thomas Vaughan, which touched my heart, because it so aptly described my state. I will read it, to show you that the paradox of a believer's life is no fiction of mine, but is the frequent experience of God's people. In a little out-of-the-way poem, which perhaps no one of you ever has seen, Vaughan quaintly sings:

"My sweetest Jesus! 'twas thy voice, 'If I
Be lifted up I'll draw all to the sky.'
Yet I am here: I'm stifled in the clay,
Shut up from thee, and the fresh East of day.
I know thy hand's not short; but I'm unfit,
A foul, unclean thing! to take hold of it.
I am all dirt: nor can I hope to please
Unless in mercy thou lov'st a disease.
Diseases may be cur'd, but who'll reprieve Him that is dead? Tell me, my God, I live.
'Tis true, I live: but I so sleep withal
I cannot move, scarce hear when thou dost call,
Sin's lullabies charm me when I would come,
But draw me after thee, and I will run.
Thou know'st I'm sick: let me not feasted be,
But keep a diet, all prescrib'd by thee.
Should I carve for myself, I would exceed
To surfits soon, and by self-murder bleed.
I ask for stones and scorpions, but still crost
And all for love: should'st thou grant, I were lost.
Dear Lord, deny me still: and never sign
My will, but when that will agrees with thine.
And when this conflict's past, and I appear
To answer, what a patient I was here,
How I did weep when thou didst woo: repine
At thy best sweets, and in a childish whine
Refuse thy proffer'd love; yet cry and call,
For rattles of my own to play withal:
Look on thy cross and let thy blood come in
When mine shall blush as guilty of my sin.
Then shall I live, being rescued in my fall,
A text of mercy to thy creatures all.
Who having seen the worst of sins in me,
Must needs confess, the best of love's in thee."

Does not this writer dip his pen into your soul's sorrows?

III. Spare me a minute or two while I dwell on the head of MYSTERY SOLVED.

"I sleep, but my heart waketh." How doth her heart wake? It is because the voice and knock of her Beloved are heard. Every child of God has a wondrous union with Christ. "Because I live," saith Christ, "ye shall live also." Ask you why you are alive in such a body of death and grave of sin as your poor nature is? You live because Christ lives; and you cannot die till He does. This is why you cannot sleep as do others, because He does not so sleep. "He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep,' 'and till Christ's spiritual life shall altogether slumber out into forgetfulness and inaction, yours never shall.

The mystic union between yourselves and Him secures you from destruction, which apart from Him would sweep you away as with a besom. This is why, dear friends, when you get where you should not be, you cannot be happy because Jesus is not happy when you are there. He groans over your follies; they cost Him wounds, and bloody sweat, and death, and they must cost you something, too, if you indulge them. That field all tangled with the brambles tore the Shepherd when He sought you out, and the briars will tear you also if you wander there.

The reason why you are awake at all is because Jesus calls you. His voice rings in your ears through His word both heard and read. He more than calls: He knocks at your heart by affliction, by mercy, by warning, by comfort. The mystery is all solved, the saint would be a sinner if it were not that he is one with the sinner's Saviour: the living believer would be a lump of death and corruption if it were not that he is one with Him who is the resurrection and the life, who hath said, "Whosoever believeth in me shall never die;" and again, "Though he were dead, yet shall he live." What a blessing is this vital union with the ever-blessed Head, immortal and unslumbering!

IV. Now for

THE LESSON LEARNED.

It is this: be very careful when you possess great joys, for in this instance the spouse had been with the Beloved in choice fellowship, and yet was soon drowsy. He had given her to drink abundantly, and he had feasted with her, but no sooner had the sun set than she said, "I sleep." We are singular creatures. Our very perfect brethren, although they do not see it, generally exhibit some glaring imperfection if you let them talk for five minutes. If you knock at the door to see if Mr. Pride is at home, you need not praise them long before he will show his full-length portrait. We are thankful for these brethren so far as they are saints, for good people are scarce; but I wish they would not tell us so much about their saintliness; for I have noticed that great cry often goes with little wool, and the noisiest thing that goes down the street is the dust-cart.

He who makes most noise about his own perfection has the least of it. Let us be careful whenever we rise to the summit of the hill; careful to keep up, careful that we so act when we are up that we do not come down with a run. Whenever the Lord visits you, entertain Him right heartily. Be careful that nothing grieves Him, lest He depart. High joys may produce slumber; the chosen three upon the Mount Tabor were soon overcome with heaviness. At the too transporting sight of the transfigured Saviour, darkness covered them. Mind what you do when on the mount; be careful to carry a full cup with a steady hand.

Next, when you are blaming yourselves for your own work, do not forget the work of the Spirit in you. "I sleep:" smite your heart for that, but do not forget to add, if it be true, "My heart waketh." Bless God for any grace you have, even if it be but little. What if I am not sanctified as I wish to be and shall be, yet I am perfectly justified! What if I do not exhibit my Father's likeness so completely as I hope to do, yet I am His child! What if as yet I do not produce all the fruits of the Spirit, yet I have the germs of them, the buds and blossoms, and soon I shall have the ripe fruit. In Aaron's rod we see that the same power that could put the buds and blossoms on a dry stick could put the almonds there too.

Lastly, make sure above all things that you have that true faith which knows the voice of Jesus. The spouse had not awaked if it had not been for the charm of Jesus' voice which affected even her drowsy faculties. Some persons can be more easily awakened by the voices of those they love than by any other means. The charm of memory, the charm of intimate affection, the charm of delight, gives music to some tongues: let your ear find all its music in the voice of Jesus.

Know his voice. He saith, "Incline your ear, and come unto me: hear, and your soul shall live. My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me, and I give unto them eternal life." God bless you, dear friends, with a faith that trusts Jesus, knows His voice, and follows Him; and may we be aroused out of all our sleepiness, if we are at all drowsy, into a holy wakefulness, so as to serve the Lord our God with all our heart and soul and strength while we live. Come, Holy Spirit, and give us this privilege, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

[PORTIONS OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Psalm 118; Solomon's Song 4 : 5.]

TALES OF THE GROG-SHOPS.

By a London Clergyman.

THE TWO WATCHERS.

THE FIRST WATCHER.

IT was a wild night. The rain was pattering dismally down, and the wind was sighing and wailing like a thing in pain. It was an easterly wind; and bitterly pinching was it to the few inhabitants of the seaport town of Sandhaven, who were forced to brave it. Great-coats and the warmest mufflers it utterly defied; and umbrellas it turned inside out in the most rough and ready manner possible. Indeed, the elements were as discourteous and unmannerly as they well could be.

It certainly was not a night for a woman to be exposed to, and especially a thinly-clad woman—such an one, for instance, as she who is cowering under the shelter of the jutting window of yonder corner public-house. See how she shivers and trembles there—ever and anon dragging her wet and wretchedly thin shawl around her—crouching half down, as though she would put herself into a smaller compass for the sharp winds to play upon—now and again shaking herself from the great drops which hung suspended from her whole person—and, yet, all the while keeping watch on the public-house door, and listening, oh, so eagerly, for the swing of its opening, but only, alas! to sink back again with a half-groan of disappointment, as the form which stepped out was not the one she sought.

How ruddily and cheerfully the light streamed out above her head! How eloquently the glittering and flickering gleam, which played on the opposite wall, spoke of warmth and comfort! It made her all the colder to look upon it.

And then the bursts of laughter which smote upon her ears, how strangely they contrasted with her now utter misery! They seemed to mock her weariness and pain. And all the more did she quiver and moan, as there came forth the sound of the voice she knew so well—the voice which once was tender and wooing, and vowed eternal love, and a protection which should know no taint of neglect.

As she crouched there, it was strange how the past laid hold of her, and transported her for a few moments beyond the pelting rain, and the stormy winds, and the cold, to green fields, and murmuring books, and the clash of the steeple bells, and a strong arm on which she loved to lean, and a voice which trembled as it spoke. But it was only for a few moments; and then the sad and fearful present came back to her, and she shuddered all the more for the flash of the past which had come to her in the midst of her sad watch.

"Will he never come?" she asked herself.

Then she rose up, and ventured timidly to peep within the public-house door.

There was her husband in the midst of a small group of men—fishermen like himself. Their flushed faces and shaking hands showed plainly how heavily they had been drinking. One of the waiters was bustling up even now to the group with fresh supplies.

"Now or never," whispered the sad watcher to her beating heart.

"Jamie," she said softly, "I've been long waiting, and it's very cold. Won't you come away now?"

He heard her voice distinctly enough, but he did not choose to reply. So he remained silent, and took no notice.

"Jamie," urged the wife again, "won't you come home to the children and me?"

He looked up now. But far better he had not, for a fierce light shone from his eyes, and a curse leaped to his lips as he looked.

Very meekly and entreatingly the red eyes met his.

Alas! that their eyes met at all. Alas! for the manhood of the man. Alas! for the poor feeble woman. For, see how it maddens him. With one great stride he is at the door. His great brown hand is lifted. And as it falls, it bears before it the one who, for love of him, would gladly have laid down her life.

She falls back into the night; and there on the wet pavement, with the fierce winds howling around her, and the rain pelting heavily upon her, she lies, a crushed and huddled mass, with a white face and a broken heart.

Alas! for the man. Alas! for the woman. Alas! for the poor children crying at home for bread and clothing.

But what of that? It's a common thing enough. Few are the towns where there is not a hand to rise and strike. And few are the towns where a day passes and some woman is not struck down. What matters! It's common enough. And so apparently thought the men within, in the warmth and the light, for they treated that battered woman as a subject for sport and merriment. "They had done the same to their wives, they had. And they would do the same again. They had taught their wives to stay at home and mind their own business." And again the laugh arose. It was a good joke, that it was.

And the woman, what of her? She lay on for a time in the wind and the rain, and then slowly gathered herself together and staggered to her feet. She appeared like one in a dream, whose thoughts were in the far-off distance. And when her thoughts came back, slowly and one by one, to the corner public-house, and the sting of the blow, and the well-known voice within, and the drenching rain, and the wind, which seemed to shriek as her own soul was then silently shrieking—there was no hesitation as to what she should next do.

She would watch on. What else could she do? Jamie might want her. He might fall down helpless in the wet street, and would need a hand to lift him. He might miss his way, and stumble into the heaving sea yonder. He might get into mischief, and with none by to say a good word for her Jamie, how badly would he fare!

Her woman's imagination was all alive. She peopled the streets with multitudes of dangers. No, she could not leave him thus. She would watch on, and on, and on. And so she settled herself again under the window ledge, and listened for the well-known step. And the red light streamed out, as of old, over her head, and played and danced and flickered on the wall before her. And the winds howled on, and had no pity. And the rain pattered, pattered, and clasping hands with the stormy winds, in one great sweep bore down upon her, whose only fault was that she loved too well.

Was it that her mind was wandering, or had some good angel come down and braved the storm to comfort her? for see! there is a smile upon her face. Ah! her thoughts are being wafted back into the far past again. She is drawing a picture on the wall yonder.

Those dancing lights there are the home lights—the home of her girlhood. They are the light sent forth in the dim twilight by the home fire. There she sits, the only child at her mother's side; and they are looking into each other's faces, and they are talking of a matter apparently of deep interest.

"But will he be a good kind husband to you? And is he a sober man? And can I trust him with my only child?" And she heard herself say in reply, "Jamie's a true man, mother, and I don't fear. Jamie'll take care of me."

And then the matter was settled. And then there came the last good-by, when home was left, and she and Jamie started in life together. And then. . . .

Yes, what then?

Oh, Jamie, Jamie, where is the wife thou didst solemnly promise to love and cherish? What hast thou done with her, man? Is that she who is crouching beneath that ledge, wet to the skin, and with her hand upon the dark livid spot upon her cheek, as though to hide it from the eyes of that good mother, with whom she is talking in her dreams?

Is that weary watcher thy wife? She had not those pale cheeks when thou didst lead her from her mother's roof, Jamie. What hast thou done with her, man?

* * * * * *

The harbor clock booms out the hour of twelve. The public-houses are closed. Nought is to be heard but the drip, drip, drip, of the falling rain, and the steady footsteps of the watchman on his beat.

"Hallo, here! What's this? Why, a woman, I declare! Come, I say, jump up. Move on."

He turned his lantern upon her face.

"What's your name? Where do you live?" he asked.

His questions, and the bright light upon her face, brought back a measure of consciousness to her; but only a measure, for this was her reply:

"Jamie's a true man, mother."

The kind-hearted policeman almost dropped a tear as he heard the strange reply, and saw the white face with its dark bruise, and perceived something of the true facts of the case.

"If you're looking for your husband, the public's shut some time ago."

"Shut!" she said, as she raised her to her feet. "Shut!" she repeated. "Then where's Jamie? where's Jamie? Let me go, I must find Jamie." And in a moment she was gone. Homeward she dragged her wet and weary form to see if he were there.

The policeman looked sadly after her, saying huskily to himself, "What a life! what a life!"

Yes, Jamie was at home, and lay snoring upon his bed. And soon she, too, was lain down; but not to sleep; for, strange, to say, she was a watcher still, watching for Jamie. And the wind howled, and the rain pattered, and the lights flickered, but Jamie did not come; and ever and anon a great brown hand would be lifted up, and she found herself hurled before it; . . . and so on, and on, and on, all the night through.

(To be concluded.)

A Delightful Picture of Christian Home Life is sketched by Mrs. M. Baxter, who is now staying at Mülheim in Germany: "Here at Mülheim, in Baden, we are in the midst of a population about equally divided between Catholics, Protestant, and Jews. We are staying in the house of a dear Christian woman, a farmer's widow, who is as simple in her habits as the poorest, dressing in blue cotton, short to the ankles, with the head-dress of the country, a huge bow of broad black ribbon, extending as far as the shoulders, but standing straight out from the head, stiffened by wire, with one end fringed over the forehead. She has ten farm laborers and three or four women servants. All dine in the same room with us, and the hours are primitive—breakfast at 5.30 A.M., dinner at 11 A.M., supper at 7 P.M. This dear woman has built a beautiful room for meetings, which seats four hundred people; services are held there twice every week. Every morning after breakfast there is a little service, conducted by Frau Willin or her nephew, an earnest man of God for the farm people, and at every meal the dea woman herself asks the blessing of God in th most solemn manner: one feels that she lives i the presence of God. The only furniture in th one sitting-room is two wooden tables and number of wooden chairs; at dinner one plat is provided, at breakfast none. All her super fluity goes to further the cause of God. Sh sends cartloads of vegetables to the Missio House at Basle, and many a needy one in th neighborhood is helped by her. God raise u many such."

The Authoress of "Ministering Children. Miss Maria Louisa Charlesworth, died in Londo last week. She was the daughter of the late Rev John Charlesworth, rector of St. Mildred' Church, London. Most of her works are of religious character, and she endeavored to incul cate the duty of bringing religion into the dutie of daily life. She has written, besides "Ministe ing Children," "The Female Visitor to th Poor," "A Book for the Cottage," "England' Yeomen," and many other productions of th same class.

DR. TALMAGE'S FRIDAY EVENING TALK.

Oct. 29, 1880.

THE THREE PILLARS.

The Pillar of Fire—Calamity Unmitigated—Honors to the Heroic Firemen—The Day when all Pendulums will be Stopped—No Clocks Needed when there is no Time—The Pillar of Ice—Explorers, who have Perished—Schwatka's Heroism—The Fate of Franklin—Monuments of Ice—Schwatkas Needed in the Church—The Humble Workers Recognized—Christ's Welcome to the Poorest—The Pillar of the Throne.

MY lecture is on the two pillars. First, the pillar of fire by night, lifted last Wednesday across the darkness, while the Ansonia Clock Company's works were burning. At two o'clock in the morning this whole city was lighted up as by a premature morning. One million dollars' worth of property destroyed. Twelve hundred men, women, and children turned out of employment. Calamity unmitigated.

Out of some styles of disaster good-fortune comes to others. If a ship drive on the rocks, wreckers may pick up some of the wreck, but a disaster like this is the obliteration of capital and the ruin of labor without any alleviation. Turned out of work at the beginning of winter. This is doubly distressful. After long idleness, compelled by the fact that there was no work to do, upon their reviving prospects the conflagration sweeps in.

What a fearful and indiscriminate element fire is! On the hearth it cheers the household; in the furnace it drives the rail-train across the land and the steamer across the sea; but, unharnessed, how it paws into destruction factories and churches and cities. In one night it turned Chicago into lamentation. In 1835 it made New York quake and crouch with indescribable terror. What iron hearts of courage it needs to climb the hot ladders and carry to the top of the tumbling roofs the hose of the fire-engine. In all our cemeteries are monuments to the heroes who fought and fell in this battle with flame.

Let us thank God for the new inventions by which we contend with this raging element—the steam power that now does the work of those who used to pull and tug at the ropes, and toil with the up-and-down stroke of the handles of the engine until they dropped dead in the smoke and the cinders. Let us be grateful for those great insurance companies which divide up what would be overwhelming loss to one, among many, to whom the loss is inconsiderable. But after all palliation, occurrences like that of Wednesday night are gigantic afflictions to the city.

Let us learn the uncertainty of earthly treasure. Down went the tools of the workmen and the exquisite draught of the artisan. The hand of God stopped those great chronometers of the clock company. So a mightier fire will at last stop the swinging pendulum of the timepieces all the world over. No more use for clocks when time shall be no longer. To a thousand useful reflections the intelligent and Christian mind will be led by this pillar of fire by night.

But I pass from the pillar of fire to

THE PILLAR OF ICE.

Last night Lieutenant Schwatka was received with appropriate honors in New York, on his return from his astounding endurances in the Arctic. Ever since 1498 the world has been trying to find the north-west passage to the Pacific. John Cabot, Nordenskjold, Sir John Franklin, Dr. Kane, Dr. Hayes, Captain Hall, Sir John Nares battled with the ice and perished, or, after awful exposures, escaped to tell us a story that fairly congeals the blood.

The world was determined to know how to cross from ocean to ocean at the North Pole, and save a long voyage around Cape Horn. One explorer, and only one, the brave Nordenskjold, went through. No other man will ever follow him. The passage is proved to be useless, for since we have cut this continent in two by the Union Pacific Railroad, we no more have to make circuit of Cape Horn, and if the north-west passage were possible it would not be taken. Nevertheless, we have increased appreciation of the courage and endurance of those explorers who, on errand of science, or commerce, or mercy, have run against the sharp spear of Arctic ice. And now we have more freezing revelations as Lieutenant Schwatka at Chickering Hall last night tells the story of his Arctic explorations. It is the poetry of icebergs. It is the canto of eternal winter.

What became of Sir John Franklin and his men of 1846? was a question never satisfactorily answered until now. The governments of the earth and the philanthropists of all nations banded together in the search. When the last Franklin search was proposed in 1878, Lieutenant Schwatka volunteered, and in April, 1879, with his party, left the ship and took to the sledges across wildernesses of ice. On and on, amid suffering and peril, until they found the ship in which, or near which, Franklin and his men surrendered to the everlasting cold. They find that valuable charts and philosophic apparatus belonging to Franklin's party have become the toys and the playthings of the children of the savages.

They find boxes of human bones sawn asunder that the marrow of the bones might be eaten by the surviving explorers. A picture of awful suffering never surpassed. Skeletons of the Franklin party, after more than thirty years waiting for sepulture, were entombed by Lieutenant Schwatka, where they will wait the trumpet that shall wake the dead. Sarcophagi of ice. Graves of ice. Monuments of ice. Temples of ice. Westminster Abbeys of ice. How terribly and overwhelmingly sublime.

Well may England and America honor Lieutenant Schwatka as he returns from an expedition in which he pierces two degrees further north than any explorer has ever gone, and coming back with information that forever silences the last question about the fate of Franklin and his men. Ah! it is this kind of men—the Schwatkas, and the Franklins, and the Dr. Kanes, and the Livingstones, and the DeLongs, and the Stanleys—who do honor to the human race. More now than ever before, there are giants among men—great force of human will conquering fatigue and hunger and physical woe, that they may present the round earth to the cause of geographical discovery.

We have found out at last how the world is bounded: on the north, on the south, on the east, on the west, by the courage of man and the greatness of God. It is not more what such explorers discover of the features of the globe, than what they discover of the capacity of man when he sets out for great enterprise. The influence of such example is most salutary.

We want more men of that kind to work the reforms of State and Church—endurance that cannot be frozen out by the world's frigidity. If Schwatka and Franklin and DeLong can endure so much for science, how much ought we to be willing to endure for God?

Lieutenant Schwatka having left the ship, he says, he and his men endured forty-three days of storm and cutting blast, but they kept right on. But how many of us turn back at the first cyclone. We want in Church and State more endurance, more heroics, more backbone, more brawn. "Oh," we say, "if we only had some great ship to sail, or some great expedition to command, we too would do wonders." Be not deceived. Schwatka did his greatest work with a sled pulled by a team of dogs. Use what material you have. Put your resources to full stretch. Do not cry out for a man-of-war when you may take a sled. If you cannot harness a reindeer, hook up a dog. If you do not use one talent you already possess, you would do nothing though you had ten talents.

WHAT IS DETAINING THE CHURCH OF GOD in our day is its namby-pamby membership. We have plenty of Christians ready to sit down in the vineyard and eat grapes, but few Schwatkas to push out into the cold. Yet God is fitting out expeditions on all sides, and men and women are wanted who care little for their own comfort and everything what they can do for others. Paul commanded such an expedition, Frederick Oberlin another, Florence Nightingale another, Alexander Duff another, John Howard another, Bishop Asbury another. If you cannot command an expedition, you can join one.

There was only one thing wanting at Chickering Hall last night at the Schwatka reception, and that was the presence of all the men of the expedition—the men who on cold mornings shot the game, the men who hooked up the dogs, the men who with numb fingers mended the sleds, the men who dug the graves for the skeletons, the men who climbed the ratlines before they took to the ice, the men who paced the slushy decks of Arctic seas. Poor fellows! All the reception they wanted was at the door of their own warm and rejoicing homes. But still, when we honor the explorer we must not forget the suffering assistants. When we welcome the general, we must not disregard the private. When we honor renowned Christian workers, we must not despise the widow of two mites, the doorkeeper of the Lord's house, the men and women who suffer in silence for Christ's sake.

The day will arrive when all the great Christian expeditions shall come back in the presence of many worlds. Not only the leaders but the led, not only the commanders but the commanded, not only the celebrated but the obscure shall get celestial and divine recognition.

As Christ introduces, amid the éclat of heaven, His friends, and the question is asked, "Who are these Thou introducest into our imperial company?" Christ will say, "This is the woman that gave a cup of cool water to the thirsty traveller; this is the child that read the Scriptures to her blind mother; this is the nurse that rocked the sick child's cradle; this is the female clerk of the store who patiently endured the insolence of customers; this is the mother who brought up her children to God; this is the man who forsook not his religion amid the ridicule of the hat factory; this is the fireman who fell dead in trying to get a child out of the third story of a burning building; this is the sailor of the Franklin search party who, kneeling in the Arctic storm, prayed that his sin might be made whiter than snow."

And then Christ, waving his hand over "a great multitude that no man can number," will say, "They were cold, they were sick, they were poor, they were despised, they were wronged, they came out of great tribulation, and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb." That day will be the rectification of everything, and those who expected to take back seats in heaven will be called to take front seats, and those who would have been satisfied to occupy a footstool will be awarded a throne, and those who had no ambition except to get inside the shining gates will be made rulers over many cities.

So my lecture, which began at the pillar of fire and wandered on to the pillar of ice, stops at the pillar of the throne.

An Australian Inebriate was Converted by the blessing of God on one of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's sermons, which are published every week in the Australasian. It was preached in 1868, and was entitled "The Approachableness of Jesus" (No. 809). He lived alone about twenty miles from Geelong, and had not entered a place of worship more than four or five times in twenty years, and had taken to drink until delirium tremens seized upon him. When partially recovered, with not a human being near, his eye lighted on the newspaper. Then he read the sermon, which went to his heart, and "Sir," said he to Mr. Spurgeon's son Thomas, who is in Australia, "I've never touched the liquor since. I can't tell you how grateful I am to your father, but I thought the best way for me to do honor to the father was to tell his son of the blessing the printed word has been to me."

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

(Continued from page 703.)

Christian Counsel.

I KNELT down in a sheltered corner, and felt myself alone with God. I do not think that I have ever realized the Lord's presence more than at that moment. And then I confessed it all to Him—all my coldness, all my carelessness, all my neglect of prayer, all my indifference to Him. I came back to Him, and asked Him to receive me, and to give me the light of His countenance again. And then, as Miss Irvine had advised me, I prayed very earnestly for the Holy Spirit, pleading that promise, "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children: how much more shall your Heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him?"

Oh, how thankful I felt that Miss Irvine had spoken to me that afternoon? I am sure that God put it into her heart to do so.

When I went back to the house I found her still sitting in the same place, and she said, as she took hold of my arm to walk home with me,

"Is it all right, dear?"

"Yes, Miss Irvine, I hope so. I have asked Him to forgive me, and I think He has."

"Yes," she said, "if you have asked Him I am sure He has. He is always ready to forgive us, if we will only go to Him. If we only realized how much He loves us, May, and how much it grieves Him when we are cold and heartless to Him, I think we should be more careful never to leave Him."

As I look back upon that part of my life which was spent in Alliston Hall, I cannot be too thankful that God gave me the friendship of Miss Lilla Irvine. I found in her a true friend, one in whom I could confide all my troubles and anxieties, and one who was ever ready to sympathize with me, and to advise me. Her visits, to my great joy, were very long ones. At the time of which I am now writing she spent several months at her cousin's house, so that I had many opportunities of seeing her, and of learning to love her more and more.

As Christmas time drew near, the good sisters at Branston Manor House wrote to ask me to spend Christmas with them, and Sir William most kindly gave me a fortnight's holiday. Evelyn was very loath to part with me, and told me she would be dreadfully dull while I was away. But Sir William would not hear of my refusing the invitation, and promised to do his best to make up for my absence.

It was six months since I had seen Maggie, and my heart beat very fast as the train drew up at Branston Station, and my little sister came forward to meet me. She had grown very much since I had seen her last, but she was the same dear, simple-minded child as when I had left her, and was just as loving and true.

Old John was waiting for us with the two luxurious horses, and we drove to the Manor House at the usual measured pace.

It was quite touching to see the welcome which the three kind sisters gave me. If I had been their own child they could not have seemed more glad to see me. Miss Jane, especially, took me under her wing from the moment that I entered the house, and it would indeed have been my own fault if I had not spent a pleasant Christmas time at Branston Hall.

But what I enjoyed, perhaps, more than anything else, was hearing Mr. Claremont's sermons. There was something in his plain, practical way of preaching which went direct to my heart, and I always came away from hearing one of his sermons feeling thoroughly dissatisfied with myself, which perhaps, after all, is the best proof how very useful they were to me.

On the last Sunday of the year, especially, I felt that indeed there was a message for me. In both his sermons that day Mr. Claremont spoke of the year that was past, gone forever, with all its shortcomings and sins, all its neglected opportunities, all its wasted moments. In the evening his sermon was addressed more especially to the unsaved in the congregation, urging such not to let the last moments of the old year pass away until they had been to the fountain, Christ Jesus, the fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness, and had washed their sin-stained souls till they were whiter than snow.

But in the morning Mr. Claremont spoke to Christians, to God's own children. He spoke of the sins of which we Christians had been guilty during the past year, and above all of our sins of omission. He told us that God had given to each of us a special work to do for Him, and that if we did not do it the work would be left undone. And then he asked us whether all those who lived in the house with us were among the saved. Were there any, was there one, with whom we spoke day by day, and whom we loved perhaps very much, and yet whom we knew to be still outside the refuge, still unsaved?

And then Mr. Claremont pleaded with us, if this was the case, to give ourselves no rest until that one was safe in Christ, but to speak to him about his soul, and, whenever we had an opportunity, to plead with him, and to urge him to come to Jesus before it was too late.

"Another year gone, just gone, and your loved ones still unsaved. Oh, what if this new year should be their last! What if next New Year's Day the opportunity should be over, and they should be gone! Up, children of God, up and be doing; let not their blood be on your heads! Oh, if they should come up to you at the last day, and say, with bitter reproaches, 'Why did you not warn us? If you really believed, knew that this was before us, why did you not give yourselves no rest, day nor night, until you knew that we were saved from it? Oh, why not?' What will you say to them then? Friends, be up and doing, for the night cometh when no man can work."

As Mr. Claremont spoke, one face was ever in my mind's eye, one form was ever before me. It was Evelyn Trafford, my own dear little Evelyn, of whom I thought. I knew she was not safe. Loving and amiable and sweet-tempered as she was, I knew that she cared nothing for the Lord I loved. She had been brought up entirely for this world, and she had never been taught to think of things above.

And yet, what could I do for her? I had sometimes tried to get a word in, edgewise as it were, for my Master, but it was very difficult, and it never seemed to do any good.

Sometimes I thought it did harm. If she was alone with me she turned the subject so quickly, and called me precise and particular, and did not seem so much at her ease with me afterward. And if any one else came into the room she would begin to talk almost scoffingly of all that I loved and reverenced, as if she were determined to show me how little she cared for it all. And so I was beginning to think that it was wiser to be quiet and to say nothing.

Yet this sermon had made me uneasy. If Evelyn, my dear Evelyn, should die unsaved, and I had never once really spoken to her about her soul's interests, oh, how I should blame myself! And yet, when could I do it? How could I begin the subject?

I met Mr. Claremont the next day, as I was going to see one of Miss Jane's sick people, and I ventured to tell him how much I had felt his sermon.

"But does it not require very great wisdom in speaking to others?" I asked.

"Undoubtedly," he said; "there is a time to speak and a time to keep silence."

"But with me, Mr. Claremont," I said, "it always seems the timt to keep silence."

"Have you been looking out for an opportunity?" he said; "ready to speak and longing to speak, whenever and as soon as God shall give you one?"

"Hardly that," I said; "I have often thought I ought to speak, but have always persuaded myself that it was not the right time to do it."

"Ah!" he said; "perhaps if you look carefully within, Miss Lindsay, you will find that at the bottom of it all there has been a little cowardice, a little unwillingness to be brave for the Master's sake—please forgive me for saying so—but I have often found it so myself. Often, when I have neglected speaking to others about their souls, I have found that it was not from want of opportunity, but from want of courage to use the opportunities that were given me."

"Yes," I said, "I believe you are right."

"Pray for opportunities to be given you, be on the look-out for opportunities, and use the opportunities as soon as ever they occur, and you will, I am sure, Miss Lindsay, find that there is indeed a time to speak as well as a time to be silent."

I went back to Alliston Hall determined to be on the watch for the time to speak, and longing most earnestly for that time to come. Evelyn welcomed me very warmly, and told me she had never known a fortnight pass so slowly.

"Have you many visitors here?" I asked.

"No," she said; "there is only Alice Fitzgerald; I did not know she was coming when you went away, but I found out she was staying with friends of hers not far off, so I asked her to come here on her way home; her father is an old friend of papa's."

"Alice Fitzgerald!" I repeated; "Alice Fitzgerald; I wonder if it is the same!"

"The same as what, May?" she said laughing at my astonishment; "do you know an Alice Fitzgerald?"

"No," I said, "I do not know her; but she is a great friend of a friend of mine."

"Well, this Alice Fitzgerald—how pale you are, May," said Evelyn, suddenly stopping short in her explanation; "are you very tired?"

"No, not at all," I said; "go on, I want to hear about your Alice Fitzgerald."

"Well, my Alice is a very pretty girl, at least I think she is, and a nice sort of girl, though she isn't a bit like you. I don't mean that you are not nice, you dear old thing," said Evelyn, laughing, "but she is quite different from you; I'm rather afraid you will quarrel."

"Oh, no, I hope not!"

"No, you must not quarrel," said Evelyn, "though she has some very strange ideas; but, after all, what does it matter what one believes?"

I was about to answer when the door opened, and the subject of our conversation entered. She was a tall, fair-haired girl of about my own age, and was indeed, as Evelyn had said, very pretty.

"Alice, this is my friend, May Lindsay," was Evelyn's introduction, as she came in.

Miss Fitzgerald shook hands with me pleasantly, and then sat down on a low seat by the fire, and took her work out of a pretty embroidered pocket which hung by her side.

"I am very glad to make your acquaintance, Miss Lindsay," she said, laughing; "for I have been hearing your praises sounded morning, noon, and night, ever since I came."

"By the bye, Alice," Evelyn went on, "May thinks she knows a friend of yours; at least, if you are the same Alice Fitzgerald. What is her name, May?"

"It is a gentleman," I said, turning very red, in spite of all my efforts to the contrary; "Mr. Claude Ellis."

"Claude!" repeated Miss Fitzgerald in astonishment; "do you know Claude? I never heard him speak of you."

"No, perhaps not," I said; "but I do know him very well indeed; we were playfellows when we were children lives."

"How very strange that I never heard your name!" said Miss Fitzgerald; "and I was staying at the Parsonage last spring; would you be at Acton then?"

"No," I said, "we had left a little time before you went there. Do you remember noticing a house, standing in a large garden, close to the Parsonage?"

"Oh, yes," said Miss Fitzgerald; "it was shut up when I was there, and Claude said the doctor used to live there."

"Yes, the doctor was my father," I said, checking the tears, which would come in spite of myself, and which nearly choked me.

"Well, that's very funny!" said Evelyn, "that you should know this dearly beloved Claude, about whom I have heard much lately! Do you know he is coming here to-morrow, to make my acquaintance? Papa has invited him o come for a day or two while Alice is here."

Claude coming to Alliston Hall! Claude oming to-morrow! How I wished that my tay at the old Manor House had been a little onger. I made some excuse to leave the room oon afterward, and went to my own bedroom nd locked the door.

(To be continued.)

JOSEPH, THE WISE RULER.

S. Lesson for November 14th, Gen. 41-38-57. olden Text, Prov. 22 : 29. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

It is a law of God that "the hand of the dili- nt shall bear rule" (Prov. 12 : 24); expressed so in our golden text, "Seest thou a man dili- nt in his business? he shall stand before ngs; he shall not stand before mean men." was also God's promise to Joseph individually rough his dreams, that his brethren, and even father and mother, should bow down to him. his law and promise assured to this injured d oppressed man that he should yet rise supe- r to his surroundings. There can be no ubt that his faith remained firm; "his bow ode in strength;" otherwise it would have been possible for him to act as he did, with a spirit ich was in no way oppressed by circum- nces.

"At the end of two full years Pharaoh amed." The presence of a man who lived in mmunion with God brought about a nearness God to those who were around him; his fel- -prisoners first, and Pharaoh later, were e recipients of messages from God. When ldren of God are living in real nearness to n, there is a something about them which ers feel without being able to understand it, they find that their thoughts unconsciously in to turn to heavenly things; they may e a spirit of resistance, but they cannot be fferent.

haraoh's spirit was troubled, as the spirits of chief baker and chief butler had been ubled before. And why? In both instances reason was the same: there was "no inter- er" (Gen. 12 : 8; 41 : 8). When God ks to the unconverted, they are always in ay because they do not know the language e Holy Ghost. Then it was that the chief er was seized with compunction; he had e use of Joseph to interpret his dream, yet ad forgotten the man who understood the pretations which "belong unto God." Now elated to Pharaoh the history of his dream that of the chief baker, and how all had fulfilled which Joseph had foretold in his pretation.

Then Pharaoh sent and called Joseph, and brought him hastily out of the dungeon: he shaved himself and changed his raiment, came in unto Pharaoh." What surprise there have been in Joseph's heart! These ong years of forgetfulness by the chief but- ad exhausted every earthly hope; he could o way by which help could come. And it is when we are at an end of our resources, of our hopes, that God glorifies Himself in ing His Word, and proving the might of naided arm. "Pharaoh said unto Joseph, ve dreamed a dream, and there is none can interpret it: and I have heard say of that thou canst understand a dream to in- t it." And Joseph, who never forgot the nce of his God, replied, "It is not in me: hall give Pharaoh an answer of peace."

en Pharaoh related his dream: how he had 'seven kine, fat-fleshed and well favored; hey fed in a meadow: And, behold, seven kine came up after them, poor and very vored, and lean-fleshed, such as I never saw in all the land of Egypt for badness: And the lean and the ill-favored, kine did eat up the first seven fat kine and: . . . it could not be known that they had eaten them; but they were still ill favored, as at the beginning. So I awoke. And I told this unto the magicians; but there was none that could declare it to me." Pharaoh had yet to learn that none but the Spirit of God could declare or translate His teaching.

"And Joseph said unto Pharaoh, The dream of Pharaoh is one: God hath shewed Pharaoh what He is about to do." The young man who had been thirteen years in slavery and imprisonment spoke with the authority of a man of learning. He had been in the school of God, who said to His ancient people, "Thou shalt also consider in thine heart, that as a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee" (Deut. 8 : 5). He had been learning through his reverses the futile nature and uncertainty of all earthly things, and the light of God, in which he had been taught to live, imparted to him a dignity and an authority which nothing else could have bestowed. Long acquaintance with God had given him a right to count certainly upon Him; he could have said with the Psalmist, "I will speak of thy testimonies also before kings, and will not be ashamed" (Ps. 119 : 46).

Joseph explained that the seven kine and the seven ears of corn represented seven years of plenty: that the seven thin and ill favored kine and the seven ears blasted with the east wind were seven years of famine.

Having laid the facts of the case before Pharaoh, Joseph, inspired by God, proceeded to give the king counsel. Had he stopped for a moment to think about himself, he, a foreigner, a slave, a man accused of a loathsome sin, his mouth would have been shut; but Joseph's lips were God's property, to be used as "instruments of righteousness unto God" (Rom. 6 : 13); and thus, without considering how Pharaoh might look upon it, at the risk of being condemned at court for his presumption, he concluded the message with which God had charged him. How few of God's children in our day would have been equally free from self-consciousness? "Now, therefore," he said, "let Pharaoh look out a man discreet and wise, and set him over the land of Egypt. Let Pharaoh do this, and let him take up the fifth part of the land of Egypt in the seven plenteous years. And let them gather all the food of those good years that come, and lay up corn under the hand of Pharaoh, and let them keep food in the cities. And that food shall be for store to the land against the seven years of famine, which shall be in the land of Egypt; that the land perish not through the famine."

"And the thing was good in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of all his servants." There is something marvellous in the faith of some of those of whom we read in the Old Testament, who heard of God for the first time. How did Pharaoh and his servants know that Joseph was not an impostor; how could they be sure that the things which he had predicted would come to pass? The power of the Spirit of God must have been working upon the king; he said unto his servants, "Can we find such a one as this is, a man in whom the Spirit of God is?" There is an uprightness, a want of prejudice, a freedom from unworthy motives in this Pharaoh, which one cannot but admire. How often it happens in the world that one man judges another, not with an unprejudiced eye, but with regard to what he himself may gain or lose by the judgment which he passes: he would like in any case to be on the side of the majority.

There was no such unworthy spirit in this old heathen king; he said unto Joseph, "Forasmuch as God hath showed thee all this, there is none so discreet and wise as thou art, thou shalt be over my house, and according to thy word shall all my people be ruled: only in the throne will I be greater than thou." Oh that this were the spirit which reigned among all such as appoint ministers, teachers, etc. "If God himself has raised you above us by the messages He has given to you for us, then we bow to His choice; and no consideration of position, learning, or any other earthly thing, shall make us interfere with His decision." Pharaoh took off his ring from his hand and put it upon Joseph's hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck: and he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had, and they cried before him, "Bow the knee."

Taken suddenly as he was from the lowest position, and from dishonor, and placed in the second highest position in the then known world, was it possible that Joseph's head should not be turned? Could he bear such prosperity? Let us not forget that Joseph was not alone; it is expressly told us in God's Word that "the Lord was with Joseph." When the Lord is truly with us, we never need consider what are our own resources, what talents, experience, means, etc., we possess. He makes Himself responsible for every position into which He brings us, by the very fact that He is our Father. How can we believe that he would place us where we could not but fall? Only let us exercise the most absolute confidence in Him, and all is well. "I can do all things through Christ that strengtheneth me" (Phil. 4 : 13).

David says, "He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God" (2 Sam. 23 : 3). This did Joseph. As prime minister of Egypt, we may well believe that God was his chief counsellor. He acted by faith; for there was nothing in the outward appearance of things during the seven plenteous years which could warrant the expectation of the famine which should succeed them; but Joseph endured as seeing Him who is invisible, and he gathered up all the food of the seven plenteous years, "and laid up the food in the cities; the food of the field, which was round about every city, laid he up in the same. And Joseph gathered corn as the sand of the sea, very much, until he left numbering; for it was without number."

As God had foreshown Joseph, the years of famine came; "and the dearth was in all the lands; but in all the land of Egypt there was bread." Then it was that the wisdom which God had given to Joseph became apparent. The famished people cried unto Pharaoh, and he sent them to Joseph, and he opened the storehouses and sold unto the Egyptians. Not they alone received benefit; from other lands the people came, and in the great provision which Joseph had made, there was enough for them, and they came also to buy corn. Later on we read that "Joseph gathered up all the money which was in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan for the corn which they bought: and Joseph brought the money into Pharaoh's house."

When at last the people came with their sore plea, "There is not aught left in the sight of my lord but our bodies and our lands; . . . buy us and our land for bread, and we and our land will be servants unto Pharaoh; and give us seed, that we may live and not die, that the land be not desolate;" then "Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh; . . . and as for the people, he removed them to cities from one end of the borders of Egypt unto the other end thereof." Then he gave them seed to sow the land. By this dispersion the whole land could be brought into cultivation. And the only stipulation which he made to the possessors of land which he thus distributed, was this, that the fifth part was to be Pharaoh's. The hearts of the people, were won: "Thou hast saved our lives," they said; "let us find grace in the sight of my lord, and we will be Pharaoh's servants" (Gen. 47 : 14-26). Thus Joseph ruled in the wisdom and in the power of his God, a type of those who shall hereafter reign with Christ. In our daily lessons of humiliation, let us not forget that God is making us ready for a great future, and that it is worth the while to suffer now "for the glory which shall be revealed in us" (Rom. 8 : 18).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Situation in Ireland Absorbs Public Attention across the Atlantic, and the friends of that country are full of apprehension as to the events of the next few days. Correspondents of leading journals report that the peasantry are armed to the teeth, and are deluded into the belief that should hostilities break out they will be assisted by drilled and organized bodies of men from this country. The British Government has sent reinforcements of constabulary and troops to Ireland as a precautionary measure, but wishing to prevent the act exasperating the people, they are not obtruded on the public gaze. The excitement of the people, increased, by the agitators, who continue holding public meetings, renders an outbreak probable, in which many lives must be lost and the cause of Ireland retarded by many years.

The British Government displays considerable patience, or vacillation, as the opposition call it, in dealing with the difficulty. The threatened arrests have not yet been made, and it is now reported that several names have been erased from the list of those it isintended to prosecute. Meanwhile the Irish landowners are loud in their denunciations of the Government which permits their lives to be placed in imminent peril day by day. The condition of the country is but little removed from anarchy, and no landowner's life is safe, even though his previous treatment of his tenants has been marked by kindness and consideration.

The Aspect of the Eastern Question Continues a source of astonishment to Europe. The Sultan's reiterated promise to surrender Dulcigno has not yet been fulfilled, and the question of the Greek claims he refuses to entertain. How long he will be permitted thus to defy Europe is a matter of serious consideration, but his present obstinacy shows his foolhardiness. The cession of territory is no doubt a painful and humiliating process, and it is attended with personal danger, as his people, despising him for what in their ignorance they denominate his cowardice, may kill him; but he and his ministers must know that timely concessions to the will of Europe might so conciliate the Powers as to insure to his empire an extended lease of life. As it is, his temerity may hasten the utter overturn of Turkey by exasperating its enemies and alienating its friends. England and France saved her from destruction a quarter of a century ago; but now France is indifferent to her fate, and England is ruled by a man who believes that Europe would be benefited by the Turk being driven out, "bag and baggage." In such a perilous position the Sultan stands, and with incomprehensible recklessness awaits the action of Europe.

Colonel Gordon, the Eminent Christian Officer whose efforts to repress the slave trade in Egypt are well known, wrote last month to the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, "I will believe in the regeneration of Egypt when I hear that the slave-hunting in the Soudan is finished, when there is an assembly of native Egyptians governing the country in the place of pashas, and when the decrees are truly carried out instead of being, except under European control, dead letters, merely intended for European credulity, and when a reliable budget of expenses and receipts for the Soudan is published."

The Gospel in Brazil is Making Progress in spite of difficulties which many people regarded as insuperable. Eighteen years ago the first Protestant church was organized in Rio Janeiro, and two persons received into its communion on confession of their faith. Since that time more than three hundred have been admitted into this one church, mostly converts from Rome. In 1865 a second church was established at San Pauio, of six persons, which has grown and prospered, several preachers having come forth from it to work in other localities.

A Proposal to Erect a Protestant Episcopal church by American citizens at Nice, the famous resort of European tourists, emanates from Mrs. Read, of Wilmington, Del. That lady's husband died in that city some time ago, and she desires to rear a church there as a memorial of him. She offers to give fifteen thousand dollars to pay the cost of erection if other Christians desirous of propagating the gospel in that land will subscribe a sum sufficient to purchase a site.

The German Peasant.—The Chaplain of Emanuel Hospital, Westminster, England describes in a recent letter the hard lot of the German farm-laborer. He says: "Men, women, and children may be seen hard at work in the fields from sunrise to sunset, and the heavy loads which they carry on their backs, from mere infancy to old age, is appalling. As there are no houses in the open country, but all the habitations are crowded in the villages, the long walk which the laborer has to take in order to reach his work seriously increases his toil. Long hours in like manner obtain in the schools, which usually begin work at seven A.M., and with a brief mid-day interval, go on till five P.M., the poor little students carrying work to be done at home as well. The sanitary condition of school-houses is frightful, and this seriously detracts from the quality of German village education. Long school-hours, hard fare, bad in-door air, and labor in addition at home, account for the wearied, aged look of the children, in spite of the fresh air of the hills and forests in which the district abounds."

Mr. Inskip and his Party on the "Round the World Tour" must have nearly arrived in India now. They had a blessed time at Hull, England. No condition of the weather hindered the people from crowding the place of prayer, and occupying aisles, altar, pulpit steps, vestibule, and galleries. One evening two hundred persons came forward for prayers, and one hundred and thirty of them professed salvation. The next day two hundred and forty came forward, and among those who received "full salvation" were a Protestant Episcopal clergyman and a minister of the Primitive Methodists. Mr. Inskip writes, "The work has been amazing, and continued to augment in power and spirituality up to the close."

Liquor and Starvation in the Arctic Regions. —The revenue cutter Corwin, which arrived at San Francisco October 13th, brings news that at St. Lawrence Island, in the Behring Sea, out of 700 inhabitants 500 were found dead of starvation. The traders had introduced liquor among them, causing them to neglect storing up the usual supply of provisions.

The Light in New Guinea.—"I shall never forget," writes a missionary, "the first night I landed in New Guinea, and I should like to compare it with the last night before I left. I remember the feeling that came across me that night. I could see the fires through the grove of cocoanut-trees; I could hear the drums beating; and I heard sometimes the shrieks of women. I knew that there was heathenism and cannibalism all round. Ah! but as I sat on the veranda of my little honse, seven years afterward, you must try and understand what my feelings were then. I saw a fire in the cocoanut grove, just as I had done on that night before I landed. There was a sound that came warbling up the hill; it was not the shrieks of women, but it was one of Moody and Sankey's hymns. These people were engaged in their evening worship, and after the singing of the hymn and prayer and the talking of the teacher, then came about two hours of singing, for they were very fond of it; they know nearly all Moody and Sankey's hymns. All this has been accomplished within eight years."

The Best Way to Gain Working men is by the manifestation of interest by the clergy in their temporal welfare. This fact is illustrated by an English clergyman, who relates: "I recently found myself in a railway carriage on the London Underground Railroad, which was crammed with artisans, to whom I spoke of life insurance in the Post-Office Savings Bank. So interested were they that some of them went a station or two further than they had first intended, in order to hear more of the matter. As I drew near to my own destination, thei principal spokesman asked me, "Have you go any cards about you?' I thought he said, 'abou it,' and replied that I had not, for I was not a agent for the insurance. 'No, sir,' he answered 'it was your address I meant. What's your par ish? That's what I want to know. I have no been much of a one since I was a boy to go t any church at all; but if yours is within fiv miles' walk from my house, I'll go to hear yo every Sunday of my life.'"

Persecution in India.—The "Indian Herald' states that a Christian named Prabhudas ha been sentenced at Indore to two hundred days imprisonment for selling Christian books in th City of Indore. Two months ago he attache himself to the English Church Mission at Indore and has been carrying on the trade of a weave for his livelihood. His leisure hours have bee occupied in the sale of religious books, and fo this he has been condemned to imprisonment fo the greater part of a year!

Drink, Bad Company, and Horse-racing— trio of fatal evils—have just brought a Londo clerk, respectably connected, to grief. He wa in the employment of a colonial agent, name Alexander Strachan, and from time to time embezzled sums amounting to $600. For this h was committed for trial, on October 4th, at police court. Mr. Strachan told the magistra that his clerk's conduct had been uniforml good, and that he had trusted him to a gre extent; and when arrested he said he was sor for what he had done, as his employer was " good sort," and had trusted him. He ascribe his ignominious position to the influence drink, his association with bad company, an his infatuation for the turf. A threefold comb nation of those mighty agencies of Satan sufficient to overthrow any man. Only t grace of God can deliver a man so situated. T fascinations of sinful pleasures and sinful ass ciations are only seen in their true colors whe the light of Divine truth is cast upon them a the Holy Spirit opens the eyes.

Dr. H. H. Jessup, the Eminent Missionary Syria, expresses his regret, in a recent letter the New York Observer, that the Sultan Turkey has removed Midhat Pasha from the go ernorship of Syria. He states that Midhat bu roads, encouraged education, and general governed the country with a view to the pro ress and welfare of the people. His succes is a man of widely different views, and belon to the old school of Turkish politics, which of a conservative character. Midhat was su denly removed, the alleged cause being his pop larity with the people, and a suspicion that was plotting to separate Syria from the Turk Empire. There appears from Dr. Jessup's o servations to have been good cause to susp Midhat of such designs, and it is probable t had he remained at his post much longer, a volt would have taken place. Students of pro ecy believe that the separation of Syria fr Turkey will certainly be effected within the n few years.

The Second Volume of The Christian Hera comprising Nos. 37 to 62 (July to Dec., 1879), may procured, elegantly bound in cloth, at this off Price $1.75.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchm (London) for October may be obtained at the o of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Price six cents.

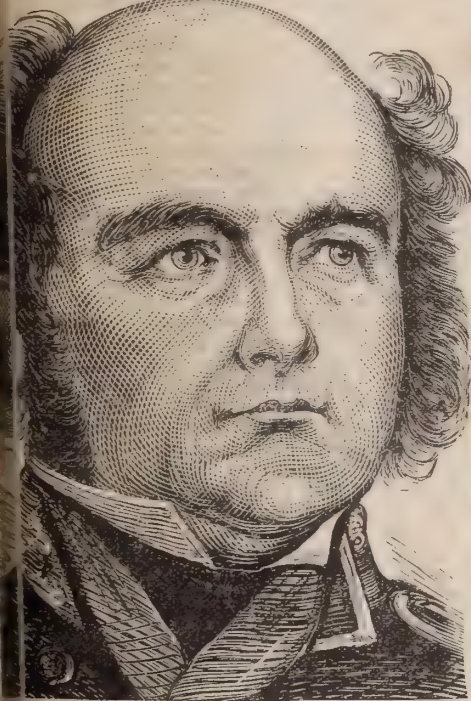
The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Works are on s at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at prices low as to bring them within the reach of every Twelve Sermons on various subjects, with photogr of Mr. Spurgeon, price 35 cents. John Ploughma Talk, in paper cover, 40 cents; in cloth, 60 ce The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, a volume of sermons, $2.50. The Treasury of David, a homil cal exposition of the book of Psalms, five vols., as as Psa. 118, $3 per vol. Spurgeon Birth-Day B This popular gift-book contains a suitable pass selected from Mr. Spurgeon's writings for every in the year, with a blank space opposite for a graphs. The signatures of Mr. and Mrs. Spurg appear at their respective birthdays. The boo elegantly bound, and the price is 75 cents. Re tances should accompany orders.

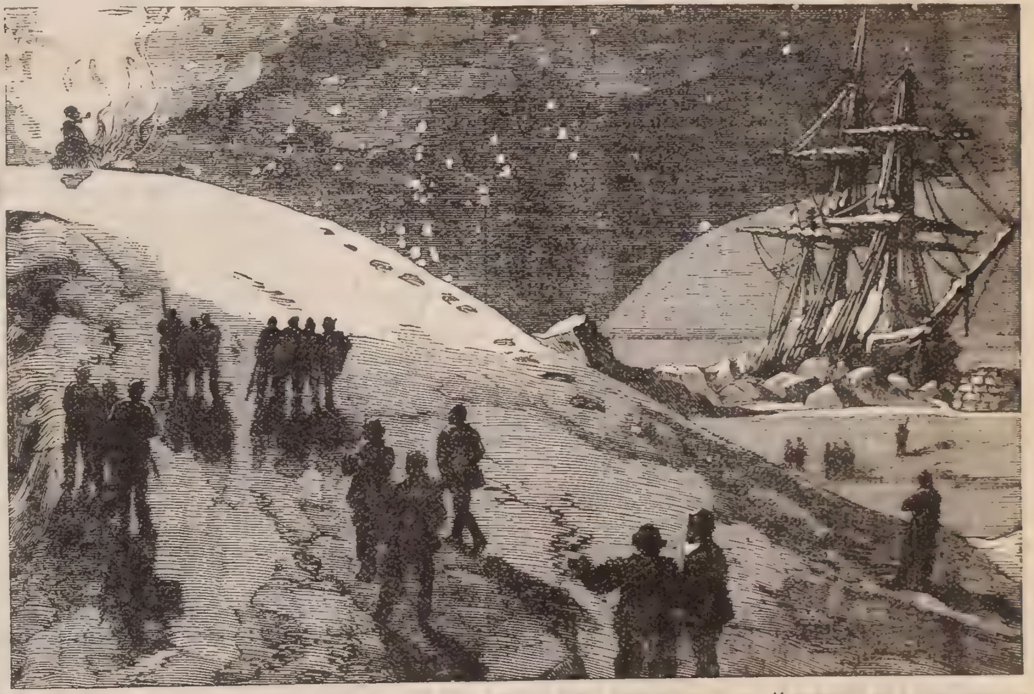
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1880. 14th Year. No. 46—New Series.

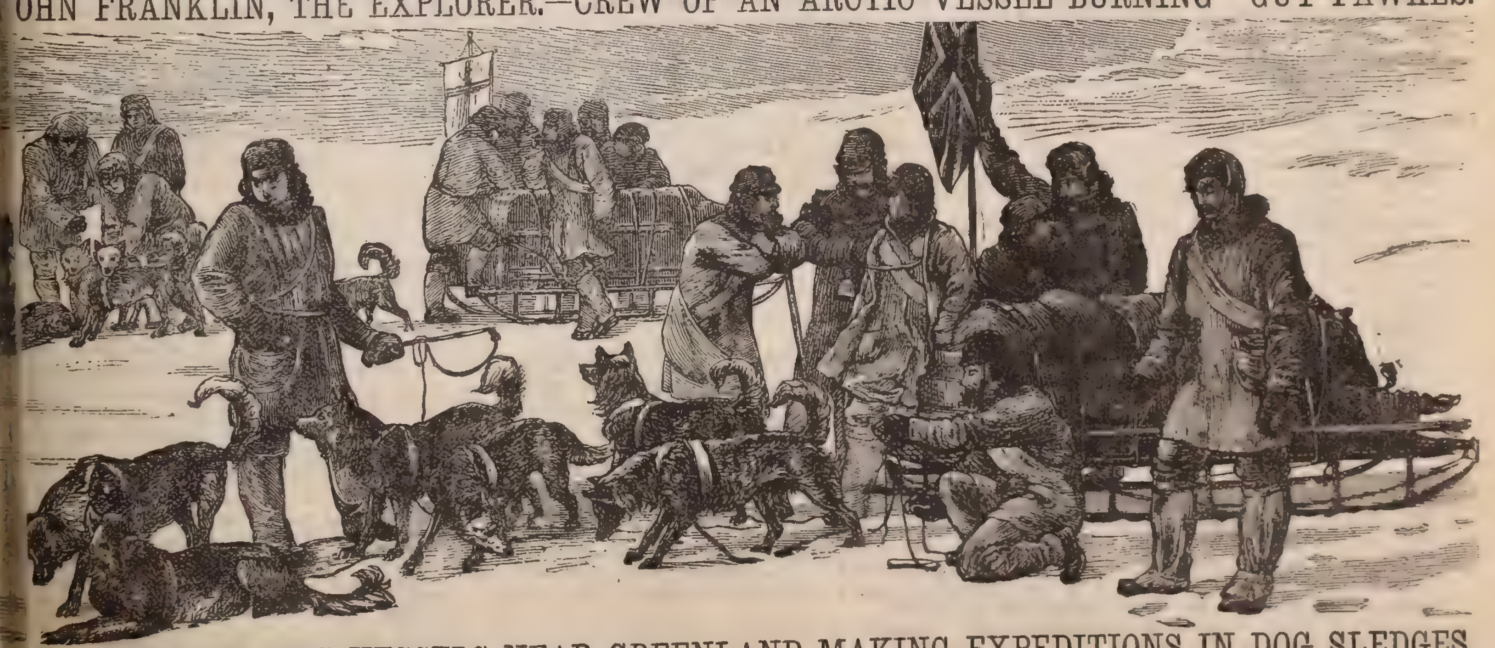
CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

ORTRAIT AND LIFE OF SIR JOHN FRANKLIN, with an Account of His Voyages and of the Recent Search Expedition under Lieut. Schwatka.
HE MURDER OF THE INNOCENTS. A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
OCHESTER TOWER. A New Serial Story by Miss M. A. Paull (Continued).
DR. TALMAGE'S FRIDAY EVENING TALK.
CURRENT EVENTS: The Lessons of the Presidential Contest—The Wreck of the Rhode Island—A Dethroned Queen of Vice—The Curiosities of the Dead-Letter Office—Destruction Worked by a Grain of Sand—The End of an Elopement, etc.
THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY. By P. W. E
TALES OF THE GROG-SHOPS—The Two Watchers.
THE DUTY OF THE PRESENT HOUR. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
A CHOICE VINDICATED (Continued).
Joseph and His Brethren. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M Baxter—Sir John Franklin's Piety.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The Turkish Problem — The Irish Agitation—The French Government Closing the Monasteries—The British and the Basutoes, etc





OHN FRANKLIN, THE EXPLORER.—CREW OF AN ARCTIC VESSEL BURNING "GUY FAWKES."



HI CREWS OF ARCTIC VESSELS NEAR GREENLAND MAKING EXPEDITIONS IN DOG SLEDGES.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.

The Problem of His Fate Solved by an American—Sir John's Family and Early Life—His First Arctic Expedition in 1818—His Second in 1819—Extraordinary Hardships and Starvations—Old Shoes and Skins for Food—Third Expedition in 1825—His Fourth Expedition in 1845—The Erebus and Terror—Total Disappearance of all on Board -Subsequent Discovery of some of Their Bones—And of the Fact that Franklin Died on June 11th, 1847—Subsequent Expeditions—Lieutenant Schwatka's Discoveries.

AMERICAN enterprise perseverance, and intrepid daring has in the person of Lieutenant Schwatka added another triumph to the magnificent record which makes the name of an American citizen honored throughout the world.

Lieutenant Schwatka has solved a problem which for more than thirty years has disturbed the minds of the intelligent and sympathetic public in the old world. On May 19, 1845, a brave British sailor sailed from England for the North on a voyage of discovery, and never returned. What became of the intrepid man and the gallant crews under his command was a question in which every one took an interest, and to which the personal friends of the explorers were drawn by deep concern. Several expeditions were sent from England to search for the party, but it was reserved for a citizen of the nation which furnished the discoverer of Livingstone to learn all that could be learned of Sir John Franklin and to penetrate farther north than any previous explorer. American citizens will be proud to know that the flag that waves nearest to the pole—one hundred and fifty miles beyond the flag of any other civilized nation—is the Stars and Stripes, which Lieutenant Schwatka appropriately unfurled on July 4, 1879.

Lieutenant Schwatka has returned bringing melancholy intelligence of the English explorer's fate, but it is satisfactory to know the truth, whatever it may be, for the agony of suspense produced by the darkness of ignorance was less tolerable than knowledge, however painful. The mystery that baffled the exertions of the English searches has now been explained by the brave American explorer, and it is possible, in the light thus afforded, to see how those gallant men toiled and suffered and died. Sir John Franklin's name is thus again brought prominently before the public, and is the topic of general conversation. But thirty-five busy years have passed since he sailed, and it is possible that the readers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD have but a vague knowledge of the circumstances under which the Franklin expedition set out, and of the history of the remarkable man who commanded it. We therefore to-day give the portrait of the explorer, and an account of the leading features of his career.

Sir John Franklin was born in 1786, in Lincolnshire, England. He was the youngest of the four sons of an eminent banker at Spilsby. Very early in life he evinced a great predilection for a sea life. When a boy of twelve years of age he is stated to have availed himself of a holiday to walk to the coast, a distance of eleven miles, for no other purpose than to see the ocean, upon which he gazed with wonder and delight for many hours. On his return home he urged his father to permit him to become a sailor, but for some time without success. At length, perceiving that the boy was bent upon a career on the sea, he yielded so far as to allow him to make a voyage to Lisbon in a small merchant ship, with the hope that the discomforts of the voyage would cure the lad of his inclination to a sailor's life.

John Franklin's first voyage only added to the keenness of his zest for a maritime career. He returned to England with a confirmed taste for the naval profession, and was shortly afterward entered as midshipman on board the Polyphemus, under Captain Lawford. This was in 1800, when Franklin was in his fourteenth year. In March, 1801, his ship took an active part as one of Nelson's fleet in the memorable battle of Copenhagen. Franklin escaped without a wound, while a brother midshipman was killed at his side. A few months after the date of this engagement Franklin joined a relative, Captain Matthew Flinders, then in command of the Investigator discovery ship, and about to proceed to the survey of the Australian Coast. During the voyage Franklin and his companions suffered shipwreck, and spent nearly two months on a narrow sand-bank only a few feet above the sea level, while Captain Flinders in a small open boat proceeded to Port Jackson, a distance of seven hundred and fifty miles, in search of relief, and returned to rescue them. Subsequently Franklin obtained a passage to China, and thence sailed in the Earl Camden for England. His ship was one of a fleet of Indiamen carrying a rich cargo. They were attacked by the French Admiral, Linois, in the Straits of Malacca. After a sharp engagement, in which young Franklin performed his part, the French were defeated and put to flight.

On his arrival in England Franklin was appointed to the Bellerophon, in which he fought under Admiral Nelson at the ever-memorable battle of Trafalgar, in 1805. He was in the hottest of the engagement, as signal midshipman, but escaped without a wound. For his distinguished conduct on these ocasions he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant. Henceforward he devoted his great abilities mainly to those scientific pursuits and Arctic discoveries with which his name has been since identified.

The belief that there was an open watercourse in the northwest through which it was possible for ships to pass between England and India was first mooted in 1498 by John Cabot, and since that time, at long intervals, efforts have been made to find it. Franklin was fired with this ambition, and took part in

THE FIRST ARCTIC EXPEDITION

of this century, which was despatched in 1818. The discovery brigs, Dorothea and Trent, sailed from England on April 25th, under the command of Captain Buchan and Lieutenant John Franklin. Toward the close of the same year both vessels returned severely injured by collisions with the ice, the former so fearfully shattered as to be no longer seaworthy. Franklin had entreated to be allowed to continue the voyage alone, but the instructions given to Captain Buchan, the senior in command, would not admit of such a course ; hence the return of the two ships.

THE SECOND EXPEDITION.

In the following year Lieutenant Franklin was entrusted with the command of a second expedition to the coasts of Arctic America. The expedition embarked at Gravesend, on the 23d of May, 1819, on board the Hudson's Bay Company's ship, Prince of Wales. On the 25th of July they entered Davis's Straits, and on the 7th of August they had an earnest of those perils which thickened around them, and almost overwhelmed them at a later period. Their ship struck violently on a point of rock projecting from the Island of Resolution. A gentle swell freed them from their perilous situation, but the current hurried them along in contact with the rocky shore, and the prospect was most alarming. After a three days' contest between the pumps and the leaks the ship was happily preserved.

There is no part of the proceedings and adventures of this expedition that is not deeply interesting. Their visits to the forts of the Hudson's Bay Company, their river and lake voyagings, their notices of the Esquimaux and Indian tribes, their observations in science and natural history—all constitute a most entrancing narrative of which Sir John Franklin published an interesting account in two volumes. He relates how at last they were obliged to abandon the Prince of Wales in August, 1821, and travel on foot over the ice to the nearest Indian settlement.

The morning of their final departure on their way to Point Lake, which was distant in a straight line one hundred and forty-nine mil was warm and fine. Their luggage consisted ammunition, nets, hatchets, ice chisels, ast nomical instruments, clothing, blankets, th kettles, and two canoes, which were each carr by one man. The weight borne by each in vidual, officers included, was about nin pounds, and with this they advanced abou mile an hour, including rests. Their daily tra for some time was about five, eight, or ten mil

On the 6th of September their tents w completely frozen, and the snow had collec around them to a depth of three feet, and ev in the inside there was a covering of it to extent of several inches on their blank Their suffering from cold in a comfortless t in such weather will easily be imagined ; it w however, less than their suffering from hung for their provisions had now nearly failed. next day, fearing that winter had set in with its rigor, and that by longer delay they sho only be exposed to an accumulation of diffi ties, they started, although in a very unfit c dition, being weak with fasting, and their g ments stiffened with frost.

HARDSHIPS AND STARVATION.

Just as they were about to commence th march Captain Franklin was seized with a fai ing fit in consequence of exhaustion and sud exposure to the wind ; but after eating a mo of portable soup he recovered so far as to be to move on. The ground was covered a f deep with snow, the margin of the lake encrusted with ice, and the swamps over wh they had to pass were entirely frozen, but ice not being sufficiently strong to bear th they frequently plunged knee-deep in wa Those who carried the canoes were often bl down by the violence of the wind, and at ot times fell from making an insecure step o slippery stone. On one of these occasions larger canoe was so much broken as to be dered utterly unserviceable.

A fortnight later their sufferings extreme. They picked up some pieces of and a few bones of deer that had been devo by wolves the preceding spring. The b were rendered friable by burning, and eaten well as the skin, and several of the party ad their old shoes to the repast. On the 22 September the second canoe was hopele broken, and the men lost all hope of being served.

HAIR-BREADTH ESCAPES.

The journal which Sir J. Franklin kep this expedition overflows with incidents of and trial. One day a hunter brought in antlers and backbone of a deer which had killed in summer. The wolves and birds prey had picked them clean, but there still mained a quantity of spinal marrow which had not been able to extract. This, altho putrid, was esteemed a valuable prize, and spine being divided into portions, was distrib equally. After eating the marrow, which so acrid as to excoriate their lips, they bur and ate the bones also.

After this, one and another began to fail fall behind, finding it impossible, from shee haustion to proceed. As a last resource, Cap Franklin was induced to push forward wi few of the strongest of the men, in hope sending relief from Fort Enterprise to th that were left behind. In a few days the tain, with four men, accomplished this jour but to their great disappointment found Enterprise desolate. There was no deposi provisions, "no trace of the Indians, no lette indicate where the Indians might be foun "It would be impossible for me," says Si Franklin, "to describe our sensations entering this miserable abode and discove how we had been neglected. The whole p shed tears, not so much for our own fate a that of our friends in the rear, whose depended entirely on our sending relief from place."

THEIR SUFFERINGS FROM HUNGER AND C in Fort Enterprise were terrible. Two of party died, and their companions had not strength to bury them. In the course of two weeks they were joined by Dr. Richardson and a heroic man named Hepburn, whom they had left behind. These returned with the sad intelligence that four of their detachment had perished.

On the 7th of November the whole party obtained deliverance by the hands of three Indians, who were sent to their relief by Mr. Back, who had travelled ahead to search for assistance, and had experienced hair-breadth escapes. Their life had been hitherto sustained at this place by the bones and skins which they dug from beneath the snow, and they procured fire only by tearing up and consuming the floors of their dwelling. And had relief been delayed but a few days longer, Franklin believed they must all have perished.

From this time mind and body, which had become alike enfeebled, gradually regained strength. The Indians fed them as if they had been children, and treated them with the utmost tenderness and consideration. On the 26th of November they were able to remove to an Indian encampment, and on the 11th of December they arrived at Fort Providence, and were sheltered in comfort and safety for five months, till the advanced spring allowed them to resume their homeward journey.

During Franklin's absence on his second Arctic voyage he was promoted to the rank of Commander, and on his return to that of Captain. In 1823 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, and served on its council. In the same year he married his first wife, Eleanor Porden.

HIS THIRD ARCTIC EXPEDITION IN 1825.

In 1825 he left England again on a land and boat exploration. On his return home, in 1826, Franklin's fresh services gained him the honor of knighthood, the degree of D.C.L. from the University of Oxford, and the gold medal of the French Geographical Society. Sir John Franklin now rested on his honors for a period of about two years, during which he united himself in marriage to Jane Griffin, the lady whose noble devotion in tracing the career and fate of her intrepid husband has since shed so bright a ustre upon her sex.

HIS FOURTH EXPEDITION IN 1845.

In 1845, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, Sir ohn Franklin undertook the command of the xpedition in search of the Northwest Passage, etermined upon by the admiralty, upon the uggestion of the late Sir John Barrow.

The Erebus and Terror sailed from Greenhi- he on the 19th of May, each ship having on oard sixty-nine officers and men, with three ears' provisions. They sailed amid the cheers f the onlookers, and with the "Godspeed" of he whole British nation, and every man on oard those gallant vessels had dreams of high nd noble enterprise. In this spirit they went rth to the icy North, and never came back.

Just as the blood of the martyrs is the seed of e church, so the fate of Sir John Franklin and s company operated as nothing else could, to lve the problem which exacted their lives. etween January, 1848, when Captain Moore iled in the Plover for Behring's Straits, and ay, 1859, when Lieutenant Hobson found the ics of the expedition at Point Victory, no ver than twenty-one distinct expeditions were ade to discover what had become of the missg voyagers.

SCOVERY IN 1859 THAT FRANKLIN AND BOTH HIS CREWS HAD PERISHED.

Expedition after expedition having failed, the blic resigned itself to the belief that the galt band had perished, and that their fate uld never be known; not so Lady Franklin. is devoted woman was determined not to rest il, if possible, something decisive had been ertained respecting her long-lost husband and companions. Accordingly, in 1857, her yship, chiefly at her own expense, fitted and patched the yacht Fox on a final search, under command of Captain (now Sir F. L.) McClink, R.N. The Fox and her gallant crew sailed from Aberdeen on the 1st of July, 1857. Of the various episodes and adventures of this journey we have no space to write. On the 22d of September, 1859, McClintock returned to England with tidings that went home to every heart and relieved a long pent-up anxiety. They had discovered documents, relics, and other conclusive evidence as to the fate of Sir John. In his despatch to the admiralty, Captain McClintock wrote: ". . . At Point Victory, upon the northwest coast of King William's Island, a record has been found, dated 25th of April, 1848, and signed by Captains Crozier and Fitzjames. By it we were informed that her Majesty's ships Erebus and Terror were abandoned on the 22d of April, 1848, in the ice, and that the survivors, in all amounting to 105, under the command of Captain Crozier, were proceeding to the Great Fish River. Sir John Franklin had died on the 11th of June, 1847."

THE AMERICAN EXPEDITION.

On June 19, 1878, the expedition under the command of Lieutenant Schwatka sailed from New York to prosecute the search for Franklin relics, and especially for any records of discovery that might have been buried by the unhappy party. Reports had been brought that a spoon which bore Franklin's initials had been seen in the possession of the natives, with some other articles, and this fact led to the hope that a diligent search might result in the discovery of the information so anxiously desired.

Arrived at Hudson's Bay, they decided on proceeding to King William Land, where the Franklin relics were reported to be. But the story was even then found to be wholly without foundation; but Lieutenant Schwatka resolved instead of returning to New York to make a thorough search of the country. Accordingly, on April 1, 1879, he and his party started on the longest on record. The expedition was in all respects an extraordinary one, and we give the history of it in Lieutenant Schwatka's own words as narrated by him before the Geographical Society at Chickering Hall, New York, on October 28th last.

SLEIGH EXPEDITION

"My party consisted of four white men, four Esquimau families, consisting of thirteen persons, all dog drivers, hunters, etc. We had three sleds, carrying about one thousand pounds each, and forty-four dogs. The sleds carried about one month's provisions for the party and two weeks' food for the dogs. The route was to be directly across land, in a northwest direction, to the nearest available point on Back's River, thence to King William's Land. Our greatest obstacle was the well known tempestuous weather of the Arctic. We had an almost uninterrupted storm from the 20th of April to the 1st of June—forty-three days. We came upon a small village of about thirty souls, only two of whom had ever before seen any white man. One of these, a very intelligent looking man, aged about fifty-five or sixty years, gave us much interesting information of a lost ship that he had personally visited some thirty years before, eight miles due west of Grand Point. This is evidently one of Sir John Franklin's ships that floated down Victoria Channel after its abandonment.

"He remembers Lieutenant Back's exploration in 1834, and recounted minutely his meeting with that explorer at the Dangerous Rapids. He says that the next white man that he saw was a dead one, in a large ship some thirty years ago. The body was in a bunk in the after part of the ship. On the mainland, near Grant and Smith points, he saw the tracks of white men, and judged they were hunting for deer. The first time he saw the tracks of four and afterward the tracks of three men. He never saw the white men, but thinks that they lived in the ship until fall and then moved on the mainland. The natives did not understand how to enter the vessel, so they cut through one side, and when the ice melted in the summer she sank as the water poured in. After sinking, her masts stuck out of the water, and they collected many things which floated ashore. Shortly after the ship sank they found another small boat in Wilmot Bay. No monuments erected by the white men were ever found.

"On the 31st of May we encountered a large village, containing about one hundred persons. From them we had obtained some very important information, which, coupled with other testimony obtained elsewhere, shows beyond all reasonable doubt the complete destruction of the more important records of Sir John Franklin's expedition at a point (which I called Starvation Cove) three miles northwest from this village. The spot was then visited. At Starvation Cove the natives found a small boat on its keel, and in it some skeletons, while outside were a few scattered around. All of the natives I interviewed and who had been eye-witnesses of the sad scene place the number at from six to ten.

"The most important information connected with this boat place, which is evidently the farthest reached by any body of Franklin's men in 1848, is that concerning a sealed tin box, about two feet long and about one foot square on the ends, which was broken open by the natives and found to contain books, and a small piece of iron to which all pieces of the same material would adhere when brought in contact. This tin box was retained by the natives and its contents emptied on the ground, where they slowly perished. Some few of them were given to their children for playthings. That men thus placed should have burdened themselves with such a quantity of books, and the careful manner of their preservation, shows an importance which can only be attributed to the records of the expedition. I think it not improbable that the magnetized iron spoken of by these people from its description, was the dip-needle with which the north magnetic pole had been redetermined. This instrument would be a valuable historical relic.

"The party remained on King William's Land from June 10th to November 8th, engaged in a thorough search of that island and its adjacent mainland. It may be interesting to note that the civilized food of the party was exhausted June 24th. After this date, and until March 20, 1880, the white men subsisted the same as their native allies, principally upon the flesh of the reindeer, 511 of which were killed by the party on the expedition. The snow had sufficiently disappeared by the 4th day of July to commence the search, and at this date we were at Cape Felix, King William's Land, near which the Erebus and Terror had been beset in September, 1846. From Cape Felix to Collinson Inlet, only from fifteen to twenty-five miles of coast line, we were engaged in searching from June 27th to July 14th, traversing 278 miles, the search being thorough and extending a number of miles inland.

"This strip of coast was important, as being the nearest land to the imprisoned ships during the two years previous to their abandonment. A number of here found was large and interesting. In a grave between Victory Point and Cape Jane Franklin was found a silver medal awarded by the Royal Naval College to John Irving in midsummer of 1830, as second mathematical prize. This, with corroborative evidence, showed the grave to be that of Lieutenant Irving, the third lieutenant of His Majesty's ship Terror, Sir John Franklin's second ship.

RELICS

"Returning southward, a skeleton was found and interred near Franklin Point, and another, which, from the fine quality of clothing, linen, buttons, etc., I infer to be an officer, was reinterred in a desecrated grave on Point Le Vesconte. A skull was found about five hundred yards from a despoiled grave on Payer Point, in the latter there being found only a belt buckle and a musket cap. In South Erebus Bay the boat place was encountered. Here some four or more skeletons were properly buried, and a few interesting relics gathered. Near here the ice broke up with us July 24th, rendering further sledging impracticable, and we were occupied until August 6th in crossing our effects from Erebus to Terror Bay, a very slow and laborious undertaking.

"The expedition achieved the longest sledge journey ever made, both in regard to time and distance, having been absent from its base eleven months and twenty days, and having traversed 3251 statute miles. It is the first Arctic expedition whose sole reliance for the subsistence of itself and draught animals has been premeditatedly placed in the game of the locality. It was the first expedition wherein the white men of a party lived solely upon the same diet, voluntarily assumed, as its native allies. From the thoroughness of the search and the conspicuous contrast of bleaching bones with the brown clay-stones composing the flat coasts of King William's Land and adjoining mainland, I do not hesitate to state that not a single unburied man of Sir John Franklin's expedition probably exists. Where nature had not anticipated my party, or the retreating crews themselves performed the burial, we completed these sad offices."

THE MURDER OF THE INNOCENTS.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, November 7, 1880.

"My father, if thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, do to me according to that which hath proceeded out of thy mouth."—JUDGES 11 : 36.

Jephthah's Battle and Victory — His Vow — A Daughter of Sacrifice—Two Wrong Things in Jephthah's Proceeding—The Sacrifice a Type—I. Our System of Education a System of Sacrifice—Politics the Curse of Our School System — The Fatal Cramming Craze — Instances of Children Sacrificed before the Idol of Cram—Wanted, an Advocate of Children's Rights — II. Wrong Systems of Discipline — Children Trained to be Miscreants—There must be Harmony between the Paternal and Maternal Authorities—Errors of Each—III. A Spirit of Worldliness — A Mother's Secret — The New Mode of Reducing Eternal Truths to Vulgar Fractions — Unions that are Massacres not Marriages — Neglected Children — Boys in the French Revolution—A Choice for Parents.

JEPHTHAH was a freebooter. Early turned out from a home where he ought to have been cared for, he consorted with rough men, and went forth to earn his living as best he could. In those times it was considered right for a man to go out on independent military expeditions. Jephthah was a good man according to the light of his dark age, but through a wandering and a predatory life he became reckless and precipitate. The grace of God changes a man's heart, but never reverses his natural temperament.

The Israelites wanted the Ammonites driven out of their country, so they sent a delegation to Jephthah, asking him to become commander-in-chief of all the forces. He might have said, "You drove me out when you had no use for me, and now you are in trouble you want me back;" but he did not say that. He takes command of the army, sends messengers to the Ammonites to tell them to vacate the country, and, getting no favorable response, marshals his troops for battle.

Before going out to the war Jephthah makes a very solemn vow, that if the Lord will give him the victory, then, on his return home, whatsoever first comes out of his doorway he will offer in sacrifice as a burnt-offering. The battle opens. It was no skirmishing on the edges of danger, no unlimbering of batteries two miles away, but the hurling of men on the point of swords and spears until the ground could no more drink the blood, and the horses reared to leap over the pile of bodies of the slain. In those old times, opposing forces would fight until their swords were broken, and then each one would throttle his man until they both fell, teeth to teeth, grip to grip, death-stare to death stare, until the plain was one tumbled mass of corpses from which the last trace of manhood had been dashed out.

Jephthah wins the day. Twenty cities lay captured at his feet. Sound the victory all through the mountains of Gilead. Let the trumpeters call up the survivors. Homeward to your wives and children. Homeward with your glittering treasures. Homeward to have the applause of an admiring nation. Build triumphal arches. Swing out flags all over Mizpeh. Open all your doors to receive the captured treasures. Through every hall spread the banquet. Pile up the viands. Fill high the tankards. The nation is redeemed, the invaders are routed, and the national honor is vindicated.

Huzza for Jephthah, the conqueror! Jephthah, seated on a prancing steed, advances amid the acclaiming multitudes, but his eye is not on the excited populace. Remembering that he had made a solemn vow that, returning from victorious battle, whatsoever first came out of the doorway of his home, that should be sacrificed as a burnt-offering, he has his anxious look upon the door. I wonder what spotless lamb, what brace of doves will be thrown upon the fires of the burnt-offering.

OH, HORRORS!

Paleness of death blanches his cheek. Despair seizes his heart. His daughter, his only child, rushes out the doorway to throw herself in her father's arms and shower upon him more kisses than there were wounds on his breast or dents on his shield. All the triumphal splendor vanishes. Holding back this child from his heaving breast, and pushing the locks back from the fair brow, and looking into the eyes of inextinguishable affection, with choked utterance he says, "Would God I lay stark on the bloody plain. My daughter, my only child, joy of my home, life of my life, thou art the sacrifice!"

The whole matter was explained to her. This was no whining, hollow-hearted girl into whose eyes the father looked. All the glory of sword and shield vanished in the presence of the valor of that girl. There may have been a tremor of the lip, as a rose-leaf trembles in the sough of the south wind; there may have been the starting of a tear like a rain-drop shook from the anther of a water-lily; but with a self-sacrifice that man may not reach, and only woman's heart can compass, she surrenders herself to fire and to death. She cries out in the words of my text, "My father, if thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, do unto me whatsoever hath proceeded from thy mouth."

She bows to the knife, and the blood, which so often at the father's voice had rushed to the crimson cheek, smokes in the fires of the burnt-offering. No one can tell us her name. There is no need that we know her name. The garlands that Mizpeh twisted for Jephthah the warrior have gone into the dust; but all ages are twisting this girl's chaplet. It is well that her name came not to us, for no one can wear it. They may take the name of Deborah, or Abigail, or Miriam, but no one in all the ages shall have the title of this daughter of sacrifice.

Of course this offering was not pleasing to the Lord; but before you hurl your denunciations at Jephthah's cruelty, remember that in olden times, when vows were made, men thought they must execute them, perform them, whether they were wicked or good. There were two wrong things about Jephthah's vow. First, he ought never to have made it. Next, having made it, it were better broken than kept. But do not take on pretentious airs and say, "I could not have done as Jephthah did." If to-day you were standing on the banks of the Ganges, and you had been born in India, you might have been throwing your children to the crocodiles. It is not because we are naturally any better, but because we have more Gospel light.

Now I make very practical use of this question when I tell you that the sacrifice of Jephthah's daughter was a type of the physical, mental, and spiritual sacrifice of ten thousand children in this day. There are parents all unwittingly bringing to bear upon their children a class of influences which will as certainly ruin them as knife and torch destroyed Jephthah's daughter. While I speak, the whole nation, without emotion and without shame, looks upon the stupendous sacrifice.

I. In the first place, I remark that much of THE SYSTEM OF EDUCATION in our day is a system of sacrifice. When children spend six or seven hours in school, and then must spend two or three hours in preparation for school the next day, will you tell me how much time they will have for sunshine and fresh air, and the obtaining of that exuberance which is necessary for the duties of coming life?

No one can feel more thankful than I do for the advancement of common-school education. The printing of books appropriate for schools, the multiplication of philosophical apparatus, the establishment of normal schools, which provide for our children teachers of largest calibre, are themes on which every philanthropist ought to be congratulated. But this herding of great multitudes of children in ill-ventilated school-rooms, and poorly equipped halls of instruction is making many of the places of knowledge in this country a huge holocaust.

Politics in many of the cities gets into educational affairs, and while the two political parties are scrabbling for the honors, Jephthahs' daughter perishes. It is so much so that there are many schools in the country to-day which are preparing tens of thousands of invalid men and women for the future; so that, in many places, by the time the child's education is finished the child is finished! In many places, in many cities of the country, there are large appropriations for everything else, and cheerful appropriations; but as soon as the appropriation is to be made for the educational or moral interest of the city, we are struck through with an economy that is well nigh the death of us.

In connection with this I mention what I might call the cramming system of the common schools and many of the academies: children of delicate brain compelled to tasks that might appal a mature intellect; children going down to school with a strap of books half as high as themselves. The fact is, in some of the cities parents do not allow their children to graduate, for the simple reason, they say, "We cannot afford to allow our children's health to be destroyed in order that they may gather the honors of an institution." Tens of thousands of children educated into imbecility; so, connected with many such literary establishments there ought to be asylums for the wrecked.

It is push, and crowd, and cram, and stuff, and jam, until the child's intellect is bewildered and the memory is wrecked, and the health i gone. There are children turned out from th schools who once were full of romping and laughter, and had cheeks crimson with health, who ar now turned out in the afternoon pale-faced, irri tated, asthmatic, old before their time. It i ONE OF THE SADDEST SIGHTS ON EARTH an old-mannish boy, or an old-womanish girl.

Girls ten years of age studying algebra! Boy twelve years of age racking their brain over trig onometry! Children unacquainted with the mother tongue crying over their Latin, Frenc and German lessons! All the vivacity of the nature beaten out of them by the heavy beetle a Greek lexicon! And you doctor them for thi and you give them a little medicine for that, an you wonder what is the matter of them. I wi tell you what is the matter of them. They a finishing their education!

In my parish in Philadelphia a little child w so pushed at school that she was thrown into fever, and in her dying delirium, all night lon she was trying to recite the multiplication-tabl In my boyhood I remember that in our class school there was one lad who knew more th all of us put together. If we were fast in o arithmetic, he extricated us. When we stood for the spelling-class, he was almost always head of the class. Visitors came to his fathe house, and he was always brought in as prodigy. At eighteen years of age he was idiot. He lived ten years an idiot, and died idiot, not knowing his right hand from his le or day from night. The parents and the tea ers made him an idiot.

You may flatter your pride by forcing your c dren to know more than any other children, you are making a sacrifice of that child, if by additions to its intelligence you are makin subtraction from its future. The child will away from such maltreatment with no exu ance to fight the battle of life. Such child may get along very well while you take care them, but when you are old or dead, alas! them, if, through the long system of educat which you adopted, they have no swarthines force of character to take care of themsel Be careful how you make the child's head a or its heart flutter. I hear a great deal ab black men's rights, and Chinamen's rights, Indians' rights, and woman's rights. W God that somebody would rise to plead for c dren's rights.

The Carthaginians used to sacrifice their c dren by putting them into the arms of an which thrust forth its hand. The child was into the arms of the idol, and no sooner touc the arms than it dropped into the fire. But it was the art of the mothers to keep the children smiling and laughing until the moment they died. There may be a fascination and a bilarity about the styles of education of which I am speaking; but it is only laughter at the moment of sacrifice. Would God there were only one Jephthah's daughter.

II. Again: there are many parents who are sacrificing their children with

WRONG SYSTEMS OF DISCIPLINE

—too great rigor or too great leniency. There are children in families who rule the household. They come to the authority. The high chair in which the infant sits is the throne, and the rattle is the sceptre, and the other children make up the parliament where father and mother have no vote! Such children come up to be miscreants.

There is no chance in this world for a child that has never learned to mind. Such people become the botheration of the Church of God and the pest of the world. Children that do not learn to obey human authority are unwilling to learn to obey divine authority. Children will not respect parents whose authority they do not respect. Who are these young men that swagger through the street, with their thumbs in their vest, talking about their father as "the old man," "the governor," "the squire," "the old chap," or their mother as "the old woman?" They are those who in youth, in childhood never learned to respect authority.

Eli having heard that his sons had died in their wickedness, fell over backward, and broke his neck, and died. Well he might. What is life to a father whose sons are debauched? The dust of the valley is pleasant to his taste, and the driving rains that drip through the roof of the sepulchre are sweeter than the wines of Helbon.

There must be harmony between the father's government and the mother's government. The father will be tempted to too great rigor. The mother will be tempted to too great leniency. Her tenderness will overcome her. Her voice is a little softer, her hand seems better fit to pull out a thorn and soothe a pang. Children wanting anything from the mother, cry for it. They hope to dissolve her will with tears. But the mother must not interfere, must not coax off, must not beg for the child when the hour comes for the assertion of parental supremacy and the subjugation of a child's temper.

There comes in the history of every child an hour when it is tested whether the parents shall rule or the child shall rule. That is the crucial hour. If the child triumphs in that hour, then he will some day make you crouch. It is a horrible scene. I have witnessed it: a mother come to old age, shivering with terror in the presence of a son who cursed her gray hairs, and mocked her wrinkled face, and begrudged her the crust she munched with her toothless gums!

> "How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is,
> To have a thankless child."

But, on the other hand, too great rigor must be avoided. It is a sad thing when domestic government becomes cold military despotism. Trappers on the prairie fight fire with fire, but you cannot successfully fight your child's bad temper with your own bad temper. We must not be too minute in our inspection. We cannot expect our children to be perfect. We must not see everything. Since we have two or three faults of our own, we ought not to be too rough when we discover that our children have as many. If tradition be true, when we were children we were not all little Samuels, and our parents were not fearful lest they could not raise us because of our premature goodness.

You cannot scold or pound your children into nobility of character. The bloom of a child's heart can never be seen under a cold drizzle. Above all, avoid fretting and scolding in the household. Better than ten years of fretting at your children is one good, round, old-fashioned application of the slipper! That minister of the Gospel of whom we read in the newspapers that he whipped his child to death because he would not say his prayers, will never come to canonization. The arithmetics cannot calculate how many thousands of children have been ruined forever either through too great rigor or too great leniency. The heavens and the earth are filled with the groan of the sacrificed. In this important matter, seek divine direction, O father, O mother.

Some one asked the mother of Lord Chief Justice Mansfield if she was not proud to have three such eminent sons, and all of them so good. "No," she said, "it is nothing to be proud of, but something for which to be very grateful."

III. Again: there are many who are sacrificing their children to

A SPIRIT OF WORLDLINESS.

Some one asked a mother whose children had turned out very well, what was the secret by which she prepared them for usefulness and for the Christian life, and she said, "This was the secret: When, in the morning, I washed my children, I prayed that they might be washed in the fountain of a Saviour's mercy. When I put on their garments, I prayed that they might be arrayed in the robe of a Saviour's righteousness. When I gave them food, I prayed that they might be fed with manna from heaven. When I started them on the road to school, I prayed that their path might be as the shining light, brighter and brighter to the perfect day. When I put them to sleep, I prayed that they might be enfolded in the Saviour's arms." "Oh," you say, "that was very old-fashioned. It was quite old-fashioned. But do you suppose that a child under such nurture as that ever turned out bad?

In our day most boys start out with no idea higher than the all-encompassing dollar. They start in an age which boasts it can scratch the Lord's Prayer on a ten-cent piece, and the Ten Commandments on a ten-cent piece. Children are taught to reduce morals and religion, time and eternity, to vulgar fractions. It seems to be their chief attainment that ten cents make a dime, and ten dimes make a dollar. How to get money is only equalled by the other art, how to keep it.

Tell me, ye who know, what chance there is for those who start out in life with such perverted sentiments? The money market resounds again and again with the downfall of such people. If I had a drop of blood on the tip of a pen, I would tell you by what awful tragedy many of the youth of this country are ruined.

Further on, thousands and tens of thousands of the daughters of America are sacrificed to worldliness. They are taught to be in sympathy with all the artificialities of society. They are inducted into all the hollowness of what is called fashionable life. They are taught to believe that history is dry, but that fifty-cent stories of adventurous love are delicious. With capacity that might have rivalled a Florence Nightingale in heavenly ministries, or made the father's house glad with filial and sisterly demeanor, their life is a waste, their beauty a curse, their eternity a demolition.

IN THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON,

during the late war, a lieutenant of the army stood on the floor beside the daughter of the ex-Governor of the State of South Carolina. They were taking the vows of marriage. A bombshell struck the roof, dropped into the group, and nine were wounded and slain; among the wounded to death the bride. While the bridegroom knelt on the carpet trying to stanch the wounds, the bride demanded that the ceremony be completed, that she might take the vows before her departure; and when the minister said, "Wilt thou be faithful unto death?" with her dying lips she said, "I will," and in two hours she had departed. That was the slaughter and the sacrifice of the body; but at thousands of marriage-altars there are daughters slain for time and slain for eternity. It is not a marriage: it is a massacre.

Affianced to some one who is only waiting until his father dies, so he can get the property; then a little while they swing around in the circles, brilliant circles; then the property is gone, and having no power to earn a livelihood, the twain sink into some corner of society, the husband an idler and a sot, the wife a drudge, a slave, and a sacrifice. Ah! spare your denunciations from Jephthah's head, and expend them all on this wholesale modern martyrdom.

I lift up my voice to-day against the sacrifice of children. I look out of my window on a Sabbath, and I see a group of children, unwashed, uncombed, unchristianized. Who cares for them? Who prays for them? Who utters to them one kind word?

When the city missionary, passing along the Park in New York, saw a ragged lad and heard him swearing, he said to him, "My son, stop swearing! You ought to go to the house of God to-day. You ought to be good; you ought to be a Christian." The lad looked in his face and said, "Ah! it is easy for you to talk, well clothed as you are, and well fed; but we chaps hain't got no chance."

Who lifts them to the altar for baptism? Who goes forth to snatch them up from crime and death and woe? Who to-day will go forth and bring them into schools and churches? No. Heap them up, great piles of rags and wretchedness and filth. Put underneath them the fires of sacrifice, stir up the blaze, put on more fagots, and while we sit in the churches with folded arms and indifferent, crime and disease and death will go on with the agonizing sacrifice.

During the early French Revolution at Bourges there was a company of boys who used to train every day as and they carried a flag, and they had on the flag this inscription: "Tremble tyrants, tremble; we are growing up." Mightily suggestive! This generation is passing off, and a mightier generation is coming on. Will they be the foes of tyranny, the foes of sin, and the foes of death, or will they be the foes of God? They are coming up!

YOUNG SOLDIERS;

I congratulate all parents who are doing their best to keep their children away from the altar of sacrifice. Your prayers are going to be answered. Your children may wander away from God, but they will come back again. A voice comes from the throne to-day, encouraging you: "I will be a God to thee, and to thy seed after thee." And though when you lay your head in death there may be some wanderer of the family far away from God, and you may be twenty years in heaven before salvation shall come to his heart, he will be brought into the kingdom, and before the throne of God you will rejoice that you were faithful. Come at last, though so long postponed his coming. Come at last!

I congratulate all those who are toiling for the outcast and the wandering. Your work will soon be over, but the influence you are setting in motion will never stop. Long after you have been garnered for the skies, your prayers, your teachings, and your Christian influence will go on, and help to people heaven with bright inhabitants.

Which would you rather see?—which scene would you rather mingle in, in the last great day—being able to say, "I added house to house, and land to land, and manufactory to manufactory; I owned half the city; whatever my eye saw I had, whatever I wanted I got"; or on that day to have Christ look you full in the face and say, "I was hungry, and ye fed me; I was naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick and in prison, and ye visited me; inasmuch as ye did it to the least of these my brethren, ye did it to me"?

Although the Sultan of Morocco has Signified his desire to treat his Hebrew and non-Mohammedan subjects more humanely than heretofore, letters from Fez and Tangiers report fresh outrages on the Jews. One man who had asked redress of the Sultan has been beaten severely, and another has received 500 lashes.

ROCHESTER TOWER.

By Miss M. A. Paull.

(Continued from page 710.)

Free Breakfasts—Salome Enlisted in Mission Work—Nondescript Guests—Salome Stanley's Singing.

FREE breakfasts are among those benevolent outcomes of Christian charity which are sorely needed in winter in great cities, all of which must certainly be reckoned with ragged schools, crêches, homes for the destitute, refuges, and other necessary correctives of our gigantic drinking system. Sober men and women inspired by the love of God cannot allow children to perish because their fathers and mothers waste their earnings in drink—cannot even allow the wretched beings, made so destitute by their own sins, to "faint by the way" for want of the commonest necessaries of life; so they stop a few hungry mouths with wholesome viands, and leave, alas! being powerless to prevent it, hundreds of famishing and hunger producers in full play, at every corner of every street, in the shape of gin-palaces and public-houses.

Until benevolence, with its genial face and open hand, fully recognizes the important fact that brewers, distillers, and publicans manufacture destitution infinitely faster than benevolence itself can mitigate it, things will probably go on, getting worse instead of better. But when benevolence turns most of her attention to stopping the manufacture and sale of drink, then there will be hope for old England.

Free breakfasts are also, however, in many cases, a most efficacious means of helping those in temporary unforeseen distress to recover their position; the words of kindness and sympathy extended to such sufferers at such times have often put them in heart again to make continued efforts to raise themselves; and many men and women have signed the pledge when warned and filled and comforted by Christian generosity, and determined by God's grace to lead a new and better life than hitherto.

The free breakfasts every Sunday morning in winter at the Albert Street Mission Hall had been established before Mr. Anerley's death; his children Cecil and Constance had been accustomed to help him there, standing together, when mere children, to hand the mugs of tea or coffee to the half-starved, broken-down creatures that passed in to be fed.

It was dreadful to behold some of these poor objects, neglected by themselves and others—sodden, debased, filthy—so filthy that it was even sometimes quite impossible to admit them for the sake of others; and then they were given a huge piece of bread by the porter at the door, and dismissed with the admonition, too seldom carried out, to get themselves clean.

Cecil had formerly often been anxious to induce Salome to take part in distributing the food, and saying a kind word to any one who especially seemed to need counsel or sympathy at these free breakfasts. He had believed that any such intercourse with sunken humanity would induce contentedness with, and thankfulness for, her own happier lot, and tend to raise the cloud that had settled upon her life. But since he had known more of her history he had ceased to press any of this kind of work upon her. He had felt very glad that she had become so regular a visitor at the crêche, and she had acknowledged to him that it had served to pass many otherwise weary hours. But after the receipt of Constance's letter and her own reply to it, she somewhat astonished Cecil by asking if she might go the next Sunday morning to the Albert Street Mission Hall, and help to give away the loaves and coffee.

"I told Miss Calvert," she said, "that I felt inclined to come, and she very kindly replied that I should be both welcome and useful."

"Most certainly you will be," Cecil answered, and they went off in the early morning together.

It was the first time they had ever walked thus since Salome Stanley had met the declaration of his love so unexpectedly; always since, until now, Mrs. Anerley or Emily had accompanied them to chapel or for a walk.

"I wanted an opportunity to tell you, Mr. Anerley," said Salome, "that Constance has discovered my secret."

Cecil's tell-tale face revealed at once that he already knew this, and in a few minutes all was told between them.

"I have a strange, sad feeling," said Salome, "that now he is come to this I ought to do something without repugnance for the class to which he belongs, and which I have heard you say are always so largely represented at these free breakfasts."

"But, suppose—" returned the young man, and then hesitated, abruptly and painfully.

"I know what you would say, Mr. Anerley; I may meet him there. But that is not in the least probable. I expect his condition has driven him from London; he would be too proud to run the risk of encountering his old equals and associates, to be looked upon by them with scorn."

"Perhaps you are right," he said, and they talked of other subjects for a while. But as they drew near the Mission Hall, Cecil said to Salome, "Be prepared for what is a very painful sight."

It was strange almost how plainly his sympathy with her delicate perceptions and acute sensibilities made him able to appreciate what were likely to be her sensations at any new and striking manifestations of human wants and woes. Perhaps it was well he had prepared her, for certainly it was a sight to try any woman of refined feeling.

Seated closely on the benches of the hall were a party of men and women and children which can best be described by the one word "nondescript." Some of them were coarse, low, vulgar—steeped from childhood upward in the sordid life of viciousness and crime; others, refined in manner, even aristocratic in feature, trained, one might judge, in luxury and ease, well educated, with an excellent knowledge of mathematics, languages, and grammar, but sunk to this dire state by indulgence in drink and sensuality of all kinds. Broken-down gentlemen, with a horrible skulking sense of shame on their lowering brows, huddled close to abject poor who had never even known what it was to live save in a cellar, a gutter, or a public-house; little forlorn boys and girls, who had strayed in here with the pleasant consciousness that at least their awful craving for food would for this time be appeased. Unhappy women were there, who had been at first the pampered slaves of man in his awfully careless thirst for pleasure, now sunk so low that they have no other means than this to procure a meal.

Together with all these, a small smattering of decent poor, reduced to terrible straits by sickness, or thrown out of work, perchance, by singularly bad times in their trade, by their own want of thrift, or still more often by some unusual indulgence in that giant foe of working-men and women's happiness, strong drink—paying a heavy penalty for rare indulgence by being turned off by the master when one hand less is needed at his works.

All of them now reduced, alas! to be alike terribly quiet and subdued, with the mark of the gaunt finger of hunger upon every wan, pale face, and there was hardly a rosy one among them; but with lurking passions of terrible import to society, ready to burst out when once their craving was appeased. Now and then a rather late arrival slunk into the room, looked round tremblingly for a seat in the already full room, but space was made for him or her by the touching freemasonry of starving trouble. The tears gathered fast in the eyes of Salome Stanley.

It was heart-aching to know by actual experience that there were so many so ready to present themselves for a meal. No tempting viands either, except to the really hungry--thick bread and a very little butter, with a mug of good hot coffee; yet there was no mistaking the looks of keen satisfaction on those varied faces when the viands were distributed. Among the rest, and Salome thought almost the only happy-looking one there, except the children, was a negro sailor lad, a friendless youth, waiting for a ship, no doubt—any ship, any captain that would take him; yet with such a pleasant smile, and bright eyes, and ready exhibition of his white teeth and guileless expression, that he was quite agreeable to look at.

Toward one poor young mother Salome felt particularly drawn, she sat so patiently, so unobtrusively, with her three little ones, and waited so modestly, and received so gratefully the much-prized meal. On her small young face were written want and trouble and inexperience. Salome sat down by her and elicited her simple history. She had been comfortably off, she said, while her young husband lived; but since his death had found it hard to live, and had known sore trouble. Her last baby, born just after its father's death, first saw the light in a workhouse. A little fellow of three or four, and a sickly little child of two, made up, with the six months' old baby, her little group.

She had come out of the workhouse hoping to get work and be able to keep all together. They took her two elder ones away from her in the workhouse, and she did not know how to bear that. If she could only furnish a room she might get on, she thought. She had heard by accident, at the lodging-house where she slept, of this free breakfast, and had been so happy and thankful to get one good meal for herself and her little ones without trespassing on the scanty resources of her almost empty purse.

Many such sad little histories were imparted to Salome Stanley that morning, and she felt how even the mere expression of her tenderness and pity comforted the narrators.

It seemed to her that just such a crowd as this must have gathered around the Saviour—all classes, all griefs, all diseases, mental and physical, confident of His desire and power to assuage and heal.

"Shall we sing a hymn, my friends?" said Miss Calvert's pleasant voice; "and by that time breakfast will be ready. Will one of you choose what it shall be."

"Jesus of Nazareth passeth by," cried one old woman in a shrill treble.

Miss Calvert sat down to the harmonium and played the air over once, then Salome Stanley started the hymn. One and another joined in, and then as abruptly left off, and listened instead to the rich beauty of her clear sweet voice. She sang through one verse alone, her own pale cheeks flushed and beautiful with emotion. At the last line all joined, appreciating the fine effect, proceeding throughout as if Mr. Sankey himself had been singing.

Salome, abashed at first, but gaining confidence as she proceeded, continued all the verses of the plaintive hymn. When it was finished there was a pause.

"Would the young lady be so kind as to sing us another?" A homely-looking working man, with a baby in his arms, and a frail, delicate-looking wife beside him, rose to ask it, with tears in his sad eyes. Salome could not refuse.

"I will," she said, "if you all wish it." They all did wish it. Every hand was raised, and some voices, in assent. She chose a favorite of her own, which she had learned from Emily Anerley, "The Lost Sheep." It begins thus:

> "How many sheep are straying
>   Far from the Saviour's fold,
> Upon the lonely mountains
>   They shiver with the cold."

The chorus seemed especially appropriate to her surroundings:

> "Oh! come let us go and find them,
>   In the paths of death they roam;
> At the close of the day 'twill be sweet to say
>   I have brought some lost sheep home."

Cecil would not disturb her by openly showing himself; but out of sight, at the bottom of the room, he stood and listened, and longed, more han he could have found words to express, that e sweet singer, whose tender voice was even ow softening many a stony heart, many a guilty oul, and bringing blessed repentant tears to any eyes unused to weep, had had no personal riefs to cloud her life and chafe her spirit; was ee to return the love that had been so warm in is heart toward her. "Dear Salome! Poor alome!" thought Cecil. "I must ever love er as a cherished friend. I must ever pity her om my soul. Let me at least be careful never wound nor grieve her by reminding her again my own bitter disappointment in thus losing r."

It was a generous resolve, and faithfully and ivalrously did Cecil keep it.

(To be continued.)

THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY.

By P. W. E.

(Continued from page 711.)

II. The First Resurrection—III. The Second Resurrection—IV. The Raised Body to be Material.

2d. There shall be a resurrection of the just. his is called is resurrection of the saints precedes the sec- d, or the resurrection of the unjust, by at least thousand years. The Bible carefully distin- ishes between these two resurrections as to e, circumstances, and character of those sed. The first are raised from among the dead; ut the rest of the dead lived not again until the ousand years were finished. This is the first urrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath t in the first resurrection; on such the sec- d death hath no power, but they shall be ests of God and of Christ, and shall reign h him a thousand years" (Rev. 20:5, 6).

THE FIRST RESURRECTION.

his is a resurrection which takes place be- se "he that raised up Christ from the dead ll also quicken your mortal bodies by, or mar- al reading, because of his Spirit that dwell- in you" (Rom. 8:11). It is a "resurrection life," in contrast with the resurrection of nation, or rather judgment (John 5:29). s first resurrection takes place at the time Lord comes for his saints. "They that are ist's, at his coming" (1 Cor. 15:23). It urs before the tribulation in contra-distinc- to that of the resurrection of the wicked d.

e have accounts of many being raised from dead; but the master proof is that Christ rose n among the dead. He was seen by His own stles and the saints, as witnesses, at different es and in different places for the space of y days. The prophets and Moses declared at Christ should be the first that should rise n the dead" (Acts 26:23). "If we believe Jesus died and rose again, even so them which sleep, in or through Jesus—marginal ling—will God bring with Him. For this say unto you by the word of the Lord, that which are alive and remain unto the coming he Lord shall not prevent—go before—them ch are asleep. For the Lord Himself shall end from heaven with a shout, with the e of the archangel, and with the trump of ; and the dead in Christ shall rise first. n we which are alive and remain shall be ht up together with them in the clouds, to t the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one her with these words" (1 Thess. 4:14–18). passage should be read with 1 Cor. 15:51, "Behold, I show you a mystery; we shall all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a ent, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last p, for the trumpet shall sound, and the l shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall hanged."

om these two passages, we learn that when righteous are raised the trumpet is to sound e. At the sound of the first trumpet, those are asleep or who have died, are to rise, the trumpet sounds again, and those who are alive are caught up together with them, and all meet the Lord in the air. "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, "Death is swallowed up in victory" (1 Cor. 15:53, 54).

What a victory! "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him. But God hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit; for the spirit searcheth all things; yea, the deep things of God." Well does the Lord Jesus say, "I am the Resurrection and the Life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die" (John 11:25, 26). That is, those who believe, though they are dead at Christ's coming, shall live; and those who are alive and believe on the Lord Jesus, shall not die, but shall be changed and caught up. He who has "the keys of death and hell" displays his power over both classes. Hell or Hades gives up possession, and death is cancelled to the living just. The redemption of the body is completed. "The Lord himself shall descend." "So shall we ever be with the Lord."

3d. The resurrection of the unjust, or

THE SECOND RESURRECTION.

This takes place after the righteous have reigned with the Lord Jesus Christ a thousand years. It is known as the resurrection of judgment. When the "sea gives up the dead which are in it, and death and hell deliver up the dead which are in them;" and "the dead, small and great, stand before God" (Rev. 20:12, 13). The unjust are to be raised just as surely as are the just; but the results—so different. One, a resurrection of life; the other, a resurrection of judgment.

4th. These

MORTAL BODIES ARE TO BE RAISED,

changed, and to consist of flesh and bones. "Enoch was not, for God took him," and Elijah was carried to heaven in a chariot of fire. Neither of these men left his body in the grave; but both of them in their mortal form, changed and glorified of course, ascended on high. These two are a pledge that all saints shall rise in the same manner: that is, with the same kind of bodies. Would it be likely that two spirits would be in heaven, clothed in flesh, while the rest are unclothed? Paul longed not "to be unclothed, but to be clothed upon." "Even we ourselves groan within ourselves waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body" (Rom. 8:23).

There is a very remarkable passage in Jude, 9th verse, where it speaks of Michael, the Archangel, contending with the devil about the body of Moses, and using no "railing accusation." In this we see that the body of Moses was watched over by the Archangel. The devil, it seems, intended to disturb the body, but Michael contended with him about it. There would have been no contention about the body if of no value. He would never have withstood the enemy for that which was to be scattered to the four winds of heaven, never to be raised again into a glorious, incorruptible body.*

Jesus, when He rose from the grave, was not a mere spirit unclothed. His body could be touched. Did He not say, "Handle me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have" (Luke 24:39). If we are to rise, as Christ did, then our bodies are to be raised, though all bodies are not the same. "There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial; but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another" (1 Cor. 15:40).

"There is one flesh of men, and another of beasts;" and there is one flesh of this body, and another flesh of the heavenly body. There is one body for the soul here, and another body for the spirit up there; and yet it shall be the same body that will rise again from the grave; the same in identity, though not in adaptation or in glory.

The Holy Spirit, through the apostles, confirms the doctrine that the bodies of the saints are raised again. In the first Epistle to the Cor., 6th chapter, we have an abundance of proof. "Now the body," says the Holy Ghost through Paul, "is not for fornication, but for the Lord; and the Lord for the body" (verse 13). The body, then, is the Lord's.

"With what body do they come?" (1 Cor. 15:35). "It is sown; it is raised." "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body" (1 Cor. 15:42-44).

Just what change takes place, the Word does not teach us; but we are informed that God cares for the very dust of His saints; and their resurrection is the "redemption of the body"—a body already claimed by the Holy Ghost as His temple. "He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies, by His Spirit, that dwelleth in you!" (Rom. 8:11). Notice, it is the mortal bodies that He quickens, not the spiritual.

This body for the spirit is developed out of the natural, or soul body. The same Power that at first gave life to the natural body, though it may become dust in the grave, shall cause to rise from it a body for the spirit. With men this is impossible; but with God all things are possible. Man cannot define it, nor can he comprehend it, only as God's child by the light of faith in the Word of God.

Not only are the souls of the unjust lost, but also their bodies. Here let us notice one important truth. All the Epistles are written to saints; not one word is written to the unregenerated. Thus what is said about the resurrection of the saints, and with what bodies they are raised, does not apply to the unjust. The saints are raised incorruptible and with glorious bodies, in virtue of their having been regenerated and redeemed by the blood of the Lord Jesus. The wicked have rejected redemption and chosen their own way; and we do not find one word in the Bible that informs us that they shall be raised in any other way than with their own natural natures and bodies.

Care should be taken not to misapply God's word. Much of the teachings in the Gospels is to the unregenerated; to them we must look for information on this point. Says the Lord Jesus, "And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee; for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell" (Matt. 5:30). Again He says, "Fear not them which kill the body, and are not able to kill the soul, but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell" (Matt. 10:28). When the wicked dead are raised, they are to be judged every man according to his works; "and whosoever is not found written in the book of life is to be cast into the lake of fire" (Rev. 20).

Not so with the children of God. All Christians have Christ for their life. "Their life is hid with Christ in God" (Col. 3:3). Though "it be appointed unto man once to die," yet "we shall not all sleep," for there shall be some who will be changed without dying. "The dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." At an unexpected moment we shall enter into this scene, ordained by the Father and prepared by the Lord Jesus. The power of God will accomplish this change in an instant. The trumpet may sound any moment, and we be summoned to meet the Lord in the air. "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory" (Col. 3:4). "Wherefore comfort one another with these words" (1 Thess. 4:18).

---

* The passage I Cor. 15:35, 38 seems to imply that the germs of our spiritual bodies are contained in the bodies we have now.—ED.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of back numbers to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

SINGLE COPIES

can most conveniently be obtained through newsdealers. Any complaint that the CHRISTIAN HERALD cannot be obtained from a particular newsdealer is promptly attended to if we are given the name and street address of the dealer who does not keep it for sale.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS

ordering the Christian Herald for 1881 are hereby offered the paper free from the time their remittence is received till the end of the present year.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Proclamation Appointing Thursday, November 25th, as a day of thanksgiving, thus summarizes the blessings for which he justly considers thanks are due to the Giver of all Mercies : " At no period in their history, since the United States became a nation, has this people had so abundant and so universal reasons for joy and gratitude at the favor of Almighty God, or been subject to so profound an obligation to give thanks for His loving kindness, and humbly to implore His continued care and protection. Health, wealth, and prosperity throughout all our borders ; peace, honor, and friendship with all the world ; firm and faithful adherence by the great body of our population to the principles of liberty and justice which have made our greatness as a nation, and to the wise institutions and strong frame of government and society which will perpetuate it — for all these let the thanks of a happy and united people, as with one voice, ascend in devout homage to the Giver of all good."

Now that the Exciting Presidential Contest has been concluded, we may hope that the bitter party hostility which has characterized it will be allayed. It seems probable that the Democratic party will still have a majority in the Senate and a large and influential representation in the House. It will be in the power of that party to prove that, although excluded from the honor and emoluments of office, it is animated by a lofty patriotism which prompts it to work for the common good of the country without those inducements.

It will be seen, on examining the returns, that the contest for the Presidency turned, as was expected, on the vote of New York. General Garfield owes his election to this State. The country was so equally divided that without New York neither candidate had a majority in the Electoral College. Had New York been carried by the Democratic party, as it was in 1876, General Hancock would now have been President-elect. It is therefore an interesting question as to the causes which operated to change the Democratic majority of 32,818 in the State in 1876 into a Republican majority of 24,865 in 1880. There have been many reasons assigned for the movement, and several prominent Democrats charge it to the selfishness and mismanagement of the leaders of the party in the cities of New York and Brooklyn, where the loss of votes has been greatest. That is a matter of opinion ; but it is certain that the jealousies of the two sections of the party injured its prospects, whoever was responsible for those jealousies.

The fact that at the polls the solid South was confronted by an almost solid North is not an encouraging sign of the times. It shows that sectional animosity is still active, and the most useful work to which the new President can set his hand will be that of an effort to heal old wounds and unite the two sections in one harmonious whole. That he may make that effort, and that in doing so he may have the blessing and guidance of God, should be the prayer of every Christian patriot of both parties in North and South.

A Riot Occurred in Denver, Col., on Oct. 31st, owing to the alleged illegal registration of voters and antagonism to the Chinese. A mob of about a thousand persons attacked the Chinese, and, with cries of " Lynch the lepers !" beat, shot, and mutilated the defenceless and unoffending foreigners, tore down their houses, and destroyed their property ; and the police and fire department combined could not stay the rioters. Such scenes are disgraceful in a civilized land, and bring discredit on our national honor.

Nearly Three Millions and a Half of Letters and packages were received at the Dead Letter Office at Washington during the fiscal year ended June 30th last, of which 290,000 were held for postage, 202,000 were misdirected, and over 9000 were not addressed at all. The great mass of the letters and packages contained nothing of value, and over 2,000,000 of this description were destroyed, the senders not being found. Of the remainder, 21,974 contained drafts, checks, notes, etc., of the face value of $1,526,217, and 26,264 contained money amounting to $49,-438. Most of the property has been returned to the senders. These particulars ought to make people careful about two things : 1st, addressing their letters ; 2d, finding fault all round when they miss a letter or paper.

Those who are in the Habit of Drinking alcoholic beverages in cold weather to promote warmth will do well to consider the following extract from a speech delivered by Lieutenant Schwatka at the New York Academy of Sciences on November 1st. As to the use of alcohol, Lieutenant Schwatka said that not a drop of ardent spirit of any kind was used in his sled journey of 3251 miles. On long journeys ardent spirits could not be carried in bulk without displacing other indispensable articles. Alcohol was not regarded as necessary, and was not considered a good heating agent. On shipboard the general use of alcoholic stimulants was considered bad.

The Wreck of the Steamer Rhode Island, of the Providence line, on Saturday, November 6th, adds to the list of maritime catastrophes of which the last few months have been so prolific. Although happily the wreck was not attended by any loss of life, these frequent disasters occasion a sense of insecurity and apprehension among the numerous class of citizens who are in the habit of travelling daily by steamboat. The Rhode Island belonged to the same line as the Narragansett, which was wrecked last summer, and was one of the stanchest of the Sound steamers. She left her dock in New York on Friday evening, with about one hundred passengers and the usual quantity of freight on board. The night was very foggy, and the captain proceeded with the utmost caution. All went well until four o'clock on Saturday morning, when a tremendous crash was heard, and the passengers rushed from their berths in their night-clothes shrieking with fright.

It was found that the vessel had struck on the rocks off Bonnet Point. She was swaying violently as the waves beat against her, groaning and straining in the heavy sea. To add to the alarm the large chandelier in the saloon fell, and th passengers were left in darkness. Then the tw smoke-stacks went by the board, crushing in part of the deck. The captain and crew retaine their coolness, and perfect discipline prevailed.

It was impossible to attempt a landing unt dawn, and during that time of waiting, as o of the passengers observes, " not much was sai
but there were many anxious thoughts." break of day the boats were launched, and a li was stretched between the shore and the vess and by this means all the passengers and cre were landed in safety. They found the coa very rugged, and it was necessary to scale a pe pendicular rock over thirty feet high. A ro suspended from the summit enabled the rescu people to make the ascent, and they were th conveyed in wagons lent by the farmers to hotel.

It is thought that the vessel will be a tot loss. Bonnet Point is known to be a dangero part of the coast, and a sum of money to buil lighthouse there has been three times voted by t
Senate, but the act has each time failed in t House. Such a lighthouse would have prevent the wreck of the Rhode Island.

A Practical Effect of the Recent Temperan movement in Washington, D. C., is seen in t diminished number of licenses to sell liqu that are issued, and the difficulty saloon-kee ers have in obtaining them. The Washingt correspondent of a Chicago journal say
" The law, as a general statement, requires th each petition should be indorsed by neighbori property-holders and reputable persons. It been decided in the temperance mass meetin that every church member be urged not to le his name to any such document ; also, that eve license granted shall have its indorsers' na prominently displayed thereon and be posted c spicuously in the seller's place of business. Th and many other practical points have been ma
The effect on our commissioners has been gre
Now there is no speed in issuing these licens whereas formerly they seemed to be spilled ou
The conspicuous exhibition of the names of reputable petitioners in the bars of the drink saloons makes the signatures difficult to obta
It would be well if the practice were enforced every city of the Union.

Christian People are Often Blamed on ground that they direct their efforts to spiritual part of man's nature and neglect temporal interests. A recent report issued the Chicago Y. M. C. A. contains the foll ing note, which rebuts that charge : " A b ness man called at our Employment Bureau week for a couple of laborers. He told the s rintendent, Mr. J. M. Hitchcock, that he himself, eight years before, been sent by bureau, as an office boy, to the very firm of wh he is now a member."

Bible and Prayer Union.—The Lessons
the ensuing week are the consecutive Psalms, c mencing with Psalm 102 for Friday, November 1
The following requests for prayer have been recei (Jeremiah 33 : 3): For a member of the church full assurance of acceptance by her Lord.—For who has fallen into the error of Universalism, tha may be brought to accept Jesus now, while ther time.—From a Christian wife and mother for the version of her husband and children, all as strangers to Christ.—From a young lay-preac that the Lord would guide his steps and give hi fresh baptism of the Holy Spirit.—From a citize Hancock Co., Ga., that the sale of intoxicating uor, now doing so much harm among the young of that locality, may be stayed.—For a very wic man, whose conduct is causing much distress to family.—From one to whom the reading of CHRISTIAN HERALD has been blessed, that a Christian friend may be restored to health, if sistent with God's will, and that she may, if she covers, be the means of leading the unconve members of her family to Christ.—From one wh the only Christian member of a household, that beloved brothers and sisters may be brought the light of the children of God.—That God w open a door of usefulness to one who desire serve Him in the ministry, and thoroughly fur him for the work.

End of an Elopement.—Sarah Dempsey, Believed to be 111 years of age, was found dead in bed in her hut on the Ulster Mountains, near Ellenville, N. Y., on November 4th. No food of any kind was in the hut, and the appearance of the corpse indicated that the old lady had become unable to get out of her bed, and had lain there until she died of starvation. Beside the bed a piece of paper was found, on which she had written with a pencil the following words, being unable to finish the sentence: "I am dying by inches from hunger. My money will be found—" Mrs. Dempsey had long lived alone in her hut, miles from any other dwelling. Nearly a hundred years ago she eloped from school with a young man, who soon abandoned her; and she is said to have forsaken society and lived a solitary life ever after. Her sin was great, and her punishment has been heavy.

The Storm on Lake Michigan, in which the Alpena was lost, on October 16th, caused consider able loss of life and property. Upward of half a million dollars damage was done to vessels and argoes, and ninety-three persons perished. here were seventeen total wrecks, involving a oss of $153,900; and in all, sixty-six vessels were amaged to a greater or less extent.

A Single Grain of Sand Caused the Death of wo men and the destruction of a considerable mount of property near Paterson, N. J., on ovember 3d. On the side of a hill in Passaic ounty are erected the extensive powder-mills f Messrs. Laflin & Rand. This dangerous man- facture is surrounded by precautions of all kinds or minimizing the risks necessarily run by the peratives. There is, however, one danger gainst which the proprietors cannot provide a reventive, and that is the accidental introduc- on of minute grains of sand among the com- ustibles. On Wednesday, while the men were t work, one of these little rough particles had ound its way into the granulating department, nd during the progress of the work it produced iction, which caused the ignition of the powder d an explosion in which the walls of the mill ere overturned and two workmen killed. This eplorable calamity was brought about by a cause any people would call trivial; but there is no epartment in life where it is safe to under-esti- ate the importance of trifles. Especially ought e Christian to take care that he never, by a rsh word or inconsistent act, however insig- ficant it may appear to him, cause those who atch him to lose their reverence for the holy me he bears.

Col. Ingersoll's Exposition of the Doctrine forgiveness through the blood of Christ is a riking illustration of 1 Cor. 1:18. In a lecture cently delivered he said, that whereas under the d Testament dispensation a sinner obtained rdon for his sins by sacrificing a sheep, the odern Christian did not take that trouble: he erred to the death of Jesus, and said, "Charge ' Charge it!" He thought that was a mean y of getting forgiveness, and he preferred to nake a settlement on his own merits." It is dom that notorious blasphemer makes a state- nt so precisely true. The humble Christian devoutly thankful that there is no necessity make a settlement for his sin on his own rits. He is deeply thankful that the riches of d's grace manifested in the sacrifice of the oss are so abundant that they cover his sins, t he is assured he may plead the sufferings his Saviour in full discharge of his debt.

he Glare and Glitter of Vice Often Exises a fatal attraction on young people who e had no opportunity of seeing the end of the h its votaries tread. A striking exhibition of stage in that sad and shameful journey may seen in the Hudson County jail at the present e. In Ward No. 5 is a woman still bearing ces of remarkable beauty, who was once known he queen of vice in New York. In 1865 she upied a splendid mansion in this city, which the resort of profligate brokers and business who were thriving on the profits of war con- ts, and who lavished their money upon her. She dressed with the utmost magnificence, frequently wearing on her hands jewels worthy fifty thousand dollars. Now, broken down in health and behind prison bars, she pleads for a few cents to purchase a cup of tea. Deserted by her friends, stripped of the proceeds of her sin, her constitution shattered, she is on the threshold of the grave, having no hope for the life to come. Such are part of the wages wherewith Satan pays his servants.

The Roman Catholic Church and the Bible.—Those who think that the days of persecution are over, and believe that the Roman Catholic Church has so far improved as to relinquish the intolerant spirit which characterized it in bygone days, will do well to ponder the fact mentioned at a public meeting in New York last week. It was stated by one of the speakers that only a few days ago a Roman Catholic, whom he was endeavoring to bring to a knowledge of the truth, had been prohibited by her priest from speaking to him again, or even to read the Bible.

A Singular Death from Poisoning Occurred a few days ago at Granville, N. Y. Dr. Nelson, a physician practising in that city, was recently seized with a sudden fatal illness, which had all the symptoms of mineral poisoning. After his death it was discovered that the water he drank was stored in a painted cistern, and had afterward flowed through twenty-four feet of lead pipe. The physicians who attended him believe that the water had become impregnated with lead, and had thus caused his death. Several recent cases of preachers being disciplined for preaching erroneous doctrine indicate that a similar process is going on in spiritual matters. The pure water of the Gospel becomes impregnated with tradition and the theories of men and those who hear suffer loss of spiritual health by imbibing the poison.

A Savage Black Wolf is at Large in Montgomery County, Pa. He escaped from an exhibitor's cage and took to the woods. He emerges at night and feeds on the farmers' fowls, one owner having lost two hundred and fifty through the wolf's depredations. Dogs have been set upon him, but by his superior strength and cunning he has vanquished them, and though he has been shot at several times he has hitherto escaped unhurt. Parents are exercising unwonted vigilance over their little children lest in wandering about alone they may fall a victim to this ferocious beast. Even parents who voluntarily expose their offspring to the attacks of the more crafty and ruthless being who goes about seeking whom he may devour are anxious while this wolf remains alive and free.

"I Can Understand it," says a Reformed drunkard, in a letter recently received by a Christian worker in Cincinnati. "A friend said to me recently it was wonderful how I, apparently without aid, sympathy, or encouragement, had quit the use of intoxicating drinks without resorting to some other stimulant. He could not understand it—thank God, I can; it is not my work, it is the Lord's." He had been found in rags, intoxicated and half-starved, cast off in despair by his wealthy and influential friends; he had been induced to sign the pledge and been brought under Christian influence, and now he is a respectable member of society.

The Chicago Y. M. C. A. Received a Letter from a British sailor some time ago, which shows how valuable and useful are such institutions. The sailor said that while on a visit to this country he had strayed into the Association rooms in Chicago, and had, although even then under the influence of liquor, been deeply impressed. After the meeting he signed the pledge, and he recollects an old lady who was present, telling him she should pray for him. Not long after, he gave his heart to the Saviour, and since then has been the instrument of the reformation, and in some cases of the conversion of many comrades. Writing from a South African station, where he is in the service of Queen Victoria, he blesses God that he was led into the Chicago Association that eventful day.

THE DUTY OF THE PRESENT HOUR.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Break up your fallow ground: for it is time to seek the Lord, till he come and rain righteousness upon you."—HOSEA 10. 12.

Human Nature, a Small Farm — Three Fields, Body, Mind, and Spirit — Neglected Ground Brings Forth Weeds—Passive Men Will be Lost—The Field Must be Cleared—Then the Sowing and the Rain—I. A Time Mentioned—It is Time to Seek the Lord as Soon as Right is Known from Wrong—When it is Late in the Day of Life—Special Occasions—Time to Yield Before Chastisement Comes—Time in the House of God—When the Heart is Slightly Moved—II. A Search Commended—For the Lord Not for Priests or Sacraments—III. A Period Set—A A Live-long Lozenge—The Persevering Search of Columbus—Elijah's Prayer for Rain.

"BREAK up your fallow ground." Our nature at its largest is but a small farm, and we had need to get a harvest out of every acre of it, for our needs are great. Have we left any part of our small allotment uncultivated? If so, it is time to look into the matter and see if we cannot improve this wasteful state of things., What part of our small allotment have we left fallow? We should think very poorly of a farmer who for many years allowed the best and the richest part of his farm to lie altogether neglected and untilled. An occasional fallow has its benefits in the world of nature; but if the proprietor of rich and fruitful land allowed the soil to continue fallow year after year we should judge him to be out of his wits. The wasted acres ought to be taken from him and given to another husbandman who would worthily cherish the generous fields and encourage them to yield their harvests.

Bad is the man who neglects to cultivate his farm, but what shall be said of the sluggard who fails to cultivate himself? If it be wrong to leave untended a part of our estate, how much worse must it be to disregard a portion of ourselves! Now, there is a part of our nature which many allow to lie fallow. It is not often that they neglet the clay soil of their outward frame. They dress that field which is called the body with sufficient care; and truly I would not that they should be careless about it, for it is worthy to be kept in due order and culture.

Albeit that it is a very secondary part of our nature, yet it is so interwoven with the higher that it is most important that the body should not be neglected. See ye well to that field, and by temperance, cleanliness, and obedience to the rules of health let it be as a garden. Though it be after all but dust and ashes, akin to the common earth around us, yet the body is honorable, and when grace has sanctified the soul the body becomes the temple of the Holy Ghost. Few need to be exhorted to pay attention to their bodies. "What shall we eat? What shall we drink, and wherewithal shall we be clothed?" is a trinity of questions which the majority of mankind spend all their lives in answering. The fault is not that they care for the body, but that it takes an undue share of consideration, and usurps a higher place than it can claim.

There is a second field in

MAN'S SELF-FARM,

and this is called the mind, or the soul, and there are many who neglect this. These do ill, for "that the soul be without knowledge, it is not good." There should be for the mental powers instruction and discipline. We should seek to know, and learn to understand, for we are not as the brutes which perish, which know nothing beyond their daily wants; we have thought and judgment, and memory, and imagination: these all need to be trained and used. Let the mind be cultivated by all means; and yet I need not say much upon this, for "culture" has become a kind of watchword with certain professors of religion, and with supposed knowledge they are puffed up. They have enough thought for the mind, and they glory in the harvests which it yields of human knowledge and earthly learning.

The soul in such cases seems to be well tilled, but the spirit, the highest nature of all—that with which we speak to God—is suffered to lie entirely fallow! The soil where true religion should flourish in the furrows is left by many to produce the deadly nightshade of superstition, the hemlock of error, or the thistle of doubt. Is it not so with some of you who listen to me at this hour? Your hearts, your innermost natures, have been neglected, and from the finest part of your being the Lord has derived neither rent nor revenue. Your best acres lie fallow—fallow when you have good need to cultivate every inch of the ground.

Do you know what happens to a fallow field? how it becomes caked and baked hard as though it were a brick? All the friable qualities seem to depart, and it hardens as it lies caked and unbroken; I mean, of course, if year succeed year, and the fallow remains untouched. And then the weeds!

If a man will not sow wheat, he shall have a crop for all that, for the weeds will spring up, and they will seed themselves, and in due time the multiplication table will be worked out to a very wonderful extent; for these seeds, multiplying a hundredfold, as evil usually does, will increase, and increase, and increase again till the fallow field shall become a wilderness of thorns and briers, and a thicket of dock, nettle, and thistle. If you do not cultivate your heart, Satan will cultivate it for you. If you bring no crop to God, the devil will be sure to reap a harvest.

I fear that I am speaking to some who have never thought about this. It has not occurred to them to consider themselves, and the reasons for which they have a being. There is one text which I should like to drop into your ear in the hope that it may drop down through your ear right into your heart: "The wicked shall be turned into hell." "Oh!" you say, "that is not me." No, I did not mean that for you; I have not finished the verse yet. This is the part for you—"and all the nations that forget God." There are nations of them, so numerous are careless souls. What did they do? They did not do anything; they merely fell into a little matter of neglect: that is all. They forgot something; they forgot God.

So my text begins right well by saying, "Break up your fallow ground." Begin to look to what you have neglected. Take a survey of what has come already of your neglect. Contemplate what result will surely come of continued carelessness. God helping you, go into that field which is up to your knees with weeds, and look around it, and say, "This must be cleared out. This must be got ready for ploughing. We cannot have this sad waste any longer. Now, by God's grace, we will enter into it, and will clear all the rubbish away, and pray the eternal God to bring the great steam plough of His almighty grace and tear up the soil to the very bottom, and then to burn these weeds and make this ground fit to be sown, that it may bring forth a harvest to His praise."

Leaving that first part of the text, I am going to dwell upon the second: "It is time to seek the Lord, till He come and rain righteousness upon you."

I. First, here is

A TIME MENTIONED.

When is it time to seek the Lord? I am not going to try to say anything fine, but something that will come home to each unconverted person. May the Holy Spirit help me in this attempt, and bless it to your souls. When is it time to seek the Lord?

Well, it is time as soon as ever you know right from wrong. Oh! it will be a thousand blessings to you, dear boy and girl, wherever you may be at this moment, and to you young people that are listening to me, if you are led to seek the Lord while yet you are little. While you are yet children may you become children of God. Before you are permitted to go into open sin may your hearts be opened to divine grace. Some of us who were converted while we were children will have to praise God forever, not only for our conversion, but for our early conversion.

I have often prayed that prayer of David, "O Lord, Thou hast taught me from my youth, and hitherto have I declared thy wondrous works." I look forward hopefully to the time when I shall add, "Now also when I am old and gray-headed, O God, forsake me not." If you have had a man in your employ ever since he was a boy, you do not like to turn him off when he grows old; and our Lord never turns off His old servants. It is a surely prevalent plea with Him, "Thou art my hope, O Lord God: Thou art my trust from my youth."

It is time to seek the Lord as soon as we can seek anything, for to such seekers there is the special promise, "They that seek me early shall find me." I found the Lord and joined His church when I was fifteen years old, and I feel it no small joy to say with Obadiah, "I thy servant fear the Lord from my youth." Early piety saves from much sin and sorrow, and is often followed by a blessed and useful life.

But it is time especially to seek the Lord when it is late in the day of life, and the shades of the eternal night are gathering. If it is time when the first morning breaks, how much more solemnly it is time when the shadows lengthen! You cannot live long, dear friend, for age, I see, is telling upon your once stalwart form. In the order of nature you must soon be gone. You know that you have passed your threescore and ten, perhaps your fourscore years, and you are living now upon the special charity of God. You have run out your lease, and are now a daily tenant. Surely it is time for you to seek the Lord. You may be gone to the judgment and the irreversible sentence before another Sabbath comes round.

"It may be no to-morrow
Shall dawn for you or me·
Why will you run the awful risk
Of all eternity?"

Take heed to yourselves that you do not trifle on the verge of eternity. With one foot in the grave, oh, seek to have both feet on the Rock of Ages! Then you need not fear old age and its infirmities, or its closing hours. Jesus will cheer and comfort you, and your eventide shall only be the prelude of a blessed morning—a morning without clouds.

What a mercy it is that the very wording of the text gives us encouragement! "It is time to seek the Lord"—then there still is time in which to seek the Lord. Then it is not over with me, even if I have long delayed. I may still come to him. Yes, when you are nothing but a bag of bones, with a crown of gray hair, Christ will have you. When you can only totter on your staff, you may come to Jesus, and if you have grown so infirm that even your memory begins to fail you, and all your senses seem to be departing, yet He can give you a child's eye—the eye of faith, and a child's heart—the heart of love, and make you a new man in Christ Jesus.

There are special occasions in which a divine call is made to men. If you remember, we read just now the word of the Lord in which He says, "It is in my desire that I should chastise them," and this is said in connection with the words of our text, "It is time to seek the Lord." Now, have any of you been under the chastising hand of God of late? Have you been sick? Do you come up to this house after a time of illness? Well, it is a choice mercy to be afflicted. Take care that you do not despise it. The Lord has not given you up, it seems, for still He thinks it worth His while to put bit and bridle upon you. Waste not the opportunity which recovered health brings you, but hearken to the divine call. He smites you that you may run to Him to have the wound bound up.

Or is it, dear friends, that you have lost lately some of those who were dear to you? Are they in heaven? Are you not going there yourself? Then, God calls you by that baby that has been removed, by that godly mother or that Christian friend who has gone home. He calls you, and He says, "It is time to seek the Lord." Or have you been losing property? Is trade very bad? Have you been out of work, and are you brought to poverty? Will not these whips touch you, and drive you to seek the Lord?

I sometimes think that I have good reason for trusting God, because I have nothing else to trust in. And beyond a question you might use the same reason.

GO TO GOD,

for everything else is going away from you You will soon have nothing left. Oh, man, mak sure of your God! When a Christian is in abundance, he finds God in everything, and when a Christian is in poverty, then he find everything in God. But you cannot do that you cannot do that, for God is nothing to you And where will you be when all is gone, and yo have no God?

It will be wise for us to add, and for you t remember, that it is time to seek the Lord befor the chastisement comes. Is it not a wise thing t escape, if we can, from these judgments, fo though kindly meant, it were better if we di not render them necessary? Soul, dost tho want to be whipped to Christ? If God mean to save thee He will bring thee by fire, and H will bring thee through water; yea, He wi break all thy bones in the bringing, but brin thee He will. Why necessitate the roughe means?

Let me argue with any that have been living life of sin, and have never come to Chris Have you not had enough of it? May not th time past suffice you? Here are some swe words which I would fain put into your mouth

"He has called, I cannot tarry,
I have heard his voice before;
I will leave these deadly slumbers,
And set open wide the door.

"In the north blast he rebuked me,
And I knew the message well;
In the south wind now he whispers,
And no longer I'll rebel.

"Even now again I hear him,
Come, my Lord, and enter in,
How can I resist thy knocking?
Come, and cover all my sin."

There are certain occasions in our lives upo which there seems to be a special mark set— sort of nota bene—to make us note well that ju now is a happy occasion. Tides to be taken the flood do happen in men's lives, and it is w if they are turned to profitable use. I thin dear friends, that it is time to seek the Lo very hopefully when you are in a place whe others have sought Him and found Him. Yo being in this house of prayer is a token f good. I can bear personal witness that there hardly a seat in this Tabernacle on which, some time or other, there has not sat a seeki sinner who has found the Saviour. If marked these seats with golden stars where sou were saved, you would see here many footprin of grace, holy places which angels look on wi delight. Why should you not now seek a find the Saviour?

Perhaps you are feeling in your heart at ti moment a measure of thoughtfulness and soft ing; some drawings are upon you. This sho that it is time for you to seek the Lord.

"E'en at this hour he calls you!
It is not yet too late;
He has not closed the day of grace,
He has not shut the gate.
He calls you! Hush! He calls you!
He would not have you go
Another step without him, Because he loves you so."

